Secondly, the hon. Gentleman and many other Conservative Members have, in effect, been saying for a significant period of time that we should bring the Good Friday agreement to an end—[Interruption.] They can shout and bawl as much as they like, but that is effectively what they have been asking for. I believe that that would be a mistake; it would be the wrong thing to do. We have now set a timetable to try to get over this last remaining difficulty.

I hope that the Conservative party will put the interests of people everywhere in the United Kingdom ahead of whatever views it might express that would undermine the agreement. I hope that it will support the Labour Government in the same way as we used to support the Conservative Government in getting the peace agreement through.

Radioactive Waste

Q9. [85193] Mr. David Chaytor (Bury, North): What plans he has to develop a policy on the long-term storage of radioactive waste.

The Prime Minister: Existing radioactive waste is stored at licensed sites under strict regulatory controls and in accordance with the highest international standards. We want to ensure that the long-term management of waste continues to ensure public safety and the protection of the environment. We shall publish a consultation paper on that around the end of the year.

Mr. Chaytor: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. In view of the latest research from Sussex university comparing the costs of reprocessing and of dry storage as methods of dealing with spent fuel, will he include the future of nuclear reprocessing in the terms of reference of the Green Paper?

The Prime Minister: I know that my hon. Friend has expressed that point of view and his concerns on several occasions. I assure him that the full range of safety, environmental and economic issues associated with reprocessing were considered in exhaustive detail during the process of consultation before THORP was commissioned. But if we were to question the continued operation of THORP, that would not be right. THORP is an operation with orders valued at some £12 billion, it provides 6,000 skilled jobs and it indirectly supports many more. We have to deal with the issue of radioactive waste, but I do not support the case of those who would like us to abandon THORP.

Engagements

Q10. [85194] Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): Why, based on the Government's figures, between 1 May 1997 and 31 March 1999 in the Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS trust area, has the number of people waiting 13 weeks or more for out-patient treatment risen from 555 to 2,422; the number of people waiting 12 months or more for hospital treatment risen from 104 to 1,093; and the total hospital waiting list figure increased by 1,500 people?

The Prime Minister: I do not know the details of the individual hospital. I am happy to accept the figures the hon. Gentleman gives, but I will check them if I may.

There is no doubt about the figures for the whole country: the waiting lists have fallen after years and years of rising. Waiting times in the whole country have fallen, and more out-patients are now being treated than two years ago. The health authority deficits that we inherited were £500 million for the whole country. They came down to £100 million last year and, I can tell the House, now stand at £12 million. Yes, it will take us time to turn around a health service that under the Government the hon. Gentleman supported was undermined and ruined every day. It will take us time, but with the extra investment that we are putting in—more nurses, more doctors and more capital spending—everywhere, including mid-Essex, will feel the benefit at the next general election.

Points of Order

3.32 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Following Welsh questions today, I wish to ask for your guidance before the next Scottish questions. As you know, in Scotland, there is now a formal coalition between the Liberal Democrats and the Labour party. Is it appropriate for the Liberals to be treated in this House as members of the Government in terms of Scottish questions or as members of the Opposition? In particular, what is the position of the hon. and learned Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) who, although he sits on the Opposition Benches, is a Minister of the Crown?

Madam Speaker: I must tell the hon. Gentleman that I have already given the position some thought. Members of the Liberal Democrat party are not represented in Her Majesty's Government in this House, so as far as I am concerned, it remains an Opposition party. It is as clear as that.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The Prime Minister might reasonably have anticipated that at least one question in the past half hour would have referred to what has happened in the past 24 hours in Macedonia. Through no fault of the Prime Minister's, he was not asked such a question. In those circumstances, has there been any request from the Defence Secretary or the Prime Minister to make a report to the House of Commons? Surely we deserve to know what is happening, whatever one's view of the continuous bombing.

Madam Speaker: I must tell the hon. Gentleman and the House that I have had no indication that the Government are seeking to make a statement at this time.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You will be aware that in January last year, the Prime Minister set up a second judicial inquiry into the events of Bloody Sunday, involving members of the 1st Battalion of the Parachute Regiment. I am distressed that the Prime Minister has slunk away from Question Time immediately. I wonder whether you have heard from him, in view of the fact that he has responsibility for security matters, that he intends to come to the House to explain why he refuses to accord the right of anonymity to those former members of the regiment who have been called to give evidence and whose lives are now at risk. This very afternoon, in advance of a hearing in the High Court tomorrow, the solicitors acting on behalf of the inquiry released to the relatives of those who died and were wounded in that incident the statements given by those soldiers containing their names, ranks and numbers.

Madam Speaker: Order. That is not a point of order for me. As I explained earlier, I have not been informed by any Minister—including the Prime Minister—that he or she is seeking to make a statement today about any issue.

Concessionary Television Licences for Pensioners

3.35 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to extend the concessionary television licence entitlement to all pensioners living in households consisting only of pensioners; and for connected purposes.

It is more than 12 years since my private Member's Bill that sought to extend television licence concessions to all pensioner-only households was defeated by 21 votes. That occurred on 16 January 1987. I was pleased that the majority of Labour Members of Parliament came to the House on a Friday to support that measure, which was defeated as a result of the then Tory Government's imposing a three-line Whip on a private Member's Bill. Several Cabinet Ministers were shown on television being chauffeured to the House of Commons to vote down my measure.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): Disgraceful.

Mr. Winnick: I could not agree more. The issue has certainly not gone away since then. I understand that the Department for Culture, Media and Sport receives more correspondence on this subject than on any other topic. I see the Minister nodding his head.

Several weeks ago, it was reported that the committee examining the future of BBC funding and the concessionary scheme had decided to recommend that all existing television licence concessions should go. Within hours of those press reports, the Government—I believe at the highest level—made it clear that any such recommendation would be rejected; and rightly so. I hope that Mr. Gavyn Davies and his committee—who are to report next month—will make a very different recommendation for pensioners.

I want to see the existing concession extended to all pension-only households. I believe that that is fair, and it is something for which I and many of my hon. Friends have campaigned for many years—even before I introduced my private Member's Bill in 1987. I accept that such a concession could probably be introduced only in stages because of the cost involved. While I would like to see the concession extended to all pensioner-only households—that is the purpose of my 10-minute rule Bill—I would welcome any compromise and progress towards its introduction on a wider scale. For example, the television licence fee could be halved for pensioners, it could be a third of its present cost or the concession could be granted to pensioners over 70 years of age. Those are some of the ways of achieving our objective.

Of course, we need good pensions. I sometimes hear the argument—not from my colleagues, but from various organisations—that a good basic pension, rather than concessions, is required. Which Labour Member is not in favour of a good basic pension? We have always called for that. However, that aim should not be used as an argument against concessions.

All pensioners in my own area, in London and in many other parts of the country receive a bus pass. Is that not right? Does it not assist pensioners a great deal? They certainly appreciate it. They would certainly have difficulty meeting the costs involved if they could not travel for free on the buses at most times of the day. All Labour Members are again very pleased about the assistance that the Government have provided to pensioners with winter fuel bills. I remember arguing constantly from the Opposition Benches in previous Parliaments that such a payment should be introduced, and this Government provided that assistance as soon as they came to office. From next year, all pensioners will receive £100 towards their winter fuel bills. That demonstrates our concern for people of pensionable age.

It has also been argued that pensioner incomes have increased over the years. I accept that since I introduced my private Member's Bill 12 years ago, there has been a modest improvement, which is welcome. That is largely due to various occupational schemes taking effect as people have retired in the past few years. There should, however, be no misunderstanding: the latest figures demonstrate that 63 per cent. of pensioners are in the bottom half of income distribution. The figures for 1997-98 reveal that 42 per cent. of single pensioners were in the lowest fifth of household incomes. Clearly, many of our fellow citizens of pensionable age are experiencing poverty or near poverty.

I am often asked why I put so much emphasis on television. As they grow older, many pensioners find that their television set is extremely important, particularly in the winter months and if they live on their own. Television is an important link with the outside world, not simply a form of entertainment. Without television, there would undoubtedly be far more isolation and loneliness for the people to whom I have referred.

I could quote endlessly the letters that I have received from people around the country. Those who know of my concern write to me about my proposal to introduce a Bill on this matter. I shall refer to only one letter. A pensioner in Worcester wrote to me last month saying that she is a widow who receives, in all, £76.25 a week, and that for people such as herself, the television is the main source of news and entertainment and, in her case, the greatest companion. She concluded her letter by saying that a £5 fee would be a great help to her. How many more pensioners throughout the country take the same view?

There are anomalies in the current system. I receive letters from people who say that their pensioner next-door neighbour pays £5 while they must pay the full amount. We know the explanation for that. The Tory Government made it far more difficult for local authorities to make applications for concessionary television licences. There was a successful court case and the Conservative Government were frightened that the concessionary door was being opened too wide, so they tightened the restrictions in May 1988. Those who lived in certain accommodation prior to May 1988 therefore receive the concession, and rightly so, but those who moved in afterwards pay the full amount. One can imagine the resentment that they feel. That does not, I suppose, make for good relations between neighbours. That is one of the most blatant anomalies.

Other countries have more generous television licence schemes for pensioners. In the Irish Republic, licences are free for those who are entitled to the state pension. France and one or two other countries have schemes that are more generous than ours.

What about the cost? Of course, I accept that a substantial cost would be involved. That could be borne by the Exchequer or by an increase in the licence fee. After all, everyone hopes to reach pensionable age. If the measure were introduced in stages, the cost would be lower. If, in the first instance, the concession were given only to the over-70s or if the licence fee were reduced, as I have suggested, by a half or a third, there would be less cost to the BBC or the Exchequer. If the £5 concessionary fee was increased, but only—I stress the word "only"—if the scheme that I am advocating was introduced, that would also reduce the overall cost.

I do not for one moment accept that we cannot afford to introduce a more generous scheme. We are a rich, advanced country, and pensioners are absolutely right to ask for this reform. They have been campaigning for it far longer than I have been. We should make a move in the right direction, so I decided to introduce this ten-minute Bill. I hope that the Government will give it serious consideration and that, over time, we shall make the progress on this issue that so many of us want.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Winnick, Mr. Peter Bradley, Mr. Hilton Dawson, Mr. Lindsay Hoyle, Mr. Martin Salter, Mr. Ken Purchase, Mr. David Drew, Mr. Nigel Griffiths, Mrs. Maria Fyfe, Valerie Davey, Mrs. Ann Cryer and Mr. Jeremy Corbyn.

Concessionary Television Licences for Pensioners

Mr. David Winnick accordingly presented a Bill to extend the concessionary television licence entitlement to all pensioners living in households consisting only of pensioners; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 23 July, and to be printed [Bill 115].

House of Lords Reform

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hanson.]

3.46 pm

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): Although it is, of course, right and proper that we debate the White Paper, I doubt whether hon. Members will find much new in what I propose to say. The legislation that the White Paper accompanies is very much stage 1 of an enduring process. Although the White Paper provides the context for the legislation that it describes, it also sets the framework for a royal commission and for further legislation. That first stage of reform is still being debated in the House of Lords—the House of Lords Bill will return to this House—while the second stage is now with the royal commission.

The legislation reforms the House of Lords by abolishing the right to sit and vote there on the basis of heredity alone, without regard for the personal qualities or qualifications of the inheritor. As the White Paper identifies, the effect of that decision—should it be carried through into law—will be to create a transitional House of about half the present size, in which every Member will sit as a result of their own achievement and reputation.

That is certainly preferable to the present position, but it still in our view has serious flaws. Although it diminishes the permanent in-built Conservative majority, there would still be, for example, a wholly disproportionate representation of the main parties—even in a transitional House that is created solely by the removal of hereditary peers. That is because of the exploitation of the Prime Minister's sole power of patronage during the 1980s and 1990s, which led to the creation of infinitely more Conservative life peers than those of any other party, and exacerbated the in-built Conservative majority among hereditary peers.

That position is certainly unacceptable to my party, although I have noted that, in the many debates on this matter in the House of Lords, the proposal to remove that in-built majority has been described pejoratively as acting "to our own"—the Labour party's—"advantage". On the contrary, we strongly believe that it is to the country's advantage that no political party has an overall majority in the House of Lords. That is the principle that we are enshrining in the arrangements for the transitional House, seeking only parity with the Conservative party.

Such a principle has, on occasion, been espoused by the Conservative party itself, but it has been most notable that, whether in this House or in the House of Lords, today's Conservatives have been most reluctant to accept that national interest should override the political interests of the Conservative party.

Rather than following the precedent created by his Conservative predecessors, the present Prime Minister is determined to diminish the unfettered power of patronage that he now enjoys—although nobody would think so to listen to some of the rubbish that has been uttered from the Opposition Benches during many of our debates. The Prime Minister is, for the first time ever, to forgo his power to object to the names of those nominated by other party leaders.

We are to set up an appointments commission—using machinery devised by the previous Government, to ensure a proper process of appointment—with a suitable independent element, as well as representation from the political parties. That appointments commission will take over the job of scrutinising proposals for adding Members to the House of Lords. The whole process will, therefore, be much more transparent and independent than ever in the past, and will represent the first ever diminution of the sole power of patronage enjoyed by a Prime Minister in Britain's history.

Against the background of the creation of the transitional House, the Government have also proposed the setting up of the royal commission—itself chaired not by a Labour, but by a Conservative peer, and with a balanced and independent-minded membership. We have given the royal commission a tight timetable, and we acknowledge that. However, those who criticise us for the timetable being too tight are, in many cases, the very same people who said that unless the royal commission worked to a tight timetable, it would prove that the Government had no intention of going beyond stage 1 and the transitional House. They really cannot have the argument both ways. The tight timetable for the royal commission is itself evidence of the Government's good faith in seeking proper and fundamental reform of the House of Lords. It is also evidence of our practicality in trying to ensure that, on this occasion, after more than a century of debate, it is actually achieved.

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): Will the right hon. Lady acknowledge that Conservative Members were calling for a royal commission for more than a year before it was established?

Mrs. Beckett: I acknowledge that Conservative Members have called for a royal commission, although I also acknowledge that they nevertheless resist any attempt at change. As I shall say later in my speech, one of the Government's objectives is to ensure that the royal commission will be able to take account of other constitutional change. The commission would not have been able to do that if it had been established earlier.

The Government have established some broad principles against which the royal commission should begin its work. It is asked to consider, first, the role of a second Chamber; then, the powers required to fulfil that role; and, finally, the composition of the body that should be established to exercise those powers and perform that role. That seems to us to be the only sensible and logical way in which to hold a proper debate on the new second Chamber. We have never had such a debate in Britain before.

All previous discussions have tended to begin with the matter of composition, partly because the composition of the current House is so self-evidently unjustifiable. They have also been dominated by composition because—perhaps unsurprisingly—the principle preoccupation of many Members of the current House of Lords has been their own role in a new second Chamber, and whether and to what degree they might continue to exercise legislative power. Therefore, the stranglehold that they have enjoyed over any previous attempt at reform has ensured that the debate has almost always begun with composition, and been driven very heavily by what they were prepared to accept in a successor body. That has created an artificial context for previous debates, so that what a second Chamber ought to be has never been properly considered.

The House of Lords Bill cuts that Gordian knot. It allows us to begin as we should, by considering what Britain needs and not what hereditary peers are prepared to accept. However, just as the House of Lords Bill enables us to separate stage 2, and what should come in the future, from stage 1 and the first steps of the reform process, it is extremely important to encourage the new debate without allowing it to be bogged down in comparisons, valid or otherwise, with the current House of Lords.

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): Perhaps for the sake of clarity, will the right hon. Lady tell us whether, in general, she believes that a reformed upper House should have more, the same or fewer powers than the current one?

Mrs. Beckett: I shall tell the hon. Gentleman that later in my speech. If he will forgive me, I shall not do so now, as I want to make a specific point that should underpin the debate.

I very much hope that we—by which I mean not only those participating in the debate, but everyone who engages with the issue—shall free ourselves from looking at the House of Lords as it is and saying what we should make different, whether in its powers or its composition, and instead begin from first principles, by considering not what people have been criticising or even campaigning for, but what type of new second Chamber Britain actually needs.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): I am extremely encouraged to hear the Leader of the House speak in those principled terms about the role of the House of Lords. Does she think that, conformable with those terms, the commission should not listen to siren voices suggesting that a reformed upper House should depend on actions taken in this House to reform itself, but that—although there are connections between the two Houses' roles and functions—the commission's job is one that can properly be carried very far by simply examining the functions of the second Chamber?

Mrs. Beckett: The right hon. Gentleman is right. The commission would find it difficult to get engaged in that area of argument and doing so would make it very difficult for it to report within the time required.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): While it is right that the commission should address the functions of the second Chamber, in determining what those functions are, should it not consider the extent to which this House properly performs its democratic role of holding the Executive to account?

Mrs. Beckett: No. That is not the business of the commission. It was set up to consider the role of the second Chamber. If there is concern about the operation of this House, it is for this House, not a royal commission to tell us what to do.

Mr. Oliver Letwin (West Dorset) rose—

Mrs. Beckett: I want to get on, but I shall give way briefly.

Mr. Letwin: I do not want to detain or distract the right hon. Lady, but does she not recognise that there is an intrinsic relationship between the two issues? The role of the second Chamber must depend to an extent on the effectiveness of the lower Chamber.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not accept that point and I shall explain why. There is clearly a relationship between this Chamber and the second Chamber. When the hon. Gentleman talks about the effectiveness of this Chamber, I suspect that, like his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), he is seeking to pursue the ridiculous Conservative argument that the present Government cannot be scrutinised in the way that previous Governments were, and that that shows some in-built failing in the House. The effectiveness with which we conduct our business is a matter for Members of Parliament, not for the royal commission.

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton-under-Lyne): I am sorry to ask my right hon. Friend so many questions at this stage in her speech. Does she agree that the role of a second Chamber is not to remedy the deficiencies of this Chamber? There have been many changes over the past 20 years and more. Should we not make sure that the system is brought into line with what is required rather than using the other Chamber to cope with our deficiencies?

Mrs. Beckett: I share my right hon. Friend's view that if there are deficiencies in this House, it is for this House to address and deal with them. It is strange to argue that we have to set up another House to do so. There is a different role for a second Chamber.

That intervention ties in neatly with the point that I was about to make—and may yet make. The starting point in the debate for some people is to ask whether we need a second Chamber. They are the so-called unicameralists, who can be found on both sides of the House, although not in substantial numbers, I think. No doubt that will emerge over time. Those of us who accept that there is a need and a role for a second Chamber must explain why.

It has always been argued that the value of a second Chamber is to provide not merely an alternative group to scrutinise and comment on Government activity, particularly the legislative programme, but a group with different experiences and perspectives. Those who have argued for some of the virtues of the existing House of Lords have almost always said that they lie in some of the differences between that Chamber and this one. In particular, they have argued strongly for keeping some people from outside the mainstream world of politics that leads to the House of Commons and for there to be at least some people in that House who do not take a party Whip. As the Government have pointed out in the terms of reference of the royal commission, the creation of the new devolved bodies, and the growing role and increasing powers of the European Parliament have created a different context in which the role of a new second Chamber should be considered.

We do not seek to dictate answers in the White Paper. We seek to address the issues that should inform the shaping of those answers and we try to set out some of the principles that any proposals should meet. The first is that this House must continue to be the pre-eminent Chamber of Parliament. That is a principle which I hope that every Member of this House would wholeheartedly endorse. I am unashamedly a House of Commons woman through and through, and it has been most noticeable that one of the most potent weapons of those who have opposed change down the years has been any threat, real or potential, to the pre-eminence of the House of Commons. That suggests that Members of this House through the decades have shared the Government's view on this important point.

[Mrs. Beckett]

We have not nor would we ever propose to change the power of the second Chamber to veto any extension of the life of a Parliament. The legitimacy of government comes from the endorsement of the people and, of course, it must be renewed at regular intervals.

My brief summary of the Government's approach to the issues of role, powers and composition is that there is a role for a second body and a second process of scrutiny, and that the needs of that process should direct the powers that it requires. It is only then that one comes to consider what should be the nature of the body to exercise those powers, how such a body might be composed and how its members might be chosen.

I do not propose to say much about the powers that would be needed by a second Chamber retaining the important roles of revision and scrutiny, but, picking up the question asked by the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox), one important point is that there is enormous confusion, particularly outside the House, in much of what has already been said about the powers that a new second Chamber should have.

Almost every time I hear somebody comment on powers, I find myself wondering whether they are referring to the powers that the House of Lords has now or to the powers that it currently exercises. It is somewhat strange to hear those who argue against any change, because the present House of Lords does a brilliant job, going on to argue—as some do—that that job cannot be done adequately without fresh powers that the House of Lords does not exercise at present. They cannot have it both ways. Either the present House of Lords is not doing much of a job—which I do not myself argue—or what is the justification for saying that more powers will be required in future to do the job it does now.

Let me make it clear, as does the White Paper, that the House of Lords has almost all the powers enjoyed by the House of Commons. If it gets more, it will probably have more power than the House of Commons. Is that really what some Conservatives are asking for? If so, they are in danger of saying that a new second Chamber should supersede this one and that it should be the pre-eminent Chamber. That is a dangerous and damaging argument.

I suspect that that is not what most of them think, but I also suspect that on this issue, as on many others, sheer opportunism and the inability to look further than the ends of their noses is leading them gleefully to advocate ideas on the basis of what they hope will embarrass the Government in the short term, without their apparently giving any real thought to the impact of what they are proposing on the country in the long term. That is playing with fire and if it persists with those tactics, the Conservative party will go down in history as the party that sought to undermine the authority of the elected House of Commons.

Without going into the detail of what should be the composition of a new second Chamber, there are some principles we could identify which might attract a degree of agreement and common ground.

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): On the point about powers, is the right hon. Lady saying that she would not wish any new powers to be given to the House of Lords?

Mrs. Beckett: I do not want to pre-judge any view that the Government might wish to express at some time, but given that the House of Lords has almost all the powers enjoyed by the House of Commons—although it does not exercise them all—if the right hon. Gentleman is asking me to agree to more powers for that House, he is in danger of putting those who advocate this case in a position of arguing for more powers for the second Chamber than for the House of Commons. I do not support such a proposition and I would be surprised if the right hon. Gentleman did.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Will my right hon. Friend forgive me if I ask a question that I have been asked by one of my constituents—a serious constituent—and will she give me some advice on how to answer it? My constituent asked whether it is proper that the Speaker of the Holyrood Parliament should also be a Member of the House of Lords, and whether that creates some problems of interface between the House of Lords and the Holyrood Parliament? I do not expect my right hon. Friend to answer this somewhat arcane question off the top of her head, but perhaps she might write to me at her convenience.

Mrs. Beckett: I am deeply grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me the courtesy of writing to him about it. He is right. I fear that it is not a matter on which I feel emboldened to venture off the cuff. It is, indeed, a serious constitutional point, not only for the House of Lords or indeed for this Parliament, and it is certainly interesting. I am not surprised that my hon. Friend is not sure how to answer it; I am not either, but I shall take advice.

Without getting into the detail of what should be the composition of a new second Chamber, we can identify some principles that might attract a degree of agreement and common ground. The body itself should be more legitimate than it is now; it should be stable; it should be a suitable body to revise and scrutinise; it should be distinctive and embody real expertise. It should represent a range of economic and social interests and have independence—both in the sense that its members should feel free to express their opinions honestly and in the sense that no political party should command a majority.

Hon. Members will be aware that, although the Government have not given evidence to the royal commission, the Labour party has. I have not been part of that consultation process, but I have talked with some of those who have. The process seems to have been most interesting, both in its conduct and in its outcome.

I am told by those who attended the Labour party's regional consultation that there was a thorough, well-informed and practical debate. Much to the surprise of some who took part in that consultation, there was apparently little appetite for the prospect of and potential for that confrontation which seems to be the chief hope and expectation, perhaps inevitably, of many media commentators.

Ordinary members of our party were interested in a process where voices other than those of the House of Commons could be heard; experience other than ours could be aired and points of view different from the points of view naturally held and expressed in this Chamber could be taken into account. I am told that there was little if any appetite for duplicating this Chamber and none for a built-in process of confrontation. Mature debate, and mature and considered decision taking seem to be what members of the Labour party who gave evidence to our consultation seek, and what they urge on the royal commission.

It is a reminder to us, irrespective of party, of what our citizens expect of Parliament—mature debate, and mature and considered decision taking. I believe that the White Paper and the process it sets in train is an important step along the road of creating a better forum for decision and debate in the future—a forum that will not merely replace, but greatly improve what we have now.

4.8 pm

Dr. Liam Fox (Woodspring): I am grateful that the Leader of the House has finally got round to having a debate on the White Paper and grateful, too, for the tone of her speech, which was much more conciliatory than the one that she used on the launch of the White Paper. It is healthy that the debate is being conducted more in today's atmosphere rather than in that of the unfortunate first opening salvo.

It is rather strange that the right hon. Lady should not only fail to say anything new today, but effectively apologise for the Government having no views on taking forward one of the flagship proposals in their manifesto. We are finally getting to talk about stage 2 of the reform, but all that we are getting is a clear admission that the Government have embarked upon it without knowing what they actually want. We always suggested that that was the case—that the Government had no idea of what they wanted as part of the process that they set out in their manifesto—and today we have heard the clearest possible admission that that is the case.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): If my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House had said exactly what we wanted to do at the second stage, would not the hon. Gentleman have accused us of setting up a royal commission on a totally false basis? The Government have quite rightly appointed a royal commission to look at the issue and the Labour party, as a political party separate from the Government, has submitted views.

Dr. Fox: The hon. Gentleman, who has attended some of our previous debates, will know that the Opposition's position is that a royal commission could have been set up two years ago, when the Government came to power. We could now have been at the conclusion of that royal commission, and discussing the move towards single-stage reform by consensus. That opportunity was lost by the Government. The Opposition pushed for a royal commission, which the Government did not want, at the outset of the reform process. The Government were pushed into it by the Opposition's demands.

Mrs. Beckett: Before the hon. Gentleman gets too carried away with the notion that we might have had consensus about single-stage reform, may I remind him that the Conservative party went into the last election saying that it wanted to keep the hereditary principle?

Dr. Fox: The right hon. Lady will know that we have said consistently that we would look at reform that we thought was in the national interest and that improved the way in which the UK was governed. However, we have always opposed stage 1 reform without any idea of what stage 2 would entail. Clearly, the Government have no idea what they are embarking upon, but that goes for all of their constitutional changes. They have not thought through any of their policies, and we will suffer as a result. However, that is par for the course for the Government, who start projects with no idea of how they are to finish.

The royal commission could have been finished by now, but there is delay. The initial deadline was December this year, but perhaps the Leader of the House can tell us whether that will now be as late as March or April next year. There are rumours that the royal commission will be allowed to sit longer if it wishes. How much longer will it be given? How long will the Joint Committee take?

All hon. Members will have worked out that the timetable will take us perilously close to the next general election, almost certainly making sure that no legislation could be proposed to implement stage 2 before that election. Therefore, we will go to the general election not knowing the outcome of that election in terms of the composition of the House of Commons, and not knowing the nature of the Parliament in terms of its structure. That is entirely unacceptable. There is a suggestion that the Government want to kick this matter into the long grass to prevent divisions in their own party on the subject, in the run-up to the next election.

I want to take the Leader of the House to task on some of the points that she raised because—as with the Prime Minister at Question Time today—rather than dealing with the real policies of the Opposition, she simply invented Opposition policies to try to knock them down.

We must look at the role of Parliament as a whole. I fundamentally disagree with the Leader of the House when she says that reform of the House of Lords can be looked at in isolation. What happens in one part of Parliament necessarily impacts on the functioning of the other. Therefore, we need to look at Parliament as a complete entity. We cannot deal with one Chamber in isolation.

The assumption from the remit of the royal commission is that the House of Commons will not be reformed, and that therefore the commission has to make changes to the House of Lords to increase its powers of scrutiny or to get it to work better. Given that the royal commission is not able to look at the workings of the House of Commons, that is the only assumption that I can make. We have said that we must look at a series of relationships, and not only that of the two Chambers in this Parliament. Given the other changes to our constitutional framework, other relationships must be looked at.

The first of those is the relationship between Parliament and the Executive. The Leader of the House said that the Opposition were pretending that, in some way, this Government were not being scrutinised as well as previous Governments. Our argument has been that Parliament as a whole has been unable to scrutinise any Executive in recent years, and that is a fundamental flaw. Governments in office—including Conservative Governments—necessarily think that, having got the power, they do not want it scrutinised too much.

[Dr. Fox]

If we are to have a meaningful debate on reform, the House of Commons must get some of its self-respect back and decide that the Executive need to be brought to account better for the sake of the good governance of the United Kingdom. We will have to make sure that the House of Lords has suitable powers of scrutiny to bring the Executive to account.

Having spent two years in the Government Whips Office, I am all too aware of the power that the Whips exert, partly because there is no alternative career structure to the patronage handed out by the Executive. We must include that in our consideration of the way in which Parliament as a whole operates.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough): I understand that the Opposition are veering towards having an elected element in the second Chamber. If we give the second Chamber an advise and consent role, we must ensure that the elected politicians in it should not themselves be the beneficiaries of any ministerial or other patronage. It is absolutely vital that we do not create a new cadre of ambitious elected career politicians.

Dr. Fox: I will deal later with the Conservative proposals under the Mackay commission, but my hon. Friend's general point is extremely important, and I hope that he will expand on it later in the debate.

Parliament must consider other relationships. One of the factors that makes the Leader of the House wrong to say that we can undertake reform of one Chamber in isolation is the role of the judiciary. Given the Human Rights Act 1998 and other changes in the political nature of the judiciary, it is inevitable that there will be a new relationship between the judiciary and both Houses of Parliament. We cannot divorce one from the other.

Mrs. Beckett: How does the hon. Gentleman square his expressed desire for stage 2 to be implemented before the next general election with his further list of things that he thinks that the royal commission should scrutinise before stage 2 reform takes place?

Dr. Fox: That has to be part of a wider process. I would welcome a broader remit to consider how the whole of Parliament works and how all the changes are to be implemented. It was not the Conservative party but the Government who set the artificial timetable for the changes. We would all have been better served if they had started the process two years earlier and taken account of the broader arguments. It is unfortunate, in terms of the wider picture, if the Government really think that we can reform one Chamber in isolation.

We must also consider the relationships between Parliament and other bodies that have arisen as a result of Acts of Parliament: not least, the devolved bodies in Wales and Scotland. The hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) mentioned the relationship between the Presiding Officer's roles in both the Scottish Parliament and the House of Lords. That is a valid point that must be considered, as must Parliament's relationship with Europe.

The Leader of the House mentioned the legislation that comes from the European Union. I wonder whether there are many hon. Members who believe that we really fulfil our primary duty to scrutinise the way in which we legislate in the name of the people whom we are chosen to represent. With the vast amount of secondary legislation that goes through Parliament, do we believe that we are performing our democratic role of ensuring that it is all properly scrutinised and that we are not passing legislation affecting our fellow citizens that we are unhappy about?

It would be an ideal role for the second Chamber to play a greater part in the scrutiny of secondary legislation. I hope that that will be considered as a positive suggestion. It is not true that, to increase the powers of scrutiny of the second Chamber, one has necessarily to reduce the powers of the House of Commons. It is entirely possible to increase the powers of scrutiny of the House of Lords at the expense of the Executive without in any way diminishing the House of Commons.

Mr. Hogg: I entirely agree with my hon. Friend's point, but would it not be better if the House were to take unto itself the power to amend statutory instruments? One of the most objectionable features of secondary legislation is that it is incapable of change unless it is laid before the House in draft form, and then it depends on the will of the Government to change the draft.

Dr. Fox: That is an extremely important point, and we shall all have to think seriously about it in the context of the wider reforms. The shadow Leader of the House is considering it as part of the Conservative party's review of those wider subjects, and we are right to do that. My right hon. and learned Friend may want to make an internal submission to contribute to the thinking and policy development of the Conservative party, which is showing all the signs of being light years ahead of any development on the Government side.

The idea that the only way to increase the power of the House of Lords is at the expense of the House of Commons is false. It is an argument used by the Executive to protect their power from increased scrutiny.

As I have said, we must seriously consider whether we give Members of the House of Commons an alternative career structure that does not depend on keeping the Whips happy. As my hon. Friend the Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) said in a previous debate, the present system of getting rid of the hereditaries, but keeping the powers of the Whips, simply means, "Out with the ermine and in with the straitjackets."

We do not want the power of the Executive to increase as a result of what the Government are doing. We must still believe that the results of their actions, if not their intentions—I have great doubts about those—will not weaken Parliament as a whole in relation to the Executive.

I hope that the Leader of the House will accept the fact that we have never questioned the legitimacy of the Government's carrying out their manifesto commitment to abolish the voting rights of the hereditary peers. We have always said that we welcome reform if it results in the better governance of this country. However, we have questioned the wisdom of what the Government are doing, their timetable and their motives, because we believe that they are motivated not by an interest in improving the way in which Parliament works but in further sidelining Parliament to the benefit of Ministers. That will result in a move towards de facto single-chamber government.

There is a suspicion among the Opposition that many people within the Government would welcome that. The way in which the House of Commons has been treated by members of the Executive can only strengthen that suspicion. To set up a House of Lords chosen entirely by nomination by the Prime Minister or by agents appointed by him would undermine the independence of the upper House.

There seems to be a disturbing pattern of authoritarianism in the Labour proposals. That includes the other constitutional changes, as voters will find out tomorrow, when they realise that they cannot choose which candidate to vote for. That is all about centralising power; it increases the power of politicians while diminishing the power of the voters.

It is therefore difficult for us to have faith that the Government's intention in the reform of Parliament is not to weaken Parliament to the benefit of the Executive. There is little support out there for creating an appointed House. It is hard to find anyone who supports the Government in their option of an appointed Chamber, even as an interim measure.

Lord Irvine, the Lord Chancellor, said:

"I think that it would be very important to avoid the perception of the biggest quango in our nation's history".

That is exactly what will be created if the policies in Labour's submission are carried forward, and many of us believe that that is exactly what the Prime Minister wants. There is a great risk of creating a compliant halfway house of yes men, which the Prime Minister, in particular, would like to last as long as possible.

According to reports, the Prime Minister does not bother to take particularly seriously either his duties in the Palace of Westminster, or his duties to attend Cabinet. As we all know, he is increasing the central power of the political machinery at the expense of the parties in the country and of individual voters.

Anthony Barnett, the former director of Charter 88, said:

"Surely Labour should first decide how it will replace the Lords with a democratic Chamber? Otherwise it will create an Upper House that is so pliant and illegitimate that it will expose the government to the charge of dictatorship".

Charter 88 said that, not the Conservatives.

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): If the hon. Gentleman opposes an appointed second Chamber, does that mean that the Conservative party will support a wholly elected second Chamber? If not, what proportion of the new Chamber's composition will be derived through elections?

Dr. Fox: The hon. Gentleman makes an utterly illogical leap from one position to the other. He can look at the Conservative party's submission to the royal commission, but this problem was created by the Government. He should not look to the Opposition for ways out of the hole dug by the Government. That is what Governments are for and, when the Minister replies to the debate this evening, we shall expect some answers.

Mr. Rammell rose—

Dr. Fox: I shall come to the Mackay commission and the proposals put forward by the Conservative party in a moment. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear with me a little.

I want to mention one other opinion on the appointed Chamber. Vernon Bogdanor, professor of politics at Oxford university, has said:

"It is by no mean obvious why the ability to defer the wishes of one's party leader constitutes a better title to a place in a legislative chamber than the claims of hereditary. Labour's proposals for a purely nominated chamber would involve a quite unacceptable increase in prime ministerial patronage."

We are supposed to believe that, because the Prime Minister will give up his ability to nominate Cross Benchers, that will be all right. However, that is more than offset by the exclusion of any independent element. I shall return to that in moment.

We have always advocated that there must be an independent element in any upper Chamber for it to be effective.

Mrs. Beckett: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not pretending that the Government are taking out the independent element in the upper House. Is he arguing that the only people who can be independent are the hereditary peers? If so, most of the rest of the House of Lords would find that very insulting.

Dr. Fox: One reason for the Government's keenness to press ahead with the changes is that they do not like any independent criticism. They will find that many peers—hereditary and otherwise—will have the courage to do what Labour Back Benchers did not have the courage to do over the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill. I am sure that the electorate will thank them for that.

By their every change to our constitutional arrangements, the Government are trying to diminish the power of those who are able to influence the political process but who do not belong to a political party. That is one of the most disturbing trends of the Government's proposals.

Mrs. Beckett indicated dissent.

Dr. Fox: The right hon. Lady shakes her head, but I shall give her an example. The people who are able to choose who will sit in the European Parliament are not the voters in an election but the party bosses in their party headquarters. That increases the power of the parties, and decreases the power of any independent element, including that of the electorate.

Mrs. Beckett: I look forward to the next general election, when—the hon. Gentleman seems to be saying—every constituency will be offered a choice of Conservative candidates. If that is not what the hon. Gentleman is saying, he is making a stupid point—not for the first time. He pretends that, in some way, the electorate have lost a power, which they enjoyed in the past, to choose individual candidates from political parties. In his constituency, the hon. Gentleman stands as the sole representative of the Conservative party, as I stand as the sole representative of the Labour party in mine. There is nothing unusual about that.

[Mrs. Beckett]

With regard to the possibility of making a different change, all hon. Members are worried about the level of interest in, and concern about, the European elections, because we all recognise that the European Parliament has important powers. Given the present size of ballot papers, does the hon. Gentleman agree that people would be put off if they were also asked to pick out individual candidates? I am sure that people could do so, but whether they could be bothered is quite another matter.

Dr. Fox: I thought that the right hon. Lady was going to keep up her conciliatory tone for an entire debate, and not descend to her usual level. I am reassured to find that she has done so in the end.

What will happen in tomorrow's European elections is symptomatic of what the Government are doing, in that the power of the parties over the electorate will be increased, as I shall describe. If one of those elected under a list system drops out, it is up to the political parties to decide who should replace him or her. The electorate have no say: that is a clear example of how the parties are trying to centralise their authority.

We had the utter nonsense of the recent debate in the Scottish Parliament, in which list members were told that their job was not to represent constituents—for which they get less money—but to represent the political parties. What sort of democratic obscenity is it when Parliament is supposed to represent the politicians rather than the people? Democracy is being stood on its head by the Government's arguments. Labour Members will have a real difficulty when the Bill comes back from the House of Lords. Let me remind the House of what Labour's manifesto said:

"The House of Lords must be reformed. As an initial, self-contained reform, not dependent on further reform in the future, the right of hereditary peers to sit and vote in the House of Lords will be ended by statute. "

We have all heard Ministers mocking hereditary peers and saying how unacceptable it is that they sit in the House of Lords. The Home Secretary said that the first fundamental objection to the position of the hereditary peers was that they were hereditary. He said that we should

"imagine lying open-mouthed in the dentist's chair as the dentists drilled into the gum instead of the teeth. That would raise questions about his skills. Imagine if, when asked to produce his certificate of competence, he brought out one awarded in 1860 to his great great uncle William, but said not to worry because the skills had been transmitted through the genes."—[Official Report, 30 November 1998; Vol. 321, c. 571.]

I remember hearing howls of laughter from Labour Back Benchers, the same Back Benchers who trekked through the Lobby to vote down the Weatherill amendment when it was offered in this House. We know that, once the proposals have been accepted in the House of Lords, the same Back Benchers will, on the instruction of their Whips, vote for them, in direct contravention of their manifesto.

Mr. Rammell: As we are in the business of trading embarrassments, will it not be a greater embarrassment for the Conservatives and their leader to vote for a proposal for which the Leader of the Opposition sacked the Conservative leader of the Lords?

Dr. Fox: We all make mistakes when we take interventions. The hon. Gentleman fails to understand that the situation at that time had nothing to do with the content of the proposals but arose over agreement to a deal that no one but the shadow Cabinet had the authority to accept.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend has precisely described why this House is failing to discharge its role of holding the Executive to account. It is true of all Governments, not only the present one, that they use their Whips to ensure that Back Benchers do whatever the Government want. In this case, that means either voting for or against the Weatherill amendment. That is what is so destructive of truly accountable Government.

Dr. Fox: What is most damaging about this episode is that the Government have not even pretended to act from a point of principle. They said that they would do whatever was necessary. If that meant countermanding their manifesto, they would tolerate that. If it meant blatantly forcing Members to go back on what they had previously voted for, the Government would force them to do so. Perhaps the Leader of the House will confirm that the Government intend to march their troops through the Lobby to vote for the Weatherill proposals. That seems the only logical position given that the Government backed those proposals in the House of Lords. Will the Leader of the House tell us that?

Mrs. Beckett: No.

Dr. Fox: Perhaps it is too embarrassing for her to admit what the Government are going to do to their Back Benchers.

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly shall not comment and nor shall my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office. The hon. Gentleman may not have noticed, but the other place has not yet finished with the Bill.

Dr. Fox: What courage, what leadership, what great principle.

Mrs. Beckett: Let me explain to the hon. Gentleman in words of one syllable what I meant. Amendments have been tabled to the Weatherill amendment, and none of us knows whether they will be carried.

Dr. Fox: We have a fair idea of the Government's position. I do not know whether it is appropriate—perhaps it is against the rules of the House—to offer the Leader of the House a wager. I shall wager £10 for her favourite charity that she ultimately forces her Back Benchers in precisely the opposite direction to that which they took when the Weatherill proposals were previously debated in this House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. Perhaps it would be better if that wager were kept metaphorical.

Dr. Fox: I am not a gambling man, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have never even been to a bookie.

Let me return to the point made by the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell). The Conservative position has been clear throughout the debate. We saw no need for reform of the House of Lords. There was nothing about it in our manifesto. However, we have accepted that the Government are implementing the proposals in their manifesto and that the status quo is no longer an option. As the Leader of the House has pointed out, I have also said that the Conservative party will not reintroduce hereditary peers after we win the next general election. We must therefore consider ways of introducing an independent element into the upper House.

I commend the Mackay report to Labour Members who have not read it. It is an elegant and extraordinarily interesting discourse that takes the debate on House of Lords reform to levels never achieved by the Government. It proposes two models. It is not a question of an entirely elected or an entirely appointed House. One of the Mackay options is a partly elected House. Members could be elected in many different ways. Another option is to move to an almost fully elected House with a proportion of Members appointed by the Executive so that Ministers could work in the upper House. It is an interesting document and we will consult on it in the Conservative party to find how our party thinks reform should be taken forward.

I hope that the hon. Member for Harlow will give us credit for having moved the debate much further than have the Government. The contributions in print of several of my hon. Friends have added much to the debate on the House of Lords on both sides of the argument. I am genuinely sorry that the Government were not more willing to outline some of the options that the Labour party, if not the Government, might consider for stage 2 reform.

The Government's contribution has been extraordinarily sterile. They have proposed a change with no idea of how to carry it through. They have muddled along. They do not know how they want our constitutional framework to look and have little idea of what the Executive's relationship with people or Parliament should be beyond having more power centralised and more power given to political parties for the Prime Minister to exercise greater control through those organs.

I hope that this debate marks the beginning of the House of Commons re-establishing a little of its self-respect. In the wider process of reform, let us remember that our primary duty is the scrutiny and production of legislation and the provision of a framework for what we are meant to do: to govern wisely and well those whom we are elected to represent.

4.37 pm

Mr. Robert Sheldon (Ashton–under–Lyne): I agree with one aspect of what the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) said. On the proper use of Back Benchers, there is a need for the alternative career structure that he mentioned. The Select Committee that I have the privilege to chair, the Liaison Committee, is considering that. It is examining what changes should be suggested halfway through a Parliament for the future role of Select Committees and considering how they can carry out their investigative role, which cannot easily be reproduced in any other forum. They can question the people responsible for important decisions and come back at them again and again. They can seek memorandums and have the power to call for whatever persons, papers or records we require. Something is happening on that and I await the results in due course.

Dr. Fox: The right hon. Gentleman has much more experience than most hon. Members. Is he saying that he believes that the House does not have sufficient scrutiny powers to control an Executive who seem increasingly capable of legislating by Executive action through secondary legislation?

Mr. Sheldon: My view is that the Select Committees are doing very well. They were set up two years ago and this is a suitable time to consider whether there can or should be changes to make them even more effective. That is what is being done through our consultations.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House opened this debate in a way that wholly commended itself to me and many others when she said that she is a House of Commons woman through and through. That is what the Leader of the House should be and I welcome that assertion. Of course, I knew it already, but it is nice to hear it once again. My right hon. Friend also mentioned that the powers of the House of Lords are great—far too great in the opinion of many Labour Members. The only limit on the activities of Members of the House of Lords is the way in which they exercise those powers. My right hon. Friend was right to draw attention to that point.

My view of the proposed legislation, as it comes back from the House of Lords, is that it would produce a transitional House; these are the first steps. My expectation is that that temporary scheme is likely to become permanent. I am sorry to disagree with some of my colleagues, but, as time goes on, the enthusiasm for constitutional reform is not likely to increase. In my experience—I have seen a fair amount of such matters in my time—that enthusiasm is likely to terminate fairly early on.

Lord Cranborne showed himself to be a most powerful and inventive person. Given the way in which he carried out his work, he is obviously the lost leader of the Tories in this generation. He knew that, as Sir John Harington put it in the 16th century:

> "Treason doth never prosper, what's the reason?
> For if it prosper, none dare call it treason."

That is the point. The noble Lord's work will almost surely prosper. We may reach agreement on losing the hereditaries, save for the 90 or 92, whatever the number is, but further moves to abolish them are likely to die through the difficulties of constitution making, where there are as many solutions as there are Members of Parliament. The likelihood is that after the noble Lord's work, which he carried out to the annoyance—even the anger—of Members on the Opposition Front Bench, he could see that there was a cause worth fighting for. If he could not save all the hereditaries, he was going to save a substantial number of them.

There will be slippage. As was mentioned earlier, the second stage is likely to continue well beyond December. The matter is unlikely to be resolved in this Parliament—possibly not even in the next one. As colleagues have pointed out, we should not try to remedy the defects of the House of Commons by making changes in the House of Lords. The House of Lords should remedy not the deficiencies that we see at present, but those that might be regarded as more permanent. If there are defects in this House, they need to be put right before we grant the House of Lords more powers to remedy those problems.

[Mr. Sheldon]

Mr. Hogg: What if the defects in this House are not essentially procedural, but stem from the fact that we do not have a separation of powers and that the Executive are Members of this place? Because the Executive, through the Whips Office, can control the majority party, this House is incapable of exercising proper control of the Executive. That is not procedure; it stems from an inherent characteristic of the constitutional settlement that is in place.

Mr. Sheldon: That has been the position for the past 250 years. It was a wonderful solution, because, as long as Members of Parliament had feelings of independence, they could form part of the Executive as well as holding the Executive to account. When we considered the problems in the United States, we used to congratulate ourselves on how well we had organised matters. What has happened during the past 30 years is that Members of Parliament have become much more full time and are looking to a career structure. It is that career structure that has tended to corrupt the system. That is the problem.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): The right hon. Gentleman has made half the point that I was about to make. Is it not true that Members of Parliament were much more independent when they were of independent means?

Mr. Sheldon: Now, we have large numbers of Members of Parliament who have little in the way of outside interests and outside concerns. As a result, they look to the ordinary routes of promotion and envisage themselves forming part of the Government. In the past, many Members of substance and standing would come into the Chamber to listen to the debate; now, most Members come to the Chamber to speak in a debate. There is nothing wrong in that, but we should recognise that there was formerly an element that produced the sort of House of Commons that it was our privilege to inherit, but which we have, to a certain extent, distorted. That is the real problem.

We have been at this stage before in respect of House of Lords reform. I strongly opposed the proposals in 1968–69. At that time, there was an agreement between the two Front-Bench teams, but it was my good fortune and privilege to spot, right from the start, that there was a way to divide them in such a way as to ensure that they could never get the guillotine. By using one device or another, the opponents of the proposals ensured that that happened. The Government Back Benchers railed against Ministers and the Opposition Back Benchers railed against their Front Benchers, with the result that the legislation fell.

I could see that the legislation could not be revived, because a poll produced at the time showed that there was little support for the proposals. The House sat 14 days and nights—at that time, we had the Dick Crossman reforms, so we sat morning, afternoon, evening and night—but after those 14 days, we had reached only clause 6 of a 20-clause Bill, so the Bill was dropped.

The deficiencies in that legislation were far greater than the deficiencies in the current Bill. At least in the current Bill, we can see the first stage and what will happen during that period, whereas the 1968–69 legislation simply gave huge powers of patronage to two Front-Bench teams operating together. If it had been passed, not only would it have distorted the House of Lords, but, more important, it would have distorted the House of Commons by creating an aldermanic bench.

I have had some experience of an aldermanic bench. People who have been elected as councillors wait for a certain number of their colleagues to die off so that they can acquire a position in which they will never have to face another election. It is a tempting prospect: permanent positions that carry power, but no responsibility—lovely. I could foresee the result of the 1968 proposals: some Members of Parliament would have been anxious to obtain one of those aldermanic posts, so there would have been patronage in this place, because Front Benchers would have been able to offer an attractive combination of power with security and pay. We must concern ourselves with both powers and composition, even at the first stage.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): The right hon. Gentleman has thoroughly described the shortcomings of the 1968 proposals. Does he take issue with the Labour party submission which states:

"There is a great deal of wisdom in these earlier proposals for House of Lords reform which would repay careful examination today"?

Mr. Sheldon: Given that I spent a great deal of my political life fighting such proposals, I am not likely to change my mind 30 years on. Those proposals were flawed. At the time they were debated, the House could not get the guillotine—it could not even get 100 Members to move the closure; it got only 99, and that was the end of that.

The whole point is that Back Benchers have been underappreciated. Back Benchers are not always wrong, even on the big issues. In my time, we have had devaluation, which should have occurred far sooner; we have had the east of Suez policy, when the Government said that this country's frontiers were on the Himalayas, which was a load of nonsense and I fought against it; we have had the poll tax, against which we should have fought harder. On those and many other issues, Back Benchers knew better than the Government of the day, but the House of Commons failed to turn that general feeling into decision making. It was not the House of Commons or the system that was weak; it was the individuals who failed to put right what was wrong.

What needs to be done? We must consider the scrutiny of legislation by the House of Commons, which is the backbone of its work. We perform two types of examination of legislation—one is examination to see whether it is efficient, economic and effective. That is the Public Accounts Committee work of ensuring that everything that is done is done in the best possible way. The other role concerns aspects of policy, and the role of Government Back Benchers is even more important when the Government have a large majority. Francis Pym, who lost his position for his pains, was right to point out the dangers of large majorities. I welcome the Labour party being in power, but we must be careful that we understand the difficulties of a large majority and find a role for Members of Parliament so that they can use their abilities to the full.

What is the solution? We must use the House of Commons more effectively, as both a debating and a decision-making body. Some in the Government have always believed that, in the interests of party unity, different views should not be openly expressed, but should be conveyed quietly to the relevant Ministers for their reconsideration. With many Ministers that is an effective way to achieve change, as we have seen in the past day or so. What if it does not work? Should the alternative views not be put? Should Members of Parliament have to bite their lip, swallow their pride, grumble in private and await the next means of persuasion? That is not the way for a sovereign House of Commons to proceed. This is a national forum for debate and open discussion, and for argument that brings out issues openly for the people to see and decide. Anyone who believes in open government and open dissent must be a part of that.

Are Governments always right? Of course they are not. The question is whether we should exchange the pressure of Members of Parliament for pressure from the unelected peers in the House of Lords. Of course not. I have always believed in the need to maximise one's powers of persuasion. An opponent of a Government can find his or her views readily dismissed, but Government Back Benchers can have an enormous influence if they make use of their voice sensibly, moderately and sustainedly. The task of a Government Back Bencher is not to be considered outside the pale but to have it believed—including by the Whips—that one is redeemable and interested in looking for good solutions.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): What should the loyal Government Back Bencher do if they find themselves totally opposed to the Government's proposals, say, for example, on whether the upper House should be directly elected?

Mr. Sheldon: I can only answer from my own experience. I was against the Government on devaluation and on the east of Suez policy. At the time of devaluation, I was the chairman of the economic and finance group. I spoke in the House in favour of devaluation, and nine other members of the economic and finance group of the parliamentary Labour party spoke in my support on devaluation, but there was nobody in the Press Gallery and it was never reported. It was all in Hansard, but not in the papers. The House of Commons must return to being the centre of debate and argument to convince the people what is right and what should be done.

Government Back Benchers should put the arguments sensibly and clearly. If they get the debate going, they may persuade their colleagues and the Government of the need for a change. Nothing is fixed irredeemably. However, one should make one's point with courtesy and persistence.

In the 1969 debates on House of Lords reform, I was concerned the proposals would make the position of Members of the House of Lords more attractive. It would have given them powers as well as salaries. I considered the revising powers of the House of Lords and I was impressed by the arguments of Professor Griffiths who showed that nearly all the substantive amendments in the Lords were the result of Government actions.

I accept that the position has changed in the past 30 years. Government legislation is now more hurried and requires more amendments. Nevertheless, the fault for defective legislation lies with the House of Commons. Legislation is defective not because it has not been examined properly in the House of Lords but because the 659 Members in this place have not highlighted the flaws. That is a problem of application and of principle.

The only legislation that requires amendment from an outside body is the quinquennial Act. We clearly cannot change that Act ourselves: we cannot legislate to continue as Members of Parliament without calling a general election. I am also concerned about the domination of this Chamber by the Executive. Reference has been made to that problem, which has existed for 30 or 40 years—although it was not such a powerful obstacle when I was first elected to this place. Today, almost all Members of Parliament are full-time Members and they want a career structure. That leads to dominance first by the Executive and then by central party organisations. That is a serious matter.

I was not expected to be chosen to contest my seat of Ashton-under-Lyne: it was purely accidental. I only went along for the ride. I never expected to be a Member of Parliament—it was just one of those strange things that happens. I am not sure that that sort of thing will occur again—although there are many people in a similar position. We should have Members of Parliament from different backgrounds. A central party organisation produces clones too readily, and we do not want that in this place. Members of Parliament should have diverse views and characteristics.

Faced with those problems, people look to the second Chamber to provide solutions. However, the second Chamber can also be influenced by the Executive. The Executive have the power and may find themselves forced to exert in the other place the control that they wield in the House of Commons.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): The right hon. Gentleman is talking about the powers of the Executive in this and in another place. Does he believe that the Executive should be represented in the other Chamber if it is to carry out its legislative scrutiny role properly? Why should the Executive be represented in another place?

Mr. Sheldon: We look forward to seeing the royal commission's report. I do not see how those serving on a royal commission can agree about an issue such as this. If I were to put the people I know on a royal commission panel, I would assemble as many views as there were commission members. It will be interesting to see how the royal commission will come to some agreement and whether its members will be prepared to compromise their views.

The major question is how to ensure that hon. Members have the reasonable level of independence necessary to secure good legislation and an active debate that represents the views in the country and focuses the nation on the issues that concern it most. In this connection, the only alternative to the dogfight between two sides of the House—which is necessary, but not sufficient—is the role of Government Back Benchers.

There will be no satisfactory solution so long as the House of Commons does not fulfil its traditional role, which has existed at least since the Reform Act of 1832.

[Mr. Sheldon]

If it fulfils that role, the House of Lords will be less important and a new system may be devised more readily. The message is that the House of Commons must fulfil its function and then look to the House of Lords to fill in the far fewer gaps in our constitution.

4.59 pm

Mr. John MacGregor (South Norfolk): I shall begin by making two comments on points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox). They are points that I have made in the past, but they are worth repeating in any debate on the House of Lords.

First, I agree with all the criticism of the Government for proceeding with phase 1 without knowing what phase 2 will be. They have put the cart before the horse. It is clear that the Government gave no thought beforehand to the long-term consequences of their proposals. The speech by the Leader of the House made that particularly clear, because she dodged all the issues of what phase 2 might consist of, and resorted to leaving that question to the royal commission and then to the Joint Committee and the House. That is a fundamental criticism of the Government.

Secondly, I agree also with the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). I suspect that we shall be stuck with phase 1 for a long time, partly because of the run-up to the next election and the processes that must be gone through, and partly, as the right hon. Gentleman said, because of the difficulties of reaching any agreement, not least in the royal commission, and in the House, about what a long-term phase 2 should be. I believe that the House of Lords as it will be constituted under the House of Lords Bill will be in place for a very long time, which I find deeply unsatisfactory.

I was not sure how the right hon. Gentleman would conclude his speech, because he spent most of his time talking about the House of Commons, rather than the House of Lords. I suspected that he would say, as he did, that, if the Commons reformed itself correctly in a number of the ways that he outlined, it would not matter too much what the House of Lords was like because it would not have many functions. I do not share his optimism—if there is optimism, which I doubt—that the Commons will be able to address some of the points that he made. It is therefore important to consider the composition and powers of the second Chamber.

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): Does my right hon. Friend agree that nothing would provide a greater incentive for reform of the House of Commons than the reformed House of Lords doing its job correctly?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree, and I shall return to that point later.

The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne referred to the increasing dangers of the power of the Executive over the legislature and the centralisation of powers. If we leave in place a weakened House of Lords, which I suspect we shall have, and an unreformed House of Commons, which we shall probably have also, the power of the Executive will continue to increase. That is why we need to consider a stronger House of Lords and, perhaps, a reformed House of Commons. However, a reformed Commons will not, on its own, be sufficient.

Mr. Tyrie: Does my right hon. Friend think that the likelihood of Commons reform would be greatly enhanced if the Lords were given moral authority and powers? That would stimulate this place into reforming itself.

Mr. MacGregor: It might, and I just agreed with my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) on that very point. It is much more likely that the Commons will reform itself if we have a House of Lords that is different from that envisaged in the Bill going through Parliament at present.

Having made two points that have frequently been made and with which I strongly agree, I turn now to the future and the royal commission and its report. Lord Wakeham's royal commission began in an excellent manner. I have read the consultation paper several times, and it raises most of the big issues, only a few of which I shall have time to refer to today. I am encouraged by the fact that it has not assumed certain points, particularly those relating to powers, but is raising all the fundamental issues relating to powers as well as composition. I shall comment on the criteria, the powers and the composition.

On the criteria, I absolutely share the position of the Leader of the House and agree with her about the pre-eminence of the House of Commons. I am an out-and-out House of Commons man, and the only difference on that point between me and the right hon. Lady is one of sex. I shall comment on one criterion that is included in the consultation paper and one that is not. The first, which I want particularly to single out, is the importance of the second Chamber complementing, rather than duplicating, this Chamber.

Mrs. Beckett indicated assent.

Mr. MacGregor: That criterion leads to a number of conclusions, and although the Leader of the House nodded on that point, I thought that her remarks about powers demonstrated that she has a closed mind about the second Chamber complementing the Commons. If she takes that point seriously, it will lead her to consider more powers for the House of Lords.

On page 6 of the White Paper, the Government say that "the second chamber must have a distinctive role", and on page 7 they refer to a "fundamental transformation" of the constitutional processes, including the way in which the House of Lords is reformed. The complementary nature is a key criterion, and will underline everything that I shall say about powers and composition.

A criterion that is not listed, but which is very important, is that the second Chamber must attract high-calibre people who have a wide range of experience and expertise. I agree with the Leader of the House on this; she mentioned the issue, but did not follow it through. If we are honest, perhaps too much of the House of Lords is in the nature of what my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke) described in a recent article in the Evening Standard as:

> "A pleasant club and a debating chamber made up of people who are reluctant to retire from public life but don't want to go through the process of election any more."

That is something of a caricature, although there is an element of truth in it. It does not lead me to the same conclusion as that drawn by my right hon. and learned Friend, which was that the second Chamber should be wholly elected—I shall come to that—but it is an important point in considering what we want the House of Lords to do.

Attracting high-calibre people who have a wide range of experience and expertise is fundamental. We need to do so if we are to have a stronger Chamber than now—and one that is respected. As the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said, it is becoming more and more difficult for this House to attract people in the middle of, or slightly later on in, their careers, who have considerable experience and expertise from a range of walks of life. This House—I regret this—is therefore composed more and more of people who are full-time politicians, from the time they leave their educational experiences to their retirement from this Chamber. In other words, we are increasingly politician-dominated.

People with outside careers, who in the past have entered the House in their late 30s and contributed a great deal, must now choose between that outside career and a much lower salary and—frankly—poorer pensions. That is partly because we make it more difficult for people to have outside interests, but mainly because if people lose their seats in their late 40s or early 50s, they find it extremely difficult, given the nature of the world of work today, to pick up the threads, have anything like an attractive career in the run-up to their retirement and secure a reasonable pension.

I speak with some feeling on the matter because, as chairman of the House of Commons trustees pension fund, I see acute cases among ex-colleagues who have lost their seats in their late 40s and early 50s. People outside the House are aware of that, and, as a result, do not want to enter it. The House of Lords could assist in bringing in such outside experience, thus complementing and supplementing this place.

We will not fulfil either key criteria unless we recognise the need to tackle the question of powers. If the reform is to be proper, thorough and long term—that ought to be the Government's aim—the second Chamber must make a contribution to the political life of the nation that is noticed and respected. The media must take notice of it, and the establishment, the Government and the civil service must take it into account. It must also affect decisions—that means changing as well as influencing Government policy.

I accept that one of the weaknesses of the strong hereditary composition of the House of Lords was that, in practice, it constrained that body in its exercise of such functions. Therefore, even when it had such powers, it did not exercise them very fully. If I am honest, speaking as a former Minister with 15 years' experience in government, I also know that, quite often, the belief that the House of Lords has a powerful influence over policy and the practice are two different things. Therefore, it is important to strengthen the House of Lords in that regard. If the House of Lords is to act as a better second-Chamber check on the Executive than it does now, it must have strengthened powers. I hope that I have shown that I believe that it is crucial to tackle the question of powers first, and composition second.

I was critical of the White Paper because it gave much more attention to composition than to powers. In fact, at some points, it talks of weakening the powers of a second Chamber. Indeed, I was a little concerned that the Leader of the House was going down that route today when she said that she did not believe that the House of Lords should have more powers than it has at present. I am very glad that the royal commission is not approaching its task in that way.

If I were at all critical of the excellent report from Lord Mackay and his colleagues—it was instituted by the Conservative party, and is an excellent contribution to the debate; it has certainly moved the arguments on considerably—I would say only that it tended to take the view that the powers of the House of Lords should be left as they are and should evolve organically, rather than being tackled now. I believe that there will not be a third chance to consider the powers of the other place. Indeed, today we have already argued that there is a danger that there will not be a second opportunity to do so. It is therefore important to consider the matter of powers now.

What should the powers be? Moreover, how will the powers be used, and will they be used?

Mr. Maclennan: Before the right hon. Gentleman deals with those matters, will he perhaps lend support to his argument by instancing examples, drawn from his long 15-year experience of government, of when the Government might have been assisted by the House of Lords exercising powers, and when he believes that, ultimately, amendments for the better would consequently have been made? Will he give some examples? An admission that Governments have got it wrong is very rare in this Chamber.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall list four issues related to powers additional to those already held by the House of Lords, and, in doing so, I should answer the right hon. Gentleman's question. All the issues arise from my own feelings and experience in government.

Secondary legislation is the first issue. I am delighted that, in its submission to the royal commission, the Conservative party has highlighted the importance of strengthening both Houses—although, in this debate, we are talking only about the House of Lords—in their handling of secondary legislation. I am delighted also that, in one of its questions, the royal commission asked about

"providing for the Second Chamber's opposition to any subordinate legislation to result in delay and reconsideration (by the Commons), rather than rejection."

I think that the way in which Parliament as a whole deals with secondary legislation is now a disgrace. The situation has become very much worse because of the habit of all Governments, but very much of the current one, of addressing so many key issues in secondary legislation because they do not have the time or do not wish to think through the consequences in primary legislation. As the practice has become so much more intensively practised, it has become much more important to answer the question of how this Chamber and the other Chamber should handle secondary legislation.

Mr. Letwin: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the prevalence of so-called Henry VIII clauses, in which secondary legislation is permitted to amend or revoke primary legislation, has almost got to the stage of turning the tables by making secondary primary, and primary secondary?

Mr. MacGregor: That is not always the case, of course, but very often it is. It must be a subject of great concern for all of us, as it has greatly strengthened the Executive's powers and made almost non-existent the legislature's powers of scrutinising.

[Mr. MacGregor]

As we all know, this House is able either to reject in toto or to accept in toto secondary legislation—statutory instruments—but cannot amend it. In Committee, when one is under pressure on a particular aspect of a Bill referring a matter to secondary legislation, the big concession that one makes—I have been guilty of it—is to agree that it is important, and therefore to agree that it should be dealt with by affirmative rather than by negative resolution. Big deal. When a Government have the majority that the current Government do, affirmative resolution does not amount to a row of beans. Therefore, there is no opportunity for either this House or the other House, which has a convention on secondary legislation, properly to scrutinise secondary legislation. There is no opportunity for this House to examine and amend in detail those crucial pieces of secondary legislation.

Mr. Grieve: I ask this as someone serving on the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is most extraordinary that, even when scrutiny—which is limited to identifying whether legislation has been properly drafted—reveals that legislation is defective and deficient, it is still open to the Government to decide, as they very frequently do, to continue with the statutory instrument in that form, with the mere assurance that, at some later date, it will be corrected?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree. The practice underlines just how few powers of scrutiny the House now has over secondary legislation. I am sure that my hon. Friend will agree that much worse than the example he gave is when there are real criticisms of one policy aspect of the secondary legislation, but hon. Members are asked to accept the whole thing or nothing at all. As I said, with the current Government's majority, it is well known that that entails accepting the whole legislation.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not particularly want to make a partisan point, and agree with much of what the right hon. Gentleman has said—perhaps more than he has recognised. However, the notion that the practice has been introduced by the Government and is a consequence of our majority—[Interruption.] It is not a consequence of our majority. The practice has been growing over very many years, and I think that we all recognise that it has defects. Although I understand the astonishment of the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) to hear the Government saying, "Yes, this is defective, but we will come back to it at some other time", I assure him that, to my knowledge, the practice has been going on for at least 15 years.

Mr. MacGregor: I thought that I had already said that all Governments have done it. However, I also said that the practice is worse now, primarily because there is increasingly a tendency to put legislation into secondary form, but also because of the Government's large majority.

Mr. Hogg: I must ask my right hon. Friend whether there is not a further dimension to the matter. Secondary legislation is the vehicle for expressing in statutory language decisions applicable to the United Kingdom and emanating from the European Union, either in directives or in regulations. In respect to a whole body of that, there is—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. and learned Gentleman, but I am sure that he knows that he should be addressing the occupant of the Chair.

Mr. Hogg: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

In that respect, no mechanism is available to us, either in this place or in the other place, to address the merits of that legislation.

Mr. MacGregor: That was going to be my second point. I should first finish dealing with secondary domestic legislation.

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central) rose—

Mr. MacGregor: I hope that hon. Members will forgive me for not giving way again for a while. There are things that I want to say on composition. I do not want to speak for too long, and there have already been interventions in my speech.

I just want to underline the fact—I am glad that all the interventions, including that of the Leader of the House, have supported it—that we have to address the issue of how secondary legislation should be dealt with.

The House of Lords may have more time than we do to consider secondary legislation, and if the other place attracts people with outside experience and expertise, it may have a greater ability to consider secondary legislation. I therefore believe that the House of Lords has a particularly important role in dealing with secondary legislation. It should be given powers to amend it, and certainly to delay it, to give Governments time to think again.

The second issue relating to powers that I should like to raise—European legislation—was just mentioned briefly by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg). To be very brief, I shall simply say that we have, of course, developed mechanisms for scrutinising European legislation. This House's mechanisms for scrutinising such legislation are fairly extensive, and are probably more extensive than those of other democratic institutions in the European Union. Nevertheless, I think that there are matters on which we could go further and in which the House of Lords could have a specific role to play.

The role of the House of Lords should include consideration of issues that will be decided in the Council of Ministers and in European legislation, but well before those decisions are taken. I stress the importance of consideration well before the decisions are taken. In my experience—as a former Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, and as a former Secretary of State for Transport—the House of Commons far too often debates issues that are almost already settled in a negotiating framework in Brussels. Anyone who has experience of how the Brussels system works will know that to be true.

In one sense, therefore, there are limitations to what the House of Lords could do on European legislation before final decisions on that legislation are taken, not only for the reason that I have given—which could be dealt with by considering the issues very early—but because every Minister has to engage in negotiation with other Ministers and cannot himself or herself entirely achieve the wishes of this Chamber or the other Chamber.

The House of Lords could also play a much bigger part in the implementation of European legislation. As we all know, it is a common cry that the United Kingdom tends to implement legislation much more extremely and thoroughly than other member states do. Clearly, there is a role not only for the second Chamber but for this Chamber in ensuring that we do not burden ourselves with consequential legislation that goes way beyond what is needed. The second Chamber should also have a role in subsequently examining how European legislation has worked. The other place should have powers in performing that important role.

My third point is that more use should be made of the revising power of the second Chamber. Two years' breathing space on legislation may well be desirable. I do not often agree with Earl Russell, but I agree with what he wrote recently in The Sunday Telegraph about the House of Lords:

> "It is only because we have the power to vote that the Commons ever listens to anything we say. Only if the functions of the reformed House include the right to revise legislation, against the wishes of the Commons, will it be worth bothering with."

There is a grain of truth in that. The revising powers need to be looked at.

My fourth suggestion relates to the Select Committees of the second Chamber, which do a splendid job and have a substantial reputation. They are one of the second Chamber's current strengths, particularly because they enable unelected people who have spent a long time in other careers to bring their experience to bear. They are highly regarded, but I wonder how much influence their reports have. They are read by the experts and civil servants, but I must admit that they are not always the first documents that a Minister reads when dealing with policy issues in this place.

We could strengthen the powers of the Committees by building on the excellent work of the Joint Committee on the Financial Services and Markets Bill, with reports to inform both Chambers. Pre-legislative Select Committees in the House of Lords, given the composition that I hope for, could have a substantial role. I hope that that answers the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) by showing some areas in which the powers could be extended.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I shall be brief. Having given evidence as a Minister to Lords Committees, does my right hon. Friend agree that it is potentially the most frightening experience that a Minister can have?

Mr. MacGregor: I must have been lucky, because I do not recall that being the case. I certainly found the Committees stimulating and prepared heavily for them, as Ministers do for anything in this Chamber. However, if that was my right hon. Friend's experience, it strengthens my view that the Committees add to the ability of the second Chamber to contribute by dealing with pre-legislative issues.

I am doubtful about the concept of a wholly directly elected second Chamber. First, it would duplicate this Chamber. Secondly, as the White Paper pointed out, it would be a recipe for conflict. The endless tensions are one reason why this Chamber would never agree to it. Unfortunately, such a Chamber would divide too often on purely party lines, duplicating what happens here. Thirdly, the second Chamber would expect a real and different role. If it did not get one, those who stood for election to it would, if they will forgive me, be the failed candidates for membership of this House, regarding it as a stepping stone towards their hope of coming here. Such a Chamber would not be a step forward. If it did not have powers, it would not attract people with a wide range of experience and careers to its wholly elected posts. It would certainly not be independent—that is an important element that many people have referred to—even under the ingenious Mackay proposals whereby Members would be elected for 15 years in total, with one third being elected every five years. That would remove some of the conflict and duplication, but it would not address my criticisms.

Those criticisms do not apply so much to a partly elected Chamber, but there are still difficulties that would need to be thought through, including the proportions and the possibility of there being two classes of Member. I do not have the same overall objections to a partly elected second Chamber.

The greatest merit lies in a mix of indirectly elected and nominated members. I stress the need for indirect election. I share the views of those who think that a Chamber that was wholly appointed, either by the Prime Minister or by his appointees, would be most undesirable. There are two advantages in Members being indirectly elected—independence and expertise. In his consultation paper, Lord Wakeham refers to the case for some Members to be active in other walks of life. I would go further than that: there is a strong case for a lot of Members to be active in other walks of life.

Mr. Hogg: And in this place.

Mr. MacGregor: As there should be in this place, but, alas, for reasons that we have discussed, that is too often not the case these days.

The bodies that would be involved in the process of indirect election are a matter for debate, and I shall not waste time on that now, but there are obvious professions, including the Church and the law, that could contribute to the indirectly elected element.

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): Does my right hon. Friend accept that if we lay too much emphasis on people who are active in other walks of life, they may not pay much attention to their duties in the second Chamber, which would diminish the ability of that Chamber to provide effective scrutiny of what the Government are doing?

Mr. MacGregor: I was coming to that. With a mix of indirectly elected, partly elected and nominated Members, there would be a considerable number of Members who could fulfil more of a full-time role. If we want to attract people with wide experience who have a lot to give to the process of legislation and debate, we have to accept that some of them can be there only part-time.

Mr. Tyrie: My right hon. Friend has argued for increased powers for the House of Lords so that it has the ability to challenge the Executive and call it to account. Does he believe that a mish-mash House could have the necessary moral authority to challenge the authority of an Executive elected on a huge Commons mandate?

[Mr. Tyrie]

Mr. MacGregor: I have already said that there are grave difficulties with a wholly elected Chamber. It would duplicate the work of this Chamber. I do not accept that the only people with any moral authority are those who have been directly elected.

I have already said that Church representatives are important. I would remove the judicial role from the House of Lords and have it purely as a legislative and policy advisory Chamber, but I accept that there would need to be a substantial mix of lawyers in the indirectly elected element, because their expertise would be valuable, particularly in the scrutiny of secondary legislation. The proposals that I have outlined would provide the best mix of a second Chamber that complemented this one and attracted good people.

I cannot see the justification for the proposals regarding representatives of the devolved bodies in Scotland and Wales and the European Parliament. The proposals would duplicate the work that those Members should be doing in their own bodies. Regional interests are well represented in this House, and we should beware of excessive duplication and layers of government. The devolved bodies need to bed down first.

The proposals also raise the question of how the English regions would be represented. Representatives from regional assemblies would not be the way forward. Most of all, the proposals are wrong in principle, because there is no purpose in having a second Chamber composed of people from other elected Chambers. Absurdly, some elected representatives from this place would have to sit in the other place to represent England, complementing those from the Scottish Parliament. The case has not been made.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said that people from other walks of life might be only part-time members. Some life peers, including former colleagues from this place and some noted industrialists, hardly ever participate in the work of the House of Lords. The same is true of some hereditary peers. That has to be addressed. Members of the other place must agree to give a certain proportion of their time to the work of that place. I agree with the Mackay commission that some salary and allowance for secretarial and other help must be given, although I do not agree with the proposal that the allowances should be the same as those in this place.

I believe that this issue poses a great challenge to the House of Commons and particularly to the Government and the Government Whips. If the process is to be more than simply a device to pander to certain left-wing prejudices and get rid of the hereditary element, and is to be a genuine reform with a real purpose to improve our constitutional system and the control over the Executive, involving some of the most experienced and knowledgeable in our nation, the Government must face up to that and accept that it will mean real powers and real changes in the second Chamber. If that is not the case, we will have a House of Lords that is not much different from now, except that the independent hereditary element will be displaced by appointed cronyism and even more concentration of power. That would be a hugely backward step, and I share the fear of the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne that that might happen. I must tell the Leader of the House that the Government will be judged on their response.

5.31 pm

Mr. Peter Temple-Morris (Leominster): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). I am pleased to tell him that I agree with the vast majority of what he said. The spirit of his speech and its bipartisan nature—that applies also to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon)—is necessary in what is essentially a consultative debate. This is the House's road to Lord Wakeham. Doubtless his commission will take heavy note of what we say across the Floor of the House. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk concentrated on powers, but he had quite a bit to say on composition. I hope to complement him by saying a little more on composition. He will hear echoes of his speech in what I say, and I hope that I can advance some of his arguments.

Let me dispose of one point immediately by saying that House of Commons reform is relevant to whatever upper House we have ultimately. As other hon. Members have remarked, House of Commons reform is notoriously difficult to bring about. I am pessimistic about it in the shorter term, but optimistic in the longer term. The Modernisation Committee, which is a noble effort to improve matters, does not move with the speed of an Olympic 100 m sprinter, to put it mildly. Reform will take time. However, I agree with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) that if we create a reformed upper House, which will inevitably come, it will be a great spur to the House of Commons to speed up its reforms.

In reverse order to the right hon. Member for South Norfolk, I will deal first with composition and then deal with functions and powers.

Mr. Letwin: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Temple-Morris: I want to make some progress. The hon. Gentleman has made a number of interventions; I will give way later.

I want to state how I see the upper House, and I shall begin with what we do not want. I agree with the right hon. Member for South Norfolk that we do not want an all-elected Chamber. It would inevitably challenge the House of Commons and its method of election could make it almost an embarrassment to this place. There have been suggestions that it should be elected, in whole or in part, under proportional representation. We must bear in mind the electoral system that prevails for this place and which results in its various characteristics, such as, for example, the lack of Conservatives in entire tracts of the country. Under proportional representation, the Conservatives have now become represented again, but there would immediately be a clash. We cannot get round that, even with some fancy system of staggered long terms, because there would still be a claim that they should be more representative at any given moment. Please, no all-elected Chamber.

We do not want an all-appointed Chamber. Anyone who looks at matters in a somewhat old-fashioned way might see certain attractions in the power of patronage and appointment. It might be seen as an admirable concept under which there could be a great variety of people. However, the public perception, which is all important, is that it would be cronyism gone mad. It would have no legitimacy; the Canadian Senate is a good example. That goes out.

What do we want? There are some interesting guidelines in the admirable White Paper, which is a fair document. Page 6, paragraph 6 states:

"But the second chamber must have a distinctive role and must neither usurp, nor threaten, the supremacy of the first chamber."

That point was raised by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. It is important that this Chamber remains supreme.

Page 6, paragraph 9 of the White Paper states:

"The most distinctive and important role of the present House of Lords is the specialist expertise and independent perspective it can bring to the scrutiny of legislation. But the House of Lords and the work it carries out suffer from its lack of legitimacy".

It then goes on to deal with the House of Lords as at present constituted.

We need to strike a balance between the necessary expertise and legitimacy in the eyes of the public. It follows from those guidelines that we need a mixed Chamber, and I believe that, at the end of the debate, many hon. Members will favour that. The difficulty, as hon. Members agree, is to decide on what mix one has.

Let us look at some criteria for a mixed Chamber. It is essential that we should have the necessary expertise and a relatively independent collective attitude. The last thing we want is a copy of this place. We need part-timers with outside interests—they functioned here until comparatively recently. We must institute a system whereby they can continue to function because those whom we want to get in would not be interested in a Chamber that was any different from that. I welcome the White Paper's view that there should be no automatic party majority, which is very much part of the same point.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): The hon. Gentleman says that it is self-evident that the Members should have the necessary expertise. Would he define what he means by "expertise" and tell us how they acquire it?

Mr. Temple-Morris: All will be revealed as my speech continues. That was a helpful intervention, but if I answered the hon. Gentleman now, I would lose the sequence of my speech. I hope that I will have dealt with it in some depth by the end of my speech.

We also need depth of representation to supplement this place. I am already beginning to answer the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) because, however we achieve that depth of representation, we need to deal with aspects such as occupation, region, gender, ethnic origin and so on.

I shall now deal with the mixed Chamber—part appointed and part elected, directly or indirectly.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman has said that he is moving on to deal with a part-appointed and part-elected Chamber, by which he clearly accepts that part of the Chamber needs to be appointed. Might there be a possibility that the elected Members, who should be the vast majority, co-opt those who are not elected, thereby removing the power of patronage entirely and enhancing the legitimacy of the Chamber?

Mr. Temple-Morris: Much as I respect the interventions that the hon. Gentleman makes on my speeches, my answer is no, no, no. One has only to look at the Irish Senate and the political nature of the electorate there to realise that an admirable system can go wildly wrong. The last thing we want is for those who are elected, by whatever means, to reproduce themselves by way of appointment.

Mr. Grieve rose—

Mr. Temple-Morris: I will not give way again. I have not even answered the hon. Gentleman yet.

It is important that, to a certain extent, the power of patronage, well controlled by way of an independent appointments commission, stays with us in order to get the people we need who would not dream of coming forward under any other form of election.

The proportions within a mixed Chamber have been mentioned. It is important to remain flexible at this stage. On Second Reading, I talked about 70 per cent. being elected—the vast majority—and 30 per cent. being appointed, or one third being appointed, one third being elected and one third being functional constituencies, or colleges of interest as I called them. I am sorry to distress the hon. Member for Beaconsfield, but now I tend to go for more appointed Members. I would even go up to about 40 per cent. We need flexibility of appointment to get the right people in—I return to the point about expertise and independence of view, and the Cross-Bench element.

The period of appointment is directly relevant to the continuity of the House and its independence. It is a difficult subject which was touched on by the right hon. Member for South Norfolk. Particularly if we want younger people in, we have to consider the possibility of reappointment, but that limits independence. I have thought about the matter as, no doubt, have others, but, at the end of the day, rather than any particular term, appointment should be for life or the age of 75. We hope that all the Members have a happy and healthy retirement. I see that element of appointment as the foundation or the permanent feature of the new House of Lords.

I now turn to the elected part of the upper House. Touching again on a point raised by the right hon. Member for South Norfolk, direct election, whether it is regional or anything else, would produce the dreadful danger of party hacks. The upper Chamber would become a second division and, like the Irish Senate, to use an example that I know very well, in some ways it would be a waiting room for those who wanted to get down to this end of the building. In my view, direct elections should be avoided at all costs.

That leaves us with indirect elections, which need to avoid a political electorate. I referred briefly to that in reply to an intervention. The Irish Senate operates by way of functional constituencies. It is lovely on paper and it could work very well. Sometimes the system is criticised without the realisation that it is not the system, but the electorate that is wrong. The electorate comprises the Members of the Dail and members of Irish local authorities, who form one of the most highly political electorates in the country, and the same would apply here.

[Mr. Temple-Morris]

There is nothing wrong with functional constituencies provided that we get the electorate right. In regard to the electorate, the answer is quite simple: they should elect themselves. The indirect system of election involves colleges of interest or functional constituencies. They could include representatives of the main areas of activity, such as business, the professions, trade unions and so on. The European Parliament could be a functional constituency, not in terms of electing its own Members, but it could elect a representative. The devolved Parliament and Assemblies of Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland could also be involved.

I entirely agree with the right hon. Member for South Norfolk that when Members of the European Parliament were first elected in 1974, many hon. Members standing said that there could be a dual mandate. If I remember rightly, after the first European election in 1979, only one solitary MEP remained a Member of Parliament after 1984.

Mr. Grieve: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way again. In the spirit of the debate, which is more a discussion, is there not a difficulty with the system of colleges of election? The Irish one began in the 1930s. Is it not the truth that it derived from a fascist form of government? I do not mean that pejoratively, but that was its origin: the idea of an estate of the realm made up of corporations. Is not the problem that the system typecasts people into categories, whereas all the evidence is that today's society is very fluid and that people are not typecast in that fashion?

Mr. Temple-Morris: I do not think that bringing fascism into the debate is particularly helpful. I do not find the Republic of Ireland a particularly fascist state. Having dealt with that rather extreme part of the hon. Gentleman's intervention, I should say that the election should be conducted democratically. There is no earthly reason why it should not be—I hope that the hon. Gentleman would agree that the Bar Council, for example, would be perfectly capable of putting people up to go to the upper House and electing such people at its annual meeting. Any professional, business or equivalent body in the country would have no difficulty in doing that. Such an election is a way to get in people in a representative capacity other than by appointing them by power of patronage, from wherever it comes. In addition, it would provide the opportunity for indirect election from regional councils in order to get regional representatives.

With regard to period of office, I do not think that there is anything wrong with having two different types of Members of the upper House. Appointed Members should be for life or until the age of 75. It is a matter for discussion, but a fair term of office for those indirectly elected by way of functional constituencies would be for the duration of a Parliament. Indeed, many of those representing such constituencies may not want to do so permanently; they may want to do a spell in Parliament.

Finally, I wish to make a few specific points about functions and powers. First, the Law Lords have been mentioned. As I said on Second Reading, I do not believe that the Law Lords belong to the legislature. Their presence is almost an accident of history; at one point, no one else had the skill to try such significant cases. They could quite easily continue as a supreme court of appeal, sitting in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, as they do today on certain matters. However, that is no bar to senior judges being nominated to the House of Lords. Inevitably, many of them will be and, no doubt, there will be plenty of lawyers in that Chamber.

Secondly, I know that there are constitutional complications in respect of the bishops, but I do not think that they belong in a modern legislature. That problem needs to be addressed. In some cases, they could be nominated. Indeed, the Churches could be functional constituencies. As a member of the Church of England, let me make the point that we need representatives of more Churches and faiths than just the Church of England by constitutional right.

Thirdly, the position of Ministers crept in by way of an intervention. I see no reason why Ministers need to be Members of the House of Lords. The concept of having Government spokesmen, as occurs in most other Parliaments of the democratic world, could easily apply to the Lords. Ministers should be firmly in the House of Commons. There seems to me no earthly reason why Ministers could not, where necessary, have a right of audience in the House of Lords. That occurs in many other democratic Parliaments.

The upper House should seriously consider allowing rights of audience or outside participation. The right way to deal with our devolved Parliaments and Assemblies is not to appoint their representatives there, although they may be colleges of interest, but to allow First Ministers, and so on, a right of audience in the upper House, if they so wish, in respect of crucial legislation. That occurs not only in the European Parliament, but in other Parliaments.

Finally, I wish to make an important general point with regard to powers. We have to get it right as it is a serious matter. While we want a vigorous and strong House of Lords which must play its part in controlling the Executive, we should be under no illusion; whatever powers we give Members of the upper House at the end of the process will be used. I emphasise that. There will not be any of the present deference or standing back; almost by definition, the new upper House will use whatever clout we give it. Therefore, the House must take the matter seriously, and I welcome the careful process that the Government have set in train by appointing the royal commission, which shows every promise of producing a good and constructive report, and then involving the Joint Committee and both Houses of Parliament. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne said, the process will take some time. I have no doubt from the debate thus far that we are taking it seriously. It is an important process that will improve our governance for the future.

5.50 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross): The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) said that this was one of those occasions when the House of Commons tended to make speeches rather than listen to them. I congratulate him on sitting throughout the debate with evident interest.

I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman is here, because I want to address an issue of great importance, which he raised. He had a somewhat world-weary view about the prospect of reform of the upper House, based on his 30 years in this House, and one could have a degree of sympathy with that. However, he showed a perhaps surprising radicalism in his belief that the Liaison Committee might succeed in creating a new career track for Members of the House of Commons, which would so transform the work of this place that it might become a significant check on the Executive in a different manner from that which it has exercised during our time here.

One can exaggerate the extent to which there has been a falling off from a golden age of the House of Commons, which has been exceedingly partisan in the past and not just within the memory of those sitting here today. Historically—on issues such as the reform of the House of Lords during the first decade of this century, home rule for Ireland and many other matters—the House of Commons has shown itself to be a partisan place; perhaps that is its function.

As people are anxious to preserve the authority and distinctiveness of the House of Commons as the fount of Executive Government, it would seem likely that that will remain. Our approach to the reform of the House of Lords should take into account the probability that the House of Commons will remain similar to its present form. Whatever may be the developments in the Liaison Committee—about which the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne spoke—I hope that they will be progressed. The House of Lords has the potential to become more effective in the discharge of a different role from its present one.

For that reason, I was glad to hear the Leader of the House say that the royal commission should focus on that role, and should approach the matter fundamentally and—she did not use this word, although she clearly intended it—radically. That is an entirely desirable approach. That caution should prevent the royal commission from being lost in the deltoid sands at the outturn of a river—something that would occur if it waited to see how this House reforms its procedure to make it more effective.

The Leader of the House reflected the approach of the Prime Minister, before he became Prime Minister, in his John Smith speech in 1996, when he said that the Labour party had always favoured an elected upper House. That message would not be appropriate for the Government to enunciate in terms today. Having set up a royal commission, it would be wrong to follow the advice of the hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) and tell the royal commission what it should do, for the reasons given so effectively by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike). None the less, the royal commission will have in mind the fact that the clear view, as stated by the Prime Minister, that the Labour party has always favoured an elected second Chamber.

The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) and the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) produced a kind of consensus, but I hope profoundly that that consensus does not inform the thinking of the royal commission. I could not have disagreed more with the view of the hon. Member for Leominster that it makes sense to go towards a system of election from functional constituencies. For the sake of avoiding academic discussion, I will not address the issue of whether the idea has fascist roots or not. However, it is clear that it is an impractical suggestion.

The hon. Member for Leominster spoke about the sense of giving a member of the Bar Council a position in the House of Lords as of right—but why? I am a barrister, but I cannot see why the legal profession—if that is what the hon. Gentleman is proposing—should be represented by somebody from the Bar. Why not somebody from the Law Society, or from the magistrates' clerks?

Mr. Temple-Morris: Why not?

Mr. Maclennan: Why not indeed? We could have six, seven, eight, 10 or a dozen people with some claim from a functional constituency to represent the law in its workings, and that could be true of every other profession. In terms of the medical profession, is it to be the president of the Royal College of Surgeons or the president of the Royal College of Anaesthetists? Are we to get the entire medical profession together? Are we to have the patients, as a functional constituency, electing someone to represent them in the upper House? Tourism is a huge industry, and represents tremendously important earnings capacity in this country. Who is to speak for it?

Mr. Hogg: I very much agree with the right hon. Gentleman. Is there not an added vice, to which he may shortly come—that the members chosen by some functional college would regard themselves in some way as delegates of that functional college, and would not approach matters in the broader way that I hope that Members of the second Chamber would adopt?

Mr. Maclennan: I entirely agree. Not only would there be a problem with the latitudinarianism of those who would claim to be the spokespersons for a sector of opinion, but there would be the problem of their becoming out of date. How long can they go on claiming to speak for that functional constituency? The issue has been too easily used as a kind of halfway house towards the election of the upper House.

I think that it is an evasion—an evasion of an issue that was put directly by a previous Conservative commission, led by Sir Alec Douglas-Home in 1978, on the composition of the upper House. That report completely refuted the speech of the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor), a former Leader of the House, in terms. It stated:

"Moral authority can only come from the direct election of its Members."

There is the point. We have not heard enough in the debate about the virtues of democracy.

The Leader of the House talked about the importance of legitimacy, and that is a function of democracy. However, if the new, reformed House is to speak with authority, it must draw its legitimacy from direct elections. If it is not to be a reflection of this House—there is some consensus on that, although not on how that is to be achieved—I would suggest, praying in aid the Douglas-Home commission, that it must be elected in a different manner from the House of Commons.

Douglas-Home was not squeamish about urging a proportional system; nor would I be about advocating the single transferable vote for such elections, as it would ensure the probability that not only would no single party dominate that House but that its Members would represent substantially different constituencies, drawn from a much wider geographical base. If the experience of other countries with the single transferable vote is any guide, it would also bring in that very mix of people that it is our common wish to see elected.

[Mr. Maclennan]

Mr. Letwin: I am puzzled by the right hon. Gentleman's remarks because I understood his party to favour that system for this House. How would its introduction in the second Chamber differentiate it from the first if his desires for the first were also achieved?

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman is running a little behind, which is surprising from him, as he is one of the most acute members of the Conservative Front Bench. The Liberal Democrats happily welcomed the Jenkins report's recommendation of alternative vote plus for this House, which would build on existing parliamentary constituencies—that is its virtue—but that is something entirely different from what is being advocated for the upper House. We are observing the rubric of the Douglas-Home commission, which seems to make eminently good sense.

Mr. Temple-Morris: The right hon. Gentleman knows that I am a supporter of electoral reform, but does he seriously think that the House would create an upper House that could in many ways be argued to be more representative than this place? Does he honestly think that that is on, or practical?

Mr. Maclennan: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for acknowledging that the single transferable vote is an eminently democratic system of election, but I would not for a minute suggest that it is more democratic than the proposal of the Jenkins commission, which will be the subject of a referendum. That is how the matter should be decided, and how the Government have undertaken that it will be decided. I do not doubt that the House can live with a touch of democracy, if that is what he is inferring that it might not be prepared to accept.

Most of today's speeches have, rightly, focused on what is the point of the upper House, what it should do that it is not doing and whether it needs more powers to do it effectively. It is fair to say that the House of Lords has many powers that it feels constrained from using because it lacks legitimacy. I do not set my face against change, and there are several areas in which I think that it would be desirable—for example, involving the upper House, as has been suggested by many of its Members, in greater scrutiny of treaty making, and giving it more of a role in scrutinising secondary legislation—but the real inhibition on the effectiveness of the upper House concerns not its powers but the sense that, if it were to seek to face down the Government, its wings would be clipped.

That is why I asked the right hon. Member for South Norfolk the question, which he did not answer, whether there were occasions on which he would now, with the benefit of hindsight, say that it would have been a good thing if the Government of which he was a distinguished member for a long time had been faced down by a reformed second Chamber. He has not said so, so we must take it that it is his view that the present balance of power between the Executive and the legislature, in its manifestation in the House of Lords, is about right. That is why he did not advocate anything more fundamental or radical than he did.

Mr. MacGregor: I should have thought that the four areas that I listed showed where I thought that the upper Chamber, and to some extent this House, was deficient in its scrutiny of the Executive.

Mr. Maclennan: I acknowledge that the right hon. Gentleman has argued that there are deficiencies, but he has not said how he would give the upper House the authority to deal with them effectively. By espousing the minimalist changes that he has recommended, he fortifies the belief that he is broadly content with the current balance of power between the Executive and the legislature.

Mr. Hogg: The right hon. Gentleman is asking, fairly, whether those who have been in government can identify measures that we think that the upper House should have rejected. I most certainly can: for example, the ability that we instituted to try people for war crimes committed during the second world war; that was wrong in principle and I wish that the second Chamber had voted it down. As a rather more dramatic example, with hindsight, the community charge was a disaster and I very much wish that the other place had voted that down, too.

Mr. Maclennan: Not for the first time, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has shown himself to be more robust and outspoken than some of his colleagues, but his example of the war crimes legislation was a rather surprising one, because it was an occasion on which the upper House did indeed vote down the Government, although it was not of course able to carry its way because, ultimately, the Parliament Act was invoked.

We have not had a debate about the Parliament Act and whether it should be more widely open to the House of Lords to have the last word. If the pre-eminence of the House of Commons in our polity flows from anything, it is first from the fact that it is the bed from which Ministers are plucked, and secondly from the fact that we have the last word on legislation, save in the extraordinary case, referred to specifically by the Leader of the House, of the possibility of extending the life of a Parliament beyond five years.

There are other matters over which it might be reasonable to consider that the House of Lords should be able to exercise such a power. The essence of the power that it has is in respect of major constitutional change, and that principle might be embraced for issues such as any suggestion of tampering with the Representation of the People Acts and the provisions for secret voting.

Mr. Grieve: I earlier said that I did not consider the Irish model a particularly good one, but may I extol one virtue of it—the possibility of a conflict on a constitutional issue being the trigger for a referendum?

Mr. Maclennan: That is an entirely sensible suggestion, and I would be happy to endorse it.

On constitutional matters, because of the dominance of this Chamber by the Government, which I believe to be virtually inevitable, it is valuable to have another

Chamber with a checking power. It should not be a power to stand in the way for all time if there is consensus for reform, but if there is doubt about that consensus—about the view of the public—it would seem appropriate to give the House of Lords the ability to block legislation. For example, it would have been appropriate to block the winding up of the government of London without the calling of a referendum of the kind referred to by the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve).

The composition of the second Chamber should embrace the principle of democratic legitimacy. The argument deployed against that by the proponents of a partially, or even predominantly, appointed upper House is that the great virtue of the House of Lords as it stands is its expertise.

It is true that there are people of quality of mind and of experience—business experience, and so forth. I do not deny that we have been able to enjoy contributions of great merit and moment from such people in the past. I think they have probably given the raft, or the afflatus of oxygen, that has kept the place alive, but I feel less certain whether we should look to that as the crucial test in the future. That is partly because of the difficulties associated with functional constituencies, which will spill over however we decide to appoint, rather than to elect, the Members.

If we are to appoint people of experience, how do we choose them? That is made no easier by removing the political element from the choice and putting the function at arm's length from the Government by setting up an appointments commission, itself perhaps appointed by the Government. There is still a real problem of choice. The wisest people in the world, choosing among the wisest people available, would still not be able to satisfy us that those people were, by virtue of their expertise, more legitimate than many who were not appointed. That is an impossibilist course to advocate.

It makes sense for people to put their trust in democracy. If the upper House is drawn from a different base, and elected by a different franchise and method of election, and if it has clearly demarcated functions, it will attract a different kind of person.

I have heard the arguments across the Chamber about whether there should be Ministers in the upper House. Personally, I think that there are powerful arguments against their being there. If there were no Ministers in the upper House, that would remove at a stroke people who desire to be involved in the career patronage there, which is a pale reflection of what happens in this House but still to some extent colours that House's proceedings. That is a meritorious argument, worthy of consideration.

If the avenue of the revitalised upper House is not the primary route to ministerial office, that House will in any event have a different flavour and function, and could attract different people. It might prove attractive to public spirited people who have made their mark in other walks of life, and who wish to give some direct public service at a later stage, perhaps, than the younger professional full-time politicians who, it has been suggested, now dominate our debates, although to me that charge seems a slight exaggeration. That would certainly be a different sort of upper House, and that is where I would put my trust.

I hope that, in considering the functions and the reform of the upper House, Lord Wakeham and his colleagues will not be too sensitive about the possibility of the House of Commons bolting because of its fear of what a revitalised upper House might do. It would be a discreditable stance for this House to say that the legitimacy of the other House should, in perpetuity—or even as far ahead as we can see—remain tarnished by other than democratic principles. To put it more simply, the upper House should become as democratically legitimate as this House.

Sir Patrick Cormack: The right hon. Gentleman is making an interesting speech, but how, in his directly elected upper House, would he ensure that those who do not belong to a party would have the opportunity of being elected? How could he ensure that elections would not be conducted on party lines? If he could not, he could not guarantee the presence of any independents.

Mr. Maclennan: That problem has exercised me; that is why I have retained a residual commitment to an element involving appointed Members. There is a case—perhaps not a very strong one—for such an element, to accommodate just such people. That has always—or at least, for the past decade or so—been my party's position, and I see the point of it.

When we consider the performance of the upper House today, we see that one can exaggerate the significance of that independent element, as it now exists, in shaping policy and reactions to the Government. The participation rates of the so-called independents and Cross Benchers, both in votes and in other ways, are substantially lower than those of the partisan Members who accept a Whip. We also have to weigh in the balance the concern that the more one increases the independent Cross-Bench element, the more one decreases the right of the House to be listened to on equal terms with this House as an expression of genuine democratic opinion.

Mr. Grieve: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the question that I asked the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris), about co-option? Surely there would be more legitimacy if the Members who had been elected, by whatever means, were required to co-opt a certain percentage of Members of the upper House to deliberate with them. That would introduce the independent element that is so desirable.

Mr. Maclennan: It is asking too much, even of altruism, to expect people to co-opt independents. Even in the sort of House that I am talking about, I cannot imagine that the Whips would play no part.

Mr. Grieve: Suppose that we had a system in which co-option was done by two-thirds majority voting, with the aim of ensuring that independent Members were brought in. That might work quite well, and we would be mistaken to ignore the possibility.

Mr. Maclennan: I ignore nothing, and I shall certainly explore that idea—but I tend to think that if partisanship were not the quality sought by those doing the co-opting, clubability might replace it, and I am not sure that that would be any better.

[Mr. Maclennan]

On the other hand, it is right to emphasise to the Wakeham commission our overriding desire that the main defects of the upper House should be removed. Despite its expertise, the quality of its best debates, and the assiduity of its tireless Members, who sit through the night and sometimes long into the summer, the importance of the House of Lords is diminishing in our scheme of things, because it is not democratic. There is no way of reversing that by tinkering. Either we accept the need for democracy in that Chamber or we shall have to start thinking in terms of unicameralism and other ways of bringing the Executive to task, for we cannot look to that House in its present form to do that.

I do not think that this House can, or should, behave very differently from the way that it behaves already. That is not a matter of complacency. I have found its ways so unappealing at times that I have even been forced to change my political party, so I do not make that remark lightly. However, in reality, a House that is the avenue to Executive office will always be one in which the Government have great and overwhelming influence, except when an accident of electoral fate results in a narrow majority.

That being so, we would do well to use this great opportunity to reform the House of Lords that the Government are giving us to see whether we can include more checks and balance in our system, and build in greater balance between the Executive and the legislature. That is certainly long overdue.

6.20 pm

Mr. Mark Fisher (Stoke-on-Trent, Central): It is a pleasure to follow the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan), especially as I agree with so much of what he said. Indeed, many elements of the debate appear to be agreed by hon. Members from all parts of the House. There seems to be agreement that we should have a reformed and modern second Chamber, that it should be independent, representative, distinctive and non-competitive—that is, that the second Chamber should complement rather than challenge this Chamber's authority and primacy.

However, I said that hon. Members appear to agree on those points, because I suspect that those characteristics mean different things to different people. For example, there is the question of independence. I suspect that the deputy shadow Leader of the House, the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack)—and the Leader of the House in her opening remarks—used the word "independence" to mean "of no party". To me, and I sense to many others, it is much more interesting and important that independence should refer to independence of government.

That is hard to achieve, because the power of government in both Chambers, as exercised by the Whips and as described many hon. Members in this debate, is reinforced by the understandable ambitions of people—in this House and in the other place, and regardless of whether they are in opposition—to achieve government. Therefore, the only way to ensure true independence for a second Chamber is to remove the Government from it, and to make it a House of parliamentarians, in which parliamentary scrutiny is an end in itself.

I was interested that the hon. Member for South Staffordshire implied that that would not be attractive to people. I agree with the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross and believe that it would be attractive. It is an important and fascinating role, and the enthusiasm and skill with which Select Committees in both Houses fulfil it shows how important and satisfying it could be.

There is general agreement that the power of the Executive has grown under all Governments, both in general and in particular. Reference has been made to the enormous growth over recent Parliaments in the numbers of statutory instruments, and to the fact that they cannot be amended. I disagree with those who seem to criticise the House of Commons, at least by implication, for not doing a decent job in holding the Government to account. Faced with Governments and Executives, of both parties, who have skilfully and successfully found it to be an imperative of government in a difficult and complex state to take more power to themselves, the House of Commons does its scrutiny work well. That is evident in the work of the Select Committees and, often, in debate.

It is regrettable that Question Times have become almost a farce. Their style is reminiscent of Japanese Noh theatre, with the Minister knowing what the question will be and hon. Members knowing what the answer will be. They are of little democratic interest and are not effective in holding the Government to account, but in other respects the House of Commons does a good job. However, a second Chamber, especially one freed from the Executive and with scrutiny as its prime role, could and would perform differently. In doing so, it would augment the quality of our Parliament, and vary the type of scrutiny to which the Executive are subjected.

There is also the question of representation. It is right that a second Chamber must be representative, but representative of whom, and accountable to whom? If the second Chamber is appointed, it can be representative only of the will of the person, or of the commission of selection, who appointed it. However much the Prime Minister wants to place that commission at arm's length—a laudable aim—it will be appointed by government and inevitably will be made up of the great and the good. It is their stamp, therefore, that will be on that Chamber.

Most crucially, not only will the Chamber not be representative of anyone but the commission, but it will not be accountable to anyone. That idea is ridiculous and an affront.

Mr. Hogg: I have followed the hon. Gentleman's argument and broadly agree. However, is not the criticism of an appointed Chamber ultimately that it lacks political legitimacy? In the world in which we live, the only legitimacy that stands scrutiny is that which stems from election.

Mr. Fisher: The right hon. and learned Gentleman anticipates my next point: a Chamber that is neither representative nor accountable has no roots in our nation, and so has no democratic legitimacy. I strongly believe in a Chamber that is democratically elected and accountable to people. That is how we all came to be here, and it is therefore the source of the legitimacy of half of Parliament. The task, as we enter a new century, is to determine how to finish democracy's job and extend that democratic accountability beyond this Chamber to the whole of Parliament.

Sir Patrick Cormack: On a point of clarification, is it implicit in the hon. Gentleman's remarks that the Head of State should also be elected?

Mr. Fisher: Certainly not: we are talking about our Parliament, all of which I believe should be accountable to the people of this country. At present, people are denied any say in half of our Parliament. In all the debates, media articles and speculation on the subject—which the Government and the royal commission have rightly stimulated by at long last facing up to the problem—we have heard little about the rights of the people.

That is true, too, about this evening's debate. Much has been heard about the theoretical virtues of different bases of representation and composition, but where do people fit in? There is a distaste for, or a lack of interest in, what people in this country are being denied that I find extraordinary. Surely the right to vote for the people who will determine and scrutinise legislation is at the core of our democracy. We have just created Parliaments for Scotland and for Wales, and there is one in Northern Ireland. We are reforming local authorities and tomorrow we will elect people to represent us at the European Parliament.

It would be outrageous if, in forming the new Parliaments and renewing our representation in the forums that already exist, we said that part of the representation in those forums should be by appointment. No one has suggested that that should happen by appointment. No one has suggested that it would be better if the Parliament in Scotland had been partly appointed, or indirectly elected through the Scottish local authorities. People in Scotland wanted a voice in their Parliament, and I believe that the people of the wider United Kingdom have a right to a say over everyone who sits in their legislature.

Mr. Forth: I agree with the thrust of what the hon. Gentleman has said, but does he accept that we have agreed to a unicameral legislature in Scotland, which not many people would contemplate for the UK as a whole? Is that not a paradox?

Mr. Fisher: It may be so, but a Parliament such as Scotland's, which contains a comparatively small number of Members, would find it difficult to define two distinct roles. The right hon. Gentleman asks an open and interesting question, but, given that we have a complicated United Kingdom Parliament augmented by separate Parliaments in Scotland and Wales, the people of Scotland made the right decision.

We have tried appointed systems in the past. Our first Members of the European Parliament were appointed from this Chamber, not elected. We were right to abandon that system, saying that the people had the right to say directly who should represent them in the European Parliament. We were right, too, to get rid of the aldermanic system. There used to be functional constituencies in the universities and we were right to get rid of those.

The history of our democracy has been of a slow clawing back from the Executive—first, the monarch, then the lords and the aristocracy—the right of the people to have a say. We completed that process only in this century when, between the wars and at long last, women got the vote. Universal democracy is a recent innovation, but we have never had it in full. It has applied to only half of our legislature. We have an opportunity to say that everyone who discusses legislation and affairs of state should be elected. Anything less is unacceptable.

I respect my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris), who clearly disagrees with me. He and others will have to tell their constituents that we are modernising the House of Lords, but that they should have no say in who should sit in it. They will have to tell their constituents that the choice should be made for them and that someone should appoint those who sit in it. Can any hon. Member on either side of the House seriously look his or her constituents in the eye and tell them that they are not sufficiently wise or competent to decide who should sit in the second Chamber during the next century?

Sir Patrick Cormack: With the greatest respect to the hon. Gentleman, for whom I have a real affection, that is precisely what his Government will make people do tomorrow. No one will be directly elected. No voter in any constituency will vote for an individual.

Mr. Fisher: I rather agree with the hon. Gentleman. I was not happy with the closed-list system and I do not like being unable to distinguish between individual representatives. Some representatives of each party do a good job, and others do not. People in our towns and cities know very well who the competent people are, but they will not be able tomorrow to ensure that the competent return to Brussels while the incompetent return whence they came.

We need to establish that people have the right to a say. The Government are fond of the expression "the many, not the few". It is becoming a mantra, and I would willingly never hear it again.

Mr. Forth: How about "the third way"?

Mr. Fisher: I do not disagree with the spirit of the expression, merely with the way in which it trips off the tongue, sucked of almost all meaning. The principle is correct, of course, but it is ironic that a Government for whom the many, not the few is a mantra should appear so uncertain about giving the many—the democracy—the right to vote rather than giving it to the few, or the oligarchy.

If we have an appointed or even an indirectly elected second Chamber, we shall turn away from democracy, which is government by the people, to oligarchy, which is government by the select few. Will we really enter the 21st century by modernising our second Chamber so that we have an oligarchy? Is that the way to express our country's needs? It is absurd. We are a democratic people and we have fought hard for centuries to try to extend democracy. Thanks to the Government, it is at long last within our grasp, but we seem uncertain about whether we wish to grasp the opportunity.

The most compelling argument against an elected second Chamber made tonight and by the Government has been that the authority conferred by elections to both would create gridlock, threatening the primacy of the Commons and undermining the clarity of government. The authority of government resides in this Chamber, and it is here that the Government are rightly held to account. I do not accept that argument. That need not happen as long as the rules and the functions of the two Chambers are distinct.

[Mr. Fisher]

Over several decades, we have made the mistake of establishing primacy in this Chamber by the illegitimacy of the membership of the other Chamber. Except for a few diehards who love the hereditary principle, the other place is cautious about exercising its many and considerable powers because the world and the Members of the other place know that it is illegitimate. We have been content that that has been so because it has established our authority, but our primacy should not rely on a broken-backed composition of the other Chamber. It should depend on clarity in the roles and functions of the two Chambers. The way in which to establish that clarity is by enacting a new Parliament Act.

Mr. Tyrie: The existence of the Parliament Acts is the reason why gridlock would be unlikely. They give supremacy to this House and, in the event of a clash, the Commons can always win by exercising the Acts. Only once has there been gridlock in the modern history of the two Houses, and that arose over the definition of the rules of the Parliament Acts themselves.

Mr. Fisher: Some people would say that we have come close to gridlock in recent weeks. I agree with much of what the hon. Gentleman has said—and has written extremely well—about the House of Lords, but the Parliament Acts are deficient in some key respects. If we are to establish clear and distinct roles for the two Chambers, which must be the aim of any reform, we need a new Parliament Act that will recognise and enshrine the primacy of the Commons and legislate on areas currently covered by the Salisbury convention.

The growth of that convention since 1945 is the reason why the Parliament Acts are unsatisfactory. It is wrong to distinguish between the two Chambers by convention alone. It would be clearer and simpler to have their roles detailed in primary legislation that would maintain for the second Chamber the power to amend and delay—though possibly for a shorter period—and that would extend that Chamber's powers to secondary and European legislation. A new Act should remove some of the inflexibility of the present Acts with regard to unamended Bills, and it should extend to House of Lords Bills and delegated legislation. It should also provide procedures for mediation. Of course, if the Government were removed from that Chamber, its power to initiate legislation would have to be removed.

Mr. Grieve: The hon. Gentleman is making a well-reasoned and powerful speech. Does he agree that if the Lords were elected for fixed terms with rotational election so that a certain proportion were up for election at any given time, the chance of a clash would be minimised because its role would be seen as wholly distinct from that of this Chamber, whose mandate is renewed when the Government go to the country?

Mr. Fisher: Yes, but it would be essential that the Chambers were not elected at the same time, to emphasise the distinction between the two. However, that is less important than having very different functions in relation to the Executive. The most encouraging element of this debate has been the agreement among hon. Members on both sides of the House on removing the Executive from the second Chamber. That would at a stroke transform its nature, improving it radically. It would also enormously improve this Chamber and scrutiny of the Executive.

Perhaps I misunderstood, but I was surprised when the Leader of the House said that we were considering only reform of the House of Lords. The two Chambers are interdependent and their reform must be considered together. We are talking about one Parliament and how the two Chambers can work together to represent the views of our people and ensure that we are well governed. What happens in the upper Chamber affects what happens here.

I believe that such changes would recreate a modern, independent, representative, accountable, non-competitive second Chamber of which we could be proud and which this Chamber need not fear. We would benefit from its intelligence, wisdom and scrutiny, while this Chamber would continue to be the locus of government and therefore the source of power of the Executive. Those objectives depend on a democratic route to giving our people a voice that I believe to be long overdue. I hope that it will soon come to pass.

6.42 pm

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): It is a great pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), with whom I have had a long friendship going back to the earliest times. I regret that he is no longer a Front Bencher.

Sir Patrick Cormack: He would have made a different speech if he were.

Mr. Hogg: That may be true, but I am sure that he would be urging his case as strongly within the Government. The House is the poorer for his no longer being a Front Bencher.

I do not know whether it is strictly necessary but to avoid possible criticism I declare a personal interest in that my wife and father sit in the other Chamber and I stand to inherit a hereditary peerage. I hasten to add that I have always intended to remain in this House if my constituents are willing to make it possible.

Perhaps partly because of my background but also because of a long-standing interest in historical matters and the constitution, I have always been interested in reform of the House of Lords. I have long held first, that we should substantially increase the powers of the second Chamber and secondly, that we should therefore confer proper political legitimacy on it. That goes back to the points made by the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central. The only legitimacy that exists in Britain today stems from direct election. I shall explain in more detail later, but I therefore conclude that the second Chamber should have substantially increased powers and be largely—or as I would prefer, wholly—elected.

Discussion of the composition of the second Chamber must begin by focusing on powers and functions. The Government's approach has been criticised because it deals with composition separately from functions and purpose. We cannot consider functions without also considering how this House performs its function of holding the Government to proper account. If this House is discharging its functions well, we need to make relatively little change to the powers of the second Chamber; it is only if this House is not exercising its functions well that we need substantially to enhance them. If we are content to leave the second Chamber with its powers largely as they are now—this is not my position—I would argue that there is no real case for changing its composition either.

In fact, there is an argument for the present composition of the second Chamber. There are advantages in a mixed system of hereditary and appointed peers. Most obviously, there is a measure of independence to be found among the hereditary peerage that should be acknowledged by this House. We must also acknowledge that appointment does not by itself confer any more obvious legitimacy than the hereditary principle, but it does confer on the Government very extensive powers of patronage that I regard as undesirable. However, I do not have to defend the status quo on composition because I want the second Chamber's powers to be greatly enhanced.

I have come to this view—to be fair to myself, I held it as a Minister over 13 years—because I do not believe that this House will or can properly hold a Government and Executive to account. It is not just a lack of will, but an inherent inability that stems from the constitutional settlement that has existed for very many years. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was right about that.

We do not have a separation of powers. From that, it follows that the Executive are in this Chamber. Provided that the Executive can control their own party, they can do as they please, subject to relatively few external constraints. There are some, which I shall mention shortly but only touch on now. The European Union has a measure of control, as does the European convention on human rights. Subject to those, the Executive who control their own party can do what they please. That is inherent in the constitution. Of course, the problem is aggravated by a Government with a very large majority as we have now, but we have had a Conservative Government with a very large majority. It is further aggravated—this is probably the only party political point that I shall make—if we have a Prime Minister and Ministers who have a highly developed contempt for this House.

In substance, the problem has nothing to do with the Labour party, but is inherent in the constitutional settlement that has been in place for decades. It stems from the fact that there is no separation of powers. In that respect, I have always held that the American model was infinitely preferable. However, I am not foolish enough to suppose that we shall ever bring it about—at least not in my lifetime, and probably not in the lifetime of my children or my grandchildren.

An Opposition Whip, my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle (Mr. Day), is sitting in front of me, so I am sorry to have to say that the very tight control that parties exercise over their Back Benchers undermines democracy. I thought so when I was a Conservative Government Whip, although, having taken the Queen's salt, I performed my functions with enthusiasm.

Sir Patrick Cormack: My right hon. and learned Friend was dreadful.

Mr. Hogg: As my hon. Friend says, I was dreadful. I was certainly a vigorous Whip, but I acted disapproving of myself. Furthermore, if I may say so, I did not necessarily have a high regard for those of my colleagues to whom I gave instruction. The tight control that the Whips exercise over their parties positively diminishes the reputation of this place and indeed our ability to control the Executive.

Mr. Letwin: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the fault lies mainly not with the people who are doing the whipping, but with the recipients, in that the system does not provide for the recipients to resist the whipping by giving them an alternative career course?

Mr. Hogg: I remember articulating the same argument back in 1979 when the noble Lord St. John of Fawsley—or Mr. St. John-Stevas as he was then—introduced the Select Committee system. At that time, we articulated the argument that Back Benchers would have an independent career structure that would make them readier to resist the power of the Whip. I do not believe that that has really worked. As long as the Executive are Members of this place, the ambitions, fears and inhibitions of right hon. and hon. Members will always dilute their ability to speak their own mind and to do what they would do if they were to follow their consciences.

Mr. Rowe: My right hon. and learned Friend makes a powerful and interesting point. Does he agree that there has been an enormous escalation in the practice of the popular media highlighting "disloyalty" when people stand up for their principles, and that that is a nonsensical undermining of democracy?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is entirely right. Of course, that gives the party Whip—although I make no personal observations about my hon. Friend the Member for Cheadle—

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): I thank my right hon. and learned Friend.

Mr. Hogg: The party Whips have another instrument with which to chastise and coerce their Back Benchers. They can tell Back Benchers, "You will be portrayed as dividing this great, united party of ours", so my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) is right.

Mr. Fisher: I agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman's critique, but he seeks to place all the blame on the Government. Does he not feel that this Chamber shares some of the blame? It is perfectly within the powers of this Chamber to insist, by a vote, that it should elect members of Select Committees, rather than leaving that power to the Whips. Much of the power that has been removed from this Chamber to the Executive has been with its agreement—or, at least, with its nodding and tacit consent.

[Mr. Fisher]

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman is correct. If this House wanted to exercise its powers, it would be a truly sovereign and democratic institution. However, for a variety of reasons—some of which I have tried to identify—this House does not choose to employ the powers that we, as Members, could exercise if we were to vote according to our individual beliefs.

The point that I have been trying to make is that those defects are not merely theoretical; they are real and they distort the way in which business is carried out. I will give two examples from the Labour Government's period in office and, to be fair, will cite two examples from the previous Conservative Government's time in office. In relation to the Labour Government, if the House had voted in accordance with its actual wishes, rather than those of the Whips, the Government would not have put through a substantial portion of their welfare legislation. To take the other example—in respect of which the hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) was in the Chamber at the beginning of the debate—we should not have passed the European Parliamentary Elections Act 1999 with the possibility of the closed list system. Those measures would not have been passed.

During the period that the Conservative Government were in office, I do not believe that the legislation relating to the Maastricht treaty would have been approved by this House—certainly not without a referendum clause—had the House spoken in accordance with its wishes. Furthermore, the community charge legislation would not have passed if the House had spoken according to its wishes. We should acknowledge those facts.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): I am sure that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will have anticipated my question and I shall be interested to hear his answer. Would not that strict party control exercised by the Whips be a feature of an elected second Chamber, even one that did not have an Executive element, bearing in mind the fact that the need for enforcing party discipline and unity would still be an argument that could be deployed?

Mr. Hogg: I shall develop that point later, but will give a brief answer now. There might be a degree of such control, but, because there would not be the same scope for ambition, the influence that the Whips could exercise in an elected second Chamber would be much less.

I have focused on the big issues, but we need to keep in mind that this defect also extends to the small issues—the detail of Bills. The grip that the Whips maintain on their parties is as great in Committee as it is in the Chamber. What happens in Committee in relation to the detail of legislation is frequently as important as what happens during the major debates on policy or on Second Reading.

To develop that point further, we need to understand that there is nothing in our constitution that guarantees minority rights. Provided that the Government of the day retain their control over members of their parliamentary party, they can do much as they please. Minority rights are not entrenched under our system—although they are entrenched in many other systems—and I regard that as a serious defect in the way in which we conduct our affairs.

Mr. Grieve: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, if anything, minority rights are threatened even more nowadays, because of the growth of the belief that when the people have spoken through the mandate of an election, any opposition to that expressed wish becomes improper in some way?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend makes an extremely important point, about which I make two comments. First, I have always regarded the manifesto doctrine as complete rubbish. The fact that detailed policy propositions may be set out in a manifesto does not give the Government a blank cheque to carry out those policies. Truth to tell, only a tiny proportion of Members of Parliament will read their party's manifesto—far less the electorate as a whole. The manifesto doctrine is rubbish.

Secondly, I believe that minorities have rights that they are entitled to assert even against majorities. All Governments and Members of this House should realise that they have a limited right to effect change.

Mr. Edward Garnier (Harborough): I apologise to my right hon. and learned Friend for interrupting him. He mentioned his views on the principle behind the manifesto doctrine. Might not the same be said for the votes taken in this House at 10 o'clock? A huge proportion of Members do not listen to the debates, but simply go into the Lobby to which they are directed. Does my right hon. and learned Friend accept that there is at least a possibility—although it is no more than that—that the Human Rights Act 1998 may entrench the rights of minorities in a way that has not previously been the case?

Mr. Hogg: I was just coming to the second proposition that my hon. and learned Friend makes, but his first reinforces my basic point, which is that the House of Commons is not an effective defender of rights, and nor does it provide an effective method of holding Governments to account. Let us not get personal—we should all admit to flocking in at 10 o'clock and asking a Whip which way we should vote, even though that is not a proper way in which to discharge our functions.

I said that there were one or two external controls, and my hon. and learned Friend has mentioned one: the European convention on human rights. The concept of a Bill of Rights is one way in which to entrench rights; I am broadly in favour of incorporating the European convention into domestic law and glad that that has happened. Although that gives judges a policy-making role, they have had such a role ever since we first subscribed to the convention. The question is whether they should be based in the UK or in Strasbourg; my preference is that they should be UK-based, subject to appeal. That is a constraint of which I am broadly in favour. A second lies in our membership of the EU, which carries both rights and obligations, and I am bound to say that I am less enthusiastic for that model of control, because the democratic underpinning is far less good than it ought to be.

That brings me to my main point. I believe that we ought to create a bicameral system in which the second Chamber has powers that are very similar to those of this House. Let me be candid: my objective is to create in the second Chamber an elected body that has a genuine ability to constrain and restrict the power of the Executive. I want to create a body or forum in which there will be more effective scrutiny of the detail of legislation than is exercised in this place. Finally, I want the second Chamber to provide effective entrenchment of minority rights.

To create a second Chamber with such extensive powers, one must confer legitimacy on it, and that takes me back to my intervention on the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central, with which he was good enough to agree. Where Parliaments and representative bodies are involved, the only legitimacy that is now accorded respect is that which stems from election. Therefore, I am in favour of a second Chamber that is elected either wholly or to a very large extent, certainly by direct franchise.

Right hon. and hon. Members have expressed criticism of such a system and I have some sympathy with their views. I agree that we must not create a facsimile of the House of Commons in the other place—that would be a tragedy. Therefore, those right hon. and hon. Members who say that the Executive should not be represented in the other place are absolutely right. Ministers from this place can go to the other place to answer questions and participate in debates there, but we want to remove the ministerial career structure from that place. To answer the hon. Member for Clwyd, West (Mr. Thomas), I think that such an arrangement would diminish the Whips' control in the other place.

I also want different electoral arrangements. To the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan), I say that I am not hostile to the use of proportional representation in respect of the other place, even though I am wholly opposed to its use in respect of the House of Commons. I am sorry that I cannot carry my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) with me on that point. I should also like elections to the second Chamber to be staged: that is, a rolling programme with one third of Members subject to election at a time.

Mr. Garnier: The problem with using proportional representation or some other form of election for the other place is that it would confer a different degree of legitimacy. Although I agree with much of my right hon. and learned Friend's argument, if we had different systems of election for each House, I fear that the other place would be criticised by Members of the House of Commons as lacking the quality of legitimacy that we have.

Mr. Hogg: I am not sure that I agree with that criticism. The reason why I am opposed to PR being used in elections to this place is not that it confers less political legitimacy on the outcome, but that it makes good government almost impossible. That is a different problem altogether. Because PR can result in an equally representative—perhaps more representative—body, it would not be open to Members of this place, who are elected by first past the post, to say that those who were elected by PR are less representative. I do not want PR here, but not because it would create a less representative body.

My final point relates to the risk of creating the potential for deadlock. There is a danger of deadlock, but it is perfectly possible to create anti-deadlock mechanisms. The exact mechanism, its shape and weighting, depends on the balance one wishes to strike between the two Houses. However, one would have to bear in mind the fact that we are talking about having two elected Chambers—two democratic Chambers; having recognised that, one begins to realise that those who assert the primacy of this House have not faced up to the fact that there would be another House of equal respectability. Such a House is what I want to create.

I cannot say that I am optimistic. I believe that what will emerge from the process is a model that does not satisfy the aspirations of those of us who want there to be a second Chamber with greatly enhanced powers and, therefore, one that is wholly or largely elected. However, if that is what emerges, we will have missed a great opportunity, so we should not be backward about asserting our beliefs, even though people will say that I am advocating the removal of powers from the House of Commons. In fact, if my analysis is correct and acted on, it would diminish the powers of the Executive and, in the words of the great and historic resolution passed by this House, the power of the Executive

"has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished."

7.7 pm

Mr. Alan Hurst (Braintree): I am grateful to be able to speak in this debate and to follow so many distinguished and erudite right hon. and hon. Members who have long experience of constitutional matters. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), other than with his distaste for Governments with large majorities—it is harder for one whose constituency majority is only 1,500 to accept that view. That matter aside, there was merit in his somewhat pessimistic assessment of the whole question of House of Lords reform.

We have to consider composition. In an ideal world, we would start with powers and then move on to composition, but each form of composition has a different effect on the outcome. There are three forms of composition on offer: election, appointment and the hybrid form, one possible manifestation of which was described by my hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris), who dipped his toe into functionalism.

The idea of the second Chamber being elected is gathering a head of steam, especially among the Opposition, but it has inherent problems which can be seen in countries with a history that is somewhat similar to our own. One hundred and thirty years ago, the United States Senate was a shadow of its current self: all the action after the American civil war was led by the House of Representatives, which overshadowed the Senate at that time.

The balance of power between those two bodies has changed since then, as a consequence of the change from Senators being indirectly elected to their being directly elected. Until about 1914, they had been elected from the state assemblies; thereafter, the American Senate had the ability to take to itself power and authority that it had not had before. If we go down the route of having a directly elected upper House, we should be aware that such a House will take to itself powers additional to those that we give it, because that is what constitutional bodies always do if they believe that they have the authority to do so.

[Mr. Alan Hurst]

If we take that approach, the question then is what method of election we adopt. We perhaps saw the House of Lords at its worst on the question of the European elections. Five or six times it ping-ponged back to this House the European elections legislation because, in the first place, it did not approve of any form of proportional representation. Once it had accepted proportional representation, the argument was about whether the list should be open or closed. We ended up with a closed list which, I suspect, has a very small minority of support in this House and in the House of Lords. When the House of Lords had the opportunity, because of the time pressure on the European elections legislation, it funked it and did not act as a check or barrier to the power of the Executive.

If we adopt a system of proportional representation for the upper Chamber and hold the elections at different times from those for this House, we will move almost inevitably into gridlock because both Houses will try to assert their power. I understand why those of a Conservative disposition would not be averse to gridlock. I do not mean to be offensive when I say that it has always been the position of the Conservatives, at least until the past 20 years, to avoid undue change.

Historically, Conservatives have been supporters of upper Houses or second Chambers, and radicals have normally been opposed to them. That is because radicals wish to move matters along and Conservatives wish to slow everything down or wish for nothing to change at all. If that is still the case, support for a second Chamber is to be anticipated on the right of politics but is more surprising on the left. The right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) claimed that more powers should be given to an upper House, and that fits logically with the gridlock approach to democracy.

Why are we considering an upper House at all? It is because we want to put a check on the Executive and on democracy itself.

Mr. Maclennan: I would not favour gridlock, and I take seriously the criticism the hon. Gentleman makes. Does he agree, however, that, on occasions, gridlock might reflect the public wish, as in the case of the poll tax? Gridlock can be dissolved by public opinion when an election is imminent. Those who are sustaining opposition to the Executive can be punished at the polls if they do so unreasonably.

Mr. Hurst: I understand the right hon. Gentleman's view, but I submit that the disadvantages of gridlock outweigh the protection he suggests. He mentioned the poll tax, but the party that introduced that tax was not punished at the polls subsequently. It was returned to office.

In other countries, such as Australia, which has an upper House, a double dissolution is the most common way to resolve disputes between the two Houses. Often, the dispute is not resolved, because one House is elected on a variation of our electoral system and the other by proportional representation. The upper House seldom has an overall majority.

If we have an elected upper House, we will let a genie out of a bottle and people will rue the fact that they cannot put it back in.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): Does my hon. Friend agree that gridlock could be avoided if one had sufficiently strong Parliament Acts?

Mr. Hurst: I have, I hope, learned the phraseology of the House in the time that I have been here, so I tell my hon. Friend that I shall come to that point later in my speech.

The other option is an appointed upper House, which runs into the barrage set up by the word "patronage". Sometimes we appear to live in a squeaky-clean intellectual world in which we believe that policies can operate entirely without patronage, party Whips, party loyalty or any other aspects of the glue that makes effective government possible. The argument against an appointed Chamber is that it would lead to patronage. How would its members be appointed fairly? Would the Prime Minister be completely unbiased, and would the Leader of the Opposition put forward the best names available? Would a commission be impartial? Who is to appoint the impartial commission? All those problems argue against an entirely appointed upper House.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leominster proposed a notion that was interesting both historically and intellectually. He suggested a combination or hybrid system. He said that the elected system had defects and the appointed system had defects and that we should therefore have a combination of the two. However, that is like saying that if one has one bad egg and adds another to it, one somehow achieves a good egg. In my submission, one achieves a doubly bad egg, unless my biology is in error. Any argument against an elected system or an appointed system applies twofold to any hybrid or combined system. However, it is only by going outside an elected system that we could bring in to the House the experts, the wise men, the Solomons of our time who would deliberate and hold back from foolishness, and ensure that we did not destroy the prospects for the future of this nation.

Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the model whereby some Lords sit ex officio, as the bishops do, is useful? They have authority because of the office they hold, and that is not resented. It also serves a useful function in this House by sparing us the deliberations of the clergy of the established Church.

Mr. Hurst: That is an interesting point. It was well said by Bagehot that if we had an ideal House of Commons, it is certain that we should not need a higher Chamber. To paraphrase more modern authors, as Simon and Garfunkel said in "Mrs. Robinson":

"Every way you look at it you lose".

We would lose with an elected upper House, with an appointed upper House and with a hybrid upper House.

Why are we going through such heated discussion and intellectual strain to achieve an upper House? It is because we believe that we are failing in two ways. We are failing to operate the House of Commons effectively and also failing to control the Executive. That is why we endlessly discuss what to do about the upper House. We should not put off the day when we consider the real problems before us—this House and control of the Executive—but we delude ourselves by thinking that we can solve the problem by creating a strange new upper House.

Mr. Grieve: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that if we reform the upper Chamber correctly, it will provide a powerful incentive for the reform of this House?

Mr. Hurst: If we attempt to reform the upper House, we will put off till doomsday any consideration of the reform of this Chamber or any effective controls on the Executive. I was pleased that the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham mentioned the words of Dunning about the powers of the Executive increasing and needing to be diminished. I remember reading that in an A-level history examination in 1963—not in a contemporary question, but in one that related to the 18th century. That problem has been with the House for centuries and, until we can tackle it within this place, it will continue.

Mr. Letwin: I have a great deal of sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's observations about the need to check the Executive within the House, which has been a theme common to many speeches this afternoon. Is he optimistic that enough can be done in this place—without diluting the Government's ability to govern—to cure the problem in the absence of an effective second Chamber?

Mr. Hurst: I am grateful that the hon. Gentleman has ascertained where my remarks are leading: we do not need a second Chamber. We have believed throughout modern times that we needed a second Chamber, but the majority of democracies do not have one. It is argued that single Chambers work only in small democracies. There are normally second Chambers in federal situations and, despite what Opposition Members might say, we are not yet in that situation.

If we had single-Chamber government, we could apply our minds to reforming the problems in this place. As a comparatively new Member of Parliament, one of the main problems seems to me to be that, when a Bill leaves the Floor of the House and goes into Committee, the party system operates as sternly in Committee as in this place. A solution might be to have a single Chamber—the Lords within the Commons, if I may put it that way—and not to allow party majorities to operate in the Committee system. It could draw instead upon a pool of independent experts and those who are learned in particular subjects.

Matters could be debated in a non-partisan manner in Committee, and those involved could seek to improve rather than destroy the Bill. The Government of the day might then accept or reject amendments to the Bill on Report without the rancour of partisanship. If we approach the matter in that way, we might make real progress towards increasing the power of the House rather than chasing the will-o'-the-wisp of second-Chamber reform.

7.22 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Faversham and Mid-Kent): I have been astonished by the frequent references to the reform of this place—I thought we were perfect, and popularly perceived to be so. The serious question is: would any Government seek a reform of this place that made it a more effective brake on the Government? That is the crux of the matter. I do not believe that, beyond tinkering with various procedural matters, any Government of any hue will take seriously any attempt to reform this place to make it a more effective check on Government.

The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), who made an interesting and entertaining speech, advanced a rather strange proposition. He basically said that this place works so badly that, if we destroy the only mechanism—however frail—of checking our bad behaviour, we will be so frightened by our behaviour that we will be forced to reform ourselves. That is an interesting and an ingenious argument, but it did not carry me altogether.

I think that we have accepted rather too readily the proposition that the primary role of the House is the creation and scrutiny of legislation. Apart from anything else, I think we legislate far too much, and I wonder what proportion of each legislative programme is spent making good the mistakes of previous programmes rather than introducing new legislation. I believe the Government spend far too much time worrying about announcing their business and organising their timetable, rather than ensuring that a smaller body of legislation is scrutinised properly so that it does not have to be repealed two legislative programmes down the track.

I think that our job is also to call the Executive to account for the way in which they perform their functions. Above all, my constituents want me to chase the Government about the way in which they and their agencies deliver on policies and on legislation that has been passed. Most of my correspondents and my constituents are concerned about oppressiveness, inefficiency, bureaucratic delay and all the other elements of a creaking administrative system for which Ministers are responsible. I am not sure that we have effective mechanisms in this place to address those problems, but that is as much a part of the House's role as passing legislation.

I think also that our purpose—this is manifestly borne out by the interest of the media, which is notably lacking in most of what we do—is to be seen to debate the great issues of the day. It does not matter very much whether there is a vote at the end of a debate. This place is still seen to be the centre of national debate on issues such as genetically modified food, euthanasia or any other subject that seriously exercises the public. Indeed, it is one of the few areas of debate in this place that the media take the trouble to cover.

Mr. Garnier: Does my hon. Friend believe his concerns will be exacerbated by the removal of many debates from this Chamber to the Grand Committee Room? Will those debates be reported more widely than those that take place in this Chamber?

Mr. Rowe: It will be a shame if, in the mad rush to pass legislation through this place, debates that are central to the national interest are removed from this Chamber. I would rather see the legislative programme trimmed so that we may hold the main debates of our time in the House. For example, the media have been covering our debates on Kosovo—an area where the House has virtually no power—with meticulous care. In fact, much of the action has taken place under prerogative power in which the House has no role. However, our debates have been covered carefully.

[Mr. Rowe]

I share the Mackay commission's view that if we are to have a second Chamber—I believe that we should—it must have its own programme. The commission is right about that. It is ridiculous that two Chambers that share the same building should engage in so little joint action. The two Chambers should co-operate much more when the new second Chamber is created. I agree with those who argue that the second Chamber should not include representatives of the Executive.

We must explore whether the traditional pattern of Chamber service is the only way to go. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) painted an all too accurate picture of the disincentives to serving in this place, and it seems to me that those disincentives will operate with almost equal force in the second Chamber. I reckon that I am wholly unemployable in the outside world after 16 years in this place—I may have been unemployable when I escaped here in the first place, but that is certainly the case now. The same will be true of people who have served 15 years or so in the other place, so we need to think of ways to attract the lively specialists on whose expertise we all seem to be anxious to rely.

I wonder whether we could acknowledge how Members behave now and allow those who bring especial expertise mainly to attend the debates in which they can contribute that expertise. The practical difficulty with that would be voting. If there is an insistence, as there is in this place, that votes take place frequently, people who have been appointed because they are experts in social services or heavy engineering will feel inhibited about taking the job. If they could take part only in the debates to which they could make a specialist contribution, they might be delighted to do so, but if they had to turn out for regular votes, they might be reluctant to take the job. We need to examine that practical problem and to consider changes to the procedures for voting in the second Chamber.

I wonder whether there could be a much closer link between the second Chamber and the European Parliament. One of the most lamentable features of our parliamentary process is the fact that we have an almost entirely separate team with their own agenda and view of life who nominally represent us but have little contact with us. There is no time for that contact here, and our procedures do not make it easy to establish contact, but there is no reason why, in a revised second Chamber, it should not be possible, for example, for Members of the European Parliament to have a right of audience or to attend by invitation.

I remember vividly the meeting at which the Conservative party hierarchy decided that we would not allow Members of the European Parliament even to have a room at 32 Smith square because they were such undesirable, grossly overpaid characters and we were jealous of them and did not want them. That did enormous damage to the Conservative party because the divide between the Conservative team in the European Parliament and the rest of the party was unnecessarily exacerbated, and it led to a number of troubles on which I shall not dwell.

On the composition of the second Chamber, I am entirely in favour of direct elections. I agree with the right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan) that we must have a different franchise and that the Members should be elected for a different period. The Mackay commission suggested multi-Member constituencies for at least part of the Chamber's constitution. That is a possible method, but we should have direct election of one sort or another. Like the American Senate, the second Chamber should be elected for a different period and in a different election year.

It is nonsense to suggest that direct elections give institutions equal authority. Authority is defined by the rules. For example, nobody believes that local authorities, which are directly elected, have power or influence equal to that of this place, because the powers of local authorities are defined by this place. If we define the powers of the second Chamber, there is no reason why we should create a Frankenstein's monster that will gobble us up sooner or later.

Finally, we should be much more imaginative and discover new ways of finding and electing the Members of the second Chamber. I shall give one example, which relates to an experiment so tentative that I mention it with care. The embryo United Kingdom youth Parliament is experimenting with the idea of having virtual members. Young people can be given a form of ID and can click onto the website and take part in debates. That may develop into a pool of young people whom one could not only ask for ideas about what might be on the agenda of a youth Parliament, but use as a source of potential candidates.

I understand that that is a radical suggestion, and I am aware that it may not work, but we are moving into a world in which there is an enormous amount of electronic interaction and in which information and choice are offered electronically. It might be worth at least considering the harnessing of that technology to the second Chamber because it is such a hassle to introduce even simple communication methods into this building of which we are all so fond and, rightly, proud—one must find an electricity socket and get someone to bring a slide projector or whatever one needs—that we are the laughing stock of the general public. The revised second Chamber might give us an opportunity at least to experiment with new devices.

7.36 pm

Dr. Tony Wright (Cannock Chase): I am about to make some high-minded and non-partisan points, so I shall begin with a thoroughly partisan point. The process of reforming the second Chamber—which is entirely to be welcomed, and I applaud the way in which the Government are making progress—has caused us to forget why we are doing it. The reason is that we have a second Chamber that, in its present form, is entirely indefensible.

There are people who doubt whether stage 2 will ever happen. We have heard hon. Members say with some authority that the transitional stage may become the final stage, which is a genuine fear. Nevertheless, we must not think of the current second Chamber as a faded antique that we simply have to touch up. It is fundamentally unsatisfactory. The idea that, at the end of this century, we still have a second Chamber composed in large part of an hereditary element is an outrage. We must tell ourselves that throughout today's rather high-minded discussion.

To remind myself and other hon. Members of that, I turned to the history of the other place, which I shall take a moment to recount. It involves the history of the Conservative and Liberal parties early in the century when they were merrily selling places in the upper Chamber. I shall give two examples before I move on to the high-minded part of my speech. The Bonar Law papers provide conclusive proof that honours were bartered for subscriptions to party funds in the early part of the century. When Bonar Law became Leader of the Conservative Opposition in 1911, he received a memo—

Mr. Grieve: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Wright: Not until I have made my point. Bonar Law received a memo from the party manager, Arthur Steel-Maitland, on the state of the party's organisation and finances. The document reported that the party had a nest egg of £300,000 and that "a year's peerages are hypothecated".

Steel-Maitland went on to say that he hoped for an income of between £120,000 and £140,000 by the end of 1913.

Mr. Grieve: I am trying gently to encourage the hon. Gentleman to move on to the high-minded bit by reminding him that, although he is talking about the hereditary system of peerage at that time, there is a great deal of evidence that similar things have been happening under the appointed system of peers. I therefore fail to understand how he sees anything more legitimate about the appointed system.

Dr. Wright: I am interested in that intervention. If any hon. Member does not find the sale of peerages the most outrageous thing concerning the second Chamber this century, they do not quite understand what has been happening in that institution or, indeed, our political system. I shall, therefore, give the hon. Gentleman the second bit of low-mindedness, which refers to the Liberal party and Lloyd George's sale of the century: the 1922 birthday honours.

I refer particularly to the case of Sir Joseph Robinson, who was to be elevated to the peerage. It was discovered that he had been engaged in all kinds of shady business dealings in South Africa. Indeed, the South African Supreme Court asked him to repay £500,000 as a result. That caused some consternation; there was a debate in the House of Lords in which it was discussed how on earth a man of such a disreputable character could have been offered a peerage. It was announced in a further debate that Sir Joseph had written to the Prime Minister asking to be allowed to decline the peerage offered to him.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Wright: Just a second.

Lloyd George's reply to Sir Joseph, accepting his decision to refuse a peerage, was delivered to Robinson at the Savoy hotel by an official of the National Liberal party. Sir Joseph misunderstood the message, reached for his cheque book and asked, "How much more?" I am afraid that that is the history of the institution in the early part of this century; that is the outrage and that is the motivation for ensuring its reform.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Although I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, my constituency neighbour, for giving way, he is dredging up selective history—it is extremely selective—in order to advance a case about which nobody in this House is arguing. Nobody is arguing for the sale of peerages. The House of Lords Bill has gone through this House and to another place. We are not seeking to defend the automatic right of hereditary peers. The hon. Gentleman is walking on extremely thin ice because, not long ago, his own party gave peerages to a range of slightly odd characters, many of whom are on record as fairly major donors to it. What credit is he bringing on anybody by dredging up this rubbish?

Dr. Wright: I can understand why such issues should be unsettling, but it is important that we get the history right. Only the Labour party has not been involved in the sale of peerages. That is simply the case. If we want to bring the story slightly up to date—

Mr. Tyrie rose—

Dr. Wright: I shall finish answering the previous intervention. It was only in the previous general election campaign that the Conservative party defended the rights of hereditary peerages and argued for the status quo. We may argue about history and how right it is to refer to it when talking of reform, but the fact nevertheless remains that the Conservative party was so wrong on so much so recently concerning this issue that it is difficult to take it entirely seriously when it argues for the positions for which it seems to be arguing—although not terribly coherently.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman's party has been successful only because it has adopted so many Conservative party policies. If our policies were so wrong, why has his party been so successful?

Dr. Wright: I confine myself to the point at issue—[Interruption.] It is a rather important point at issue. I do not want to be detained by it, but the fact is that the Conservative party went into the election defending the hereditary peerage and opposing reform of the House of Lords, just as it opposed a freedom of information Act, devolution and a human rights Act—all things that are making our political system more democratic and decentralised.

Mr. Tyrie: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Wright: In order that I may endeavour to find some common ground, I would rather move on and give way later. Perhaps I should not have stirred things up, but there it is.

It is rare that we have an opportunity to think freshly about a political institution. We make modest reforms here and there, but, on this occasion, we are being asked to think freshly about what we want to do with a central institution of the political system. We can do so only if we are fairly clear about the issue—what we think are the difficulties and the problems to which a reformed institution might be the answer. Unless we do that, we shall get into all kinds of difficulties.

It is possible to invent a second Chamber that might be able to do all kinds of interesting things and might be composed in all kinds of interesting ways. We might look around the world at other second Chambers and borrow this from there and that from here. In all sorts of ways, that would be mistaken because second Chambers are usually responses to particular situations in particular political systems. Sometimes, they are a way of trying to heal religious or regional differences, or of bringing the country together. We must be clear about the central problem; if we do not know what it is, we shall not know what reform might be the solution to it.

[Dr. Wright]

I agree very much with those who say that the central problem is that of an Executive who have too much power, and that the agencies and institutions that are there to check have too little. There is nothing original in saying that. It has been the standard critique of our political system for as long as I can remember. Twenty years ago, Lord Hailsham famously described our system as an elective dictatorship. He was right then; the analysis is true now.

Parties wax and wane on the issue depending on whether they are in government or in opposition. As we have seen in this debate, a party in opposition is terribly interested in issues of scrutiny and accountability—all things in which they had no interest when in government. Similarly, a party in government rapidly loses interest in issues of scrutiny and accountability in which it had great interest in opposition. I am afraid that that is one of the truisms of political life.

The central fact nevertheless remains that we have a peculiar system of what is often called strong government—a Government who have concentrated Executive power. Because we do not have a separation of powers, and because the Executive are drawn from the dominant party in the House of Commons, if we are not careful, we almost necessarily have a supine House of Commons. Necessarily, the House of Commons is controlled by the Executive.

That is our system and I see no immediate prospect of changing it. Such facets are characteristics of a system of strong government. I simply argue that if that is our system, and if we want it to continue, we must at least balance it with a system of strong accountability. We must have strong government on the one hand, because that gives coherence, direction and some crude political accountability. However, it will work satisfactorily and meet the tests of scrutiny and accountability only if it is matched by strong accountability. If this House of Commons cannot provide that by itself, it must be provided in a range of other ways, of which this House will be part.

We are creating a range of mechanisms that are beginning to help in achieving those objectives. Devolution helps to achieve them, by beginning to decentralise power. The Human Rights Act 1998 helps to achieve them, by beginning to give basic rights to citizens and against the Executive. I hope that a freedom of information Act also will help, by checking the Executive and making them less secretive. However, a reformed second Chamber also can help, by doing the general job of recognising that we have a system of strong Executive power that is tolerable only if it is always matched by institutions of strong accountability.

Mr. Grieve: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making the interesting point on the Human Rights Act 1998—the introduction of which, as he may be aware, I broadly supported. What most worries me is that the Government, having passed that Act, are now chickening out in implementing it. Does that not bring us back to the point, which he himself made—that the longer Governments are in power, the more reluctant they are to initiate change? Therefore, on the broad issue of House of Lords reform, Opposition Members are anxious that, the further into this Parliament we go, the more apparent it is becoming that removing the hereditary principle is only an opportunity to substitute a purely appointed principle, which is equally bad.

Dr. Wright: I had planned on dealing with that point in a moment. For the moment, however, in my search for non-partisanship on the issue, I shall not be distracted from the argument that I was trying to develop.

If it is true that we need institutions of strong accountability, we shall have to create a second Chamber that—to put it in a nutshell—is neither a rival nor a replica of the first one. There is no question but that we have a primary Chamber in the House of Commons, and that is as it should be. This is the primary Chamber, which initiates, directs and governs. However, the virtues of having a primary, Executive-dominated Chamber are realised only if that Chamber is matched by other institutions that hold it to account. That is the real opportunity in reform of the second Chamber.

There is no great need to revisit the powers of a second Chamber. As other hon. Members have already said—I shall not go over the same ground—a reformed second Chamber will be more confident in using its powers. That will be the major change. A reformed second Chamber will have to be taken seriously, and conventions currently inhibiting the use of the powers of the unreformed second Chamber will not be sustainable. Those conventions will go, and the second Chamber will do the things that it should be doing.

In constitutional matters, however, there is a case for saying that the second Chamber should have a more developed role. We already give it a specific role in dealing with any attempt to extend the life of a Parliament; we already use it to provide that basic constitutional protection. However, I should go further and say that, if this place wants to do anything that offends basic constitutional rights—for example, if it were to seek systematically to erode the rights of Opposition—the second Chamber should act as a constitutional backstop. In any consequent conflict, a referendum could perhaps decide the issue. Nevertheless, I agree with those who have said that, in dealing with more usual situations, it might be more useful to develop routine anti-gridlock mechanisms.

We have to be able—having had a discussion about powers and activities—to address the underlying issue of legitimacy. People may ask of the second Chamber, "Who are these people? Why should they be taken seriously, listened to or be able to exercise a delaying power?" Unless we can answer that question in terms of legitimacy, ultimately, the second Chamber will be ineffective. Any fundamental reform will have to grapple with that fundamental point.

We shall, therefore, have to balance a range of often competing interests and issues, some of which have already been mentioned in the debate. We need to have sufficient election to provide sufficient legitimacy—without which we shall not be able to answer the question of who those people in the second Chamber are. Nevertheless, I am absolutely clear that if we had simply a purely elective system, producing in the House of Lords a clone of the House of Commons, we shall only make the position worse rather than better.

I am equally clear that a party nominee, closed list system is substantially no different from a system of direct appointments. The closed list system may seem better and feel more legitimate, but—as the European elections show—that may not necessarily be so.

In thinking about those issues, I started by being rather keen on indirect election. Many years ago, I was very keen on ideas of functional representation—which, for much of this century, was a sub-current in British thought on those issues. I am not sure whether it was Sidney Webb or Winston Churchill who once talked about a "house of industry". Nevertheless, many people have explored the idea of trying to establish a system of functional representation alongside our system of direct representation.

The problem is that it is fiendishly difficult to work out how to create such a system. Therefore, in my own mind, reluctantly, I have had to move away from some of those fancy schemes of indirect and functional election, as I simply could not see how they would work in practice.

My conclusion—it is not an original one, but I reached it after trying to think my way through the issues—is that it would make sense to try to have the best of both worlds, and not the worse of two bad eggs. We want the merits of election without the demerits of total election, and we want the merits of appointment without the demerits of total appointment. Such a system necessarily entails an exploration of a mixed system that has to be—I phrase this carefully—predominantly elected, so that it must be taken seriously and passes the test of basic legitimacy. Beyond that, we need sufficient appointment to guarantee independence and expertise.

Mr. Gareth Thomas: I am following with great interest my hon. Friend's cogent points. However, is he not really advocating a system in which all Members of the second Chamber are legitimate, but in which some are more legitimate than others?

Dr. Wright: No. I think that we create legitimacy in different ways. We do not, for example, elect magistrates or juries. We have different ways of finding people to serve in public office. The challenge of finding a mixed system demands that we be reasonably imaginative and inventive.

We should not assume that one may have only election or only appointment—which is how the argument usually begins. I think that we can have not only the merits of election—thereby creating a predominantly elected House to reflect the party element of this place, and ensuring the legitimacy of election—but sufficient nomination to ensure that we create the non-party and independent element, and the range of expertise that we know that a second Chamber needs if it is not simply to be a replica of the House of Commons. That is the essence of the position at which I have arrived.

I shall detain the House only briefly with some further thoughts, some of which have already been expressed. If my argument is right, there is a case for not having Ministers in a second Chamber. If we are serious about strong accountability, the lures of office and patronage should be dispensed with. The Executive have grown large over the years and are well able to attend upon a second Chamber, too.

We need to attend to the problems of the bishops and the Law Lords. I hope that those issues will not be fudged because they are serious ones. The present position is unsatisfactory and now is the time to remedy it. The position of the Lord Chancellor is unsustainable. I speak as a former Parliamentary Private Secretary to the Lord Chancellor. Even in a system that loves anomalies, his position is an anomaly too far. Reform of the House of Lords should be the moment when we attend to that.

It is no small matter to find our way through in a manner that commands as much consensus and assent as possible. Considering the history of attempts to reform the second Chamber, we shall need enormous political will and substantial consensus to achieve it. The history of failed attempts to reform the House of Lords shows that we know how not to do it. We have spent much of the 20th century failing to reform the second Chamber. We need a combination of political will and broad consensus. I do not doubt the Government's political will to see the matter through. The challenge for all of us across the House is whether we have the imagination and determination to produce a solution that can be implemented and will stand the test of time.

8.2 pm

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): I agree with the last remarks of the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright), even if not with the first, but I shall not delay the House by taking issue with them, as I had momentarily intended to do.

I was walking across College green the other day when I bumped into a recently created life peer. I have known him for a long time and he has always been in favour of election to the second Chamber. He knew that I was, too. He buttonholed me and said, "Andrew, you are quite wrong about elections, you know. Quite wrong about having an elected House." "Why is that?" I asked. "Well," he replied, "if you are going to have any kind of proportional representation system, it means a list, which is basically an appointed system, because the party puts people on the list. That is no different, so I have decided I am against it." A large number of life peers are suddenly converting to the principle of nomination, having believed in the principle of election for many years. While the hereditaries were there they were safe, because there was a buffer zone between them and any threat of democracy, but they have twigged that the fresh air of democracy will be as much of a threat to life peers as the House of Lords Bill is to the hereditaries.

The life peers are a powerful vested interest—as powerful a vested interest as the hereditary peers have been over the years. The hereditaries are doing their best to cling on through the Cranborne-Weatherill amendment. It was only recently made public in an interview that Lord Cranborne negotiated a life peerage for himself as part of the deal to secure the amendment. He is in a Morton's fork. He will lose his right to sit because he sits by virtue of a writ of acceleration, so he is not ready even to be considered for election as part of the elected element in his scheme, but he does not have a life peerage either.

[Mr. Andrew Tyrie]

so he would have gone were it not for the special personal offer by the Prime Minister. That again shows the power of vested interests.

We, too, are a powerful vested interest.

Sir Patrick Cormack: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Tyrie: In a moment.

This House has a monopoly of democratic authority. If we gave any elected authority to the second Chamber, we would have to share it.

The most important vested interest is the Executive. The Government have a huge vested interest in ensuring that no impediments are put in the way of pushing through legislation. That has been true of all Executives. I am not making an assault on this Government. It has been the case since the 1911 reform.

The power of vested interests on this issue is huge. We are talking about a large number of Members of Parliament, the Executive, life peers and hereditary peers. If we are to secure democratic reform, we must take the issue away from the vested interests and give it to the electorate to decide.

Sir Patrick Cormack: I am sorry to take my hon. Friend back, but he made a categorical statement about Lord Cranborne. I do not know whether he is right, but is he sure that he knows precisely what took place in a private alleged conversation between Lord Cranborne and the Prime Minister?

Mr. Tyrie: It is rather tedious to go through all this, but I have a transcript of Lord Cranborne's interview on "Breakfast with Frost". Since my hon. Friend has raised the issue, I suppose that I shall have to read it out. He said:

> "Very kindly, the Government made it clear that . . . I could stay on if I wanted to as a life peer and I think it would be a bit churlish to turn that down—that general offer—particularly when there was a memorandum in the attached Bill making it clear they wanted to get rid of me. It is nice that they have changed their mind on that, too."

I think that that is a fairly clear answer to my hon. Friend.

This is our first debate on an issue that we should have debated two years ago—whether we want an upper House that is largely or wholly directly elected or one that is indirectly elected or wholly appointed. I have tried to answer that in various pieces that I have written over the past two years. It is worth going through some of the arguments briefly. Many of them have been mentioned today.

We need to be clear about whether we want a second Chamber. There are many unicameralists in the House, but most of them are not here today and their voice has scarcely been heard in the debate. I respect their views, but I find the arguments for bicameralism compelling. The Executive have become more powerful in recent decades. Many factors have contributed to that. The right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon), who is no longer present, alluded to some of them, including the growth of the payroll vote, the professionalisation of Commons politics, the increase in the power of the Whips, the decline of the independent Back Bencher and the Executive's almost complete control over the Standing Orders of the House.

Our scrutiny of legislation is inadequate. After two years here, I am appalled by how shoddy legislation gets on to the statute book. I do not want to suggest that that has arisen only in the past two years. We also rely too much on the self-restraint of the Executive to protect our freedoms. A second Chamber can help to improve scrutiny and can act as a constitutional long stop.

Unicameralists may ask, "Why do we need the Lords to do those jobs? Why not reform the Commons?" That is a strong theoretical argument, but I do not think that such reforms will see the light of day. It is just possible that the Executive may be persuaded to support some improvement in the effectiveness of the Lords, but it is inconceivable that they will allow themselves to be restrained by radical reform of the Commons. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) made a similar point, and I agree with him.

Mr. Letwin: Does my hon. Friend agree that there are grounds for a little more optimism than he is expressing in that, as an Opposition, we now have an opportunity to bind ourselves to reforms of this place which, when in government, we would be forced to implement?

Mr. Tyrie: That is a welcome suggestion, and I will now give greater thought to how the House of Commons might be reformed so that I can add to that debate.

As things stand, a second Chamber that works is the only way to tackle the problem of an over-mighty Executive.

Before moving on to consider election, we have to ask ourselves whether an interim House such as that being created by the first Bill or a largely appointed House—or something very similar—could do the job of scrutiny. I do not believe so. I believe that stage 1 reform will leave the lower House controlled by the Executive and the upper House effectively appointed by them. Abolishing the hereditaries achieves very little. It merely ensures that ancient patronage is replaced by modern patronage. What quality of scrutiny could we hope to obtain from that?

When it is created, it will be a Chamber of virtually no legitimacy. It will be no more than an interim rump, effectively on death row. If there is any trouble, the Government will be able to threaten to press the stage 2 button and eject as many as they want from the remainder of the Chamber.

I do not believe that tweaking a few dials such as creating an appointments committee, can create a modern appointed Chamber that will command widespread public respect. Without that public respect, no second Chamber would be able to exercise its powers. That is the central flaw in the argument of my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk. He said that he wanted an increase in powers, but he did not want any increase in the moral authority of the Chamber in exercising them. He argued for some indirect election and some appointment. That would carry no more moral authority than we have now—in fact, it may carry less. By virtue merely of longevity, the existing House has come to serve some sort of constitutional role, although not a wholly adequate one. Once that has been removed—or even if there is only a moderate reform—what is left will have no moral authority.

The plain fact is that we live in a democratic age and only democracy can supply legitimacy. In the 21st century, parliamentary legitimacy must come largely from the ballot box. The public will find it increasingly unacceptable that parliamentarians should be created by a committee and given the power to legislate over them. Such a committee would amount to little more than a self-perpetuating oligarchy of the great and the good.

Sometimes I catch myself wondering why making that case should sound so radical. When I first raised this subject 18 months ago—shortly after I published my first article in The Times in favour of an elected House—an elderly colleague prodded me in the shoulder and said. "You're a republican." I can assure the House that I am not a republican and that I believe that it is entirely reasonable to envisage two parliamentary Chambers—directly elected or largely directly elected—while retaining the monarchy in its present form.

I believe that, only a few years ago, the vast majority of Labour party members, certainly those on the Front Bench, would have agreed that there should be more direct democracy in the House of Lords. Two years of being the Executive seems to have spawned a few doubts. After the election, there were still a few nods in the direction of democracy, but most of those have disappeared from Labour rhetoric.

I want to be slightly partisan in taking issue strongly with the Labour party's submission on reform of the House of Lords. It tells its own story. It is a profoundly anti-democratic document. It is replete with boxes of Labour party members' views—56 views are listed. I cannot find one Labour party member who is in favour of democracy—not one. On reading the boxes, one would believe that no one in Labour's grass roots believes in election. The press release that accompanied the document states:

"any proposals . . . for an elected second Chamber"— that is proposals from the Conservative party—are

"naked opportunism masquerading as argument."

I find it appalling that the Labour party should produce a document suggesting that, if any Conservative such as myself stands here arguing for election—most of us have done it today—we should be accused of naked opportunism.

To read the Labour party document, one would believe that democracy was no way to achieve representation of the people. It calls for a "fully representative" Chamber of different interests and says that, above all, the House of Lords

"should be representative of the people as a whole."

That representation should be achieved not by election but by appointment. It is an outrageous abuse of language to talk about a representative Chamber that is wholly undemocratic. It is quite absurd.

Mr. Forth: I wonder whether my hon. Friend is flattered that the Labour party should assume that Conservatives should be opportunistic in arguing for democracy. That means that the Labour party accepts that we would be the gainers from any democratic process. I find that flattering and encouraging.

Mr. Tyrie: My right hon. Friend makes his point very well. I do not believe that two years, or even five or eight years, ago we would have seen a document such as this from the Labour party. It is deeply regrettable.

Mr. Grieve: Does my hon. Friend agree that one or two of the contributions from some Labour Members today mark an evolutionary stage in Labour party thought? The hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) was fascinated by the idea of corporatist elected Chamber, but we have a proposal for a corporatist Chamber that is not elected but appointed.

Mr. Tyrie: I agree.

I have got to know quite a large number of Labour Members who strongly support direct elections and I do not want to suggest that I am portraying all Labour Members in that light—far from it. I have had some fascinating conversations with people who follow pretty much the same line of argument as I, in favour of a largely or wholly directly elected Chamber.

What is more, although it is well concealed, the Labour party document rules out a second Chamber of mixed composition. It is worth bearing that in mind. I notice that one Labour Member is frowning, so I shall read the relevant passage. It says:

"Its Members should have equal standing and there should be no opportunity for some to assert that they have a greater legitimacy than others."

That can only mean that those who might have legitimacy as a result of being elected cannot sit alongside those who have been appointed. I should be interested if the Minister could enlighten me on what that sentence means, if it is anything other than my interpretation.

So where do we stand? The Executive seem to be determined to prevent even a whiff of democracy in a reformed second Chamber. They have issued a Labour party document that calls for a wholly appointed House, but they do not have the courage to say that that is what the document means.

Does democracy stand any chance at all? I have to say that I am not very optimistic, and I share the views of my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) on that. I am sure that the royal commission was originally appointed with the idea of trying to kick the issue into the long grass. None the less, there are two sources of hope. One is the royal commission, which might surprise us by embracing democracy. The other is the existing House of Lords which might force commitments out of the Government with the passage of the stage 1 Bill.

On the royal commission, I am hoping for the best but fearing the worst. I am most impressed with the way in which its members are going about their work and I have already given evidence to them in writing and orally.

It is worth looking briefly at the composition of the royal commission. Some of its members have expressed quite clear views about an elected House. Only recently,

[Mr. Tyrie]

Lord Wakeham was reported as being sceptical about election. That was in The Times earlier this year. The Bishop of Oxford is completely against in the second Chamber, as he made clear in a speech just under a year ago. I do not know the views of Sir Michael Wheeler Booth and Anthony King. Professor Oliver will almost certainly be in favour of some form of election.

"even a partially elected element"

I was also greatly heartened by some typically erudite remarks on the danger of appointed Houses from Lord Butler, the former Cabinet Secretary, when he quoted Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire". Gibbon wrote of Augustus:

"The principles of a free constitution are irrevocably lost when the legislative power is nominated by the Executive".

Lord Butler went on to say:

"I think it of the highest importance, in the absence of hereditary Peers, for the Royal Commission to find a way in which to select Members of your Lordships' House which does not depend solely on the patronage of the Executive".—[Official Report, House of Lords, 25 November 1998; Vol. 595, c. 42.]

Of course he has had the benefit of seeing successive Executives exercising that power of patronage and I wonder whether that had any influence on his decision to express that view. I am not overly optimistic about the royal commission, but I am not yet overly pessimistic.

The other hope—which is a genuine one and not to be wholly ignored—is the possibility that the House of Lords itself in its present form might yet force commitments from the Government for direct democracy. The hereditary peers can do a great deal before they depart. They can and should force through two important amendments. First, they could demand a referendum. The Lords could demand that, whatever the content of stage 2, the Government should be required to hold a referendum on their stage 2 proposals. They should be forced to let the people decide.

Many Opposition Members, including me, are not particularly attracted to referendums as a matter of principle, but the Government have always said that they believe in them. If the Government believe that the end point of this reform should be an appointed upper House, as the Labour party's submission so clearly elucidates, let them take that issue to the people. They have had referendums on Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and London. Indeed, the White Paper refers to them glowingly. They have promised us referendums on economic and monetary union, and proportional representation.

In the local government White Paper, the Government promise to allow local authorities to hold referendums. If local authorities are to be allowed to hold referendums on whether to charge for home helps, what possible argument can the Government have against giving people a chance to decide something as fundamental as the reform of Parliament? Why cannot the people be given a chance to endorse the biggest change in the legislature this century?

The second amendment that the Lords could pass, which would add pressure for direct election, is a democratic one—a clause that would force the Government to bring forward a democratic stage 2 within, say, three years of the passage of the stage 1 Bill. That would open up the debate on democracy in the House and in the country in a big way.

If they did that, the 750 hereditary peers who are threatened by the stage 1 Bill would have an opportunity to be remembered not as a group who were clinging on to what the wider public consider unacceptable privileges in a democratic age, but as the people who brought the Executive to accept some constitutional restraint through election. They could be remembered as the people who checked the Government and reduced the risk that we could be left floundering with unicameralism in all but name, which is what the stage 1 Bill will bequeath us.

So we must hope for the best from their lordships and from the royal commission, but nobody should underestimate the power of the forces acting against democracy.

I believe that all of us who believe in an elected House and a largely or fully elected second Chamber should go out and try to make the case to a wider public. If the Executive were forced to go beyond Westminster, where they reign supreme, and talk to the people directly and explain that they intended to impose a largely or wholly appointed second Chamber, I have no doubt that they would soon produce proposals for a largely or wholly elected second Chamber.

8.26 pm

Mr. Bill Rammell (Harlow): I welcome the opportunity to participate in a thoughtful debate. I used to be sceptical about the passion that people brought to constitutional issues, but, having attended all the Committee sittings on the Bill and the two days of debate on Second Reading and participated in numerous discussions, I am becoming as obsessive about the issue as many others. It is a bit like becoming a train spotter late in life. I apologise to any of my constituents who happen to be train spotters.

It is an interesting debate and we should not underestimate the degree of historic change that we are witnessing. I should like to follow some of the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright). We are ending the indefensible—people voting in one of our Houses of Parliament simply on the basis of the family into which they were born. We are ending the deformity of one of our Houses of Parliament, whereby its members come predominantly from one background and from one class with one set of beliefs and one set of values, and certainly support one political party. Many Opposition Members underestimate the power of that criticism of the current make-up of the House of Lords and the resentment that many people feel about it.

We are also rightly ending the party political abuse of the second Chamber. It is not about independence and detachment, but about the naked abuse of party political power. Two thirds of peers who take a party Whip in the House of Lords take the Conservative Whip. It is not about independence, scrutiny and a check on the Executive; it is and has been for centuries about the domination of the second Chamber by Conservative peers who have used their power to frustrate the will of democratically elected Labour Governments.

It is also about ending unrepresentativeness. We will have a debate about whether representativeness can be achieved solely by dint of election, but the current make-up of the House of Lords, with only 2.5 per cent. of its members being women and very few coming from ethnic minority backgrounds, presents a real problem. I hope that the process that we have set in train will bring that to an end. It is worth underlining what we are doing. We are making a change that is long overdue and demonstrates the radical constitutional nature of the Government.

Before I talk in detail about my views on the form and composition of the new Chamber, it is worth dealing with some of the criticisms from Conservative Members. I was interested to hear the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) say that the only positions in public life that are legitimate in the eyes of the public are those that result from direct election. Despite that sincerely held view, elected office is probably held in lower esteem than it has been at any time in recent memory. Therefore, it is at least worth considering that elections—although crucial to the make-up of the House of Commons—are not a panacea and are not appropriate to every nook and cranny of our constitutional settlement.

Some of the comments concerning the domination of this place by the Executive have been interesting. It is at least fair to say that those concerns were not voiced fully by Conservative Members of Parliament when their party was in power. Perhaps opposition releases people from the constraints of office and allows them to think more liberally.

I was interested to hear the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham say that he did his duties as a Whip reluctantly—presumably, he told people that what he was doing was hurting him far more than them. Conservative Members would know better than I. However, there are concerns about domination by the Executive, but these come when one party has a large majority.

It is interesting to reflect that in three of the previous four general elections, one party has been elected with a majority of more than 100. It is in those circumstances that concerns about domination by the Executive come to the fore. We could resolve that by moving to a fairer voting system in which views are more fairly represented. However, there are different ways of dealing with the matter rather than by simply looking to elect a second Chamber. That is an answer to a question that is not being posed.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) and Conservative Members referred to the need for an alternative career structure within this House. That is a legitimate point which could deal with some of the concerns and tensions about domination by the Executive. However, I do not think that that is in any way dependent on reform of a second Chamber. Such ideas should be debated in any case.

I was interested in the claim made by a number of Conservative Members that, if the Government had simply brought forward the matter immediately after the general election and set up the royal commission at that stage, we could have had consensus on a reformed second Chamber. I hope that Conservative Members will forgive my scepticism about that. The debate about the nature of the House of Lords has been going on for 88 years. In the 18 years in which the Conservatives were in power, they never once proposed any detailed substantive reform for the House of Lords. I do not believe that, immediately following the general election, the Conservative party was serious about reform.

Conservative Members referred to the old chestnut that the Government should have brought forward the two-stage reform in one stage. That is a flawed argument. Over the past 88 years, Members of the Conservative party have claimed to support House of Lords reform, but said that they needed to see the endgame before they could commit themselves. The lack of agreement on the endgame is always what thwarts the process of reform, so I do not believe that that argument carries much credence.

I wish to refer to what kind of second Chamber we want, what its functions should be, how it should be established, what its role and procedures should be and its relationship to this House. The first point, alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst), was whether we should have a second Chamber at all. I listened with interest to my hon. Friend and, on balance, I think that we need a second Chamber. We need within our constitutional settlement the possibility of asking the Government to think again.

We need a second Chamber to allow us to bring in the outside expertise that we do not necessarily get through bringing in professional politicians. We need a second Chamber in which it is possible to get greater detachment and independence from the party Whips—my apologies to my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Pope) on the Front Bench—which would come from the second Chamber not having the vast majority of its Members relying for their living on their seat within that House. We certainly need a second Chamber to check abuse of power by the Executive.

Fundamentally—this concern was not addressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree—we need a second Chamber as the ultimate guarantor to stop this House extending its term of office and postponing or abolishing elections.

Having dealt with these issues, the key question becomes one of the composition of the second Chamber. As someone who believes that the hereditary principle is an abomination—a view that I have held all my political life, as has my party—my instinctive reaction is that the answer should be direct elections. I hope now to set out my scepticism about that. The more I have become involved in the process, the greater my concern has been about direct elections to the second Chamber.

Those concerns stem from fact that I do not want the pre-eminence and superiority of this House to be challenged. It is in this House that the Government are accountable. It is in this House that we are the primary legislators. I do not want to undermine that. My concern with the current status of the House of Lords is that democratically elected Governments of the left have had their programmes obstructed by the undemocratic nature of the House of Lords.

I do not want to throw the baby out with the bath water and have a situation where democratically elected Governments of the left find that their legitimate mandate is thwarted by a second Chamber with an equally powerful electoral mandate which seeks to frustrate the legitimate aspirations of the Government as stated in their manifesto.

Mr. Grieve: Why should those aspirations be frustrated if there is an elected second Chamber? For instance, it might be that, two years into the elected period of the Government—when their mandate is becoming a little stale—fresh Members of the upper House may say not that they wish to thwart that mandate, but that they disagree with some aspects of it and wish to make the Government think again by exercising to the full their powers under the Parliament Acts. What is the matter with that?

[Mr. Grieve]

Mr. Rammell: The hon. Gentleman underlines one of my key concerns: that elections to the other place would be conducted in mid term and people elected with a fresh mandate would argue, however small the proportion of elected Members, that their mandate was stronger than the Government's. We would be in danger of constant gridlock and the blocking of the legitimate mandate won by a Government in a general election.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): The important element of the elections is that they would be rotational. If a third retired at each fixed-term House of Lords election, every Member would have legitimacy to cause reflection, but there would not be a mandate to block completely the will of the House of Commons, whose view must ultimately prevail. There would never be the snapshot of time that gives us in the House of Commons a mandate. Members of the other place would never be able to claim supremacy, although each Member would have legitimacy.

Mr. Rammell: We would need to think through the detail. Even if only a third were elected at any one time, clearly there would be others in that House under the same party label who would draw inspiration and encouragement from the electoral mandate that that third of the House got. I am not ruling out elections, perhaps for a proportion of Members, in all circumstances, but I am highlighting the fact that we need to think long and hard before automatically and instinctively responding to the inadequacies of the current make-up of the House of Lords by replacing it with an elected second Chamber. Before we knew where we were, we would have constitutional gridlock between the two Houses and the Government of the day, democratically elected with a significant mandate, would be unable to implement their programme beyond a period of two years.

Mr. Savidge: As my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) said, if the legislation says that the other House can only delay and cannot create gridlock, there is a perfectly good reason why a Government, who no longer have the support of the country should be made to think again.

Mr. Rammell: As we all know, the power of delay can be extremely significant and can affect the rest of a Government's legislative programme.

We also need to consider what is the role of a second Chamber in relation to this Chamber. This is where we hold the Government to account and where we are the primary instigators of legislation. Conservative Members may say that that is not the situation at present, and perhaps that is one of the problems with the current constitutional set-up, but I do not think that the right response is necessarily direct elections.

The role of the second Chamber should be tightly circumscribed. It should be a constitutional long stop, checking abuse and asking this place to think again. I am not convinced that to carry out that role one must necessarily be elected. We do not have a political culture and system in which every form of public office in every nook and cranny of our constitution is elected. We do not elect the dog catcher and we do not elect the judiciary. We should pause for thought.

Where is the enthusiasm for elections among the electorate? Perhaps my experience of the current European parliamentary election campaign has been unique, but I do not detect massive enthusiasm in the electorate for voting in local or European elections. If we add a further set of elections for a reformed second Chamber, we may find that people lose interest more and more and the turnout becomes lower, which would not advance anybody's cause.

Mr. Tyrie: I strongly agree that there is a risk of voter fatigue. Might not a way round that be to hold the elections at the same time as general elections?

Mr. Rammell: That is one possible solution and it would certainly deal with the concern about elections taking place in mid term. I am not certain that the answer to the current inadequacies of the House of Lords is to move to a wholesale system of direct elections.

The concerns that I am voicing have been expressed consistently every time the House has considered these issues. The Brice conference in 1917–18, set up by Lloyd George, rejected the option of a directly elected second Chamber on the ground that such a Chamber would inevitably become a rival to the House of Commons. That same concern was expressed when the 1945–51 Labour Government considered the issues in 1948, and in 1968, when my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne was involved in the campaign, and people such as Michael Foot voiced their reservations from a very democratic perspective.

If the second Chamber is not to be wholly elected, what should its composition be? There are certainly strong arguments for reflecting the new constitutional settlement, with representatives from the Scottish Parliament, the Welsh Assembly, the Northern Ireland Assembly, once it is established, and the English regions. Those people would be there to ensure that the overall constitutional settlement was taken into account.

There is also a strong case for Members of the European Parliament to be represented—[Interruption.] It is hardly surprising that that idea causes concern on the Conservative Benches. We should remember that 25 per cent. of our laws, and a much higher proportion of our business legislation, are derived from Europe, and we need to ensure that the interlocking between this place and the European Parliament, and our scrutiny of European legislation, take place on an informed basis. I do not think that anyone either in this House or the other place could say that that happens at the moment.

Mr. Grieve: I am wondering whether we shall hear anything from the hon. Gentleman about functional constituencies, which have been touted by the hon. Members for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) and for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright). Those would be corporatist—and is it not as corporatist to include, as of right, Members of the European Parliament, the Scottish Parliament or the Welsh Assembly, as it would be to include groups from industry, the law, the trade unions, the medical profession and so on?

Mr. Rammell: If that is done on a limited basis, I am not sure that, in view of the role that we are prescribing for the second Chamber, it would necessarily be a bad thing. There is at least a case to be made for a small element of representation from sectional interests, whether those be trade unionists, business people, doctors, teachers or whatever. We should explore the idea.

We also need to think long and hard about religious representation. Religious belief is part of the fabric of our society, and nobody suggests that the Church of England should be removed from the second Chamber. Britain today is a multi-ethnic, multicultural and multi-religious society, and it is important that, without the position of the Church of England being undermined, those views are represented in the second Chamber.

Inevitably, within the kind of set-up that I envisage, there will be a process of appointment. That is not necessarily wrong, so long as appointments are made openly and fairly. The move towards an independent appointments commission is important, as is the fact that the Prime Minister has voluntarily given up some powers of patronage.

We need to go further. If there are to be processes of appointment, political parties need to be far more open about how people can come forward and seek nomination for peerages or places in the second Chamber. We should advertise to tell people how to go about seeking a nomination; publicising the process will be important.

The view that nomination is wrong in all circumstances is not shared by most people, especially if the job is not to be primarily one of initiating legislation. That is not a role that we seek for the second Chamber. Despite the fact that this is one of the criticisms most frequently made, nomination does not necessarily mean domination by the Executive, especially as the Government, rightly, have said that no one political party will have a majority in the second Chamber.

No evidence has been produced to suggest that nominated peers, once established, are supine creatures who automatically do the will of their political parties. Let us take some examples of recently created life peers from both parties. No one could plausibly argue that the likes of Lord Hattersley, Lord Shore and Lord Tebbit are there as tame party poodles to carry out the will of the political parties that appointed them.

Under the current system of appointment, once people are appointed they are not accountable to the person or party that put them there—a view that the history of life peers in the House of Lords supports.

I turn now to some of my concerns about the relationship between the two Chambers after the reforms have been instituted. I am worried that too much of what we do happens by convention, which does not always work. Reference has been made to the Salisbury convention, but, in debates on the European Parliamentary Elections Bill, the House of Lords sailed close to the wind in terms of challenging that convention. The Conservative peer Lord Kingsland said recently that abolition of hereditary peers was a solution to a problem that he did not recognise. He considered that the Opposition would be entitled to think most carefully about whether the Salisbury convention applied to that Bill.

So, regardless of what 13.5 million people voted for in the Labour manifesto—the biggest Labour party landslide this century—Lord Kingsland considered that the gentlemen's agreement that is the Salisbury convention did not apply. I argue that the other gentlemen's agreements that police the relationship between this House and the House of Lords should not be allowed to continue.

Mr. Tyrie: The primary purpose of the Salisbury convention, as it was adopted after the war, was to deal with the disparity and imbalance between the two parties. The Government intend to impose parity in the interim House: does the hon. Gentleman think that the Salisbury convention should fall, or does he think that there should be a doctrine of the manifesto to trigger an arrangement similar to the convention and thus ensure that the Government always achieve what is contained in their manifesto?

Mr. Rammell: I think that there should be a doctrine of the manifesto. I was interested to hear a Conservative Member earlier pooh-poohing the notion that what appears in a manifesto is of any interest to politicians or the people who elect them. That attitude risks losing something that is unique about our democratic process. It is important that a party that gets a majority in this House has the opportunity to put into practice what is contained in its election manifesto. Even if there were parity between the parties in a reformed second Chamber, we would need firmer rules to ensure that what is in a manifesto can prevail.

I am also worried about the lack of an effective timetable in the other place. I am aware that if the second Chamber is allowed to have the power of delay, the Government cannot introduce a guillotine and thus remove that right. However, that power of delay must be circumscribed and confined, so that the rest of the legislative programme is not blocked, as has happened often in the past. In short, we need a new constitutional settlement to govern the relationship between this House and the House of Lords.

Finally, although there will be a debate about the form of the second Chamber and about how far elections should play a part in it, we need a second Chamber that really works in its limited role. The example of the Bill that became the War Crimes Act 1991 was mentioned earlier. That was a classic example of a proposal from the Government of the day that the second Chamber should have been able to challenge legitimately. It was a deeply emotive issue, but it was not a manifesto commitment and there were party divides on both sides of the House. One would have thought that the age and experience of Members of the second Chamber put them in a better position to form a judgment on the matter, but the second Chamber was flawed and seen to be illegitimate as a result of the involvement of hereditary peers, and the Government of the day simply brushed it aside by invoking the Parliament Acts.

If, in limited circumstances, the second Chamber is to have the right to challenge the will of this House, it must have legitimacy, openness and fairness in its composition that allows it to be respected and listened to by the public and by the House of Commons. I hope that we can achieve that in future debates as the legislation is introduced.

[Mr. Rammell]

8.54 pm

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): The trouble with debates such as this is that it is easy for Members to agree with superficially attractive propositions. We have heard much of that tonight. There has been near unanimity on some simple propositions, most obviously the idea that it is essential to our political system to have a second Chamber that provides an effective check on and scrutiny of the House of Commons. One or two unicameralists among us did not share that view, but there has been widespread agreement that a second Chamber should scrutinise legislation and hold the Government to account.

Another view widely, but easily, shared is that the second Chamber should be legitimate and accountable. Such words are widely used and it comforts politicians to be able to say them. However, the consensus goes no further. As soon as we have to put hard substance around those words, it becomes more difficult to reach agreement. I find it difficult to understand how Labour Members such as the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) can stress accountability and democracy, yet support an appointed second Chamber.

In fairness, I should say that some braver spirits on the Labour Benches have not done that. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher) robustly supported an elected Chamber, as I do. It is difficult to understand how anyone, whether in my own party or in any other, can, in an era of allegedly open government, democracy, accountability and political legitimacy—all the things to which we say we subscribe—can say that the second Chamber of the legislature should be largely or even wholly appointed. That is unconscionable.

Few Members—the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) is an exception—mentioned whether appointed legislators in another Chamber should have a fixed term or serve for life. The hon. Gentleman, in what was almost a throwaway remark, said that they should serve for life. That begs some interesting questions about how the composition of the Chamber could ever change to reflect changing circumstances. Presumably, it would have to happen by attrition if the number in the Chamber were to be limited. Alternatively, there might be no limit on the number, in which case we could return quickly to something perilously similar to the present arrangement.

Mr. Rowe: Is there not a tremendous danger that people would be reluctant to appoint people of other than a considerable age? What the legislature needs above all is more young people.

Mr. Forth: I was with my hon. Friend until his final words. I do not share the obsession with youth. When I had an element of responsibility for young people during the previous Government I was frequently told that our youth were our future. When I looked at some of them, I thought, "My God, I hope not", and I cannot agree with my hon. Friend.

In fact, I am tempted by the idea that there should be a higher age limit on eligibility for the second Chamber so that we could do the opposite of what my hon. Friend suggests, ensuring that the upper Chamber would be, by definition, mature and experienced and that its Members could not spend too long in it. That would provide an automatic renewal mechanism whether the Chamber was appointed or, as I would prefer, elected.

An appointment system raises real difficulties. Quite apart from lack of legitimacy and accountability, difficulties arise over numbers, the variability of the composition when circumstances change and the removal of Members who are no longer appropriate. There is also the vexed question—hardly covered in our debate, but one of the key considerations before us—of who would do the appointing, and who would appoint those who do the appointing, and who would appoint them. Despite the claims of Labour Members who are loyal to their Prime Minister, how could we guarantee that the Prime Minister would—as he has said he would—stand aside and allow the process to be non-political? I do not believe that and I suspect that even many Labour Members do not. For an appointed Chamber to be valid, we would have to be satisfied that appointments would be free of the patronage that has so often been mentioned tonight. Like so many of my hon. Friends, I readily argue for an elected second Chamber. To my mind, that is the only approach that we can countenance at this stage in our political history and constitutional development.

The second Chamber should be composed of a multiple of 87 Members. That number was not chosen at random, as cognoscenti will understand. We have a ready-made political map of 87 constituencies. They happen to be European constituencies, I might add sotto voce, but, for the purpose of my proposal, I will accept that. We could use that map almost immediately without needing a boundary commission. I would prefer a small Chamber, but I would be prepared to accept twice or even three times that number if that was deemed to be appropriate to the Chamber's functions.

I suggest long terms for Members of the Chamber, probably nine or 12 years, to give them some independence of the Government. That is important. A third should be elected every two or three years or perhaps a bit longer to make the Chamber responsive to the electorate and changes in their views and to make it a distinctive political entity with a validity distinct from that of the House of Commons and the Government.

As many hon. Members have argued, there must be no Ministers in the upper House, which would therefore become genuinely independent of the Government. It would reflect the electorate's views and gain legitimacy and accountability. There would be no power of patronage in the upper House because the Government would not determine what happened there. Because Members had long terms of office, they could act genuinely independently. We could thus meet many of the requirements that many hon. Members say that they seek—but often shrink from—in a revised second Chamber. I do not shrink from the implications of saying that the Chamber should be powerful because I want it properly to scrutinise and hold to account the Government of the day.

Some colleagues may know that I spend a lot of time in the Chamber. I am one of those eccentrics who attends on Fridays. Not everyone welcomes that, but I believe that I can therefore say that I do my best to be a good Member of this House. That does not mean that I have blind faith in it or in the idea that everything begins and ends here. Nor do I accept without criticism the argument about the primacy of the House of Commons. I regret what I am about to say, but it is true. Many of those Members who talk about this House's primacy do not come here to support it. The thin attendance at this debate is an example, as is the pathetically small attendance on Fridays and on many other occasions. All the talk about the House's vital importance is regrettably not borne out by the actions of its Members.

Mr. Hogg: I very much agree with what my right hon. Friend says. With regard to Fridays, does he accept that private Members' Bills often diminish the rights of individuals to a marked extent? An obvious example was the attempt to prohibit foxhunting; another example is the Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill. However, as a general rule, the House is not well attended on the occasions when those measures are discussed—albeit that their consequence is greatly to diminish individual liberty.

Mr. Forth: I share the view of my right hon. and learned Friend and I am grateful to him for making that point. Many private Members' Bills would limit considerably the powers of individuals, or would introduce a large degree of regulation. However, few Members of the House turn up voluntarily to participate in the debates on those measures.

I do not necessarily agree with those who say that the House is so wonderful that it must never be challenged. I am prepared to countenance an elected upper House with enormous powers and ability to challenge what happens in the House of Commons. As so many hon. Members have pointed out, the real difficulty and the sadness about the modern House of Commons is that it is so much in the total control of the Executive of the day. That cannot be changed in the foreseeable future, so we owe it to the electorate to provide them with the assurance that there will be a second Chamber that can effectively challenge the Executive and hold them to account, in a way that I regret that the House of Commons rarely, if ever, now demonstrates that it is capable of doing.

Those are my arguments and, in view of the time, I shall draw them to a close. To complete them, I join the few Members who have highlighted the judicial role currently played by the House of Lords. That role can be, and should be, swept aside, along with the reforms that we are considering. We should have a supreme court, modelled closely on the one that has played such a distinguished role in the development of the United States throughout almost its entire history. The US Supreme Court is one of the most fascinating political institutions of the past 200 years; its role has been dramatic and remarkable. We would do well to emulate that court. If, as I suggest, we establish a wholly elected, accountable second Chamber, we should sweep away the unnecessary representation of the Church and other interests—I should be happy if that were gone, and the sooner the better. I should also be happy to see the judicial role of the upper Chamber brought to an end and replaced by a supreme court, modelled closely on that of the United States and able to play a similar role.

I am glad that the proposals that I have briefly outlined are shared by many of my colleagues. I hope that they find increasing support from Labour Members.

9.8 pm

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Clwyd, West): The debate has been genuinely interesting. It has helped me to formulate my views—albeit tentative ones—on a subject that raises difficult issues, especially when one deals with the vexed question whether the second Chamber should be elected or nominated. I had thought that I was reasonably knowledgeable on the subject, but, having heard the wide range of rather good-quality contributions, it is clear to me that I must bow to the greater specialist knowledge of several hon. Members.

I am a relatively new Member, having been elected in 1997. I represent a Welsh constituency and am committed to Welsh devolution. I am aware that there is a wide programme of constitutional reform and that reform of the second Chamber also has to embrace the reforms in that programme. I welcome the fact that a royal commission has been appointed and I expect it to produce a comprehensive and well-argued report.

The first of my conclusions is that there is a need for a second Chamber. I do not accept the rather intriguing argument employed by my hon. Friend the Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst). However, I do accept the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright). A second Chamber is a reflection of what is required in a particular country. In our jurisdiction, there is a strong Executive and a strong first Chamber—the elected Chamber. As a corrective to an over-mighty Executive, it is essential to have a second Chamber charged with the tasks of revising legislation and complementing the scrutiny role of the elected Chamber by bringing to bear specialised knowledge.

That is my starting point. Given the public demand for strong and accountable government exercised through the House of Commons, it is unrealistic to expect this Chamber to do all that is required to produce good-quality legislation. Unfortunately, there have been many examples of poor legislation, which, in themselves, provide ample justification for having a second, revising Chamber. I make no apologies for taking a somewhat minimalist view, for my second conclusion is that there is no strongly rooted case for revising the essential roles of the second Chamber. I disagree with the analysis of the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), who would like the role of the second Chamber to be greatly expanded.

I agree that there is an inherent problem in having an elected second Chamber that could contest the will of our elected Chamber, but my third conclusion is that there must be a strong independent element in any second Chamber. Although I was almost persuaded by my hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), who offered an extremely good analysis of why, in the latter half of the 20th century, we must conclude that legitimacy is normally derived from the ballot box, I take the view that, to preserve the independence of the second Chamber and to ensure that it effectively fulfils its revising and scrutiny roles, it is necessary for it to consist of a wide range of people who reflect different experiences. I am sceptical that the conventional electoral system, which involves people working their way through conventional political parties, would produce the sort of people we want in the second Chamber.

[Mr. Gareth Thomas]

In addition, like my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell), I am concerned that the increased number of elections for different levels of government has resulted in voter fatigue. If the second Chamber is to have a limited role, which I would support, turnout in elections for it might be drastically low, which would undermine its legitimacy. The best way to ensure that we have an independent second Chamber is to have an appointments commission that is seen to be dispassionate, independent and detached from the Executive. Like the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), I hope the Minister will tell us more about how the Government propose to give teeth to such a commission.

In Wales and Scotland, there has been debate about whether there should be territorial representation in the second Chamber. I support the view expressed many years ago in the Kilbrandon report that that would be undesirable. I am in favour of a broad spread of geographical representation, but not in any formalised way, because that might lead to confusion about the functions of the House of Lords—incidentally, I see no reason why its name should be changed.

A balance must be struck between, on the one hand, tradition and stability and, on the other, the need to create a second Chamber that is more representative and fulfils its role more effectively. Provided that we can deal with the overriding objection to the current system—that there is an in-built Conservative majority in the House of Lords—I would feel comfortable with a nominated House of Lords, so long as the system for nominations was truly detached and dispassionate and ensured good-quality, independent representation.

9.15 pm

Mr. Dominic Grieve (Beaconsfield): I shall have to be brief and I have only myself to blame if I am called last. I must apologise to the House for having missed the opening speeches. The reason, I must confide to the House, is that I was attempting to maintain my independence by carrying out some of my professional duties instead of attending the House, although I had hopes that I might be able to get here slightly earlier than I did. Perhaps I am paying the penalty for that, although I was reassured to hear several Labour Members suggest that it was not necessarily a bad thing that I should have some independent interests.

I start from the premise that I am a great believer in parliamentary democracy. That does not mean that I am a believer in pure democracy, because only the ancient Athenians had pure democracy and they tended to chop off the heads of members of the Executive whom they had democratically mandated at the end of each term. Parliamentary democracy works especially well in this country and in the structure of this Chamber because there is a reasonable degree of consensus about and acceptance of the decisions that we take. However, there are many flaws in the way this Chamber operates. I do not want to go into them in this speech, which will deal mainly with the upper House, but the way we carry out our functions is in need of massive reform. That that is so does not alter the need for us to consider what goes on in the House of Lords.

We have been offered a package that goes only part of the way. I accept what is said about the hereditary peers being anachronistic, but they are an independent element. We are getting rid of that independent element and we will end up—it appears at the moment—with only nominated Members.

The functions of the upper House need to be strengthened—not enormously, but slightly. What I found most interesting in the contributions of Labour Members was not that they did not want the other place to have enhanced powers. Their fear was that the result of the reforms would be that the upper House might suddenly start to exercise the powers that it already has in a way that it would be wholly entitled to do. It could use its powers to scrutinise and, if necessary, delay legislation. That would be a good thing. I can think of few instances in which delaying legislation would result in some catastrophe, given the legislation that has passed through this Parliament since the second world war.

On constitutional issues, if there is disagreement between the upper House and this place, it is desirable that the upper House should have the power to block legislation and, if it blocks it twice, for the matter to be referred to a referendum to resolve it. That would be a powerful enhancement of democracy. If we take that approach—it is the only one we can properly take in a democratic society—it is axiomatic that the House of Lords will have to be principally an elected Chamber. It must be an elected Chamber. No other solution that has been put forward could command the legitimacy that the Chamber must have if it is properly to fulfil its functions.

Mr. Swayne: I ask my hon. Friend to extend that principle. Will he accept that apostolic succession is a form of election in a purer and more ancient sense, and it is highly desirable that it should be preserved in the new system that he is developing?

Mr. Grieve: I am not sure that I feel wholly qualified to comment on the apostolic succession. On the basic issue of the form that the upper House must take, I am convinced that election is the only solution and the only one that the electorate will accept. There are many ways in which that can be achieved, and I am certainly willing to consider a form of proportional representation.

For the reasons eloquently stated by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), there is no great philosophical debate about whether the system should be first past the post or proportional representation—it is a matter of practicality. I believe it is essential that we preserve the first-past-the-post system in this place. However, for a revising Chamber, in which perhaps no members of the Executive will sit, I have no objection to the idea of selection through some form of proportional representation.

We could have a rotating Chamber. One third of Members could have fixed terms of considerable length—nine or 10 years has been suggested—and others could have single terms. In those circumstances, I believe that we can create a vibrant second Chamber that has the capacity to revise legislation, to hold the Government to account, to generate its own legislation when the Government do not have time to do so, and to call a halt in certain circumstances unless a referendum were held. That would be a powerful enhancement of democracy.

I disagree entirely with the comments of the hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) that the manifesto somehow confers great legitimacy on political parties, which entitles them to ride roughshod over minority views during their period in office—especially when one considers that opinions often change. I was struck by the hon. Gentleman's failure to mention that what appears in a manifesto often does not reach the statute book. Is that omission so shameful that we should insist that every policy in the manifesto becomes legislation and that Governments cannot change their mind? Why on earth should we always allow Governments to have it their own way?

I do not have time to develop all my arguments, but I wish to touch on a matter that I raised by way of several interventions. I have always accepted that a purely elected system has one considerable drawback: the loss of the independent element in the form of those who have a great deal to contribute but will not necessarily be willing to stand for election.

It has been said that a great strength of the upper House is its ability to involve in political discussions and policy formulation appointed and hereditary peers who have no party political affiliations, who would not stand for election and who do not wish to wear the label of any political party. If we are to go down the road of electing members to the second Chamber, the greatest drawback will be the possibility a producing a replica of this place.

I have an open mind about this issue, but I do not wish to see appointed peers or Members of the House of Lords. The exercise of prime ministerial patronage is a deeply corrupting process. I was fascinated to hear the hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) criticise the sale of hereditary peerages when the appointed system has its own inherent corruptions that many Labour Members appear happy to see continue.

I believe that there is mileage in considering the notion that if we are to have non-elected Members of the House of Lords, they should be co-opted by elected Members. Dozens of bodies and organisations up and down the land both co-opt and elect members. My right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) argued that, in such circumstances, the party with the majority would co-opt its own placemen to supplement its numbers. That is not, however, likely to happen because there are two ways in which it can be prevented. First, if there is a system of proportional representation, it is unlikely that any party will have a majority to bring in its placemen because there will have to be a measure of agreement with others about who should enter the Chamber. Secondly, there is absolutely no reason why, in framing legislation, the House should not introduce a clause stating that the co-option should be done by two-thirds majority.

We belittle the upper House and its capacity as an elected Chamber to perform a role different from our own if we think that the views of its Members will be dominated by party political considerations. If we frame the legislation properly, we can allow those Members to carry out the co-option of possibly a quarter or even a third of their number to enable them to bring into the upper House for a similar period those who are willing to serve and have a contribution to make. If we are considering having unelected Members, that is the only way in which a reasonable level of legitimacy can be conferred. I should be prepared to consider and back that proposal because it has merit, and would have merit with the electorate.

I turn now to the point that was touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West (Mr. Swayne), who asked me about apostolic succession. There are two groups within the upper House who currently come from what can only be described as a slightly corporatist background: the first is the bishops and the other is the Law Lords.

I have great regard for the presence of the Law Lords in the upper House because it significantly enhances the quality of debate there and the whole approach and ethos by marrying, at the top end, the legislature and the judiciary. I do not believe in the separation of powers. One of this country's unique features is the extraordinary way in which we have maintained such links and the fact that they have been of benefit. Given the small number of seats involved, I would be willing to make an exception for the Law Lords and allow them to remain in the upper House by virtue of their office.

I regret to have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, West that I have rather more serious doubts in respect of the bishops. There should be representation of religious organisations and organised religion, but that should be achieved by the co-option process that I have suggested rather than by enshrining in legislation a place for those of a particular denomination.

I could go on at great length on a large number of topics, but I shall refrain from doing so. I shall conclude by addressing the corporatist aspects of the debate. Frankly, I was shocked to hear some hon. Members suggest that Members of the upper House should be drawn from interest groups. That was a popular notion and may even have been popular with Churchill at the turn of the century. At that time, I regret to tell the House, some fascist notions had a certain degree of popularity and continued until, thankfully, they disappeared in the 1930s. Until then, the Webbs and many socialists were interested in those ideas. They are very cosy; they relate to the setting up of corporate groups that have interests that are exclusive to themselves and at variance with others outside.

Nobody has yet explained to me what happens to what I suppose might have been described as the lumpen proletariat, who are not supposed to form part of any interest group at all. Frankly, I am horrified that a democratic body should even be contemplating having an interest in those structures. I say to the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) that although such structures may well work in Ireland because it is a small country, they are treated as archaic and they cause embarrassment to those who know the origins of the idea. It originated in an interest in fascism in the Republic of Ireland.

I see that 9.30 pm is approaching, so I shall obey the time constraint.

Mr. Hogg: The coach is at the door.

Mr. Grieve: Indeed; I shall respect that.

I urge the House to bear in mind the fact that only a primarily elected second Chamber will command the legitimacy required to provide the necessary scrutiny of legislation.

9.30 pm

Sir Patrick Cormack (South Staffordshire): I should make two brief apologies. First, I apologise to the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty). I had hoped that he might have just a minute or two in which to speak. Secondly, I apologise to the House in general because, as the Minister and I agreed to cut our winding-up speeches from 20 minutes to 15, I fear that it will not be possible to give way if one is to try to deal with all 15 Back-Bench speeches. I greatly regret that because, as most hon. Members present know, I rather enjoy interventions.

I suppose that one should begin by saying that we would not have started from here. We do not believe that the Government have handled this issue well. The royal commission should have been established two years ago. In fact, the debate should have taken place at roughly the same time as those on the White Papers on devolution in the summer of 1997. If that had been so, we would perhaps have been able to make a more logical progression towards reform of the second Chamber.

But we must be where we are. We have had a good debate in what one must acknowledge is a thin House. Nevertheless, 15 Back-Bench speeches have been made—all of them thoughtful and stimulating, and some of them quite amusing. It is wonderful to hear ex-Ministers speak. We listened to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central (Mr. Fisher), my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) and my right hon. and buccaneering Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth). With the constraints of office removed from them all, they were able to talk about holding to account, when no Ministers were more tyrannical than they were. There is more joy in the House of Commons over one ex-Minister who repenteth than over 90 and nine others.

I believe that the Leader of the Opposition has the right to take some credit for establishing the Mackay commission. It is right that its extremely thoughtful document should have been submitted to the royal commission as part of our submission. It is right—indeed, it would be grossly discourteous if we did otherwise—to give ample time for discussion in our party of the two alternatives, as well as the others, before coming to a definitive conclusion. As we called for the establishment of the royal commission, and much as we regret the tardy implementation of that policy, it would be grossly discourteous if we did not await Lord Wakeham's final report before coming to a definitive conclusion. All my remarks in this debate must be against that background.

Of course, I am rather relieved to be able to say that. The hon. Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) said that we needed enormous political will and consensus if we were to move to agreed reform. We have heard the expression of quite a number of political wills, some more enormous than others, but we have certainly not seen any consensus on either side of the House. Several hon. Members have said that they think that stage 1 will last indefinitely. Although we are not here to debate stage 1, I say in parenthesis that it is incumbent on us all to do everything that we can at least to ensure that it works for as long as it lasts, because it will be the second Chamber for the foreseeable future.

Some diverse views have been expressed. The hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Hurst) was the only unicameralist to take part in this debate, although we all know that a number of colleagues on both sides of the House share his view. My hon. Friend the Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) made an extraordinarily diverting speech. Towards the end of a most entertaining peroration, he seemed half to advocate a virtual Parliament. I do not quite know what he means by that, although we shall doubtless discover if he develops that idea in speeches and writings.

Various themes have run throughout the debate. The hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, Central said—and he said it very slowly and deliberately, and was right to do so—that we must remember that we are talking about one Parliament which has two Houses. It is impossible properly to discuss in isolation the powers, functions and composition of one House without having regard to the other House, or the effect that one has upon the other. That was the underlying theme of much of today's debate.

A number of hon. Members talked about the inadequacy of our scrutiny procedures. My hon. Friend the Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie) went so far as to call them "shoddy", but I think that we would all accept that they could definitely be improved.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham—picking up on a most admirable speech by the right hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon)—talked about the problems of holding the Executive to account. I tell the right hon. Gentleman that, if he could recast his speech into an article on how to be a Back Bencher and distribute it on both sides of the House, hon. Members would benefit greatly from it. He has great experience, and was able to demonstrate, going back as far as 30 years, how the independence of Back Benchers is crucial if one is to have an effective Executive.

A supine legislature provides for a bad Executive, and Government Back Benchers should always remember that. It is only by articulating principles and being prepared—as the hon. Member for Thurrock (Mr. Mackinlay) is so regularly prepared—to speak out that the Executive are kept on their toes. Would that more hon. Members emulated his example.

We had a particularly interesting and thoughtful speech from the former Leader of the House, my right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor). He is not an advocate of direct elections, but favours a mixed-composition House. He also expressed the very real need for improving our powers of scrutiny, particularly of secondary legislation. He talked about Henry VIII clauses, but I should tell him that I have rather rechristened them as Louis XIV clauses, as the current Government so often seem to think that "L'état c'est moi." However, their predecessor was not entirely without blemish in that regard.

My right hon. Friend the Member for South Norfolk also talked about the need to improve scrutiny of European legislation, and perhaps to re-examine the revising powers of the House of Lords and the length of time that it should have to delay legislation.

My right hon. Friend was not alone in advocating a non-elected or mixed-composition House. The hon. Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) made an extremely long speech—28 minutes—on that particular subject. My former hon. Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris)—who is still a friend, but who, in parliamentary terms, can no longer deserve the epithet of hon. Friend—also made an interesting speech on that type of House.

One has to accept, however, that the majority of speeches—particularly those made by Opposition Members—argued for either a wholly or largely directly elected House. That message was quite clear in the speeches of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham, my hon. Friend the Member for Chichester—who has written, lectured and broadcast so extensively on the subject—and my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve), who made the final Back-Bench speech in the debate. One of the themes that they all took up—as did some of those who argued for a mixed-composition House—was that, in a mixed second Chamber, it would perhaps be advisable not to have Ministers. That point was echoed on both sides of the House.

It is crucial that we should reflect carefully on what the royal commission says; study, analyse and debate its findings; and do so mindful of what has been said in the House in this debate. However, it is crucial to the future of our democracy that we should not rush to judgment, either before or immediately after the royal commission reports. We should consider, as part of our discussion process, all those views, and we have to recognise the strengths and weaknesses in every argument.

We should be honest with each other. I am of a conservative persuasion, but those of us who tend to favour the more cautious, evolutionary approach must beware of the pitfalls of patronage, which have been talked about eloquently by many of my hon. Friends and Labour Members. If there are to be appointed peers, the system of appointment must be beyond the control of party leaders, although it can never be beyond their legitimate influence.

We must recognise that there are many who believe that those arguments are deeply flawed. However, those who propose a radical solution must be aware that a wholly elected Chamber, notwithstanding any transitional stages, would sweep away those who currently serve in the other place.

Mr. Forth: That is the whole idea.

Sir Patrick Cormack: It may be, but it would not be inappropriate to say a word from the Dispatch Box in recognition of the sterling service that the life peers, like the hereditary peers, have performed over the years. It would be churlish not to recognise that there is a great reservoir of talent there: political, academic, industrial, commercial, military—you name it, it is there. To sweep it away without complete regard for what we are doing would be a serious step.

The right hon. Member for Caithness, Sutherland and Easter Ross (Mr. Maclennan)—or Easter Island, as was once said—acknowledged that some appointments might be necessary to ensure that there were some independent members. Without some such mechanism, a directly elected House would mean the end of the Cross Benchers. Such a House could also deliver greater power to the party machines than any appointment system, particularly if the elections were held with the crass system that we are to have tomorrow. It would dramatically transform relations between the Houses, leading almost inevitably to the creation of a supreme court and a written constitution. It would also create a situation in which only the Head of State was not elected.

None of those is an insuperable obstacle. All matters are open for discussion. My party has not closed its mind to the option, but we must recognise that there are serious issues to debate. We also have to consider who would seek election to such a body. If its powers remained as the White Paper envisages, there would be little incentive for those of high talent and real ability to seek election. The need to seek election and satisfy constituents would seriously reduce the time that members had for scrutiny. If we are to give United States-style senatorial powers, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst forthrightly advocates, we have to ask what we would be doing in this Chamber and what our relations would be with the other House. All those profound questions have to be addressed.

It is important not to be seduced by arguments of superficial legitimacy. What matters is the system as a whole. No one seriously suggests that, because we are a constitutional monarchy with a non-elected upper House, we are not a proper parliamentary democracy. We are, and for the best part of the past 200 years we have been held up throughout the world as an example of a true parliamentary democracy.

The hon. Member for Harlow used the old cliché about throwing out the baby with the bath water. We have to be careful that we do not demolish the bathroom as well. Out of our deliberations must come a strengthened parliamentary system. We must create two Houses in which the Executive are held properly to account and all legislation—primary, secondary, European, the lot—is thoroughly and properly scrutinised. We must be able to deliver something that is better than the current system. That is our only legitimate aim and that is my definition of legitimacy. Over the next few months, as we wait for Lord Wakeham's commission to report, I ask the House to have as broad a discussion as possible in all our parties. We must face up to the real issues involved, some of which I have tried briefly to refer to this evening.

9.45 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office (Mr. Paddy Tipping): This debate has been delayed, but it has been well worth waiting for. There have been 18 speakers and, as the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Grieve) said earlier, it has been in the nature of a discussion. I have sat through almost all of it and I have learned a great deal. The discussion has helped to crystallise my thinking.

As well as discussion we have had confessions. I was struck by the confession of the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg) who told us about his life as a Whip. I welcome a sinner who repents. I turn to my colleagues and ask them to look closely at his words and to repent before midnight.

We have also had tutorials. I got slightly alarmed when my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon) was giving a coaching lesson to my hon. Friend the Member for Pendle (Mr. Prentice). My hon. Friend is certainly not a clone and giving him tips on how to offer more effective opposition was dangerous.

Anybody who thought that there would be some sort of consensus arising from the debate would have been disappointed. I was struck by the comment of my hon.

[Mr. Paddy Tipping]

Friend the Member for Leominster (Mr. Temple-Morris) who said that he hoped the commission would listen to our collective views. I am not sure what our collective views are. Different people have expressed different views. We have heard from unicameralists, those who want an elected second Chamber, those who want an appointed second Chamber and those who want a mixed second Chamber. There has been talk about people being elected to represent communities of interest and that there should be functional representatives and representatives from different parts of the United Kingdom. There has been a good deal of talk, highlighted by the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack), that the second Chamber should not include Ministers but should have a purely scrutinising and revising role.

What has struck me most about the debate is how self-critical it has been. Hon. Members from both sides of the House have expressed a real desire to check the role of the Executive and to scrutinise legislation more closely. No one has been partisan about that as the views have been expressed on both sides of the Chamber. There has been an understanding that the situation has prevailed for many years and I sensed tonight a real desire for change.

In part answer to the criticism, my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne and the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) told us to look to ourselves and to use our existing devices and powers to achieve our aim, but other steps can be taken, too. The right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) mentioned pre-legislative scrutiny. I am delighted that that is beginning to happen and that draft Bills are being considered by Select Committees and Special Standing Committees involving Members from both Chambers.

I was struck by the comment of the hon. Member for Faversham and Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) who, as well as talking about information technology and Members pushing buttons, made a telling point about what his constituents want from him. They want to ensure that the services delivered by the Government and their agencies—as he put it—make things better. After all, government is about making things better. The hon. Gentleman also drew attention to the need for Parliament to discuss the issues of the day—not simply to resolve them, but to highlight them and give them air. There is a wider point here. We need to develop the role of the House to consider and check what has been done and how far what has been promised has been achieved. At the moment, we are not particularly good at that.

A number of hon. Members drew attention to the democratic deficit and the desire for closer scrutiny which can be achieved only by increasing powers to the second Chamber. Let me reinforce a point that has been made several times within the debate: we need to look at the powers available to the House of Lords and the powers that are actually used. I believe that that reform will give us an opportunity to codify that and put practices and traditions on a better footing. A reformed upper House will have new confidence. The sign of a good relationship is the ability to fall out but still continue to talk. Reform will give us the opportunity to do just that.

Some have argued for new and increased powers for the second Chamber. However, a more sophisticated and persuasive argument would press the case for different and complementary powers for the second Chamber. A number of suggestions have been made as to what they should be and I anticipate that the royal commission will look at them closely.

It is significant that we are having this debate at all and that we are having it now. Its tone shows that change will happen. The House of Lords Reform Bill is making progress in the upper House. I followed its Committee stage with interest—all seven and a half days of it and all 180 amendments. Its Report stage starts next week. Some of the issues that the House of Lords will be considering have been raised tonight. They include the powers of the House of Lords and its relationship with the Commons, the status of any appointments committee, the size of a reformed House of Lords and the arrangements to govern the relative strengths of the parties within it.

Let me stir it up, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cannock Chase (Dr. Wright) said earlier. His neighbour, the hon. Member for South Staffordshire (Sir P. Cormack) said, "We would not have started from here". Some of us would reply, "You would not have started at all". We need only look back at the Conservative party campaign guide, the Conservative manifesto and in particular the views expressed by the chairman of the party in his submission to the royal commission last month. He said:

"We did not seek to change the House of Lords", but the debate has moved forward.

I read the Mackay report and I found it thoughtful and temperate in its approach. It said that many of the powers currently exercised by the House of Lords should be maintained, but that it should not be given any greater powers. I noted that it stressed the primacy of the House of Commons.

We have not had an opportunity to discuss in detail the submission by the Conservative party to the royal commission. The hon. Member for Woodspring (Dr. Fox) invited us to get a copy. I tried and it was extremely difficult. I asked for a copy from Conservative Central Office. We wrote and begged for one and it did not come, but today we managed to get a copy of "A Stronger Parliament". Let me refer to some of its contents. The Conservatives wanted at least a directly elected element. They were not attracted to indirect representation from the Scottish Parliament or the Welsh Assembly. They wanted increasing powers over secondary legislation, no age limit, no quotas, an opening size of around 659 members and a kind of monthly question time. Some of the things in that submission appear to be in contrast to what the noble Lord Mackay has said.

I wish to stress something that my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House said. We are committed to ensuring that no party has an overall majority in the upper Chamber. I do not accept the disparaging remarks of Opposition Members on either that commitment or on the appointments commission. For the first time ever, we have a Prime Minister who is giving up powers. [Interruption.] Conservative Members may scoff, but I have looked carefully at the appointments made by previous Conservative Prime Ministers, which deserve scrutiny. The royal commission will examine closely the need for parity of parties and the work of the appointments commission.

Along with the right hon. Member for South Norfolk (Mr. MacGregor) and the hon. Member for Chichester (Mr. Tyrie), I have been impressed with the start that the royal commission has made. During the debates, there has been criticism of the timetable. The royal commission has been given a tight timetable—I acknowledge that. Nevertheless, we expect its report around the end of the year. I have been impressed by the commission's desire to gain views from outside the magic political circle. It published a consultation paper which set out the questions that the commission thought needed to be addressed as part of its evidence-gathering. It is available on a web site.

In addition, the commission has been out on the road. I understand that these events have been positively received, despite what some newspaper reports have said about poor attendance. Those who attended felt that it was worth while and that their views were listened to properly. The road shows received extensive coverage in the local media. I was particularly impressed by a double-page spread in the Peterborough Evening Telegraph on 25 May. Not only was the coverage extensive, it was thoughtful, informative and spread the debate to a much wider audience. All of that bodes well for the royal commission's report, which I look forward to reading at the end of the year.

The House of Lords Bill has proved the trigger for change, and I hope and expect that the Bill will complete all its stages shortly. The two-stage approach will prove to be manageable and successful. It is, after all, in our long tradition of gradual change. Some have argued for a big bang approach. However, a manageable approach, taken in stages, will prove to be correct. After a century of debate, we will be able to deliver the goods.

The debate tonight has looked further forward, and I hope that the royal commission will take note of the views expressed. It has a tough timetable to meet, but let me point out to doubters on both sides of the House that the tough timetable is an indication of the Government's good faith and of our intention to seek a proper and fundamental reform of the House of Lords. It is also clear evidence of our desire that, after more than a century of debate, this time that will be achieved.

I conclude with some words from the White Paper, as set out in the executive summary. The commission is "being asked to report by the end of 1999, to enable the Government to make every effort to ensure that the second stage of reform has been approved by Parliament by the time of the general election."

That remains our firm intention.

It being Ten o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Kosovo

10 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): I come to the House with some important and welcome news about the situation in Kosovo. At the end of many long and hard hours of discussion and negotiation, General Sir Michael Jackson has announced that he has signed the military technical agreement on behalf of NATO, setting out the detailed conditions for peace in the light of the draft United Nations Security Council resolution.

The agreement sets out in detail how all the Serb forces should conduct a phased, verifiable and orderly withdrawal from Kosovo. It provides, as General Jackson has made clear, an agreed basis for the deployment of an international security force, known as KFOR, to establish a secure environment in Kosovo.

The House will appreciate that this agreement is a major political and military vindication of NATO's policy, of its resolve and of its determination to end the horrific ethnic cleansing conducted by Milosevic and his troops and regime. It will pave the way for the eventual return of the refugees.

We expect that the United Nations Security Council resolution will be passed shortly and that the necessary measures will all be in place for the rapid deployment of KFOR, but I must warn the House that we have been misled by Milosevic before. We have learned not to trust his words and we will need to see his troops on the way out of Kosovo. We will want to see verifiable compliance with the terms of the agreement before allowing NATO to suspend the bombing campaign.

That is up to Milosevic. For our part, we look forward to being able to move to the next and very demanding stage and to the enormous challenges that lie ahead. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made clear, there is now a huge job to be done as the Serb forces go out, the international force goes in and we get the refugees home. We are ready for that task and British forces will be among the first to cross the border into Kosovo. All the House will, I am sure, be proud of that effort and join me in wishing them and their NATO allies every success in the difficult weeks and months ahead.

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon): The whole House will be delighted with that news, and we are very grateful to the Secretary of State for coming here tonight to make his statement. This is obviously a major step on the road from war to peace, although, as he said, there are an awful lot of problems still to be overcome.

The talks were obviously extremely difficult and our thanks are due to General Jackson and his staff. Were any concessions made in the course of the talks? Press reports say that the Serbs are being given longer to withdraw than the seven days originally planned. Will that delay the deployment of KFOR, and is there a possibility that both KFOR and the Yugoslav army will be in Kosovo at the same time? Does that present any difficulties? It is also reported that the buffer zone has been reduced from 25 to 5 km. Is that significant to the security of KFOR?

What timing does the Secretary of State expect on the UN Security Council resolution? He said that he hoped that it would be passed soon, but, as I understand it—perhaps he can confirm this—KFOR cannot be deployed into Kosovo until it has been passed and the sequence would be: Serb withdrawal; cessation of bombing; UN Security Council resolution; and then the deployment of KFOR. We would all like to know that KFOR was in a position to deploy as soon as possible. Does he anticipate any difficulties about China's vote in the UN Security Council?

[Mr. John Maples]

We all understand that the crucial test of success in the operation is the refugees being able to return to their homes, and the crucial ingredient in that is the composition of KFOR. Is there any significance in the fact that a footnote to the terms agreed on 3 June by Ahtisaari and the Serb Government spoke of KFOR having

"NATO at its core"

and a

"unified chain of command under the political direction of the North Atlantic Council"

but that the UN Security Council draft resolution does not go as far as that and mentions NATO only in an annexe referring to "substantial NATO participation"?

I know that such negotiations are difficult and the wording does not always say exactly what will happen, but we would like to feel sure that the force will be able to do its job, because, if it cannot, the refugees will not go home and we will not have succeeded in what the Government and all of us have set out to achieve.

Will the Secretary of State say a word about whether Russian troops will participate in KFOR? It has been said that they will not be under NATO command, but it is important to ensure that Russia does not get a zone of occupation in Kosovo and Russian troops are spread around, as they are in Bosnia.

The difficulties for KFOR, its British component and General Jackson are only just beginning. They have all been sitting waiting for this moment for several months—all of them for several weeks, and General Jackson for several months. I am sure that the whole House wishes them every good fortune in the operations that they are about to undertake.

Mr. Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his opening comments about the efforts that have led to this evening's news, and especially for his praise for General Mike Jackson. I was with General Jackson yesterday in Macedonia, and I know how much he appreciates the support given by so many people in this country, and on both sides of the House. The hon. Gentleman and I, with other Opposition Members, have visited some of our troops in action, and that in itself was a solid illustration of the way in which the British public have stayed with the campaign through all its difficult days, helping us to ensure that we get the refugees back home, and that the strategic threat that Milosevic represents not only to Kosovo but to the wider Balkans, has, as I hope, been seen off.

The hon. Gentleman asked several detailed questions, but he will appreciate that there are many of them that I cannot answer. I have come to report to the House, as I thought proper, at the earliest opportunity, and we have not had the opportunity to see all the technical details.

However, the hon. Gentleman can take it from me, and from his own instincts, that General Mike Jackson would not have agreed to any conditions in the military technical agreement that he thought would obstruct his work in getting KFOR in safely and securely to go about its job. Some of the technical questions about timing will be fixed in the agreement, which will have realistically laid down, in a verifiable way, times when all the Serb forces will leave Kosovo.

One of the reasons for the delay in the discussions in the now famous tent was the need to ensure that there would be no security vacuum in Kosovo, and the Serb withdrawal would be synchronised with KFOR's entry. I am sure that we will be satisfied with those provisions.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the timing of the United Nations Security Council resolutions and the like. I am told that the North Atlantic Council, to which the military technical agreement will go, is in session as we speak, and it is possible that the UN Security Council will also meet soon, perhaps even before dawn, so that, simultaneously, each of the features of the agreement—the Ahtisaari-Chernomyrdin agreement, the draft Security Council resolution and the technical military agreement—can all work together to ensure that movement can be as quick as possible.

The hon. Gentleman also asked me about a unified chain of command. I can assure him that General Jackson, who signed the military technical agreement tonight as commander of KFOR on behalf of NATO, is under no illusions, and neither are the Serbs, about his role and the way in which he will go about his business.

I cannot answer questions about the role of the Russians, but we all hope that they and the other nations will find a peacekeeping role inside Kosovo. That will be done in the best and most effective way possible. I must correct the hon. Gentleman, in that the Russians who are working with us in Bosnia are not scattered throughout the country; they operate within the structures and they have their own particular structures, which have worked well in the past. They are in one zone in one of the multinational divisions in Bosnia. However, that does not determine the way in which things will happen in future.

At the end of his question, the hon. Gentleman rightly commended our troops for what they have done. I also commend the Royal Air Force, the Royal Navy and the civilian back-up in the Ministry of Defence—people who have done a great deal here. I also commend the other elements inside the Government machine—the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who has played such a distinguished role in the past few days in securing the draft Security Council resolution, and all those in the Foreign Office, the Cabinet Office and No. 10 who have contributed to ensuring that we reached this position.

I repeat what I said before: despite all the difficulties, traumas and pain involved, the task of the past 75 days may have been the easier part of the job. A difficult job is ahead of us now which will require the same unity of purpose in the alliance and the same grim determination that has seen us through all these days. We must make sure that we deliver on the promise that we all gave—to get the Kosovo refugees back to their homeland again.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): The announcement by the Secretary of State is a credit to all those responsible for these matters over the past 75 days, and in particular to General Sir Mike Jackson. Anyone who has ever met him will know that those facing him across the negotiating table faced a very formidable adversary indeed.

Does the Secretary of State understand that, even for those who supported the Government, tonight is an occasion not for triumphalism so much as for relief? As he rightly pointed out, many of the past 78 days have been difficult. Would we not be right to be cautious about the tasks that lie ahead, not least because we have little idea of what NATO forces may find when they penetrate into Kosovo? Apart from the risks posed by booby traps and the indiscriminate use of mines, is it not also possible that untold horrors of brutality remain to be uncovered?

In that regard, will the Secretary of State assure the House that British forces, and the NATO forces in general, will be assiduous in collecting evidence so that those who ought to face the war crimes tribunal in The Hague may be indicted in due course?

Finally, the Secretary of State will be aware that some individual members of the minority community of people of Serbian extraction have displayed conspicuous bravery in attempting to aid their neighbours against those seeking to ethnically cleanse the country in which they lived. Does that not argue very strongly for a clear statement by NATO and the United Nations that any forces deployed in Kosovo will act in an even-handed manner, so that the policy and principles of non-discrimination can be part of the rebuilding of Kosovo?

Mr. Robertson: I thank the right hon. and learned Gentleman for what he has said just now and for his consistent support throughout all the weeks of this campaign. He is right to pay credit to General Jackson. Anyone who has met him—that now includes the Serb generals—is in no doubt about his commitment, determination, skill, clarity and power. The other night, I mentioned to a large number of troops from Britain and other nations that I was very glad to be his boss and not his subordinate. No man is better suited to dealing with the situation that now exists.

I feel no sense of euphoria this evening, and neither do any of the troops or any of the staff in my Department. Yes, there is a cautious relief at what we have got this evening, but there is also, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman noted, an apprehension about what our troops may find in Kosovo. That apprehension arises in part from the physical dangers that the troops may encounter, but our troops are professionally trained to deal with them. However, it stems also from the horrors of the ethnic cleansing that began some time last year.

In regard to those who have committed crimes against humanity, I can tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that we will be resolute in tracking them down. Where we find relevant evidence as the troops go in, we will make sure that the investigators from the international criminal tribunal get access to it before it can be destroyed. Indeed, section 14 of the draft security council resolution demands

"full co-operation of all concerned, including the international security presence, with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia."

The UN has imposed that obligation on all its members.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman made a v[illegible]id point about those Serbs who had the courage, decency and bravery to speak out during the campaign against the way in which the Milosevic regime was conducting itself. I hope that the people of Yugoslavia will look to those people for a clear future once Milosevic has gone. Ten per cent. of the population of Kosovo is of Serb extraction. When General Jackson spoke outside that tent in Kumanovo about the even-handedness with which he will do his job, he spoke directly to those people, who have a right to their homeland. If they have acted decently during the campaign, they have every right to stay there and to be treated properly as part of the community. General Jackson will take on that obligation with great pleasure.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): While we welcome the statement, those of us who supported the Government's actions consistently during the past 10 weeks must emphasise that we fully regret every bomb that was dropped and every death that has occurred, as does the Prime Minister. Milosevic, the butcher of his own people in Bosnia and Kosovo, left us no alternative but to take action to end unacceptable ethnic cleansing. Should we ensure that the United Nations and the European Union concentrate on overcoming the major problems that we will find when we enter Kosovo and Yugoslavia? There are problems throughout the region, including in Albania, Romania and Bulgaria, which have been economically weakened by the struggles of the past few weeks.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend speaks wisely in pointing out that we regret that we had to resort to force. The intransigence of Milosevic, the way in which he conducts his business and the violence with which he has conducted the campaign left us no alternative but to act both for humanitarian reasons, to save the people who were at threat, and for strategic reasons. Milosevic would not have stopped at Kosovo. Vojvodina would have been next and Montenegro after that. Who knows where would have been next—Romania, Bulgaria, Macedonia or Albania? That is why British and NATO troops have been engaged. My hon. Friend was right to draw attention to the commitments that the international community will have to take on. In particular, Europe must rebuild that part of the Balkans and seek greater security for everyone who lives in that troubled part of the world.

Sir John Stanley (Tonbridge and Malling): Will the number of Serbian troops and paramilitary police who will eventually be allowed back into Kosovo still be measured only in the hundreds?

Mr. Robertson: Yes.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Who will be responsible for civil administration in Kosovo?

The Prime Minister said yesterday that the administration would be guaranteed by the international community, but who will take the responsibility in the coming days?

Given that one of the most difficult problems facing any forces is to distinguish between guerrillas and civilians, how will we disarm the Kosovo Liberation Army both inside and outside Kosovo?

On ethnic cleansing, will measures be taken to protect the 100,000 members of the Serb community, most of whom are innocent and will face the danger of ethnic cleansing? Will any protection be given to the holy places, particularly the monastery of Decani?

[Mr. Tam Dalyell]

Finally, as a matter of urgency, will my right hon. Friend set up a radiological survey following the use of depleted uranium munitions by NATO and a further survey of the dioxin poisons in the Danube and elsewhere? Such surveys are very urgent.

Mr. Robertson: But not nearly as urgent as getting back all the people evicted from their homeland. That is our priority. Although several of those matters will have to be treated, they will be handled with their due priority. The answer to my hon. Friend's first question about the civil administration is detailed in paragraph 10 of the draft United Nations Security Council resolution. In the first few days, it is clear that the commander of KFOR will be responsible for law and order until the Secretary-General has appointed an international civil presence in accordance with paragraph 10.

My hon. Friend asked about the disarmament of the KLA. Paragraph 9(b) of the draft resolution calls for the "demilitarisation of the Kosovo Liberation Army (KLA) and other armed Kosovo Albanian groups as required in paragraph 15".

The leaders of the KLA have been on television almost as often as my hon. Friend to make it clear that they, too, will comply with the provisions of the UN Security Council resolution.

My hon. Friend asked about the Serb community inside Kosovo, which I mentioned specifically. It will be another obligation on KFOR in the initial stages, and ultimately the international civil authority, to ensure that all the citizens of Kosovo, whatever their ethnic background, are protected from violence. The holy places will be protected under another provision of the international treaty by the troops who be allowed to return in small numbers for that specific task.

On the environmental impact, certain aspects of Yugoslav life will be affected by the bombing. It was all completely unnecessary. The bombing need not have taken place. Force need not have been used if Milosevic had recognised that the international community would not stand back and watch him butcher people because they happened to be of Albanian extraction.

Sir Peter Emery (East Devon): Will the Secretary of State accept that not only Front Benchers but Back Benchers wish to praise the work of our troops and of all the NATO troops, especially the Americans, who are not often mentioned but who played such a major role? To put party politics to one side, it is fair to say that one man much enhanced his reputation by being so firm and definite: the Secretary of State for Defence.

Has the Secretary of State heard the statements made in the past 90 minutes by the Serb generals? They are saying that they signed the peace treaty to end the war and implement Milosevic's plans for peace. I have never heard such false nonsense, but that is what is going to be put over.

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): Alastair Campbell.

Sir Peter Emery: The point is not missed.

Will the Secretary of State ensure that the Serb people realise that this agreement could have been accepted by Milosevic months ago, even last October, without the loss of life and terrible damage to property caused by the bombing?

Mr. Robertson: With due modesty, I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his courteous comments. I take them as praise for the Department that I have the privilege to lead and for the troops out there on the front line. He is right to commend the United States of America, without which we could not have assembled the air armada, with its precision weaponry, which has brought us to this point and ended the conflict.

My memory is gradually coming back. We cannot all have omnibus memories and I realise that, in my earlier praise, I missed out the Department for International Development. Given the sheer scale of the challenge faced by all of us when the refugees came across the border, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development and the officials in her Department acted heroically to ensure that people were treated well.

The right hon. Gentleman mentioned Serb propaganda. I fear that many people who should have known better listened to the lies told by Milosevic and were taken in by those lies for all too long. I am glad that, eventually, the damage done to the military machine persuaded some people that perhaps they should have considered the truth for a moment. When the truth comes out, many decent people in Serbia will curl up in shame.

Ms Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): That cautious relief referred to by my right hon. Friend at the beginning of his statement is felt not only by Members of the House and by the people of Britain, but by the Kosovan refugees, some of whom have been welcomed to many of our constituencies. The unity of purpose of which he spoke, and which has also been expressed by the shadow Secretary of State for Defence during the past few weeks, must be expressed by all Members of the House. If it is not so done, those in Belgrade will take great succour.

Mr. Robertson: The House speaks with one voice. Milosevic cannot misunderstand the message: the relief that a mission, started with great reluctance, will end, we hope, with the refugees going back to their homes. My hon. Friend is right to point out that many people in this country took to their hearts and to their local communities the refugees from Kosovo, who came so far away from their own homes. Their stories, their personalities and their plight touched the hearts of millions of people throughout the continent and throughout the world. That in itself kept the drive going to ensure that Milosevic did not get away with making them refugees for ever.

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): The Secretary of State will recall that I consistently supported the use of military action from the earliest stages of this crisis. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman and his fellow Ministers on their steadiness under political fire. Does he agree that those of us who were concerned about the over-reliance on air power alone may not have been proven wholly wrong, in that what was crucial to the resolution of the crisis—as well as the proper use of air power in context—was the success of our diplomacy in bringing the Russians on side and the threat, which was becoming much clearer, that ground forces would be used if Milosevic did not comply?

Mr. Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for what he rightly says was his consistent support for our efforts. That has been carefully noticed by the public; their consistent support has also been absolutely essential. This evening of all evenings, I do not want to debate the ins and outs of what led us to this point. It was a combination of a series of factors, but, more than any of them, it was the commitment, resolution and unity of an alliance of free nations standing together against an unconscionable evil in our continent. That, if anything, was what led to the success of tonight.

Dr. Lynne Jones (Birmingham, Selly Oak): I share my right hon. Friend's wish that the refugees will soon be able to go home. Will he assure the House that every possible assistance will be given to them and to other innocent victims of the war to rebuild their lives? Looking further into the future, has not the conflict in Kosovo highlighted the contradiction between the United Nations charter, with its emphasis on national sovereignty, and international law on human rights? Will the Government set themselves the task of securing international agreement on criteria that, if met, would make it appropriate to undertake international military intervention for humanitarian purposes?

Mr. Robertson: Providing assistance in rebuilding Kosovo and other parts of the Balkans will be a heavy burden on all of us in this and every other country of our continent, but we must do it, because we must not allow Milosevic to get away with the damage that he has done to the community there. Some of the British troops I met yesterday were Royal Engineers, and I was able personally to praise them for their work to create the refugee villages. If people can remember that far back, take the scene on Easter weekend of the ocean of human misery on the border between Macedonia and Kosovo; in 36 hours, those troops created towns in which people had habitation, shelter and food.

My hon. Friend makes an important and significant point about the limits of national sovereignty and the way in which the UN charter appeared until now to countenance the idea that anything went, as long as it happened within the national boundaries of any one country. We have shown that the international community has a bigger conscience and a bigger sense of responsibility than that implies. I dare say that, in the great debates that will take place after the refugees have gone back to their homes, that is one of the issues that will have to be addressed.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I commend the Secretary of State on the role that he has played in the conflict over the past 75 days. I believe that all of our armed services are the most professional in the world, and they have shown themselves to be so in the way in which they have tackled serious difficulties.

However, does the Secretary of State believe that we should be concerned, given that one of the news tapes I read earlier this evening indicated that NATO had watered down several key conditions in order to get agreement with the Yugoslav generals more quickly than would otherwise have been the case? Does the right hon. Gentleman feel that watering down those key conditions might undermine the chances of there being a lasting peace and a stable Yugoslavia?

Mr. Robertson: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his commendation, but I am only one member of a Government who took on this commitment with the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, who is in Cologne tonight, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for International Development have, with my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, played key roles in a team that set out to establish the rule of international law and order, and we had the support of hon. Members on both sides of the House for our action.

The hon. Gentleman is right to say that we have what we consider to be the best troops in the world. That is why the strategic defence review was specifically designed to ensure that, in future and if the country wanted us to, we would be able to do the right thing when there was a humanitarian challenge and a threat to the security of our continent.

None of the conditions that we sought has been watered down. The conditions laid down by NATO at the very beginning—the withdrawal of all Serb troops and paramilitaries; the return of the refugees; the insertion of an international security force; and a political process to take place to secure a future for the people of the region—have all been satisfied by and enshrined in the various agreements of the past few days. The hon. Gentleman should ask himself whether if the conditions had been watered down to the extent our troops might have been endangered, it is likely that General Jackson would have signed up to any agreement.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): The Secretary of State is right to sound a note of caution, for until the Serbian slaughter machine is out of Kosovo and the great majority of the people of Kosovo have returned to their shattered homes and villages, there is no cause for congratulation. Nevertheless, I offer my thanks to the Secretary of State and his colleagues.

Those of us who have called for the protection of the Albanian majority in Kosovo now call with equal passion for the protection of the Serbian minority. One of the major aims of the peacekeeping force has to be to protect the innocent and decent people of Serbia in Kosovo from any action against them.

Our resolution on war crimes would be put into good effect if within days or weeks Karadzic and Mladic in Bosnia were arrested and brought before the International War Crimes Tribunal. For too long, those mass murderers have been allowed to go free, often passing the peacekeeping forces daily.

At some stage, this Parliament must take stock of the lessons of Yugoslavia. Five or six years ago, the majority on both sides of the House was in favour of appeasement. It would be absurd if we did not remember that tonight. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues, including my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, were right in recent weeks to ignore those on both sides of the House who called for appeasement. If those right hon. and hon. Members, and they know who they are, had been heeded, the killing of young men would have continued, as would the burning of homes, the rape of young women and girls and the terrible treatment of elders in Kosovo. Those right hon. and hon. Members will soon have to account for what they urged the Government to do. I am thrilled and excited that the Government did the right thing.

[Mr. Malcolm Wicks]

Mr. Robertson: Doing the right thing is what we are all about. Some will always disagree, but we live in a democracy. I just wish that people in Yugoslavia had been able to speak out in the way that Members of this House can, without any punishment. They may be criticised, but there has been much criticism in the past few weeks of those of us who took a stand that did not always look as good as it has in the past few days. The consistency and unity that have been the hallmarks of NATO have been an example to all.

My hon. Friend mentioned the protection of the Serb minority and General Jackson made it clear this evening that he will act even-handedly. It is imperative that that message goes out to the Serb minority. We are not in the business of ethnic cleansing, even after the trials and tribulations of the majority population. If we are to recreate a decent society, it must be with all those who call it their homeland being able to live there also.

On war crimes and those who have been indicted for them, I remind my hon. Friend that on Monday British troops acting with the stabilisation force in Bosnia apprehended in Prijedor a man who was indicted for being a shift commander at a concentration camp only a few years ago in Bosnia. He is now, like so many others that we have picked up, in The Hague facing international justice. Eventually, the day will come when all those mentioned by my hon. Friend and others will face the same justice.

Mr. Douglas Hogg (Sleaford and North Hykeham): The right hon. Gentleman will know that I am one of those who have been critical of the United Kingdom's involvement in the war. That notwithstanding, will he accept my personal congratulations to him on the way in which he has discharged the burdens of his office? Looking forward, what are his planning assumptions about the United Kingdom's contributions to KFOR? How many troops, how long will they be deployed and what planning assumptions have been made about cost? What are the likely consequences of a substantial deployment on our ability to mount another operation, for example in north Iraq, and what will be the impact of the cost on other defence objectives, for example the naval modernisation programme?

Mr. Robertson: I recognise that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has dissented honourably during the conflict and it is decent of him to say what he said. Others will reflect on the criticisms that they expressed and the forecasts and prophecies they made about what would happen. However, with the greatest respect to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, I do not think that our exchange this evening, based on breaking news at 9 o'clock in the evening, is the time to go into all those details. I encourage him to come back to the House tomorrow afternoon for the debate on defence in the world which will start after business questions, when I will deal with those and many other subjects.

Mr. Malcolm Savidge (Aberdeen, North): May I congratulate the Secretary of State and the Government on the critical role that they have played in achieving this result? Does my right hon. Friend believe that, although the situation may remain difficult and dangerous, there are grounds for cautious optimism that we can end this terrible tragedy and bring security to the people of Kosovo and stability to the Balkans?

Mr. Robertson: I thank my hon. Friend for those comments, and I recall the memorable speech that he made in one of our many debates on this subject. We must look forward, but cautious optimism is all that we should feel at present. There are many tasks ahead.

Mr. Andrew Tyrie (Chichester): I should like to take the Secretary of State forward a few weeks. If, after the deployment of troops by the west and Russia, there is a relapse in Milosevic's commitment to the agreement, does the Secretary of State think it is feasible that, with Russian troops on the ground, bombing could be resumed in order to secure Milosevic's compliance? Have there been any discussions with the Russians to deal with such an eventuality? If such negotiations have not taken place, is there not a risk that the Russians could acquire an effective veto on further action to secure Milosevic's compliance?

Mr. Robertson: If there are Russian troops on the ground, British troops will also be on the ground. British, Russian and troops from other NATO countries will be on the ground because the Serbs have withdrawn. As General Jackson made absolutely clear tonight, where appropriate, the air assault could take place over Yugoslavia where much attention has been paid in recent times. That is not being bloodthirsty or bloodcurdling, and I do not seek to humiliate Serbia. However, the Serbs must recognise that they have signed an agreement and that the sanction remains that brought them to the negotiating table in the first place.

Perhaps those who want to talk about Russian vetoes should look carefully at the role played by the Russians in recent days. Mr. Ivanov, the Russian Foreign Minister, was there when we secured the first G8 statement; Mr. Chernomyrdin was instrumental in securing the Belgrade agreement; and Mr. Ivanov was also involved in obtaining the draft Security Council resolution yesterday. I pay a tribute this evening to the Russians and the role that they have played in bringing peace to the Balkans. That is a great indication of how the east and the west can co-operate to ensure that we live in a much safer, more stable and more civilised world.

Fiona Mactaggart (Slough): Like most other hon. Members, I begin by congratulating the Secretary of State and all those who have been involved in this process. I look forward to an outcome about which I think all hon. Members are united: the return of the refugees. Is the Secretary of State confident that, as well as the military arrangements to secure Kosovo, there are sufficient arrangements to ensure that the refugees know what is happening? I bet that that group of people is not cautiously optimistic but desperate, over-excited, frightened and worried about whether other villagers will return before they do. Communication with refugees in the camps will be crucial in managing the process and making it work. I seek my right hon. Friend's assurance that the processes will be in place to achieve that objective.

Mr. Robertson: My hon. Friend makes a very important point. I agree that we must keep the refugees informed. We have taken this action on their behalf, but that does not mean that they do not have a role to play. We made the refugees a promise—personally and collectively—that we would get them home, and some will be desperate to return, even though they know that the circumstances may be dire and dangerous. I know that it is high on General Jackson's agenda to ensure that communication is right and proper and that people know what is happening. It will take a lot of energy on the part of the international community to ensure that all the interlocking factors work together so that we can get the refugees back home—if we can, before the winter sets in.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): May I say to the Secretary of State that we particularly appreciate his coming to the House tonight at this late hour to make a statement and take questions? Perhaps some of his colleagues could follow his example. It is fair to say that throughout this conflict he has always sought to keep the House informed, which is appreciated.

The right hon. Gentleman is right to be cautious about what lies ahead and to pay tribute to our forces on the ground, particularly General Sir Mike Jackson. I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman would agree that they face an extremely risky undertaking with land mines having been indiscriminately planted and other possible problems with the Kosovo Liberation Army or dissident forces thereof.

Although the Secretary of State was unable to answer the point made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham (Mr. Hogg), and rightly drew attention to tomorrow's debate, he must have had some idea, in the run-up to the agreement, about whether he would need to deploy extra forces. Does he intend to call up Territorial Army reservists? Can he give us an idea of how long he expects our forces to stay out there, given that, for example, some of 5 Airborne Brigade and the 1st Battalion of the Parachute Regiment, which are based in Aldershot, have been on extensive training and other missions and would like to know for how long they are likely to be away?

Mr. Robertson: I say to the hon. Gentleman that there is nobody in the Ministry of Defence who considers 10.46 pm to be late at night, but it is nice to see him here at this late hour. I know that his questions about the Parachute Regiment have absolutely nothing to do with his being the Member for Aldershot. I spoke yesterday to the men of 1 Para and their distinguished commanding officer, Colonel Paul Gibson, at their training camp. They are absolutely raring to go and to do the job for which they have been training so extensively. Yes, that will be risky and dangerous, as I made clear. The men know that and they are trained to deal with such a situation.

By the end of this week, we shall have about 13,000 British troops in Macedonia, ready to go in when General Jackson gives the call. Large numbers of German and French troops are already there. More German, French and Canadian troops are about to land in Greece to go up into Macedonia. The United States marine expeditionary unit is also on its way and will be in theatre.

I cannot say how long people will be there. I cannot say what they will see, and I do not know what they will find when they cross the border into Kosovo. They will do their job and they will come back home as quickly as they can. Those who serve with the allied rapid reaction corps HQ are, of course, usually deployed for six months. Presumably, the clock will start ticking on that six months when the accord is passed, if it is passed, by the North Atlantic Council. Those men will be looking forward to that period of deployment being over, but, at the moment, they look forward to an engagement that will take all the skills, resolution and guts that they so legendarily have.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): May I take the Secretary of State back to a comment about the regular reserve and the Territorial Army? Clearly, policing and preserving the peace will require the support and services of many men and women. It will almost certainly require the support of members of the regular reserve and the TA, particularly those with specialist trades and skills. Many of those men and women have already given six months' voluntary service in Bosnia. Against that background, will the Secretary of State assure the House that if he calls on members of the TA to serve in Kosovo, he will use his powers under the Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment) Act 1985 to ensure that their occupations and pensions are protected while they are serving in this endeavour?

Mr. Robertson: I pay tribute to the hon. Gentleman's connection with the Territorial Army. We are very conscious of our responsibilities for the regular reserve and the TA. Some 10 per cent. of our forces in Bosnia come from the TA. If we need to deploy reserves and the TA to Kosovo—although that decision will ultimately be mine, the recommendation will come from the forces—we shall bear all the relevant factors very much in mind.

Mr. Christopher Fraser (Mid-Dorset and North Poole): In the light of this new situation, has the Prime Minister flown out to Kumanovo in Macedonia? If he has not, does he intend to do so?

Mr. Robertson: I was out in Macedonia yesterday. Frankly, the last thing that they need out there are more VIPs descending on them. We can quite effectively send our good wishes to them—and we have, and we will. I know the presence of the Prime Minister in Macedonia was deeply appreciated and had a huge morale-boosting effect not just our troops but on the refugees whom he met. I have gone on a number of visits during this conflict, and—I think—for the very first time in any conflict in which our troops have been engaged, I took Opposition Front Benchers to ensure that our troops knew that not just the Government but the people of this country supported them.

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): I am sure that the Secretary of State agrees that the widely felt relief has special significance in garrison towns. I follow the comments of the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth) in saying that there are already troops from Colchester garrison in Macedonia. Indeed, I understand that several hundred more will be going. Does the Secretary of State agree that overstretch will be even more critical? If the short term becomes the long term, as it did in Bosnia, is there not a strong case for encouraging more of our European allies to relieve the pressures in Bosnia, so that British troops are not overstretched throughout the Balkans?

[Mr. Bob Russell]

Mr. Robertson: Yes is the answer. We will ensure that all the European countries involved make a contribution. That is why I pay tribute to all those who have been engaged: the American pilots who have flown two thirds of the planes in the air campaign, the large number of NATO European ships in the naval presence and the thousands of European troops. They all have a role to play. The hon. Gentleman's presence as the representative of a garrison town reminds me to do one thing that I should have done a long time ago: pay a tribute to the families of the service personnel involved, who sit at home, worrying and concerned. They are making a huge contribution and a great sacrifice on behalf of the country. They are all hugely important. We think of them all the time. They are very much part and parcel of whatever policy we have for the armed forces.

NORTHERN IRELAND GRAND COMMITTEE

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 116 (Northern Ireland Grand Committee (sittings)),

That—

(1) the matter of the consultation document 'Life Long Learning—a new Learning Culture for All' be referred to the Northern Ireland Grand Committee for its consideration;

(2) at the sitting on Thursday 24th June, the Committee shall take questions for oral answer and shall then consider the matter referred to it under paragraph (1) above;

(3) at the conclusion of those proceedings, a Motion for the adjournment of the Committee may be made by a Minister of the Crown, pursuant to Standing Order No. 116(5).—[Mr. Dowd.]

Question agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE DRAFT LOCAL GOVERNMENT (FUNCTIONS AND STANDARDS) BILL

Ordered,

That Mr. Robin Corbett be discharged from the Committee on the draft Local Government (Functions and Standards) Bill and Mr. John Smith be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Dowd.]

PETITION

Health Food Products

10.53 pm

Valerie Davey (Bristol, West): As sometimes happens in this House, we go from a matter of international magnitude to one of national and local detail.

I am pleased to present the petition of the Health Food Manufacturers Association on behalf of 1,780 petitioners who live in Bristol, West and/or use one of the excellent health food stores in the constituency.

The petition declares:

Government proposals would give the Medicines Control Agency virtually unlimited powers to classify safe products as medicines. This would mean that the MCA could remove at a stroke products that are vital to the good health of many consumers and are currently sold under food law. This is an abuse of the democratic process and a denial of freedom of choice.

The Petitioners therefore request that the House of Commons urge the Department of Health to reconsider the proposals and to introduce an immediate moratorium preventing the MCA from declaring these safe products to be medicines except on the grounds of illegal claims or safety and, further, to introduce new legislation appropriate to the special needs of safe, natural health products.

And the petitioners remain, etc.

To lie upon the Table.

Media Standards

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Dowd.]

10.54 pm

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Kelvin): I must declare an interest, although I do so with some trepidation in the presence of my hon. Friend the Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting. As the Register of Members' Interests shows, I myself am a journalist—a newspaper columnist, nowadays on The Mail on Sunday and the Catholic newspaper Flourish. I hope that my hon. Friend will accept it from me that, on at least one of those newspapers, my own views are not always necessarily the views of the management.

I should start by saying what my speech is not about, for there has been some media interest in that. It is not about outlining a litany of complaints about my own experiences with the media; there is not enough time for that. Regardless, I know the way to the libel courts, and am represented by Davenport Lyons—the legendary "Sue, Grabbit and Runne" of Private Eye fame. Besides, some of those experiences are more hurtful than others.

My last close encounter with the gutter press consisted of a 6 ft-tall young Cuban mulatta, purchased by the News of the World to say—in colour, on pages 1, 2 and 3—that I was

"good looking . . . had a good body for my age . . . and did it with her five times a night under the Caribbean stars."

That is the type of slander that some of us have to put up with.

Neither is my speech about making a case against self-regulation, for Government intervention, for new legislation on privacy, or about anything like that. I am one of the very few surviving opponents of the last attempt at a privacy law—which was piloted by the least plausible advocate of such a thing, the former Member for Winchester, Mr. John Browne.

I have not changed my mind since then about the fact that there is no editor so venal that I should prefer to see a Minister—any Minister of any Government—sitting in that editor's chair, or making his or her editorial decisions. I have visited too many countries where the deadest hand on freedom is that of the censor—the Minister of Information, the proverbial "Minister for Truth"—to wish to see us go even an inch down that road.

It is, moreover, not true that the current arrangements, in the form of the Press Complaints Commission, are a failure. In fact, in the first decade of the PCC's existence, four fifths of all complaints have been resolved bilaterally between newspaper and complainant. While, of course, there can always be improvements—I have some suggestions to make in that regard—our system of self-regulation is currently being studied by many people around the world who are trying to balance the precious, indeed fundamental, freedom of the press with the need to avoid cruel and gratuitous intrusion. Tomorrow, at the Law Society, in Chancery lane, representatives of 20 press councils, from Estonia to Iceland, will be conferring on the best way of reconciling those matters, and will very much use the British experience as a suitable case for study.

Lately, several controversies have clearly generated a great deal of heat. However, there has been more heat than light. In the murk, some people have suggested changes to the self-regulatory framework which, while superficially attractive, do not really stand up to scrutiny. Some people, including noble Friends in the other place, seem to favour a "proactive PCC", which could trigger investigations itself, rather than being dependent on an alleged victim of abuse of the code making a complaint. However, that in itself could be an intrusion.

Many people—such as the comedian Harry Enfield, whose honeymoon was crudely interrupted by British tabloid paparazzi; or my hon. Friend the Member for Stevenage (Barbara Follett), whose holiday was similarly marred—despite their justifiable anger, have no wish to prolong their agony or widen the audience for their embarrassment by making a complaint. Moreover, it would clearly represent a type of double jeopardy if the PCC, acting in what it thought was the public good, were to ride unasked to their defence. Regardless, such people could well be on their way to the libel courts, or have others reasons why they do not wish to become a "proactive PCC" cause celebre.

A more engaged PCC more closely in tune with the industry and public attitudes and with a more hands-on chairman would be a good idea. I mean no disrespect to Lord Wakeham when I say that he is rather a figure from another age. Given that, among many other duties, he heads the royal commission investigating the future shape of the upper House of the British Parliament, he must be one of the country's busiest men. It would be preferable to have someone more steeped in the argot of the British press who would have more of a common and political touch, from which the standing of the PCC in the country would benefit.

There is also a case to answer in that some victims of abuse of the code are afraid to register a complaint for fear that the tabloids will vindictively pursue them. The code needs adjusting to make it clear that any such vindictive pursuit of a complainant would seriously exacerbate a newspaper's position and would be the subject of more serious sanction.

Similarly, the code needs to take account of the recidivist behaviour of some newspapers under some editors. It is surely unacceptable for breach after breach of the code to occur, with punishment no more severe than the publication of an adjudication tucked away on page 32 of the paper. The PCC should adopt a "three strikes and you're out" approach. If a newspaper was found on a second occasion in 12 months to have broken the code to which it had voluntarily subscribed, it should be required to publish the adjudication on the front page with an apology from the proprietor and the editor. If a third breach occurred within 12 months—we should remember that each editor is required in their contract of employment to comply with the code—it should be incumbent on the proprietor to dismiss the editor.

The code and the PCC are most seriously falling short of public expectation in what can loosely be described as entrapment. There are all kinds of entrapment for all kinds of purposes. Few would dispute that The Sunday Times was justified in its entrapment of Members of this House found to be accepting cash payments for asking parliamentary questions, or that The Guardian was right to deploy a cod fax to help get to the bottom of who really paid Jonathan Aitken's hotel bill at the Ritz. Not all subterfuge should be frowned on, but there must be a clear and undeniable public interest that overrides most people's natural queasiness about such tactics. Above all, there must be no active commissioning of wrong-doing that would not otherwise have taken place. As we shall see, that is by no means always the case.

[Mr. George Galloway]

I shall concentrate on one newspaper—the aforementioned News of the World—and two cases in particular. One involves a minor celebrity who is now a guest of Her Majesty's prison service. The other involves a previously unknown couple, Sue and Bob, the owners of a two-star naturist English boarding house. Many of us must have been intrigued over the years about whether the famously intrepid News of the World investigators really made their excuses and left the scenes of depravity that they were helpfully bringing to our attention. Sue and Bob, armed with audio and visual aids, answered that question, at least as far as the chief crime reporter of the News of the World, Neville Thurlbeck, was concerned. After he had plastered on a double-page spread a story entitled "The guesthouse where all rooms come with en suite pervert", he was unmasked by the couple's videotape as the pervert who badgered, begged and finally bribed Bob and Sue into allowing him to indulge in a rather pathetic act of onanism at the foot of their bed.

Despite the News of the World being caught bang to rights in that case, the PCC refused even to consider the couple's complaint in one of its most spineless failures of the decade. The presence on the board of the PCC of Mr. Phil Hall, the editor of the News of the World, scarcely persuaded those two private citizens that self-regulation would do it for them.

Even more serious is the case of the minor television actor, John Alford, from the series "London's Burning". He is currently serving a prison sentence for supplying 2g of cocaine, having been entrapped by the chief investigative editor of the News of the World, Mahzer Mahmood. Mahmood posed, as is his habit, as an Arab prince with a retinue of followers. I know some Arab princes—some are my friends—and Mahzer Mahmood is no Arab prince. He was dismissed by The Sunday Times for dishonesty and for seeking to persuade workmates to behave dishonestly in order to cover up his misdemeanours. Nevertheless, that man is given apparently unlimited budgets to trap a long succession of dupes, from the directors of Newcastle United football club to young and greedy actors such as John Alford.

Mahmood took a suite in the Savoy hotel and dressed in the clothes of a prince of Arabia. For more than two weeks, he seduced Alford, chauffeuring him around in his hired Rolls-Royce and laying before him the mirage of the riches of Croesus, which could be his just for being the prince's friend and appearing at a non-existent festival in the Gulf.

Finally, when he had Alford eating out of his hand, he popped the question and asked if Alford knew where he could get some cocaine. As Alford said in his speech from the dock, he would never have dreamed of making this transaction if his friend, the Arab prince, whom he thought was going to be the making of him, had not asked him to do so. He said, and he was surely right, that the News of the World had manufactured the crime rather than reported it. Mahmood got his story and young Alford got a jail sentence and the ruination of his professional and, who knows, even his personal life.

Surely the entrapment of people into committing offences is a matter for the criminal law and a matter for the Government to consider seriously. The law was an ass when it imprisoned John Alford, and justice was not done.

Of course, there is a great deal of hypocrisy in the press about the taking of recreational drugs. I could, if I were minded, draw the House's attention to important luminaries of the fourth estate who are no strangers to such illicit substances. There is something especially piquant about Mr. Murdoch's newspapers' resorting to these extraordinary lengths to prove that the most obscure individuals, whom they ludicrously dub as "role models", indulge themselves in this way.

Let me tell the House about Mr. Matthew Freud. I understand that he is now a successful public relations man and friend of the famous. Back in the 1980s, Mr. Freud found himself in the dog house, in front of a judge who fined him £500 and told him he was a "very foolish young man" for supplying 3.19g of a powder containing cocaine.

Mr. Murdoch, nowadays a papal knight, must have discovered the importance of penitence and redemption, at least as it affects his family. The same Mr. Freud is now the consort and live-in lover of Miss Elizabeth Murdoch who will one day inherit the very same News of the World in which princes of the press such as Mahzer Mahmood get high, laying in wait for fools whom they can entrap into supplying them with their powders.

In conclusion, I turn to the latest and arguably the greatest blunder by the tabloids—the sensational splash of seaside pictures of Sophie Rhys-Jones. That gross and tasteless act, in this case by another of Mr. Murdoch's flagships, The Sun, was a good old-fashioned story of personal betrayal, chequebook journalism and grotesque editorial misjudgment.

Far from having a melancholy ending, I believe that the humiliating climbdown by the editor of The Sun, David Yelland, was a triumph of the most important and safest form of sanction against unworthy journalism: the power of the people. The wave of angry public disapproval and the concentrated fire of the more respectable press secured quick and spectacular justice for the blameless Miss Rhys-Jones. People voting with their feet and their pockets against such journalism will always be the way of dragging the rudest red-top papers back out of the gutter.

11.11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Janet Anderson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Kelvin (Mr. Galloway) on securing tonight's debate. I note that he says that the views of the newspapers for which he writes do not always coincide with his own. He also said that he would not dwell on his own experience at the hands of the media because we did not have sufficient time. For the same reason, I will not dwell on my experience of the media.

I am not the first Minister to respond to a debate in the House on the issue and I am sure that I will not be the last. I am only sorry that there are not more members of the press present to hear tonight's important debate.

Recent behaviour of certain sections of the press has provoked concerns in the House and renewed, in some quarters, calls for greater controls on the press. I also know that many in the House are of the view that sections of the press have recently gone way beyond the spirit and the letter of the Press Complaints Commission's code of practice, and I have some sympathy with those views. However, my hon. Friend will agree that we must avoid knee-jerk responses. As we have all too often seen in the past, such responses rarely, if ever, result in an effective solution to a perceived problem.

We should also remind ourselves that a free press remains the cornerstone of our democracy. Quite simply, we cannot have a free democratic society without a free press.

We can justifiably be proud of a long tradition of press freedom in this country. Since 1696, there has been no Executive intervention in the content of newspapers in peacetime. Newspapers are, and should remain, independent of government. It should be for the press to decide what and what not to publish, subject to the general law.

The press has frequently demonstrated that it is a powerful force for good in our society and the Government are committed to preserving the freedom necessary for it to fulfil its proper role. That is why we have repeatedly stated our preference for self-regulation—a position that my hon. Friend will support. We have expressed reluctance to introduce statutory regulation or a privacy law. At present, the Government have no plans, nor see any pressing reason, to introduce legislation to regulate the press.

Under the present system of self-regulation, the Press Complaints Commission seeks to conciliate between those who are aggrieved about alleged press abuses and the newspaper concerned, and, where that fails, to adjudicate according to a code of practice that has been agreed by the newspaper and magazine industry.

The code, to which my hon. Friend referred, covers many different issues, including intrusion into privacy, intrusion into grief or shock, opportunity to reply, payment for articles and, above all, inaccuracy. The PCC published a revised code of practice on 19 December 1997, with increased safeguards against intrusion and harassment, and protections for children. Most of the matters are not covered by the criminal or civil law, and thus the present arrangements give people an avenue of complaint that would not otherwise be available and which is fairly rapid and free. It is important to note that the great majority of those who complain to the PCC are satisfied with the outcome.

That is not to say that the Government believe that self-regulation is working perfectly. The Government expect the press to abide by the rules and commitments enshrined in the code of practice, and we continue to review the effectiveness of press self-regulation by monitoring alleged press abuses and the PCC's handling of them.

Ministers and my officials are in regular contact with the PCC to discuss a number of issues. The Government have repeatedly stated our desire to see further improvements to self-regulation. We have no hesitation in suggesting such improvements to both the PCC's operations and the code, as and when we think necessary. I thank my hon. Friend for his contribution to that process.

From my discussions with the noble Lord Wakeham, I know that he welcomes this continuing dialogue, and he is always open to considering suggested improvements to the code. However, we should recognise that any improvements are likely to be most effective if they are made with the general consent of the press. I do not underestimate the difficulty of achieving that.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising this important issue. I recognise that the behaviour of certain elements of the press has, in recent weeks, caused concern and distress to many—my hon. Friend mentioned some of those instances—but I do not believe that that should lead us to conclude that the time for statutory regulation is right. In my view, self-regulation continues to be the best way in which to ensure high editorial standards in this country. Let us not forget that, despite the occasional lapse, the history of the press over the last decade or so has been, by and large, one of continued responsible improvement.

The Government continue to be committed to monitoring the effectiveness of the current self-regulatory system. I thank my hon. Friend again for his suggestions and comments on the code, breaches of the code and possible punishment for such breaches, and I thank him particularly for what he says about entrapment, about which there has been great concern in recent weeks.

I noted with interest what my hon. Friend said about whether the PCC should be able to initiate its own investigations without a complaint being made to it, and he made a valid point in support of the present system. Recent events will feed into the continuing monitoring process that the Government will carry out in terms of the effectiveness of the system. In my opinion, the basic rationale for self-regulation has not been damaged by those recent events.

I conclude by quoting from an editorial in The Observer on 30 May, which said:

> "A free press, warts and all, is an indispensable component of democracy. If we some saw some warts last week, don't forget that wider truth."

In what has been a difficult few weeks for the press, that is a sentiment with which I hope most hon. Members can concur. Once again, I thank my hon. Friend for raising this important issue. I assure him that we will take note of everything that he said during the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at nineteen minutes past Eleven o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 10 June 1999

The House met at half-past Eleven o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

The Secretary of State was asked—

Numeracy Hour

1. Helen Jones (Warrington, North): What assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the numeracy hour; and if he will make a statement. [85393]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): The national numeracy project has been evaluated by the National Foundation for Educational Research in England and Wales. Seven hundred and fifty schools took part in the project. Using a baseline of two years earlier with similar children, there was up to a 16-month improvement in the performance of those who had been part of that programme.

Helen Jones: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for that reply. Would he agree that, if the numeracy project is to be effective, one of the essential ingredients is for staff to be properly trained and supported? Will he join me in congratulating teachers on the work that they have done so far on the various initiatives that the Government have introduced? Will he take this opportunity to assure the House that proper support and training will be provided for the introduction of the numeracy hour in all our schools?

Mr. Blunkett: I am very pleased to give that assurance. The evaluation of the project undertaken by Ofsted shows that teachers were able to plan, organise and teach mathematics much more effectively. Obviously, training teachers is a crucial factor. We have put £55 million into training and materials for the programme and 1,760 extra teachers are providing model lessons. Teachers in every school in the country—including the head and a governor—will have the opportunity to receive the necessary training in the months ahead. We have expanded by one day the number of training days available this summer to facilitate the training programme. As teachers become more familiar with the numeracy programme, the sort of figures that we have seen for the literacy hour will be reflected—90 per cent. of primary teachers have said that they found that framework helpful and positive and have welcomed it.

Single Work-focused Gateway

2. Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): What assessment he has made of the role of local authorities in the planning and delivery of the pilots for the single work-focused gateway. [85394]

The Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities (Mr. Andrew Smith): Local authorities have been encouraged to be full partners in the new one service. They are represented on the national project team and on local implementation teams. Due to the demanding time scales to which we are working to get the pilots up and running in June and November, it made sense to allow for the phasing in of the councils' service involvement, but some council staff, premises and functions will be involved from day 1 and their contribution is invaluable.

Mr. Healey: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer. Is he aware that the Education and Employment Select Committee recently took evidence from the Local Government Association on our inquiry into the single work-focused gateway? Is he aware that, while the LGA strongly supports the ambition of the one service, it told us of the pilots whose participants felt that they had been invited to join the train but that it had already left the station and was 2 miles down the track? In the light of that, will my right hon. Friend explain what efforts have been made to ensure that local authority staff have been open to recruitment as one service advisers? Are there any local authority sites from which the one service will be delivered in the pilot areas?

Mr. Smith: Not only has the association been invited to join the train, it is on the train. The LGA is fully involved. Local authority staff have been encouraged to apply for jobs as personal advisers in the new one service and a number have already been appointed. Yes, local authority premises will be used from day one, including in some towns where there has been no access to benefit and employment services. As I said in my earlier answer, there will be an opportunity for councils to pace the extension of their involvement over time—something that the councils very much wanted—so that it accords with their own priorities. Also, discussions on resourcing are taking place so that local authorities will be resourced in relation to their involvement on the same basis as the Benefits Agency and the Employment Service.

Masterclasses

3. Mr. Ben Chapman (Wirral, South): How many schools are piloting the use of masterclasses for more able pupils. [85395]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): Ten schools are involved in the pilot of masterclasses for gifted and talented pupils. We are also developing a separate pilot of about 40 summer school projects, based in a range of schools and education action zones. Further details will be announced shortly.

Mr. Chapman: We still need to improve the education of all our children and to provide lifelong learning for others, but are not special measures needed for gifted and talented children, in particular in inner-city areas, as they are still not given the priority that they deserve? What are my hon. Friend's plans for masterclasses for those gifted children and for ensuring that those are more widely available?

Ms Morris: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. For too long, there has been the feeling that able children will do well despite school rather than because of it. It is about time that we recognised the fact that allowing every child to reach their potential means giving attention to every child, including those who have a particular ability or talent. My hon. Friend will know that a key strand of our work on the excellence in schools project is to ask those participating to work with their most able, gifted and talented children to ensure that they achieve their potential and that they achieve at a level that has not until now been available to them.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I recognise that masterclasses may indeed be beneficial for the more gifted child, and no doubt the trials will be carefully evaluated, but does the Minister recognise that able and gifted children should be assisted in mainstream education and that, from the word, go there should be streaming in secondary schools to ensure that those children are given the challenges that they need? Does she further agree that perhaps, in addition, special help could be provided at the end of the school day to continue that impetus?

Ms Morris: I agree with a great deal of what the hon. Lady has just said. It is absolutely crucial that the needs of those children in mainstream schools, whether primary or secondary, are met. For too long, schools have been good at meeting the needs of children who are thought to be less able and struggling—which is right and may it continue—but have often left those who are doing well to get on at their own pace. We are looking for a change of culture. We need to work with schools and teachers so that they develop strategies and teaching styles that will extend the abilities and the potential of every young person.

Every school should look carefully at pupil grouping. Certainly there is a lot of evidence showing that setting children can raise standards. That is setting children by ability for different subjects rather than streaming children, to which the hon. Lady referred, which puts them into the same stream for all subjects. Again, under the excellence in cities initiative, we are requiring all schools to look carefully at the way in which they group students and seriously to consider setting, unless they can prove to us that another way of grouping children is achieving the same high results.

Mr. Malcolm Wicks (Croydon, North): I welcome the Minister's responses to these questions. As she knows, the Select Committee on Education and Employment recently published a report on the needs of highly able children. I agree with her comments that we have tended to neglect this group because of the concern about struggling children and average standards. Does she agree that, although the masterclass initiative is a very important one, perhaps the key, as the Select Committee suggests, would be for every school to have a policy for highly able children and probably a named senior member of staff with special responsibility so that that group is no longer neglected?

Ms Morris: That is absolutely right. I welcome the Select Committee report on gifted and talented children and I look forward to my appearance before the Committee in about four weeks' time. The main theme of the report is absolutely right: in all our schools there are able and talented students who need to be recognised and supported. I know that the Chair of the Select Committee will welcome the fact that, as part of excellence in schools, we are requiring every school in the 25 pilot areas to designate one member of staff to be responsible for monitoring gifted and able children. Over the next few months, we will draw those teachers together, provide them with training and make links so that they can support each other. I have every confidence in saying that much that the Committee espouses in training will be delivered through excellence in cities over the next 12 months.

Mrs. Theresa May (Maidenhead): The masterclass initiative and the excellence in cities initiative, which includes masterclasses, are, like so many Government initiatives, strong on rhetoric and weak on delivery. How many children will be moved to another school for some part of their education as a result of these initiatives? The Minister has talked today of the need to meet the needs of more able pupils, but the masterclass initiative within excellence in cities is based on selection by ability. Last week, the Prime Minister told head teachers that there should be no return to selection by ability because it was too devastating for those who were rejected. What confidence can parents, pupils and teachers have in statements made by the Secretary of State and the Minister on meeting the needs of more able pupils when the Prime Minister so obviously disagrees with them?

Ms Morris: I find it amazing that the hon. Lady has failed to grasp the central difference between her policy for gifted and talented children and that of the Government. Unlike the Opposition, we do not believe that gifted and talented children exist only in selective schools. We believe that, in every school, there are groups of children who are gifted and talented and whose needs have been ignored. The thrust of our policy is to ensure that a gifted and talented child does not have to be in a grammar school to get extra support. That will give parents confidence that, whether their child goes to an existing selective school or to a comprehensive school in a city or a rural area, there will be policies to support the child in realising their potential. That is what parents want—not a few children siphoned off for extra attention.

Longer-term Unemployed

4. Mr. David Stewart (Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber): What steps he is taking to help the longer-term unemployed. [85396]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): With the excellent policies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Employment Service and the new deal are already delivering to young and older unemployed people. We now have the best record in terms of the number and percentage of people in employment in our history. We have the lowest youth unemployment for 25 years. There has been a 40 per cent. drop in long-term young unemployment. We have seen 266,000 young people go into the gateway, with 95,000 getting jobs, of which 70,000 have been sustained. The £3.6 billion that we are putting in is the wisest and most effective investment ever on unemployment.

Mr. Stewart: I thank my right hon. Friend for that reply. Does he share my concern about ageism in the workplace? I recently met a 50-year-old insurance manager who had been unemployed for two years and felt that he would never work again because of such ageism. Will the Government's new code of practice outlaw age discrimination in the workplace?

Mr. Blunkett: My right hon. Friend the Minister for Employment, Welfare to Work and Equal Opportunities will launch the code in a few days. He will spell out our measures for working with industry and commerce to build on some of the excellent examples of which my hon. Friend will know in Scotland. There, the older workers unemployed subsidy for start-up pension funds, the older is bolder programme of workshops to raise employers' awareness of older workers and the 50-plus initiative—pilots for which will be rolled out in the autumn as in the rest of the United Kingdom—will all take head on the problem of ensuring that older people are not neglected. As some of us get older, we feel this more strongly day by day.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): The right hon. Gentleman's response to the hon. Member for Inverness, East, Nairn and Lochaber (Mr. Stewart) notwithstanding, will he abandon his self-satisfaction and acknowledge that the Government are guilty of the most monstrous age discrimination imaginable? They are spending just short of £2.6 billion to assist the 118,000 young people who qualify under the new deal, but less than £500 million on the 194,500 older unemployed people. When will he put his own house in order and explain exactly what he has against older people who suffer the misfortune of unemployment?

Mr. Blunkett: The hon. Gentleman has not counted all the existing and newly developed measures outside the new deal that the Employment Service is adequately and effectively implementing for older workers. He ignores the fact that, under the new deal 25-plus, 10,600 older men and women have entered work. The 28 major programmes that have been put in place on the British mainland are already showing just how effective they can be. The performance and innovation unit has been commissioned to identify ways of increasing the effectiveness of our policies and opportunities for older people. I would welcome all parties in the House making a positive contribution to improving the well-being and opportunities of older workers rather than griping about the success of the Government.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): May I say to my right hon. Friend that you are only as old as you feel? He seems to be carrying the burdens of office very well.

In 1980, my constituency suffered the largest post-war redundancy in western Europe when 8,000 steelworkers, together with many thousands of others in associated work lost their jobs overnight. Some of those steelworkers still have no work largely because there are fewer and fewer unskilled jobs. Will my right hon. Friend tell the House and my constituents of any progress that he is making in assisting older redundant steelworkers to find new work?

Mr. Blunkett: I thank my hon. Friend for his flattery about my ageing process—some days are better than others, Madam Speaker.

I agree with my hon. Friend—how could I not, coming from a steel area myself?—about the challenge of ensuring that the reskilling programme is available. We place great emphasis on that investment in training for older workers. The 50-plus initiative, which was announced in the March Budget, will be of particular help to older workers who have spent their life in heavy industry; their futures will be enhanced by those measures, as they will by the reports and recommendations of the skills task force, which we established when we took office. I hope to announce new measures shortly that will enhance still further the available training opportunities.

Measures will also be proposed in a White Paper, which we hope to publish in a few weeks, on a coherent programme, policy and funding for all post-16 education and training.

Mr. Roy Beggs (East Antrim): I pay tribute to the measures taken by the Government to date to tackle the scourge of unemployment. We have had good success in Northern Ireland, and I welcome the continuing fall in its unemployment rate. When considering further measures to assist the longer-term unemployed, will the Secretary of State consider the unintended consequences for experienced teachers of local management of schools funding? Those teachers now have great difficulty finding long-term secure contracts and they may risk joining the ranks of the long-term unemployed.

Mr. Blunkett: We are mindful of the need to retain the services of long-serving and experienced teachers and measures that have been set in place in broader policies are aimed at doing precisely that. I am happy to talk to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about the matter. We have introduced greater flexibility for local authorities and schools so that they can vary the formulas for LMS and fair funding to take account of salary levels and the need to retain teachers who are more expensive because of their long service and grading. That will avoid precisely the danger that the hon. Gentleman describes. It is why additional money is being provided for posts for teachers with advanced skills. It is why the Government's Green Paper on reforming the promotion prospects and rewards for teachers will specifically earmark money to fund those initiatives so that money does not have to be found from existing resources.

Mr. Damian Green (Ashford): The Secretary of State has referred to the new deal as a great help to the long-term unemployed. Can he explain why his Cabinet colleagues evidently do not agree? The numbers of young new deal trainees taken on by Government Departments make fascinating reading. The Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department for International Development have taken on none. The Lord Chancellor's Department has taken on none. The Northern Ireland Office has taken on none. Even the Home Office, with its 50,818 employees, has taken on just one. Why should the long-term unemployed take the new deal seriously if the Government, when acting as employer, regard it as completely irrelevant?

Mr. Blunkett: I am grateful for the reminder to all Departments—we have issued exactly such a reminder ourselves—of the importance of their role in such schemes. [Laughter.] Well, we are almost at the end of term when we usually get reports that say, "Doing extraordinarily well, but some classmates could do better." That assessment would probably be appropriate. We are, however, making fantastic progress. We are about to reach the 50,000 mark in terms of the number of employers who have signed up. Not only are a range of Departments taking on new dealers, but their agencies and the bodies that they fund are doing so as well. It ill becomes anyone to chide the Lord Chancellor for whom he takes on, given the difficulty that he has experienced in appointing a special adviser.

Former Grant-maintained Schools

5. Mr. Desmond Swayne (New Forest, West): If he will make a statement about progress in implementing his funding policy in respect of former grant-maintained schools. [85397]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): The Government's aim is to establish a unified funding system for all state schools involving higher delegation by local education authorities and funding for all schools on an equal basis. We have put transitional arrangements in place to ensure that the changes required of grant-maintained schools are manageable.

Mr. Swayne: One of my more distasteful duties is to answer letters sent to me by parents who were unable to secure a place for their children at the Arnewood secondary school in New Milton, despite the fact that they live in the catchment area. Similar problems attend the Burgate school in Fordingbridge and Ringwood school. Although those are three of the most successful comprehensive schools in the country, they now face cutting courses and staff and even charging for some lessons. In total, grant-maintained schools have lost £100 million. The former Minister for School Standards, now the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, said that it was not the Government's intention "to cut the amount being spent on pupils in GM schools but to increase the funding . . . in other schools. We are . . . levelling up."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 12 February 1998; c. 461.]

Is that loss the meaning of levelling up?

Ms Morris: If the hon. Gentleman has any evidence that any school in his constituency is charging pupils for attending lessons, I trust that he will bring it to our attention immediately. It is illegal, and I should be totally surprised if it were going on. I hope that he will help us in upholding the law in that regard.

The hon. Gentleman has written to me about what has happened to Arnewood school's budget this year. I, too, have duties—distasteful or otherwise—in replying to letters from Members of Parliament, so he will be aware that the school's budget has been protected in cash terms. Much of the change for Arnewood school has been the result of changes in pupil numbers. The hon. Gentleman will know that last year, against the advice of the local authority, the projected numbers for Arnewood school were based on a wrong calculation. That must be put right this year.

The hon. Gentleman speaks with some passion about the needs of children in his constituency. I am sure that he will welcome the fact that all the pupils in his constituency area will benefit from the extra £25 million that the Government have allocated to the local authority—a 5.9 per cent. increase in funding compared to last year.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): Will the Minister confirm that approximately two thirds of grant-maintained schools face such severe funding cuts that they have to receive transitional protection? Will she also confirm that her Department forecast that approximately only one third of grant-maintained schools would be in that severe position? This year, many grant-maintained schools are struggling on last year's cash budget; there is no extra money to meet inflation and for teachers' pay. Does the Minister not realise that the Government's attack on grant-maintained schools has created nothing short of a crisis in the funding of the GM sector? What is she going do to about it?

Ms Morris: The hon. Gentleman must realise that those GM schools that are receiving transitional protection are receiving more money than local authority schools in similar circumstances. I would not pretend for one minute that it is easy, in a relatively short time, to move from the funding system that we inherited from the Conservative Government—in which school funding was based not on need, but on category. We will have no truck with that system. We shall move to a system in which every child is valued, whether they go to a community school or a foundation school. We shall ensure that that transition is carried out as easily as possible for GM schools.

The hon. Gentleman has a bit of a cheek to huff and puff at the Dispatch Box, talking about the difficulty for schools as they move from one funding system to another. Under the previous Conservative Government, how many times did he tell the House about the difficulties suffered by 23,000 schools as pupil funding was cut by £40 per pupil during the last three years of that Government? What is true is that every school is benefiting from the increase in money, whether capital or revenue funding, that the Government have given. We are able to celebrate the fact that, throughout the education service, there is an extra £200 per pupil of Government funding this year and over the next two years.

National Curriculum

6. Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): If he will make a statement on reform of the national curriculum. [85398]

The Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. David Blunkett): On 13 May, I launched the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority's proposed revisions to the national curriculum. That consultation will conclude on 23 July, and orders and changes will be announced in the autumn. The intention behind the review is to contribute to the agenda on raising standards, to retain stability and consistency in the curriculum, to ensure a full and rounded entitlement to learning for all pupils and to encourage the development of best practice. Establishing the literacy and numeracy framework as a key part of the curriculum has been a priority in our mind, and we are pleased with the welcome that that has so far received.

Mrs. Laing: I thank the Secretary of State for that very full answer. I am sure that he agrees that, to get on with the important job that we expect them to do, teachers and head teachers want a degree of certainty, so that they can plan what they are going to teach in the months ahead, and less bureaucracy, so that they can spend their time teaching children, not filling in forms for the Department for Education and Employment. Therefore, is there not a contradiction in the Secretary of State's answer, in that he says that his top priority is retaining stability in schools, but that the review of the national curriculum will not be published until the autumn?

Why is the right hon. Gentleman not telling teachers and head teachers sooner what should be done in the next term and the next school year? Why do they have to wait such a long time and have to go through so much bureaucracy, instead of being able to concentrate on the basics? There is a difference between the rhetoric, which is very good, and the practice, which is not.

Mr. Blunkett: Let me pause to draw breath. I have a statutory duty to consult on the recommendations of the QCA, and I am using the minimum time available to ensure that that consultation concludes at the end of a summer term. It is not possible to issue the immediate response to that consultation to schools during August, because they are on holiday. When schools return in autumn, we shall get the results of the review to them as quickly as possible. Through the standards fund and the web, we shall provide information, schemes of work and updates so that everyone has the necessary information. We shall ensure that schools have the rest of the academic year to prepare for the main changes, which are minimal and which will be introduced from 2000. All reasonable people will recognise that is the fastest that we can act.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): I welcome the introduction of thinking skills to the new national curriculum. Will my right hon. Friend confirm that he is willing to respond positively to the recent offer of help made to him by the National Committee for Philosophy in developing that curriculum in such a way that the committee's expertise is made available to the schools sector?

Mr. Blunkett: We strongly welcome advice and support and have made a point of ensuring that we open up access to the information and advice that is available outside the Department. I shall be happy to take on board the suggested contribution to which my hon. Friend refers.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): The Liberal Democrats welcome the review of the national curriculum—although it is rather ironic that it was introduced without any consultation. We particularly welcome the fact that the Government have taken the Crick report seriously. As we shall see huge voter apathy in today's European elections, does the Secretary of State believe that citizenship should be not only taught, but practised? How does the Secretary of State propose to introduce citizenship into schools, and to ensure that school councils and active participation are the norm rather than the exception?

Mr. Blunkett: I strongly welcome the hon. Gentleman's comments. About a third of our secondary schools are conducting the recommended citizenship programmes, which will be implemented by 2002. The development of citizenship and democracy in our schools is an essential feature of a modern, civilised society. It will help students to understand the world around them and their part in it. However, even in my wildest dreams, I do not imagine that the introduction of citizenship and democracy into the curriculum will improve voter turnout in European elections.

Youth Service

7. Ms Dari Taylor (Stockton, South): If he will make a statement on his plans for the youth service. [85400]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. George Mudie): After analysing and considering the national audit of the youth service published last year, we are considering policies for the benefit of young people, including the role of the youth service. We will consult—in fact, we will issue a consultation document—on the future of the youth service, but context, content and timing will need to be determined once we have decided on the wider services for young people generally. I shall make an announcement in due course.

Ms Taylor: Does my hon. Friend agree that too many young people in the 13 to 19 age bracket feel excluded, and that far too many believe that they are criticised and blamed for the things that go wrong in our society? Those young people are definitely keen to be involved—although their participation is often not recognised. Will my hon. Friend consider how the voluntary sector agencies can participate in consultation about youth provision? The youth service—certainly in my constituency—is an able group, which could be involved, and participate at the appropriate level, with young people.

Mr. Mudie: My hon. Friend and the House will be aware that a main thrust of Government policy is ending social exclusion. I say time and again—whenever I have the opportunity—that the youth service plays an important role, and is a vital partner in allowing colleges, schools and universities to widen participation and end social exclusion. The voluntary sector can play a valuable role. For example, one of its great strengths is its willingness to provide new solutions and opportunities. We fund the voluntary youth sector through the scheme for national voluntary youth organisations, and the Secretary of State announced late last year fresh grants for 81 organisations and a 30 per cent. funding increase. We support the voluntary youth sector not only verbally, but financially.

Disabled People

8. Mr. Tom Levitt (High Peak): What steps his Department is taking to assist people with disabilities when they return to work. [85401]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Ms Margaret Hodge): The Government are committed to providing high-quality services to help disabled people who want to return to work. They include access to work, the job introduction scheme, and advice and guidance from the disability service teams. Measures taken by my Department sit within a broader pattern of across-Government help, including the new disabled persons tax credit and initiatives within the health service.

Mr. Levitt: I am sure that my hon. Friend will have noted that the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill provides improved linkage rules which give added confidence to disabled people who wish to return to work. Does she agree that equally important is the question of job retention for disabled people? If people suffer from a progressive disability—such as reduced hearing, sight, dexterity or mobility—the extra assistance provided to help them stay in work will not only increase their earning power, but retain skills within the work force and decrease the benefits bill in the long run. It is better for an individual's dignity if, despite a disability, he or she can be encouraged to stay in work rather than fall out of the work force.

Ms Hodge: I agree entirely with the sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend. We consider the retention of people in jobs to be such a high priority that we are working with colleagues in the Department of Health, the Department of Social Security and local government social services to find out what new measures we can take to ensure that there is better rehabilitation and retention of people who fall ill at work. [HON. MEMBERS: "Remploy."] On Remploy, I should hope that there would be cross-party support for our initiative to ensure that people are integrated into mainstream employment opportunities and given the dignity of working alongside others, rather than being segregated in factories as they have been for far too long. The previous Government should have tackled that issue many years ago.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (Normanton): Will my hon. Friend take note of a case in my constituency in which Barclays bank sacked a person who was suffering from chronic fatigue syndrome, or ME? When that person asked for extra time to recover, the request was denied. Is there something that we can do to impress on employers the fact that they have a responsibility to dedicated workers who develop disabilities, and who should be given assistance instead of being sacked and left with no hope of further employment? Can we do something to help those people?

Ms Hodge: I would be most grateful if my hon. Friend would write to me about the case to which he referred because it strikes me that, if there was discrimination against that employee, there might well be a case against the employer under the Disability Discrimination Act 1995.

The Department has now received the first stage of research on the early cases taken under the Disability Discrimination Act. That demonstrates that more cases have been taken under that Act in its early days than were taken under the equal opportunities and race relations legislation. It demonstrates also the beginnings of the Act's good impact; for example, a person with a visual impairment received an award of more than £100,000. We hope that, when our Disability Rights Commission is up and running, there will be further support to individuals to ensure that they have rights at work.

Non-maintained Schools

9. Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): If he will make a statement on the regulations to govern the purchase of provision by local education authorities from non-maintained schools. [85406]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): The legislation that the Government introduced last year enables the Secretary of State to prevent the introduction of a new locally funded assisted places scheme. We shall publish draft regulations in due course.

Mr. St. Aubyn: During the proceedings on the School Standards and Framework Act 1998, the Minister's predecessor told the Standing Committee:

"We shall begin the consultation after Report and Third Reading, when the House has expressed a view on new clause 12. That is part of the conventions of Parliament, and that is how we shall conduct our business."—[Official Report, Standing Committee A, 3 March 1998; c. 786.]

The Minister did not conduct his business in that manner. In February, my hon. Friend the Member for Maidenhead (Mrs. May) tabled a written question to the present Minister, asking when draft regulations would be published for consultation. She replied:

"It is planned to issue draft regulations for consultation in May 1999."—[Official Report, 22 February 1999; Vol. 326, c. 20.]

We now hear from the Minister that she refuses to give any date for those regulations.

When individual schools and education action zones have the power, without regulations, to buy places at independent schools, why are such regulations needed? Conservative-run Surrey local education authority, which has already shown the Government a lead by bringing in the private sector to manage a maintained school, is ready and willing to show the Government a lead in building new bridges with the independent sector. Give us the tools and we shall do the work.

Ms Morris: The hon. Gentleman is getting very exercised on this issue. My predecessor said that we would publish regulations after Report and Third Reading, and we shall do so. It is a matter of prioritising.

As far as we know, no local authority has plans to reproduce the assisted places scheme at a local level. The hon. Gentleman will know that we have introduced many regulations since the passage of the school standards legislation. The Under-Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, South (Mr. Clarke), and I feel, as I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's Front-Bench colleagues do, that we spend much of our time in Committee discussing statutory instruments. We have discussed and laid statutory instruments on admissions, parental appeal, funding and the new standards framework. It was a greater priority for us to implement for the start of the next school term the new framework and the new funding, admission and appeal arrangements. We shall come to further secondary legislation in due time, as I said.

Mr. David Willetts (Havant): On the Secretary of State's comments about citizenship and the European elections, may I invite the Minister to congratulate our education Whip, the hon. Member for Beckenham (Mrs. Lait), on already having done three hours' telling in the European elections? Ministers are worried about turnout; it helps if one fights an election campaign. We find such telling quite a good way of increasing turnout.

On the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn), there is a serious problem. Guildford had to follow cumbersome rules, which were set by the European Union procurement policy in the absence of any regulations guiding procedures in the area. How come Islington can do a quick deal with one company for the private management of some education service virtually overnight, but education authorities that want responsibly to consider purchasing private management of schools must undergo time-consuming procedures? That is why the regulations are needed. LEAs have been kept waiting for far too long.

Ms Morris: I wonder which group of Conservatives the Whip was counting—those who are pro-European or those who are anti-European—and at which school she was doing so.

More seriously, the point raised by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. St. Aubyn) relates to our fear that assisted places schemes would be reproduced locally. We do not want that; we have made that clear. We want the private sector to be involved properly in the education service, where that is appropriate. We shall ensure that ways of enabling that to happen are implemented.

The hon. Member for Havant (Mr. Willetts) should realise that much of what we heard from his Government about the relationship with the private sector did not transpire. Over the past two years since we have taken power, we have been very carefully building up contacts and establishing rules and regulations to enable a relationship with the private sector, in order that it may contribute to the wider agenda of raising standards. That has happened in both Guildford and Islington. We shall reflect on those processes and, if need be, simplify them. We have no intention of allowing local authorities to reproduce assisted places schemes locally.

Reading

10. Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): What steps have been taken by his Department to encourage parents to read to their young children. [85409]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): Encouraging parents to read to their young children has been a very important part of both the literacy strategy and the national year for reading. We have run a series of television and radio advertisements for a free leaflet entitled "A Little Reading Goes A Long Way". The leaflet offers parents practical advice about how to read with their children. More than 1 million copies have been requested so far, and a further 2 million have been distributed through various outlets, including supermarkets and doctors' waiting rooms.

Ms Stuart: I thank the Minister for that answer. Reading to young children is beneficial not only to the child-parent relationship but to educational development. Is the Minister aware of the project that was first piloted in Birmingham in 1992, in which parents were given a leaflet and book alerting them to access to libraries when their babies attended hearing tests? In 1997, that scheme was run again for the whole city and, in the past two years, 25,000 children have received as part of the core-school partnership a pack of a book and information on the library. I gather that the scheme is being rolled out nationally. How much support will the Department give to the book start project?

Ms Morris: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. In the city of Birmingham, in which both our constituencies lie, an incredibly positive scheme, which was originally called "Books for Babies", was launched. The issue is about changing the culture and giving parents the confidence to realise that libraries are for them, and that they can learn from libraries and help their children. We are indeed rolling out the programme nationwide, with funding from the national year of reading and, I am very pleased to say, from private sector sponsorship. My hon. Friend will know that, when key stage 1 children in Birmingham and a control group were tested, the improvement in attainment rates among those who had been part of "Books for Babies" was quite remarkable. I therefore look forward to many more young children and their parents benefiting from the rolled-out scheme, and to rising reading and numeracy levels among children aged six and seven.

Secondary School Closures

11. Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): If he will make a statement on his responsibilities in relation to proposals for the closure of secondary schools. [85410]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): Madam Speaker—[Hon. Members: "Hear, hear."] Thank you to the fan club.

Proposals for the closure of schools are usually brought forward by the local education authority and are copied to the Secretary of State. If there are no statutory objections and the proposals are not called in for decision by the Secretary of State, the decision may be made by the local education authority. If proposals fall to the Secretary of State for decision, they will be decided on their individual merits, taking into account the advice of Her Majesty's inspectors and any points made by interested parties in the local area.

Mr. Winterton: I am grateful to the Minister for his detailed and helpful reply. Although I am totally in favour of excellence and success, I also support the idea of a number of schools being designated to take those with learning difficulties. League tables, unless responsibly used, can mean that a school will suffer as a result of the fact that it takes youngsters with learning difficulties, and many parents may opt to send their children to other schools.

Will the Minister, the rest of the Government and the bodies that are to take responsibility for making decisions on the closure of schools take into account the fact that some schools take on the burden, and the important task, of dealing with children with learning difficulties? Should that fact not be borne in mind before a hasty decision is taken to close a school because of a reduction in numbers?

Mr. Clarke: The short answer is yes. The hon. Gentleman has made his point powerfully and correctly. In several of the individual cases that I have had to consider during my time in office, the issues that he has raised have been taken into account, because of the considerations that he has mentioned. The general issue that he raises is the difficult one of the relationship between league tables and people with special educational needs. We are thinking carefully about how to ensure that crude league tables are considered only as part of a fully rounded view that takes into account all the issues that schools must address in trying to meet the needs of pupils in their areas. I welcome the hon. Gentleman's interest, and commit myself to respond positively to his approach.

School Playing Fields

12. Mr. Nigel Beard (Bexleyheath and Crayford): What plans he has to restrict the sale of school playing fields. [85412]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): We have already delivered on our manifesto pledge to protect school playing fields. Since 1 October 1998, section 77 of the School Standards and Framework Act 1998 has meant that local authorities in England may not dispose, or change the use, of school playing fields without the prior consent of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment. On 7 June, earlier this week, we published the criteria against which decisions on applications from local authorities and governing bodies will normally be made.

The first criterion is financial; any proceeds from sales must be returned to education or used to enhance sports provision. The second relates to schools' needs; the playing fields and other sports facilities that will be left must meet the needs of local schools, particularly primary schools. Thirdly, there are community needs; the playing fields and other sports facilities that will be left must meet the needs of the local community. The fourth criterion involves consultation; there must have been adequate consultation both locally and with recognised national bodies such as Learning through Landscapes, the Central Council of Physical Recreation or the National Playing Fields Association, so that their views can be taken into account. Those proposals offer a clear way forward in improving playing field provision in schools.

Mr. Beard: I thank the Minister for that answer. It was one of the scandals of the public asset stripping under the previous Government that 5,000 school playing fields were sold off. Does the Minister share the concern recently expressed by the National Association of Head Teachers about the level of fitness of many of their pupils, and their sedentary life styles? Will he give an assurance that school playing fields and sporting facilities will be used to ensure that standards of, and improvements in, fitness keep pace with classroom achievement?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with the points and sentiments expressed by my hon. Friend. We have a series of initiatives to develop a much healthier approach to life in school, ranging across changes in the national curriculum, our playing fields initiative, and our approach to diet and food. We have a joint healthy schools initiative, which I and my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Health chair, to bring together and to develop activity in this area. We go down the line that has been set out by my hon. Friend. It is critical that we develop more resources for school playing fields and sporting activity, and better use of those facilities. Yesterday, I met representatives of the Central Council of Physical Recreation to discuss ways in which we might develop that approach.

Ms Harriet Harman (Camberwell and Peckham): Does my hon. Friend recognise that there are major new opportunities for sport and for music, art and drama in the Government's new nationwide network of after-school clubs? What can my hon. Friend's Department do to ensure that these clubs take good care of, and look after, the children involved, and extend to them opportunities for sport, music, art and drama, which are often not available to them during their time in school?

Mr. Clarke: I strongly agree with my right hon. Friend, who puts the case with her traditional power and force. We are making resources available through the new opportunities fund, with £125 million being allocated for schools, councils, community groups and other organisations to improve access and develop the activities to which my right hon. Friend referred. We are encouraging out-of-school activity in music, arts and drama in the way that she suggests. We believe that that is an essential approach. Critical to it is developing a much better relationship between schools and their local communities and community organisations, so that real co-operation can be built up. We give this initiative major priority, and it is important that we continue to drive it forward.

Educational Attainment (Inner London)

13. Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): If he will make a statement on the current level of educational attainment in schools in the inner-London boroughs. [85415]

The Minister for School Standards (Ms Estelle Morris): In 1998, the attainment of pupils in schools in the inner-London boroughs was below the national average in literacy, numeracy and science at the ages of seven, 11 and 13, and in the achievement of five or more higher grade GCSEs. However, between 1997 and 1998, the improvement in literacy and numeracy tests was twice the national average, and the improvement in higher grade GCSEs was more than three times the national average.

All our policies to raise standards are contributing to urgent and essential improvement in inner-city education. That has been most recently drawn together in the excellence in cities programme announced in March this year.

Mr. Robathan: All of us who live in central or inner London, even if only for part of the week, must be concerned about education standards in those areas. Does the Minister accept—I know that she did not mention this—that the dreadful performance of the education service in Hackney and Islington is partly due to the ridiculous education philosophy put into practice by Labour education authorities in those two boroughs? Does she further accept that it is perhaps not appropriate that someone who was responsible for the dreadful education performance in Islington—the hon. Member for Barking (Ms Hodge)—should now be the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment? Will the Minister give her candid opinion of those who denied selection to other parents, but were prepared to send their children across London to get away from dreadful education services to schools such as the London Oratory in west London?

Ms Morris: I am not sure that the best way in which to tackle vast under-achievement in inner London, and some other urban areas, is to lay blame on actions taken many years ago and on those who were in post more than a decade ago. It is necessary now to accept that things must change and that action must be taken. The hon. Gentleman will know that, in Hackney and Islington, there has not been a failure to support schools in the past two years. However, there was a failure to support schools over a long period. The Conservative Government did nothing to put matters right.

Over the past two years, the Government have speeded-up Ofsted inspections of local authorities. We have made it clear that we will take action without fear or favour where there is under-achievement. We shall retrain teachers to teach better literacy and numeracy. We shall put more money into our schools, we shall have high expectations of them and we shall prioritise them in terms of £350 million in excellence in city initiatives. If the Conservative Government had done only one tenth of those things over the previous 18 years, I probably would not have to tell the House that there is chronic under-achievement in some of the inner-London boroughs.

National Grid for Learning

14. Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): If he will make a statement on the benefits to schools of the national grid for learning. [85416]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Employment (Mr. Charles Clarke): The use of information and communications technology in the classroom can bring learning gains, increased motivation and improved attitudes to learning. The national grid for learning is a nationwide programme to bring those benefits to all our learners, by providing access to the national focal point for education on the internet, stimulating the development of high-quality educational resources, and organising them in such a way as to make them useful and easily accessible to teachers and students.

Mr. Bercow: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for that reply, which rightly emphasises the potential benefits of the national grid for learning. However, given that only 12 per cent. of primary schools have access to the internet, owing substantially to the prohibitive cost of line rental, and given also that Gawcott county first school in my constituency has to pay the same £1,200 per year as a large comprehensive, will the hon. Gentleman undertake to go back to the drawing board and consider by what means arrangements can be improved so as to reflect the different needs and ability to pay of the primary and secondary sectors?

Mr. Clarke: I will commit myself and the Government to intensification of our massive commitment to get ICT into schools—a commitment that was introduced by this Government in an area that was flagrantly neglected by our predecessors. Substantial sums are going into the programme, together with substantial training for teachers, physical kit, internet connections and software development. The hon. Gentleman is right to say that there are different demands in different parts of the system, as between primary and secondary schools, which we are actively addressing in our strategy to roll out the ICT programme.

I can commit myself to taking into account that specific point when we consider the connections that need to be made. However, the core point is that there must be a major national initiative to drive forward and use the advantages. I believe that we are part of that initiative, and I regret only that it has taken the election of this Government to start to move it forward.

Mr. Don Foster (Bath): Does the Minister agree that, if we are to get our pupils on-line, we must also get our teachers on-line? Can he therefore explain why, despite all the hype from the Government, the Chancellor and his Department are making available sufficient money for only 6.5 per cent. of teachers to have a lap-top computer?

Mr. Clarke: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman about the need to focus on teachers. None of the potential benefits can be liberated unless teachers possess the means to implement the change. The hon. Gentleman is right to identify the benefits of the lap-top for teachers scheme. Where we have introduced it, it has brought real benefits; we are looking to extend it in various ways. He will be aware that the key issue is to ensure that in every school and on the internet and the national grid, there are resources that can be used by teachers beneficially. That is what we are focusing on, and what I believe we are delivering.

Business of the House

12.33 pm

Sir George Young (North-West Hampshire): May I ask the Leader of the House to give us the business for next week?

The President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mrs. Margaret Beckett): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 14 JUNE—Remaining stages of the Health Bill [Lords].

TUESDAY 15 JUNE—Progress on remaining stages of the Immigration and Asylum Bill.

WEDNESDAY 16 JUNE—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Conclusion of remaining stages of the Immigration and Asylum Bill.

THURSDAY 17 JUNE—Debate on Kosovo on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

FRIDAY 18 JUNE—Debate on tourism on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The provisional business for the following week—I emphasise to the House that it is more than usually provisional, because of all the obvious reasons related to Kosovo—will be as follows:

MONDAY 21 JUNE—Remaining stages of the Access to Justice Bill [Lords].

Motion on the Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order.

TUESDAY 22 JUNE—Second Reading of the Food Standards Bill.

Motion on the Church of England Cathedrals Measure.

Motion on Care of Places of Worship Measure.

WEDNESDAY 23 JUNE—Until 2 o'clock, there will be debates on the motion for the Adjournment of the House.

Opposition Day [14th Allotted Day] (First Part). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

Consideration of any Lords amendments that may be received to the Tax Credits Bill.

THURSDAY 24 JUNE—Opposition Day [15th Allotted Day].

There will be a debate on an Opposition motion. Subject to be announced.

FRIDAY 25 JUNE—There will be a debate on innovation and enterprise on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

The House will also wish to know that on Wednesday 16 June there will be a debate on incineration of waste in European Standing Committee A.

[Wednesday 16 June 1999:

European Standing Committee A—Relevant European Union documents: 12756/97, 12791/98, Incineration of Waste. Relevant European Legislation Committee Reports: HC 155-xiii and HC 155-xxxi(1997–98). Relevant European Scrutiny Committee Reports: HC 34-viii and HC 34-xxi(1998-99).]

Sir George Young: The House is grateful for next week's business and an indication of the business for the following week. We welcome next week's debate on Kosovo. Will it be opened by the Prime Minister?

Will the right hon. Lady find time soon for a debate on the report of the royal commission on long-term care, published some three months ago? There is concern, expressed in early-day motion 405, that the important issues that it raises should not be ignored.

[That this House congratulates the Government for its commitment to tackling the inequalities and inefficiencies of the present system of funding long-term care for older people; commends the Royal Commission on Long-Term Care for reporting within 14 months after consultation with over 2,000 organisations and experts in the field as well as members of the public; and joins with Age Concern in calling on the Government to produce a clear timetable for introducing long overdue changes to the system in recognition of the fact that older people do not have the time to wait for further debate.]

Likewise, there is a need for a debate on drugs following the first report of Keith Hellawell. Might those two subjects be debated shortly?

Given the real concern that those who served this country in Northern Ireland 30 years ago in the Parachute Regiment might be put needlessly at risk, may we have an opportunity to debate soon the issue of their anonymity in the Bloody Sunday inquiry?

As Britain experiences today its first taste of the closed list and proportional representation, would it not be sensible to have an early debate so that hon. Members can share with the Government their constituents' experience of the voting system and the new method of representation?

Finally, in the interests of all those who work in the House, can the right hon. Lady shed some light on the summer recess? If she cannot tell us the date, can she gives us the week, or, failing that, the month, in which it might commence?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot tell the right hon. Gentleman who will open the debate on Kosovo, but I doubt that it will be the Prime Minister. However, that is still under discussion because of ministerial commitments.

The right hon. Gentleman requested debates on long-term care and on drugs, and I shall bear that in mind. I am conscious that interest in debating those matters has been expressed. Obviously, the report on long-term care was detailed and the Government are giving a great deal of careful thought to its conclusions. As he will appreciate, and as he knows that I have said before, we have lost a lot of time as a result of the Kosovo issue, although I do not think any hon. Member regrets that. It was necessary to find time for proper reporting to the House, but it has made a difference to our finding time for other issues.

With regard to the inquiry in Northern Ireland, I understand that the issue of anonymity, which I accept is important, is today being considered by the courts, so not only do I not want to comment further, but, depending on what the courts say, I doubt whether it is a matter on which we could have a debate. Moreover, those are very much matters for the inquiry; it is for the inquiry to make those decisions.

I cannot undertake to find time for a debate on our constituents' experience of the European elections, although I rather doubt that, faced with a ballot paper on which they were invited to make a free choice on such a vast number of names, they would be as grateful as Conservative Members seem to think that they would be. No doubt, we shall have a great deal of anecdotal comment, but whether we need a debate is another matter.

As for the recess, I appreciate the right hon. Gentleman's generosity in the breadth of the indication that he invited me to give. I can certainly tell him that we hope that we might rise in August.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): On this day, will my right hon. Friend reflect on the fact that some United Kingdom subjects will not be able to exercise their vote in the European elections and, unlike the majority, would really like to do so? I refer to the people of Gibraltar. Because of the widespread cross-party interest and support in the House for Gibraltar, and bearing in mind that my hon. Friends on the Select Committee on Foreign Affairs are bringing forward a report in about a week's time, may we have some dedicated time on the Floor of this Chamber, not the new one, to discuss Gibraltar? That is something that we owe those people who are denied the franchise today—something that I regret.

Mrs. Beckett: I know that my hon. Friend takes great interest in those matters and is an enthusiastic advocate for the people of Gibraltar, but I fear that I cannot undertake to find time in the near future for a debate dedicated to their affairs. I am sorry that he rejects the notion of having a debate elsewhere.

Mr. Mackinlay: In addition.

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, but I would simply say to my hon. Friend that there are many worthy matters and we are unlikely ever to find time to debate them on the Floor of the Chamber, which is one reason why the majority of Members of the House decided to provide extra time in another way.

Mr. Phil Willis (Harrogate and Knaresborough): The Leader of the House may be aware that two of my constituents, Mr. and Mrs. Adams, were last week on holiday in St. Petes Beach, Florida. They were arrested—

Madam Speaker: Order. I understood that, in asking about business, the hon. Gentleman was speaking on behalf of his party, not on behalf of his constituents.

Mr. Willis: With respect, Madam Speaker, I am raising an issue that affects all citizens of this country who visit Florida.

Madam Speaker: Perhaps we can move to that issue. I called the hon. Gentleman at this stage because I had been given his name as the Member speaking on behalf of his party.

Mr. Willis: The party has asked me to raise this issue, and I say to the Leader of the House that my constituents were arrested, strip searched and put in jail on a charge relating to child abuse, although all that they did was leave their hotel room and go to the side of the pool to watch a firework display. Will she please ask the Foreign Secretary to issue guidance to all families who are about to travel to Florida on holiday, to make sure that they are not subjected to the level of abuse to which my constituents were subjected by the authorities in Florida?

Mrs. Beckett: I am afraid that I cannot undertake to find time for a debate specifically on that matter in the near future, although I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern, both for his constituents and about the impact that the problems that they faced would have if they were to be faced by many others. However, there is a debate on tourism on Friday next week and, although it may have been intended to focus on tourism within the United Kingdom, an opportunity might arise to work the matter into the discussion.

Mr. Gordon Prentice (Pendle): My right hon. Friend will have read the horrifying case reported in the press on Tuesday this week of the 17-month-old girl who was found to have a 1.5 in hypodermic syringe lodged within her kidney; it had been there for nine months. I have made some inquiries, and that incident is in no way unusual: eight people died last year because surgical detritus was left in a wound following an operation and 749 people suffered in the same way without dying. Such incidents are not unusual and this matter is important enough for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to come to the House next week to make a statement saying what advice and guidance is given to surgeons to make sure that negligence in operating theatres does not lead to such horrifying consequences.

Mrs. Beckett: I sympathise with those involved in that difficult case, and so will my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The Government have put extra investment into the health service and we intend to use it to raise standards. All I can say to my hon. Friend is that I do not think that I can find time for a debate on the matter, and I am not sure that my right hon. Friend will be able to make a statement on it in the near future. However, we are dealing with the remaining stages of the Health Bill on Monday and it is possible that an issue arising in the debate might allow this matter to be discussed.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): Before the Leader of the House made her statement today, I received earlier this week letters from UNICEF and Amnesty International telling me that the remaining stages of the Immigration and Asylum Bill would be dealt with next week. Would I be asking too much if I requested that the House be told of such matters before outside organisations, however worthy they may be?

Mrs. Beckett: I understand, and sympathise with, the right hon. Gentleman's view. My understanding is that that is what those organisations expected and that the letter said "probably", although I do not recall receiving a copy myself. He will know that there has been some discussion about the Immigration and Asylum Bill coming before the House at an earlier stage and that further work was needed. I think that those organisations had anticipated that, although the Bill had not reached the House quite as early as had perhaps originally been thought, it would be considered in the near future. I understand and take his point that it is right for the House to know about such matters first, and we try to observe that convention.

[Mrs. Beckett]

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Has my right hon. Friend been told whether the Tory Opposition are still calling for an inquiry into the start of the war? I have not heard a word about that over the past few days, and certainly not since last night.

By the time of next week's Kosovo debate, will we have been told whether those in the discredited gang of appeasers outside—people like the Pilgers and the Pinters—have written to apologise for getting it completely wrong?

Mrs. Beckett: I am fairly certain that, if any comment is made that is thought worthy of being reported to the House, it will be reported in the debate to which my hon. Friend refers. As for whether the Opposition are still calling for an inquiry into the start of the war, I can only say that I, like my hon. Friend, have heard no more about that lately. No doubt, whether the call is renewed will depend on how things go.

Sir Teddy Taylor (Rochford and Southend, East): Should we not, as a matter of urgency, have a debate next week on the percentage of people who voted in today's European elections? If, as seems possible, three quarters of Britain's voters go on strike today, have we not an obligation to review the democratic outrage whereby people are being asked to vote for a party, and to leave it to the party bosses to decide who is elected to the Parliament? If there is a massive strike today, have we not a duty to debate the issue next week?

Mrs. Beckett: If there is a relatively low turnout in the European elections, I doubt—unfortunately—that anyone will be dreadfully surprised. I think that all hon. Members regret the turnouts that we have seen even for general elections—and especially for local and European elections—which I, certainly, would like to be higher than they have been in recent years. Down the years, there has historically not been as high a turnout as most of us would wish.

I am always interested when Opposition Members refer to the notion that party bosses rather than the electorate will have the say on who are the candidates, as if they themselves were chosen by the electorate to be candidates for their parties and their constituencies. As far as I am aware, none of them was.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Is it not time that we had a debate on the Government's 10-year strategy on drugs? In 10 years' time, the drugs tsar will have resigned, the Prime Minister is likely to be Lord Sedgefield—

Mr. Mackinlay: Viscount Sedgefield.

Mr. Flynn: By that time, we shall have seen at least 1,000 avoidable deaths, and, if we follow the current trend and go on repeating our failures, the situation will continue.

There has been a change in the public perception of the debate. Even the Daily Mail, which is the voice of the middle-aged and the middle class, has described the Government's policy as mere window dressing. It has talked of the hypocrisy of that policy as perceived by the public, and has called for a debate on the legalisation of drugs in order to reduce the harm done by them. Why on earth are we stupidly continuing to repeat the tired, failed policies that have killed thousands of our young people, rather than imitating the success of countries that have reduced the amount of drug harm?

Mrs. Beckett: I know that my hon. Friend feels strongly about the issue, and takes every opportunity to advocate his point of view. As I told the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir G. Young), we are conscious of the need to find time to debate the drugs strategy. I hope that we shall be able to debate it at some point, and that my hon. Friend can make his case again.

I am not sure whether my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has any wish or aspiration to become Lord Sedgefield, or indeed Viscount Sedgefield. I can only say that, as a loyal member of the Cabinet, I feel confident that I ought to suggest that he should at least be a duke.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): I accept that, quite properly, the Leader of the House is reticent about commenting on matters that are before the court today. However, the question of anonymity for former soldiers in the Parachute Regiment is of great concern throughout the country, not just in Aldershot.

The Prime Minister has said that he can do nothing, although he was responsible for setting up the inquiry. May I suggest a solution? If the soldiers are not to be granted anonymity because the court cannot do that, could not the Leader of the House present a one-line Bill to give the security of the law to former soldiers who have served the country so well and put their lives at risk?

Mrs. Beckett: I understand the concern that the hon. Gentleman expresses. I understand, too, that he expresses it very much on behalf of his constituents, which is very much what all hon. Members are here to do. I accept that the concern goes wider than his constituency, but I know that, in his constituency, there will be particular worry. I can say only that, while I understand that concern, it is a matter for the inquiry; it is not a matter in which the Government can intervene. From his question, I am not entirely sure whether he is aware—he invited me to bring in legislation—that events have moved on to some degree and that the courts are looking into that matter at this moment.

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): Will my right hon. Friend find time for an early debate on the impact of the national minimum wage, a measure to which she gave a strong helping hand? Such a debate would allow the House to examine the emerging evidence that more than 400,000 jobs have been created since the national minimum wage was announced last year, including more than 100,000 in typically low-paid sectors. Such a debate would also allow the House to expose the baseless fears that the Conservative party tried to raise on the impact on jobs of the minimum wage, which is proving to be a boost to jobs, not a threat.

Mrs. Beckett: My hon. Friend is entirely right. The Conservative party did allege that—I think that the final figure was that about 2 million or 3 million jobs would be lost if any national minimum wage of any kind at any level were introduced. That was always nonsense.

My hon. Friend is right to say that, alongside the introduction of the national minimum wage, we have seen an increase in the number of jobs and in levels of employment. Although I would not say that we have evidence to link those two, as we pointed out before the election, it is true that, in, for example, parts of the United States and elsewhere, there has been evidence of the existence—and also of an increase in the level—of the national minimum wage and increases in employment at the same time, which again shows how ridiculous Conservative Members' claims were. However, I fear that I cannot undertake to find time for a special debate on the follies of the Opposition in the near future.

Mrs. Ann Winterton (Congleton): I follow the question that was raised earlier by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn), who has left his place, but do not follow in his footsteps. What progress has the Leader of the House made in securing a debate in Government time on the national drugs strategy, so that hon. Members on both sides of the House and of the argument can have plenty of time to debate the matter? She will, I know, acknowledge that there has not yet been a debate in Government time in the current Parliament, and that the time given at the time of the statement was inadequate for the breadth of the subject.

Mrs. Beckett: However assiduous the Government are in having statements in the House, it does not allow for the full exploration of a subject in the way that debating time does. All I can say is that I will certainly bear the hon. Lady's remarks in mind.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Pursuant to the question from my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) on appeasers, I say frankly that I shared platforms with John Pilger and Harold Pinter and the apology for which my hon. Friend asks may be forthcoming, but it will be in five years, when the position might be altogether clearer.

In welcoming Thursday's debate, may I say that there are some of us on the Labour Benches—I do not know how many—who would welcome it being opened by the Prime Minister. As my right hon. Friend will remember, when she was the hon. Member for Lincoln, Harold Wilson often intervened in major foreign affairs debates; during the time of Vietnam, he certainly did so.

It is not a matter just of the amour propre or the self-importance of the House of Commons because, had there been a proper parliamentary debate before the bombs were dropped, much more would have been said by some of us about the need to act in concert with the Russians—if the Russians had not been sidelined for a whole fortnight, much agony might have been saved—we would certainly have asked questions about the refusal to use ground troops at an early stage, and we would never have allowed unchallenged the decision to start bombing and to refuse to use ground troops, leaving vulnerable the very people whom we were hoping to help.

Mrs. Beckett: I am well aware that in the past—certainly in the days of our late friend Lord Wilson—Prime Ministers used to take part in a greater variety of debates, as my hon. Friend rightly says. He will recall, as I do, that that tradition was sharply changed by Lady Thatcher. I am sure that I am right in saying that that policy was not much altered, if at all, by her successor and that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister comes to the House more often than his predecessors. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] It is true, I am afraid, and the statistics clearly bear it out.

I will certainly undertake both to my hon. Friend and to Opposition Members who have raised the matter to draw to the Prime Minister's attention the request that he should open the debate, but hon. Members will be aware that the pressures on him have been extremely heavy of late. It is not clear to me what my right hon. Friend's commitments might be, or whether that would be practical. We keep talking about the Cologne summit as though it were around the corner, but it is not—it has not yet taken place. I have a horrid feeling that that debate might be on the eve of the summit and that it simply may not be possible for the Prime Minister to be here. However, I undertake to draw the request to his attention.

I also take my hon. Friend's point that it is too early to know how events will turn out in the Balkans, although all of us obviously hope that they will improve, and we have taken some strong steps in that direction.

The Prime Minister has made five of the statements on that matter to the House. As to whether, if we had had a debate opened by the Prime Minister at an early stage, events might have gone differently, I fear that I cannot share my hon. Friend's view. As the Prime Minister has repeatedly said in the House, there have been intensive discussions with the Yugoslav authorities for a long time. Most of us would contest any suggestion that the Russians were sidelined. They have been very much a part of the discussions throughout, including right back at the beginning. I understand my hon. Friend's view and can assure him that opportunities will continue to be provided for those matters to be aired.

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): When will the electronic commerce Bill be published? It was announced with a fanfare of trumpets in the Queen's Speech, but it appears to be part of a policy that is in a certain amount of disarray. Have the Government abandoned any idea of producing such a Bill? Also, will the right hon. Lady tell us what has happened to the appointment of a so-called digital envoy? Two names were passed to No. 10 in March and we still await an announcement on whether such an envoy is to be appointed. There are rumours that the right hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Mandelson) will be appointed instead. Will the right hon. Lady deal with that matter, too?

Mrs. Beckett: I am afraid that I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a date when the Bill is likely to be published, but I hope that it will be in the near future. Nor, indeed, can I give him information about the appointment of a digital envoy, although I will certainly draw his request for information to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

[Mrs. Beckett]

Moreover, Trade and Industry questions are next week, so the hon. Gentleman may be able to ask my right hon. Friend directly.

Mr. Tony Colman (Putney): Next Wednesday, Thursday and Friday a major United Nations conference is taking place at the Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre across the road. I understand that the Deputy Prime Minister will address it, along with a number of his ministerial colleagues. The conference is organised by the World Health Organisation and is on health and the environment. A number of issues are to be considered, including a legally binding protocol on water and health, and a charter on transport, environment and health. In view of the importance of that conference, will my right hon. Friend reconsider the business for next week, or arrange for us to have a debate before the end of the month on the outcome of the conference?

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly cannot undertake today to do that, although I shall bear in mind my hon. Friend's remarks. I accept that it is an important conference and I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister will make an important contribution to it. I fear, however, that the request for a debate in this House will have to take its place on the list of eminently worthy subjects that we should debate.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): I join my right hon. Friend the shadow Leader of the House in asking for a debate at the earliest possible date on long-term care. The matter is of great importance to a growing number of people.

My real question is whether the Leader of the House is prepared to arrange for a debate in Government time on the procedural changes needed in this House as a result of devolution and the other changes that the Government have introduced to the way in which this country is governed. The right hon. Lady will know that I chair the Procedure Committee and that we recently published a report on the procedural consequences of devolution. If the House is to be fair to all parts of the United Kingdom, it is important that changes take place here to reflect the changes that the Government have brought about.

Mrs. Beckett: I have taken on board the request for a debate on long-term care. May I gently remind the hon. Gentleman and other Opposition Members that it was this Government who set up the royal commission? Although he is right to say that this is a problem of great importance, it has been around for nearly 20 years—for most of which time his party was in power. I am sure that he regrets as much as I do the fact that more was not done about long-term care at that time.

On the possibility of a debate in this House on the procedural consequences of devolution, I am aware of the important and serious work being done by the Committee chaired by the hon. Gentleman and I understand his wish to have those issues aired here in the near future. Such is the pressure on time that I cannot readily see my way to finding time for an early debate—and in due course we shall have a little more experience under our belt of how these changes are developing. I have taken on board his request, although I cannot grant it now.

Mr. Tom Levitt (High Peak): Will my right hon. Friend find time at an early stage for a debate on the subject of lip reading, given the high degree of cross-party support for my early-day motion 573?

[That this House recognises that more than eight million people are hard of hearing or severely deaf; notes that most of them rely on spoken English for communication with family or friends and for equal access to leisure and social activities, public services, employment and education; further notes that the acquisition of lipreading skills is vital to this end and that this is best facilitated through lipreading classes taught by qualified tutors; believes that such a programme will encourage people with acquired hearing loss to maximise their opportunities to remain active and participating members of society; and calls on the Secretary of State for Education and Employment to require the new local learning partnerships to recognise their role in providing lipreading classes, at no charge to hearing-impaired users, in each locality.]

The provision of lip reading classes across the country is patchy. Provision exists and access is easy in some parts but not in others, and courses are charged for in some parts but not in others. Because lip reading is so important to the older generation as they lose their hearing, it is vital that we have consistent provision and easy access to lip reading classes across the country. Will my right hon. Friend draw this matter to the attention of her right hon. Friends and arrange for an early debate on it?

Mrs. Beckett: I recognise my hon. Friend's great interest in the matter and the importance of lip reading to many people who suffer from hearing deficiencies. It is the Government's wish and intention that those who have responsibility for providing educational opportunities for adults should work together and provide effective services that are accessible to people across the community. My hon. Friend may or may not know that the disability rights task force is considering how its work on rights for people with disabilities can help to support and encourage the provision of such services. We look forward to its recommendations later in the year.

Mr. Patrick McLoughlin (West Derbyshire): Will the Leader of the House ensure that we have a statement, or an opportunity for a debate, on the national parks? Is she aware of the growing concern about the number of applications which are being submitted to national parks in respect of dormant quarries, and is the Government's view that the national parks have sufficient power to deal with them, even though there are serious questions about their power once appeals are made and about the cost of compensation? This is a matter of growing concern in the national parks—and I know that the right hon. Lady knows the Peak national park very well.

Mrs. Beckett: I understand the hon. Gentleman's concern. The national parks are a great treasure for us all. I believe that my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment has held discussions on the matter. I will draw his attention to the hon. Gentleman's remarks. He may have some information for him.

Mr. Tony McWalter (Hemel Hempstead): The centrality of biotechnology to the Government's science policy is shown by the Government's papers on scientific research. Even in particle physics and astronomy, the presentation of the figures deals more with biological and life sciences than with physics, astronomy or mathematics. Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is widespread public disquiet about biological engineering and genetic modification of crops and food? Is not the centrality of biotechnology to the Government's science policy being rapidly eroded, if not evaporating, as a result of public loss of confidence in the strategy? I therefore hope that my right hon. Friend regards as urgent the need for a debate on science policy to dispel some of the myths so that we can consider judiciously the benefits and disbenefits of the technology and get the Government's science policy—perhaps somewhat amended—back on course.

Mrs. Beckett: I recognise my hon. Friend's point. There has been some public disquiet, partly, and understandably, based on experience of some recent problems. That obviously had an impact on discussion and balanced analysis of the advantages and disadvantages of various courses of action. I understand my hon. Friend's wish for a debate on science policy and I shall bear it in mind, but I am not sure that I can find time soon for such a debate. He knows that several recent reports have started to put arguments on various sides of the case, so we are not wholly dependent on debate in this House for a wider airing of the issues.

Mr. Tony Baldry (Banbury): The Immigration and Asylum Bill is of interest to all hon. Members, but Government information officers seem to be freer with information than Ministers are in briefing the House. The "Today" programme this morning carried a detailed explanation of the concessions that the Home Secretary is apparently making to buy off a revolt by Labour Back Benchers. If that is correct—it appears to be because it was such a detailed briefing—would it not be more courteous for the Home Secretary to write to all hon. Members to explain the concessions that he intends to make on Tuesday and why he intends to make them, so that we all have time to consider them? The impression was that the Government Whips would have rung round Back Benchers to brief them over the weekend, while the rest of us would have heard nothing until Tuesday.

Mrs. Beckett: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman can be entirely serious in suggesting that information and opportunities for debate have been withheld from the House. The Bill has been to Special Standing Committee precisely to encourage open, informed debate. Any changes that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary may be considering—if he is—are no doubt in response to the many points made by the Committee and those who gave evidence to it. After all, the House exists to scrutinise legislation so that issues can be aired. I am well aware that the Government whom the hon. Gentleman supported regarded it as a black mark against Ministers if they listened to anything said by anyone who was not a member of the Government. We do not do things that way.

Mr. Peter Luff (Mid-Worcestershire): May I preface my main question by asking whether the Cologne summit has been reconvened? I understood that the Prime Minister made a statement on Tuesday on its conclusions.

Can the Leader of the House say whether the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is likely to seek to make a statement next week on his decision on the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the supply of milk? He has had it for four months and the continued uncertainty is damaging the dairy industry and farmers. On a parliamentary note, my Committee—the Select Committee on Agriculture—is anxious to begin investigating the subject but cannot do so until the Secretary of State reaches a decision.

Mrs. Beckett: May I add to what I said a moment ago to the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry)? I remind the House that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's answer to a parliamentary question on some of the issues relating to the Asylum and Immigration Bill is in Hansard. I meant to say that, but did not get round to it.

The hon. Member for Mid–Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) asked about the Cologne summit. I accept that I should not have used the shorthand and referred to "the" Cologne summit. There is a G8 summit coming up. I rather think that it is also taking place in Cologne, or at least in Germany. That is what I meant. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving me the opportunity to make that clear.

As for the report on which the hon. Gentleman commented, I am afraid that I do not have information on it. I cannot enlighten him and cannot offer to find time for a discussion on it in the near future, but I undertake to draw his concerns to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): During the recess, the Education and Employment Committee heard devastating evidence from the independent Bank of England on the employment consequences of joining the euro. The Deputy Governor said that it would take hundreds of years to know whether joining was a good idea. The Governor said that it would be an act of faith. When can we have a debate on the real threat to jobs from joining the euro?

Mrs. Beckett: I am aware of the evidence-taking sessions of the Education and Employment Committee. There is no proposal at the present time to join the euro, as I am sure the hon. Gentleman is well aware. All the issues must be borne in mind. That is precisely why the Government say that we have to consider the overall impact on Britain's national interest. If we were to have a debate on the matter in the near future—I cannot at present see my way to find time for it—it is just possible that people might get round to noticing that the Conservative party argues simultaneously that the high level of the pound is costing British jobs and that the low level of the euro is costing European jobs. It can argue one way or the other, but it will have some difficulty in continuing to argue both ways.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): Will the Leader of the House make time in the near future for a debate on an important matter relating to the way in which Parliament spends taxpayers' money—namely, the subject matter of early-day motion 709 on allowances for hon. Members representing Scottish constituencies?

[That this House notes the decision of the Scottish Parliament to reduce the allowances of regional Members of the Scottish Parliament on the grounds that they do not have constituency responsibilities; further notes that honourable Members representing Scottish constituencies will also have fewer responsibilities after 1st July 1999; and consequently invites the Senior Salaries Review Board to consider whether it is appropriate for honourable Members representing Scottish constituencies to be paid an allowance similar to that of other honourable Members.]

[Mrs. Eleanor Laing]

The right hon. Lady may not as yet be aware that, earlier this week, the Scottish Parliament passed a motion that Members who sit for regional constituencies—those who have been elected on a list—should have a reduced allowance on the grounds that they do not have constituency responsibilities. Given that, after 1 July, Members of this House who sit for Scottish constituencies will have reduced constituency responsibilities because many of those responsibilities will be taken over by MSPs, surely the House ought to have an opportunity to debate whether Scottish Members of this House should continue to receive the same allowance as Members who still have full constituency responsibilities.

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly cannot undertake to find time for such a debate in the near future. I strongly hold the view, as the hon. Lady will know, that there is not, and should not be, such a thing as two different kinds of Member of Parliament. I should be surprised if my hon. Friends who sit for Scottish and Welsh constituencies—of course, they are only hon. Friends; there are no Scottish or Welsh Members on the Conservative Benches—find their work loads reduced. The hon. Lady is asking me to comment on a decision made by the Scottish Parliament, for which I am happy to say that I do not have responsibility.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): This week, we have heard the Prime Minister extol the virtues of both the single market and the single currency. Will the Leader of the House give him the opportunity to come to the House to explain to us and to the people of this country why he has changed his mind? In 1983, he stood on a platform of leaving the European Community. In 1986, with the Labour party, he voted against the Single European Act, which set up the single market. The right hon. Lady may not be aware that, in 1986, when the right hon. Gentleman opposed the European monetary system, the precursor of economic and monetary union, he said:

"the EMS is essentially a deutschmark bloc. It could be said that we would be putting Herr Pöhl"—

the then president of the Bundesbank—

"in 11 Downing street."—[Official Report, 29 January 1986; Vol. 90, c. 990.]

Should we not now know why the Prime Minister not only believes that he was so fundamentally wrong on Europe for all that time, but thinks that people should vote for him today because he is now so miraculously right on it?

Mrs. Beckett: I certainly cannot undertake to find time for such a debate. Apart from anything else, it would clearly be a complete waste of time. It does not seem to have struck the hon. Gentleman that, although the Conservative party put through the Single European Act, many Conservative Members seem to regret it. If we are talking about people changing their minds, the Conservatives should look into their own record.

As to why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister might have changed his mind since 1983, no doubt he did so for the same reasons that I changed mine. I was an anti-European and a sceptic long before some of those Conservative Members who now make those claims—and with much more assiduity than them. However, I realise that it was the decision of the British people to remain in the European Community and that that decision was reaffirmed in 1983. The balance of advantage and damage of staying in or coming out has long since swung in favour of our membership of the European Union, as it now is. In that case, there is no question but that it is in Britain's interests to work to make the greatest possible success of our membership of the European Union. That is the Government's goal, because we have long since concluded that to leave the EU would be a huge disaster for Britain. However, that seems to be the direction of the Conservative party.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): I support the views expressed by the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Luff) about the importance of the publication of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report into Milk Marque. That is crucial to dairy farmers and food processors in my constituency and throughout the country.

My main reason for rising is to welcome the debate on Kosovo. Will it cover not only the important subjects of foreign affairs and defence but the essential responsibilities of the Secretary of State for International Development? Will we consider the humanitarian efforts that have been accomplished during recent months and those that will be undertaken in the future? Will the debate cover the important question of the extent to which the budget of the Department for International Development will be protected to enable the Department to do its job, not only in the Balkans but elsewhere?

Mrs. Beckett: I cannot add to what I said earlier about the MMC report. I have undertaken to draw hon. Members' concerns to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

I am sure that issues touching on the responsibilities of the Department for International Development are bound to be raised during the debate on Kosovo. That will give an opportunity for hon. Members to put questions such as those which the hon. Gentleman has just asked me.

Mr. John Bercow (Buckingham): Will the Leader of the House find time for a statement next week on any Government proposals which we can debate for a statutory allocation of time off for involvement in future European elections? I am sure that the right hon. Lady will understand that I make that request not because I want to bunk off myself—she knows that I am an assiduous attender of the Chamber—but for a different reason. Although Conservative Members of Parliament found plenty of time to campaign for national self-government and for Britain to be in Europe, but not run by Europe, I am genuinely concerned—on the grounds of the importance of the vitality of our democracy—that Ministers seemed unable to find time to argue for Labour's policy of capitulation within the European Union. Does the right hon. Lady intend to address that point in future?

Mrs. Beckett: I was not quite clear for whom the hon. Gentleman was asking for time off during future European elections. I now understand that it is for the House—for Members of Parliament. If he has been paying attention—as I know that he does during Question Time—he may recall that I have pointed out previously that there is only one precedent for the House not sitting during European elections. That was in 1994, when the Conservative Government were desperate to avoid scrutiny of any kind.

As for Ministers not finding time to campaign, I am afraid that I must disappoint the hon. Gentleman: 250 campaign visits have been undertaken by Ministers since the local elections.

Mr. Bercow: Unnoticed.

Mrs. Beckett: Indeed, it is a matter of much concern to many of my right hon. and hon. Friends that they did not achieve more publicity. We have come to a conclusion as to why that is so; it is because we have been consistently advocating the same policy throughout the campaign, which the press find very boring, whereas the Conservatives, excitingly, change their policy every day.

BILLS PRESENTED

Food Standards

Mr. Nicholas Brown, supported by the Prime Minister, Mr. Secretary Prescott, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Secretary Reid, Mr. Secretary Dobson, Secretary Marjorie Mowlam and Mr. Secretary Michael, presented a Bill to establish the Food Standards Agency and make provision as to its functions, to amend the law relating to food safety and other interests of consumers in relation to food; to enable provision to be made in relation to the notification of tests for food-borne diseases; to enable provision to be made in relation to animal feedingstuffs; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 117].

Royal Parks (Trading)

Mr. Peter Brooke presented a Bill to make provision about certain offences under section 2 of the Parks Regulation (Amendment) Act 1926: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow, and to be printed [Bill 116].

Defence in the World

[Relevant documents: The Third Report from the Defence Committee, Session 1998–99, on 'The future of NATO: The Washington Summit', HC 39, and the Government's response thereto, HC 459.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Mike Hall.]

1.20 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. George Robertson): The choice of title for this debate—defence in the world—could not be more appropriate. The defence and security of our country can be guaranteed only by looking beyond the immediate horizons of the United Kingdom. Our security is inextricably linked to the security of our continent and the wider world. As Kosovo has demonstrated only too well, it is only by standing firm with our friends and allies that we can secure peace and stability.

Britain's contribution to collective defence and international security is founded on a unique national asset—the capabilities and commitment of our armed forces. I am sure that the House will join me in paying tribute to the men and women of the Royal Navy, the Royal Air Force and the Army, and to their families and the civilians who support them, at a time when the demands that we place upon them are greater than ever.

During the strategic defence review, one of our concerns was the growing lack of knowledge and understanding in society as a whole about defence and the armed forces. In future, we might have to return to that problem of keeping defence in the public eye, but—for the time being at least—the role of the services and the skill and dedication of our service personnel are clear to everyone who picks up a newspaper or turns on a television. Kosovo provides an object lesson in the need to be able to deploy high-capability armed forces when diplomacy fails—a need that was at the heart of the strategic defence review.

Sadly, it took 11 weeks of concerted NATO bombing before Milosevic and his generals were prepared to agree terms for the withdrawal of Serb forces from that tragic province, thus paving the way for the introduction of an international military force to enable the return of the refugees. Now, we must ensure that the final diplomatic steps are taken, that the Serbs abide by their word, and that KFOR crosses the border as soon as possible. We hope that, very soon, the military focus will shift from the air campaign to the task facing the ground troops and all those engaged in the reconstruction of Kosovo. We wish them well.

On this remarkable day, it might help if I remind the House how we got to this position: how we worked, since at least February 1998, to try to get a political settlement and halt the violence then taking place in Kosovo; how we went the extra mile for peace; and how we adopted a series of economic sanctions in the European Union and a mandatory United Nations arms embargo on the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. In October last year, as Ambassador Richard Holbrooke visited Belgrade against the background of a worsening security situation in Kosovo, we went back to the UN. We got a chapter VII resolution, determining that that was a threat to regional peace and security and that there was an imminent humanitarian catastrophe.

[Mr. George Robertson]

NATO played its part by threatening the use of force. Milosevic listened, because the threat was credible. In October, he did a deal with Holbrooke, promising to reduce the number of his forces and to restrict their operations, and to allow unarmed verifiers into Kosovo. He then reneged on his word and, through no fault of their own, the members of the Kosovo verification mission were unable to prevent matters from worsening. Then, in January, there was the massacre at Racak.

For 18 days in February, the parties were brought together, under joint British-American chairmanship, in the chateau at Rambouillet. A vital part of the Rambouillet accords concerned the military implementation arrangements; at their heart was a NATO-led military peacekeeping force to ensure a stable security situation in Kosovo. However, when the talks moved on to Paris, it was immediately apparent that Milosevic was unwilling to have any military implementation force at all and that he was simply creating obstacles to a settlement.

At this late stage, there was still a place for diplomacy—but Milosevic let it pass, calculating that the international community lacked resolution. How wrong he was. Since then, we have had more than 11 weeks of bombing, in which the Royal Air Force and Royal Navy submarine-launched cruise missiles played an important part.

Eventually, the pressure wore the Serbs down. We never said that it would be easy, and so it proved. On 2 June, Milosevic and the Serbian Parliament agreed a peace plan put to them on behalf of the international community by President Martti Ahtisaari of Finland and Viktor Chernomyrdin, the Russian representative. Last night, following considerable prevarication in the past few days, senior representatives of the Yugoslav army and of the Ministry of the Interior police signed the detailed agreement committing them to a tight withdrawal timetable.

Let me make one thing absolutely clear. The military technical agreement signed last night was not "negotiated" with the Serbs in the tent at Kumanovo. NATO made no concessions. Any changes to the agreement were made purely on the grounds of military practicability. General Sir Michael Jackson is no soft touch and he has done a remarkable job.

The task in front of General Jackson and the international community is formidable. The Serbs' track record of honouring promises is certainly not good. Once a verifiable—I emphasise that word—withdrawal has begun, there can be a pause in the bombing. The United Nations Security Council resolution, the text of which the G8 Foreign Ministers have already agreed, can then be passed. KFOR, with its strong NATO core and its unified command, can then deploy. Only when all Serb forces are out of Kosovo—and the security zone within Serbia itself—will the campaign be brought to an end.

Mr. David Heath (Somerton and Frome): Although I understand that this would not form part of the military technical agreement, is there any sign that Yugoslav army troop concentrations will also be withdrawn from Montenegro? Is there any way of monitoring the extent to which the Yugoslav forces remain in Montenegro in the next few months?

Mr. Robertson: No, because this agreement is about Kosovo and the campaign was about Kosovo. It has been agreed that the Serbian forces inside Kosovo will be withdrawn into other parts of Serbia, not into Montenegro. The hon. Gentleman's point about the importance of Montenegro is well taken. President Djukanovic, the elected President of Montenegro, is an individual of some character: he expressed several views during the conflict that clearly mark him as a man for the future.

We are very sensitive to the prevailing circumstances in that part of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. If, by some mischance, Milosevic had won and if alliance unity had not held strong, he would certainly have turned his attention from Kosovo—where he had succeeded in expelling a dissident population—to Montenegro and tried to subjugate it to the same form of dictatorship as appears to be his only ambition.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath) made an important point. Will the NATO alliance monitor extremely carefully the possibility that Serb forces within Serbia—which can now be replaced by those withdrawing from Kosovo—will, as a consequence of the withdrawal from Kosovo, augment the Serbian military presence in Montenegro, thereby putting pressure on its civil democratic Government and potentially destabilising a fragile political situation?

Mr. Robertson: Yes, of course, we shall monitor the situation as it develops. As I have said, Montenegro is relevant to the future of the Balkans. We made it absolutely clear that, if Milosevic attempted to destabilise the Government of Montenegro, the NATO alliance and the wider international community would consider that of the utmost seriousness.

Kosovo is a tragedy. British soldiers, sailors, aircrew and ground crew have helped to prevent it from becoming a permanent disaster. They are bringing hope to hundreds of thousands of victims of this last great act of 20th century barbarity at the heart of our continent. Kosovo contains major lessons for the international community, and in analysing them we must beware of preparing to refight the last war. That process of analysis will be helped by the fact that, in most respects, Kosovo is an operation of the kind that we have been preparing to conduct since the strategic defence review. All the main themes of the review have applied in one form or another.

How can defence help to ensure that the next century is different, and that it is a century of dialogue rather than one of destruction? Our starting point must be a realistic assessment of the world in which we live and with which we have to deal.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Before the Secretary of State leaves the subject of Kosovo, I want to ask a question. He knows very well that an enormous problem faces any military personnel who have to distinguish between civilians and guerrillas. That will be particularly difficult in the case of the ethnic Albanian community and the Kosovo Liberation Army. What are the Secretary of State's views on the disarming of the KLA? Will he tell the House what undertakings have been given by the KLA's chain of command?

Mr. Robertson: Of course there will be problems for the implementation force and KFOR, one of which is the problem that my hon. Friend has identified. If any of the Serb paramilitaries decide to stay out of uniform or if other irregulars do not obey their central command, the difficulty of identifying them and dealing with them will be formidable. However, I know that General Jackson has already faced up to that problem and I have absolutely no doubt that he has made plans.

The KLA will be part and parcel of the UN Security Council resolution, and its demilitarisation is a fundamental part of rebuilding the security of the area. The KLA's leadership have publicly made it clear that they will co-operate with the terms of the UN Security Council resolution and, having signed up to Rambouillet and the strictures applied by that agreement, they will take on themselves another obligation in the new circumstances.

As I said, we must have a realistic assessment of the world in which we live and with which we have to deal. We do not need rose-coloured spectacles that mislead us about the risks and challenges or comments of despair that leave us wringing our hands on the sidelines. There are those who have said, "We can do nothing. This is a civil war. Let the blood flow and eventually the situation will stabilise." We have conclusively proved those people wrong. I hope that, at some point, they will apologise for the situation that they would have created if we had been so foolish as to take their advice.

Two years on from the analysis of Britain's security priorities in the changing world that underpinned the strategic defence review, it gives me no pleasure or satisfaction to say that events have borne out our assessment. At the most strategic level, we still face no threat to our national survival, and the prospect of such a threat emerging in the foreseeable future looks, if anything, even more remote.

Instability, however, continues to bring human suffering on an almost unimaginable scale in its wake. In Europe, Kosovo is the starkest example of the consequences of the break-up of states and the ethnic and religious conflict that follows it. Further from home—in successive crises in central Africa, for example—the lesson that international peace and stability is about the lives of ordinary people has been repeated time and again.

The strategic defence review concluded that Britain had a clear national interest in working to deal with such problems and an equally clear responsibility to do so. The Government committed themselves to a security and defence policy based on engagement and not isolation. We pledged ourselves to use the armed forces as a force for good in the world and to play a leadership role that would enable us to make a difference. Our policy was not an easy option. With the benefit of hindsight, however, I am more firmly convinced than ever that it was the right option for the UK.

Today's challenge is to make the post-cold war institutional framework work more effectively. There has never been a single institutional answer to Britain's security requirements. Too often, however, we have sacrificed operational effectiveness for political symbolism. Our European defence initiative, which was developed in close partnership with France and has been embraced by allies and partners on both sides of the Atlantic, is designed to redress that balance.

At last week's European Council in Cologne, European Union Heads of State and Government endorsed progress so far on that initiative, and pointed the way forward. We are all determined that the EU should play a full role on the international stage. The in-coming Finnish presidency has been invited to take forward the work that is necessary to develop, in the EU, the means to take decisions on crisis-management tasks and political control of military operations.

I draw the House's attention in this context to the sterling contribution to resolving the Kosovo crisis made by the President of Finland, Martti Ahtisaari. We were all hugely impressed not just by his brilliant and eloquent English on our television screens but by the superb and elegant diplomacy that led to President Milosevic accepting the inevitable.

The agreement at last week's European summit in Cologne builds on NATO's Washington summit, where the allies stated their willingness to adopt arrangements for ready access by the EU to the collective assets and capabilities of the alliance. It is also fully consistent with the UK's approach to the European security and defence debate. We have argued for developing capabilities for defence decision making in the EU, while drawing the bulk of military capability from the forces which we and our allies contribute to NATO.

We have also consistently made it clear that this debate must address the shortfalls in European military capability. At Cologne, the EU member states committed themselves to developing more effective European military capabilities. That will—I say "will" and not "would" because I believe that there is a determination across our continent—allow us to make a stronger and more coherent contribution to NATO and to take action when the alliance as a whole is not engaged.

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): On capabilities, many people are concerned—I am sure that the Secretary of State is much concerned as well—that, given the stretching of our commitments and, perhaps, an unending commitment in Kosovo, we will not have the number of men required. Is he going to cover that subject, and say whether he intends to increase the number of soldiers in the armed forces?

Mr. Robertson: I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are increasing the size of the Army. By contrast with the previous drift downwards in numbers, the strategic defence review proposed an increase of 3,000 personnel. That is probably the first time that the Army has been increased by a peacetime defence review. The extra people will be used for the enhancements requested by the Army, which we believe are necessary.

Of course the present crisis, and the handling of the existing crises elsewhere, whether in Northern Ireland or Bosnia, will impose a strain, especially on human beings. Although recruitment has increased dramatically in some arms of the services since last year, because of the degree of overstretch, retention is becoming a bigger problem. That is a matter of concern for the House as a whole, especially for Ministers, and we are addressing it. I might point out to the hon. Gentleman that our objective is to increase the size of the Army beyond simply filling the gap in recruitment that we inherited, so as to make our forces stronger and more usable.

[Mr. Robertson]

Mr. Menzies Campbell (North-East Fife): Last night, while answering questions on his helpful and welcome statement, the Secretary of State told the House that about 10 per cent. of the forces now deployed in Bosnia come from the Territorial Army. Has he now an open mind about the extent to which he should reconsider the assumptions in the strategic defence review about the Territorial Army, especially the assumptions about its numbers? If, as most people now accept, we are in for a long haul in Kosovo, is there not likely to be a requirement for more extensive use than expected of soldiers from the TA to ensure that our presence in Kosovo is maintained at proper strength?

Mr. Robertson: We are always looking to see where the reserve forces can help the regular forces. That is why, alongside the increase in the regular strength of the Army, we reshaped and restructured the Territorial Army so that in circumstances such as those that we now face, it will be more relevant and useful.

I wish that those who speak out about the Territorial Army would recognise that the reforms that we put in place have now been accepted by the Territorial, Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Association and the TA and are being implemented with enthusiasm. We are already hearing strong messages from the TA that it has got precisely what it asked for. The training time has been increased, better equipment is now available, and the TA is being directed towards more relevant functions. All that is designed specifically to make it more usable, more integrated and more deployable, so that, when their country needs them, the TA's forces will be available.

There is little or nothing left of the grumbling now. People are getting on with the job that they have been set and making it work. They are content that the right decision was taken at the right time, and that the Territorial Army has a considerable future role to play within the forces. I hope that people with genuine concerns will recognise that our purpose was to prepare for the sort of conditions that exist now, rather than having large numbers of people in the Territorial Army trained up for functions completely irrelevant to the present moment.

Mr. Gerald Howarth (Aldershot): The right hon. Gentleman suggested that his increase in the regular Army would meet the needs of the commitments already under way. However, the additional troops are not expected to be fully in place until 2004. In the meantime, what percentage of Land Command is committed to operations?

Does the right hon. Gentleman not understand that, if I may say as much to him, he is giving a slight impression of complacency? He has great ambitions for Britain to play a role in the world, yet he seems not to will the means by which those ambitions can be fulfilled. As I said to him last night, it is likely that our troops will be heavily committed for a long time in Kosovo.

Mr. Robertson: I certainly do not feel complacent. Yes, I feel fatigue that is tinged with elements of relief and pride, but not complacent when so many of our troops are engaged in what, over the next few days, will be dangerous activity by any standards.

When I say that we produced a strategic defence review and that I intend to have it implemented, I am talking not from complacency but from a driving ambition that we shall match our ambitions as a nation with our capabilities. I shall not be partisan because I know that most people have forgotten that there was a Government before the Labour Government. However, we inherited— [Interruption.] The Opposition are trying to forget that more than the country is. We are not even allowed to mention the Conservative Government any more.

We inherited a very serious manning situation. That was especially so in the Army but it applied in the other two arms as well. It is a problem that we are addressing. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces who, because of a family bereavement, unfortunately cannot be in the Chamber, has done sterling work. I believe that the figures for Army recruitment are up by 17 per cent. on last year's. We are also addressing the problems of retention, which will make up the balance. There is no complacency about our determination to ensure that we have and retain the best armed forces. As for the specific question about the number of troops who are on operations, I shall give the House the latest figures in a moment.

The House might like to be informed of the situation in the outside world. I understand that the latest information from NATO is that Supreme Allied Commander Europe is unlikely to be in a position to verify the withdrawal of Serb forces by 3 pm, as was earlier anticipated. This will inevitably delay somewhat the passing of the Security Council resolution. We have always made it clear that the withdrawal of Serb troops, which we are confident will take place, must be proven and verifiable before we move into the next stages. When we receive information, I shall ensure that the House is kept informed.

Defence and security policy is much more than large-scale multinational operations and sweeping diplomatic initiatives.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): A propos the right hon. Gentleman's comment about there being no signal that Serb forces have begun withdrawal, how long are we prepared to wait until we get this signal? Was there not a statement made at some time during the past few days that, if they did not comply with what they had agreed, bombing would be restarted? Am I correct in that?

Mr. Robertson: Yes. It has been made clear that, if there was any non-compliance with the agreement that has been arrived at, the air assaults will recommence. We mean that; we mean business. I did not say that there had been no withdrawals. I said that SACEUR was not yet in a position to verify withdrawals. There were certainly signs this morning that some troop formations, which could well have been preparations for movement, were taking place. It is only when we are certain that there have been withdrawals that we shall pause from the bombing campaign. We are still hopeful that that will be done, but our patience is not endless.

As I have said, defence and security policy is much more than large-scale multinational operations and huge diplomatic initiatives. It must embrace all activities that can contribute to stability and security, and hence to preventing crisis and conflict. The strategic defence review gave renewed impetus to defence diplomacy in activities of this kind.

In parallel with the grander initiatives, the armed forces make a contribution to humanitarian missions that all too often goes unrecognised. For example, in Sierra Leone, they have helped to deliver essential food and medical supplies, to clear wells contaminated by rebel forces and to re-open local schools that were damaged during the nightmare of fighting that took place in that country.

For the longer term, we are now helping to get Sierra Leone back on its feet by contributing training and advice for the creation of democratically accountable armed forces. Using the armed forces' skills for defence diplomacy and in operations of this kind is an investment in conflict prevention and crisis management that results in vital but often unquantifiable benefits.

The armed forces have also played an important role in the fight against the international drugs trade. Last week, HMS Marlborough seized 4 tonnes of cocaine in an operation in the Caribbean—its second seizure inside a week. That was an excellent example of co-operation between the United States and the United Kingdom in the fight against drugs activity in the Caribbean, which was highlighted in the strategic defence review.

The MOD takes seriously its commitment to the security of UK nationals overseas and can deploy effectively and at short notice when there is a possible threat to the lives of British citizens overseas. That commitment has been demonstrated most notably in response to conflicts in Africa over the past 12 months—in Sierra Leone, the Congo and Eritrea.

At the heart of the strategic defence review was the recognition that security depends upon our willingness and ability to deploy high-capability armed forces when diplomacy fails. Sadly, that has been underlined by recent events.

Our forces must be deployable at short notice and in difficult and inhospitable terrain. They must be sustainable, often with the minimum of host nation support, and in operations that will inevitably be prolonged. We are obliged to maintain concurrent commitments with separate lines of communication, as we see in Kosovo, Bosnia and the Gulf.

Operations are placing a premium on precision weapons and force protection. With 50 per cent. of the British Army now engaged in, preparing for, or recovering from, operations, we cannot afford the luxury of unusable forces. No one could have predicted precisely the nature of our commitment in Kosovo, but the strategic defence review provided a template that fits in most respects.

Indeed, the main problems that we face are in exactly those capability areas in which shortfalls were identified in the SDR but in which, barely a year after the publication of the report, implementation has not yet been completed. The strategic air and sea transport, additional soldiers to man the second line of logistic communications, and the extra deployable brigade for the Army, all of which are in the pipeline, would all have been welcome enhancements to our Kosovo commitment.

As I said, the high level of commitments leads to increased pressure on individuals, especially in some of the critical specialisations. Until the necessary restructuring identified by the strategic defence review is complete and full manning, particularly in the Army, is achieved, many of our people will be redeploying on operational commitments more often than is desirable for operational effectiveness or the health of family life for our armed forces.

Those who are affected are not only from the "teeth" arms, such as armoured infantry battalions and air crew, but from elements of the very important supporting arms, such as communications personnel. We are vigorously pushing ahead to achieve the restructuring and full manning to relieve pressure on our people and their families.

In opening the debate, I have inevitably concentrated to a large extent on Kosovo. It is right that we should focus on the greatest challenge to security and stability in Europe since the end of the cold war. However, it would be a mistake to treat the circumstances of Kosovo as unique. Milosevic, ethnic hatred and ethnic cleansing, the humanitarian crises in south-eastern Europe and more widely, the risks of overspill and destabilisation—all these carry powerful lessons for every one of us.

I spoke at the outset about keeping defence in the public eye. We must not cease to strive to ensure that defence in Britain is stronger and better integrated into society, so that the contribution made by our service men and women as a force for good in peacetime, crisis and conflict in the world will go on. We must be prepared to contribute as well.

Long after NATO has achieved its objectives in Kosovo, long after the headline writers have moved on to the next subject and the next crisis, a job of work will still be being done in that area, as it is in Kosovo today, by men and women who, supported by the civilians who back them up and by the families who are an integral part of that great team, have committed themselves to international law and order. Without them, it would be a much more dangerous world for future generations.

1.55 pm

Mr. John Maples (Stratford-on-Avon): Kosovo has dominated defence and foreign policy issues for some three months now, almost to the exclusion of everything else. I shall use today's debate to talk about one or two other issues that may not have had the attention that they deserve during the last three months.

The Secretary of State spent a lot of time talking about Kosovo, and not much on other issues, perhaps because, as appeared, he did not have anything new or interesting to say about them. However, there have been some interesting developments, and I want to spend some time on the European security and defence identity.

Before I do so, I shall say a word about the timing of the debate. We have one debate a year on defence policy, which is important. Defence is not high on the political agenda at the moment, but it is fundamental to our security. It is the only one of three debates in which the Secretary of State has spoken, yet the Government have scheduled it on European elections day, when they must know that hardly any hon. Members will be here. I am sure that it is not the day that the Secretary of State himself would have chosen, but will he have a word with the business managers to see whether future debates can be held on a day when many more hon. Members are present? A Thursday would usually be a good choice, but not when the European elections are being held.

[Mr. John Maples]

I want to consider one or two issues briefly before coming to the European defence identity. Defence industries are undergoing a major restructuring. I am delighted to see the British Aerospace-Marconi merger, which I hope will successfully jump all the regulatory hurdles.

The policy pushed by the Government and initiated by other European Heads of Government to try to create a European defence and aerospace conglomerate was misconceived. If we do not maintain a transatlantic link, we shall not be anywhere. The fortress Europe against the fortress America model, which that would have created, would have led us down a blind alley. The Americans spend three times as much on defence research as Britain, France and Germany combined. If we had cut ourselves off from the United States in terms of markets and technology, we would have gone down a blind alley for which we would have paid for a long time.

The commercial realities that British Aerospace and GEC have introduced give us some hope that one of the three or four global defence companies, which I imagine will develop during the next few years, will have a significant British component and British base, both in employment and technology. I hope that those commercial considerations will continue to prevail, that transatlantic links will be developed between European and north American defence corporations and that we shall not try to corral people into United States and European manufacturing fortresses.

The Secretary of State touched on the strategic defence review, rather optimistically because Kosovo has revealed some weaknesses in that in terms of a mismatch between resources and commitment. Overstretch is getting worse. We shall want to take a detailed look at that when the war is over, as that will probably be the right time to do so. We do not know what the long-term troop commitment to Kosovo will be, or whether it will extend into other parts of the Balkans, as I suspect that it will. I suspect that we shall have a long-term commitment in Bosnia and Kosovo, and perhaps elsewhere as well. My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) will deal with that in more detail when he replies.

What is happening with regard to the Bloody Sunday inquiry is appalling. I wrote to the Secretary of State about that some time ago. I know that the Ministry of Defence is trying to help those involved, but, if the inquiry has handed over the names of serving paratroop officers to lawyers for the victims, that is an extraordinarily cavalier way to deal with people's lives and safety and the security of their families. I know that the matter is back in court for judicial review of the inquiry's ruling, and I do not intend to talk about the ruling for that reason, but I urge the Secretary of State to do everything that he can to make sure that that simply does not happen. If anything happened to those families or those soldiers, it would be an inexcusable lapse of duty—

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Lord): Order. I think the hon. Gentleman has made his point and it would be advisable if he did not pursue it any further.

Mr. Maples: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Gerald Howarth: My hon. Friend has mentioned the part that is being played by the Ministry of Defence in supporting the soldiers concerned in their legal costs, and that is to be welcomed warmly. Is he aware that I wrote to the Prime Minister, who has ultimate responsibility for those matters, on 11 May and 8 June, and that I have not had the courtesy of a substantive reply from him? Is that not disgraceful?

Mr. Maples: Yes, it is, but I must say that I received a reply from the Secretary of State and we have talked about this matter, which my hon. Friend has pursued assiduously; he represents Aldershot, where the Parachute Regiment is based, and I hope that he will continue to press his case. The solution to the problem is in the Government's hands and they could alter the terms of reference of the inquiry to provide anonymity.

Mr. George Robertson: There is a judicial review; the matter is in the courts today and it would be highly improper for any of us to discuss it in Parliament. However, the hon. Gentleman chose to raise the issue of the allegations that are being made about the disclosure of some of the soldiers' names. That is, first and foremost, a matter for the independent inquiry and its spokesmen have said that it is investigating the circumstances in which the documents were released and the status of those papers in terms of their earlier public availability. We are of course concerned about the safety of any individuals and we are urgently considering what needs to be done.

Mr. Maples: Some matters are absolutely for the inquiry; I completely agree and I have not touched on those.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I repeat what I said earlier: nothing more ought to be said on that particular subject and we ought to move on.

Mr. Maples: A public consultation is taking place on the Government's proposals for the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency, and we will respond in some detail to that, but we are concerned about total privatisation. Certainly partial privatisation—[Interruption.] No, the reason is that some agencies of government are not performing quasi-commercial activities and the Government need them as an independent source of advice and evaluation. They need such advice on computers and telecommunications—they have an agency, which they have not privatised—and I think that they need it on defence.

If the Government were to rely on commercial organisations—which are motivated by commercial considerations and could be in partnership with a competitor to a bid that they were evaluating—it would be difficult for them to know that they were receiving independent, objective advice. Whatever the outcome and whatever the solution, we want them to make sure that they have available to them independent and objective evaluation of, and advice on, defence proposals and technologies. It is, of course, important that the manufacturers involved in Government deals also have confidence in that arrangement.

Before moving on to European defence, let me say a word about Bishopton. We have the basis of a problem in other areas because, in pursuit of reduced costs, the Government are inviting people from around the world to bid for contracts. Foreign suppliers bid on a marginal cost basis, but the Governments for whom they work do not usually put their own contracts out to tender. In the case of Bishopton, foreign companies were able to bid on the basis of marginal cost and their costs were financed by contracts with their own Governments, which were not put out to tender. Royal Ordnance, however, has to bid for such contracts on a full-cost basis. That may save the Government some money, but an absolutely inevitable consequence is that organisations such as Royal Ordnance will disappear and we will be reliant on foreign suppliers. We have been in trouble with that in the past.

The Secretary of State said that he was not prepared to spend £20 million—arguably, the figure is considerably less than that—but we have to be 100 per cent. certain that we are prepared to rely on foreign supplies for ammunition. It is one thing to buy aeroplanes or tanks from foreign countries—once we have them, we have them—but buying renewable supplies such as the ammunition needed to make aeroplanes or tanks of any military use at all is a different matter altogether.

I turn to the development of the European security and defence identity and its relationship with NATO. We have seen a 180 degree U-turn in Government policy. This was not Government policy during the election, and it was not Government policy during the strategic defence review, whose report made no reference to the European Union's having any role here. In fact, it said:

"Development of the European Security and Defence Identity within NATO will enable the Western European Union to carry out these roles".

At the Amsterdam summit two years ago, the Prime Minister spoke of the proposals to which he signed up in Cologne last week. He said that Europe's defence should remain a matter for NATO and not the EU, which had proved itself unable to run a successful foreign policy.

"What matters is what works; and what works for Britain and for Europe is NATO," he said. The Franco-German plan was

"like an ill-judged transplant operation".

What was an ill-judged transplant operation in May 1997 has apparently become the solution to all our problems in May 1999. That is a 180-degree U-turn, of which we have had absolutely no explanation. It is no use the Secretary of State pretending that it is not a great big change. Whether it is right or wrong is a matter for debate, but to say that there has been no change is to fly in the face of the evidence.

It all changed in the run-up to the Portschacht summit in Austria at the end of last year. While the debate on the strategic defence review was proceeding in the House, the Prime Minister was briefing the political editor of The Times that he was prepared to drop Britain's long-standing objections to the EU's having a defence capability. That was confirmed at the Portschacht summit, when the Prime Minister spoke of developing mechanisms that were "complementary to NATO"—not part of NATO, but complementary to it.

As I have said, this represents a fundamental shift. On 19 October—on the same day, and probably at the very same hour, that the Prime Minister was briefing Phil Webster—the Secretary of State told the House:

"The Government's view on the common foreign and security policy and how it relates to European defence was determined definitively at the Amsterdam summit . . . The challenge for the European Union is . . . to apply the common foreign and security policy to events".—[Official Report, 19 October 1998; Vol. 317, c. 974.]

That reiteration of the Amsterdam position took place exactly when the Prime Minister was doing his 180-degree U-turn.

Winding up the debate on the following day, the Under-Secretary said exactly the same. He had not been brought up to speed at that point. He said:

"We are also playing a central role in developing an effective European security and defence identity in NATO."—[Official Report, 20 October 1998; Vol. 317, c. 1176.]

The Prime Minister is clearly talking about the possibility of doing something outside NATO.

Others realised the significance of the Prime Minister's point. In "Bulletin Quotidien Europe" of 26 to 27 October, a couple of days later, the Prime Minister was seen as going much further than he had in his Times interview. This was considered to be the sign of a true reversal of British policy, which was traditionally hostile to the European Union's responsibility for security and defence matters. It may not have been seen as a reversal of policy by Defence Ministers, but that is how it was seen by our allies and partners in Europe.

My hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) was so concerned about the change of attitude that he secured an Adjournment debate. [HON. MEMBERS: "Where is he?"] I have no idea where he is, but I am sure that he will be here on Thursday to make his points in the Kosovo debate.

My hon. Friend performed a useful service to the House, because, in replying to his Adjournment debate, the Under-Secretary rather let the cat out of the bag by saying that his aim was "to enable the European Union to have a more united and influential voice".—[Official Report, 11 November 1998; Vol. 319, c. 301.]

It had taken a couple of weeks to bring the Under-Secretary up to speed, but he was up to speed by then.

Mr. Robathan: My hon. Friend is absolutely right about the common European security and defence identity. However, I feel that I must apologise in advance for the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt) on Thursday. I happen to know that he will be visiting the Duma on that day.

Mr. Maples: I am told that my hon. Friend the Member for Reigate is out campaigning in the European elections today. No doubt, that is what all the other 200 or 300 hon. Members who would be present if this were not the day of the European elections are doing.

Let us be clear about what we are discussing. We are discussing a European security and defence identity—not an identity within NATO, as set out in the 1996 Berlin NATO summit, by the Prime Minister in Amsterdam or by the Secretary of State for Defence during the debate on the strategic defence review, but a European Union military capability. That is fundamentally different.

The Prime Minister took his position a little further in an article in the New York Times on 12 November, where he said:

"To speak with authority, the European Union also needs to be able to act militarily on its own . . . Britain backs that".

[Mr. Maples]

The next day, at the North Atlantic Assembly in Edinburgh, he did the same by saying:

"We must change this, by ensuring that the EU can speak with a single, authoritative voice on the key international issues of the day, and can intervene effectively where necessary."

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): Does my hon. Friend agree that the key point about a common foreign and security policy is not simply whether European NATO states and EU states that are not in NATO agree to work in harmony on defence issues, but whether a majority of those states can impose a defence or foreign policy commitment on a minority of those states that might disagree?

Mr. Maples: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Clearly, at present, that is a separate pillar of the European Union, and it will require unanimity to do anything, but we have been down that road a few times before on other subjects. We find that what starts out requiring unanimity soon does not. I will come to our reasons for thinking that European defence is much better dealt with in NATO than within the European Union and why it will be dangerous to have two overlapping alliances.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: I am most interested in the hon. Gentleman's analysis. As he knows, I take a much more sympathetic view towards the idea of a European security and defence identity. If his fears are well founded, why is it that, in the United States, there has been support for the initiative that the Government have been taking, with the support of others, including ourselves?

Mr. Maples: I will come to the United States position, but it is not supportive of that idea. It supports the development of the European security and defence identity within NATO. It makes that clear again and again. What was agreed at Cologne breaches the principles that Madeleine Albright set out in her Financial Times article about decoupling, discrimination and duplication. When one talks to American diplomats and the American State Department privately, they say that they are very concerned about the matter. I will come to why that is so.

Therefore, there has been a fundamental shift in defence policy. There has been no change of circumstances. There has been no international event to provoke the necessity for rethinking our defence alliance arrangements. There has been no explanation of why the shift has happened. The House of Commons has not had an explanation of why the Government have thought it appropriate to make a 180 degree change on defence policy.

It is a big change. We have had no explanation. The Secretary of State made no attempt to explain it today, and the Prime Minister made no attempt to explain it on Tuesday, because it is being done not for its own sake but for the sake of good relations with Europe. If we can throw a few British interests into the pot to have a better weekend in Austria, Cologne or wherever it is, let us do it. It has been done not to improve our security, but because the UK is not in the euro.

We are running up from 1 January 1999. Everyone else will be in the euro. The Prime Minister wants to be at the centre of Europe, at the core of decision-making. He is getting left behind because we are not in the euro. He needs to find something else that will get him into it. That is an appalling way to govern the country, where the UK's national interest is not put first; the Prime Minister's ego is. It is, apparently, not enough for him to enjoy the sycophantic adulation from his Back Benchers; he needs it abroad as well.

I cannot think why the Prime Minister bothers to go to these meetings because he just signs up to anything that the French or Germans put in front of him. We saw that then. We saw it at St. Malo and in Cologne. We saw it when the presidency document on the matter was signed by the Government without debate or criticism. That is not the right way to look after our interests.

Our position on the issue is what it has always been and what the Government's was until 19 October last year: the development of a European security and defence identity within NATO is an excellent idea. Michael Portillo was at the forefront of the initiative at the Berlin NATO summit in 1996. We are all for more European military co-operation.

The relationship between British and French forces at operational level is fantastic. It should be developed. We are the two countries most serious about defence in Europe. We are all for greater interoperability, which we need if we are to act together in joint task forces in Kosovo and such places. We need to do things together. We need to set up mechanisms by which Europeans can act without the United States if the United States does not want to be involved—we all agree about that—but that is in place. That was set up at Berlin. The arrangements were set up to allow that to be done, using the Western European Union and NATO planning and command structures that are already in place.

The United States made it clear that, in those circumstances, it would make available its heavy lift, intelligence and communication assets, which we do not have. We cannot undertake such operations without those assets. We do not have them, but the United States has said that it would make them available.

We do not support the responsibility being transferred to the European Union. It will undermine NATO. We will have two parallel overlapping alliances with slightly different agendas in Europe. If it undermines NATO, it will undermine the United States's commitment to NATO and to the security of Europe. That is fundamental.

The European Union is not able to have common policies in those areas not because the institutional framework is not in place, but because we are different sovereign states with different interests, agendas and histories. We find it difficult to agree on those things. If we had the same objectives, we would have no difficulty in acting together, as we have, for example, over Kosovo. It is not the machinery that is at fault.

Mr. Andrew Mackinlay (Thurrock): I am straining to understand the mischief that the hon. Gentleman is describing. If he looks at the Official Report later, he will find that he said, among a long litany of things, that there could be circumstances where there could be some conflict in Europe with which the United States does not wish to be involved; I think that he said that.

Therefore, it seems plainly obvious that we need to have the mechanisms and institutions with which Europe can respond collectively. Inexorably, logic tells us that the vehicle for that must be the European Union.

Mr. Maples: I thought that I said that we supported what was initiated at the Berlin NATO summit in 1996, which made arrangements under which the European members of NATO could act without the United States, using NATO planning, command and control procedures and American assets. There may be circumstances in which the Europeans want to act without the United States. At the moment, it is difficult to envisage that happening because we seem incapable of doing anything without the United States taking the lead. Kosovo is an interesting example of something that the Americans probably would expect us in Europe to be able to sort out by ourselves, but which we clearly could not either at an operational level or in terms of leadership. If we get to the point where we can, let us be able to do it—I have no problem with that—but the arrangements are in place by which one can undertake the task through NATO.

I come to the American opposition to the moves. It is significant and it was signalled way back in June last year, when William Cohen, the United States Secretary of Defence, said that its commitment to a greater role for Europe was evidenced by its support for WEU as a vehicle for strengthening the European pillar of NATO and for the European security and defence identity within NATO. He made it clear then that the United States saw the development as something that would happen within NATO, but the Prime Minister took the policy further by signing an agreement with the French in December in St. Malo. That is where it is out in the open.

Paragraph 3 of that agreement says that

"the European Union will also need to have recourse to suitable military means (European capabilities pre-designated within NATO's European pillar)"—

the things that were envisaged at Berlin—

"or national or multinational European means outside the NATO framework."

Clearly, that was seen by President Chirac as a major shift in policy. It was no wonder that he was pleased because the French have been pursuing that agenda for some time. He succeeded in changing the opinion that successive British Governments had held for many years and in opening a chink in the United States-United Kingdom relationship, something that has long been a French policy objective. It is not fully integrated into NATO. Unfortunately, we did not succeed in getting it fully integrated two or three years ago when we made serious efforts to do so.

The United States's response to that was again cautious. James Foley, the State Department spokesman, said:

"In general terms, we are encouraged by the document's references to strengthening the capability of Europe's armed forces so that they can react rapidly to new circumstances, to contributing to NATO's vitality, and to preserving the alliance's prerogatives."

"We want a European partner that is capable of acting"— nothing about anything independent happening outside NATO and within the European Union.

Madeleine Albright wrote a definitive article a few days after that in the Financial Times. The American position was made politely, in the friendly way that we would expect from our closest ally, but absolutely clearly. She said:

"We will examine all proposals on European defence and security with a simple question in mind: does it improve our effectiveness in working together? . . . the emphasis should be placed on enhancing the practical capabilities Europe brings to our alliance.

This means avoiding what I would call the Three Ds.

First, we want to avoid decoupling: NATO is the expression of the indispensable transatlantic link. It should remain an organisation of sovereign allies, where European decision-making is not unhooked from broader alliance decision-making."

What happened at Cologne does exactly that—it unhooks European decision making from alliance decision making. Mrs. Albright continued:

"Second, we want to avoid duplication: defence resources are too scarce for allies to conduct force planning, operate command structures, and make procurement decisions twice—once at NATO and once more at the EU."

However, Cologne sets up a series of committees and staff structures. It talks of developing satellite, intelligence and heavy lift capability, all of which is duplication on already stretched budgets. She continued:

"third, we want to avoid any discrimination against NATO members who are not EU members."

The Cologne document makes a passing reference to making some arrangements by which those members can be involved, but important members of NATO are not members of the EU—Turkey, Norway and the three new members, Poland, Hungary and the Czech Republic. There will probably be more. Those states will not be involved.

The Western European Union provided a forum in which all of those states could be involved and have access to NATO assets. We are now developing something that excludes those states. At Cologne, all those principles were broken.

It is pretty clear where our European partners are going. In February, Emma Bonino wrote an article in the Financial Times saying:

"Now Europe has Emu, it should try for DMU—defence and military union."

Mr. Prodi, the new President of the European Commission said in "On the Record" two weeks ago that Europe needed to develop its own army to enable it to act quickly to intervene in crises like Kosovo.

That is how they see it. What the Germans, French and Italians want is clear and we are going along with it. No doubt, we think that we can get off this roundabout, or this train, at some point and that we do not have to go the whole way. It is 100 per cent. clear to me where those countries want to go and it is not in our interests to go there with them. There should be some extremely good reason for doing what seems to me to be acting against our national interest and the views of the United States.

Mr. George Robertson: Given circumstances in the world today and the situation in Kosovo at this very moment, I find it remarkable that the hon. Gentleman should engage in a theological discussion that seems to play only to the Back Benches. Why, among all the documentation and bits of paper that he has produced has he not mentioned the Washington communiqué of the

[Mr. George Robertson]

NATO summit? Perhaps he intends to read this passage out—it is certainly worth reading. The communiqué stated:

"We welcome"—

that is, the 19 nations of NATO—

"the new impetus given to the strengthening of a common European policy in security and defence for the Amsterdam Treaty and the reflections launched since then in the WEU and—following the St. Malo declaration—in the EU, including the Vienna European Council Conclusions."

The next paragraph states:

"On the basis of the above principles and building on the Berlin decisions, we therefore stand ready to define and adopt the necessary arrangements for ready access by the European Union to the collective assets and capabilities of the Alliance, for operations in which the Alliance as a whole is not engaged militarily as an Alliance."

That communiqué was backed by the United States and members of NATO, who are not all members of the EU. They signed up to it. How come it is only the British Conservative party that stands isolated again?

Mr. Maples: It is not a question of being isolated. I will come to those documents, which make it clear that what NATO agreed to, and the United States is happy about, is the development of that capability within NATO. However, what was talked about at Cologne is outside NATO and is not what was agreed at Washington or what people were happy about. The change in policy raises the concerns of the United States.

After Cologne, the German Defence Minister said:

"There is a single market, a single currency and an intense economic co-operation and we need something comparable in foreign and security policy."

President Chirac said that the creation of a European defence identity was the next major project of European unification after the introduction of the euro.

Ambassador Vershbow said—this is the noted American caution—that "It is important . . . that the transatlantic link not be weakened . . . That means avoiding . . . duplication of assets or discrimination against non-EU allies . . . We will be assessing the results of today's EU Summit in Cologne with these considerations mind."

Let us consider what happened in Washington. In the new strategic concept, which is the really important document, there is only one reference to this matter, in paragraph 30, which is headed, "The European Security and Defence Identity". It clearly talks about that being within NATO, stating:

"On the basis of decisions taken by the Alliance, in Berlin in 1996 and subsequently, the European Security and Defence Identity will continue to be developed within NATO."

My concern is that it is being developed outside NATO. We are perfectly happy about development within NATO—I have no difficulty with that. The Secretary of State quoted the communiqué, which is a less important document than the new strategic concept, as I am sure the right hon. Gentleman would agree.

Mr. Robertson: No.

Mr. Maples: It is. What is more, the communiqué seems to have been drafted by someone completely different, on the hoof at the summit, as I understand that it was because some countries—Turkey in particular—had considerable misgivings about the original draft of the document.

Mr. Robertson: They agreed it.

Mr. Maples: After some redrafting. The communiqué makes it perfectly clear that development should take place within the WEU. It reaffirms our commitment—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State should listen before he crows too hard about his reading of the agreement. [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The Secretary of State must not keep interrupting from a sedentary position.

Mr. Maples: I have no problem about that being done inside the Alliance but it is being done outside it. As the United States keeps pointing out, the mechanisms were put in place at Berlin. It wants the ESDI to be firmly anchored within NATO but what is set up at Cologne is something different. It is a European Union structure to develop a military capability outside NATO. It is a parallel and overlapping alliance—a recipe for confusion. The United States is concerned that it will act as a caucus within NATO and that EU members of NATO will meet first to decide a collective position to take to NATO. It breaks all those three Ds—discrimination, duplication and decoupling—that Mrs. Albright set out and it undermines US commitment to NATO, and for what? What is the purpose? What is the change of circumstances that led to it? It would be useful if it helped to advance British interests, but I do not believe that it does. It is all for the sake of being, in some rather intangible sense, at the heart of Europe. There is no advantage for the country, even if it makes European summits nicer for the Prime Minister.

As the Secretary of State pointed out, we are doing this in the light of what is happening in Kosovo. Surely the lesson of our military intervention there is that we are in capable of doing such things without the United States and without American military capability and leadership. The United States would love us to be able to develop more European capability, but we cannot handle Kosovo by ourselves. Of the 1,100 military aircraft that I understand have been involved in operations, 80 per cent. have been from the United States. There was no question of any aggressive ground intervention without the involvement of American troops. That decision was always going to be made in Washington. Therefore, at best, the European Union is taking a pretentious stance. Frankly, it is going to be a fantasy unless we are all prepared to spend much more on defence.

Mr. Dalyell: I have been following the hon. Gentleman's speech with great interest. What does he see as the role of the United Nations in Kosovo? Should not it have been brought in at the earliest stage specifically before any military action was taken?

Mr. Maples: I do not want to be drawn into the debate about Kosovo because we will debate that next Thursday and we have been over that ground many times. We have spent much more time on Kosovo than on the European defence identity. Furthermore, if we had waited for the United Nations to act, we would not be anywhere near a solution that would have secured Kosovo for the Kosovar Albanians.

What the EU wants to do will work only if it is prepared to spend an awful lot more on defence.

Mr. Robertson: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for allowing me to intervene as I thought that the House would want to know that the Secretary-General of NATO, Javier Solana, has announced the suspension of air strikes.

Mr. Maples: I am delighted to hear that, as is everyone else in the House, I am sure. Presumably, the next step is that the Security Council will pass a resolution and KFOR will move into Kosovo. I think that the Secretary of State was pointing out to me from his seat that a substantial British contingent is involved and we all wish them well. In some ways, the most difficult part of the Kosovo operation is about to begin. It involves danger to far more military personnel than has the air operation. They will encounter difficulties.

I was talking about defence spending. The development of a parallel military capability makes some sense if we are prepared to spend a lot of money on it. We shall have to duplicate some of what happens already in NATO in command and control structures, and intelligence satellite facilities. It will cost a lot of money. Yet, we are all cutting defence spending. The Government are cutting defence spending by roughly £1 billion over the three years of the defence review. The United Kingdom and France are the only European Union members, other than Greece and Portugal, that spend more than 2 per cent. of their GDP on defence. Germany spends only 1.5 per cent. Yet for all the ways that we might improve Europe's defence capabilities by spending more, we shall spend scarce assets on duplicating what NATO and the United States already possess and what is already available to European members of NATO under the Berlin arrangements. Therefore, it makes sense only if we spend more than it costs to cover the duplication.

Can the Secretary of State name a single European member of NATO who is planning to spend more on defence? The answer is that nobody is. We will not spend more on defence. They may be wrong, but all the political pressures are in the other direction. Everybody wants money released from defence spending because of the end of the cold war.

If we set up these parallel arrangements without spending much more money, we risk the worst of all worlds: a continuing militarily weak Europe and undermining the United States' commitment to NATO. It could be argued that we could do without the United States' commitment to NATO if we were prepared to build up a serious military force in Europe, but it cannot be argued that we can do without that commitment, unless we are prepared to build up that force. We have reached a dangerous halfway stage in this: we are undermining the American commitment to NATO and we are not building up the necessary military forces ourselves. That is a high price to pay.

At the very least, we deserve an explanation for this change of policy, which we have not had. There has been substantial bipartisan consensus on these matters since the end of the cold war and since the Labour party dropped its anti-American, CND defence policy a few years ago. Yet the Government have sacrificed that. Not only that, but they have sacrificed Britain's true interests and the transatlantic link, which is vital to our security, and they have risked undermining NATO, which has been the foundation of that security for 50 years. For what? Some transitory and illusory, weekend goodwill within the European Union.

2.33 pm

Ms Gisela Stuart (Birmingham, Edgbaston): First, I apologise that I cannot stay for the winding-up speeches because I will have to return to Birmingham to vote in the European elections. That brings me to a point made by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples). He said that today was an inappropriate day to choose for a debate on defence in the world, but I think that today is most appropriate because it is important to recognise that what has been happening in Europe is significant to post-world war 2 peace.

Today is the day after last night's announcement on Kosovo and the Secretary of State has just given us the latest announcement, both of which are significant. Today, we should recognise what the part that we have played in Europe has done for peace within the framework of defence.

One of my most moving experiences since I became a Member of Parliament came a few weeks ago, when I was privileged to be with the Prime Minister in Aachen when he received the Charlemagne prize. French Prime Minister Jospin gave the recommendation speech and a British Prime Minister received a significant European prize in recognition of his work on European unity and maintaining peace. It was an extremely proud moment for someone like me, who has a somewhat international background. I like to think of myself in some way as a representation of how far Europe has moved, not least because I was born near Munich and have ended up inheriting Neville Chamberlain's seat by purely democratic means. Much has been achieved by democratic, peaceful means, and through Britain's role in Europe complementing NATO, not being apart from it.

Dr. Julian Lewis: Is not the lesson to be learned from the hon. Lady's inheriting Neville Chamberlain's seat not that Europe moved in a particular direction, but that Germany became a democracy? Germany became a democracy because British democracy defeated German militarism. To put that down to Europe rather than to a victory in a war and the maintenance of an alliance in peace is misleading and unworthy of the debate.

Ms Stuart: I regret having given way. I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was the British people of Edgbaston who elected me. It had nothing to do with the German Government.

The defence debate is not about hardware. Sometimes, there is a danger that it is about boys talking about toys. We have defence to protect people. It is no good pulling faces and saying that this is some unworthy debate. Defence is about people. We have defence to protect people.

Kosovo reminded my generation, the post-war generation, that war is essentially bloody. It came as a shock to realise that, in the heart of Europe, we could still have the kind of ethnic cleansing that we thought belonged to a different age and certainly to different parts of the world. Yet it was happening right under our noses. The most distressing aspect was how we responded to it. It took quite some time before the forces pulled together. It is thanks in no small way to British leadership that we have reached the point that we have today.

[Ms Stuart]

Let me return quickly to my experience in Aachen. The Prime Minister gave a speech about military action in Kosovo. Some of my German and French colleagues said that no French Prime Minister or German Chancellor would have dared to make that speech. That kind of leadership and determination to keep Europe united in one force is easily underestimated here in London, where we do not realise what the Prime Minister and the British forces have achieved.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to the mainland European experience of being a refugee—something that we tend to forget in this country. Britain has not been invaded for a thousand years. We read about, and see pictures of, Kosovo and people—a whole generation—being displaced in former Yugoslavia. In a country such as Germany, virtually every family will have first-hand experience of, or—as I did—will have grown up with, stories about what it is like to be told that one has three hours to leave with only one suitcase. My generation may have been brought up, as the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon rather glibly said, in the post-war CND era. Yes, we oppose war, but we also realise that there is a place for it, and an appropriate place for it when it comes to protecting people. We are in the heart of Europe and we must play our part there constructively.

It is difficult to understand why Europe has easily accepted economic and industrial leadership—Britain is the fifth largest economy in the world—when there is reluctance to accept similar leadership for defence. In some ways, we continue to behave like dependants on the United States, when it is a partner. The hon. Gentleman rightly said that Kosovo has shown that we need the States. My conclusion from that is not that we should not go on developing European defence strategies, but that there is even more reason to develop them because we should be able to deal with any future Kosovos.

The Prime Minister's initiative in Portschach signalled the Government's determination to move in that direction. The Franco-British declaration in St. Malo took the initiative further. To say that Britain goes into these negotiations simply signing what the French and Germans dictate to them is either an extraordinary failure to understand what is going on or deliberate mischief making.

Mr. David Heath: Both.

Ms Stuart: Indeed.

Britain's leadership and political determination are unrivalled in the European context and are supported by the professionalism of British troops. Some 8,000 British troops stand ready to be part of the peace agreement—the largest contingent of any nation. British forces have led the way in Bosnia in ensuring that war criminals are brought to justice.

Our peacekeeping commitment is easily forgotten in talking about defence. However, defence is not just about the narrow window of warfare but about what happens afterwards, which can be more important than the immediate engagement. Britain has been leading that work. Later this year, Britain will become the first permanent member of the United Nations Security Council to sign an agreement with the United Nations to make more of our forces available for UN peace support operations.

The United Kingdom's approach has primarily involved finding practical ways to improve political and military capabilities. Our military capabilities would be inconsequential without the political framework to support them. There have been institutional changes to help us achieve that. The Secretary of State mentioned the need to take political control of military decisions. I am sure that other hon. Members will mention military hardware, but we should always remember that hardware is a means to an end, not an end in itself. Merely possessing weapons or talking about the percentage of gross domestic product spent on defence tells us little about defence, which is about protecting people and maintaining peace.

On the international co-operation required to deal with refugees, Britain has again taken the lead. The aim is to return people to their homes. It is no good throwing refugees out and dispersing them all over Europe. The aim should be what Britain has done in Kosovo by supporting the United Nations and enabling all the displaced people to return to their homes. It is also about facilitating restructuring. The post-war period and the early development of the European Community teaches us that economic reconstruction provides long-term peace.

We need to develop our European structures not in duplication of, or competition with, those of NATO but as a complement to them. Within that, participating Governments will and must retain their sovereign authority to commit or withhold their troops. To talk about a European defence strategy is not to cede sovereignty but to recognise common interests.

I commend what the Labour Government are doing on preventing conflict and arms control. We have elevated defence diplomacy and conflict prevention to one of the seven core missions of our armed forces, which underpin all our defence planning. The prevention of conflict is as vital a part of defence policy as the strategy for responding to it.

It is easy to forget the impetus that we have given to international arms control. Not only have we banned the import, export, manufacture and transfer of anti-personnel land mines in line with our manifesto commitment, we have extended the ban to cover their operational use. No British soldier on operations will ever again lay an anti-personnel land mine. That has gone hand in hand with strengthening our forces, not least by enabling them to respond quickly to any conflict as it develops.

The hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth), who is not in his place, accused the Secretary of State of wishing to lead Europe but not willing the means. Again, he fails to understand what has been happening in the past two years. I fundamentally disagree with his assumption. The fact is that Britain and the Prime Minister have given leadership to Europe. The professionalism of British troops, the Prime Minister's leadership during the Kosovan conflict and the way in which he carried his European partners cannot be over stressed. It is no good saying that that did not happen, because it did. France and Germany followed the lead given by the Prime Minister. No other European leader could have given that lead so successfully. I am not complacent, but we can be proud of that leadership.

I conclude with a reminder. If I have one sadness, it is that we have ended the millennium with the ethnic cleansing and conflict in Kosovo. I hope that my children will have the privilege that I have had, of which my mother, a victim of ethnic cleansing after world war 2, forcefully reminded me when I once made a derogatory remark about armed forces. She told me that I had had the privilege of never having had to wait on whether the Russian or American armed forces arrived first. My life had never depended on waiting for the armed forces, and I hope that those of my children will not do so. In the meantime, we have the responsibility of maintaining our armed forces within a European defence framework that complements, and works with, NATO, not one that thinks that Britain can, on its own without such co-operation, attain what we have achieved so far.

2.47 pm

Mr. David Atkinson (Bournemouth, East): I shall confine my remarks to the missile defence of Europe. My qualification for doing so is as the rapporteur on transatlantic co-operation on ballistic missile defence for the Western European Union Assembly, which unanimously adopted my second report on the subject during its December 1997 part-session. Both my reports warned that Europe was defenceless against ballistic missile attacks. That remains true.

Since then, we have had the outcome of the Government's strategic defence review. To echo the Secretary of State, it concluded that the risk to Britain from ballistic missiles of nations of concern was many years off, that we should continue to monitor the position and that we should remain in close touch with our allies. I find that complacent and alarming. As I shall explain, it contradicts the policy now adopted by the American Congress through its Missile Defence Act, which President Clinton is expected to sign into law soon.

We in western Europe have every reason to be sensitive to the need for missile defence. There has been a missile threat to Europe ever since the first cruise missile, the V1, and the first ballistic missile, the V2, were developed more than 50 years ago. In all, more than 4,300 V2s were fired and they had a disproportionate political, economic and psychological effect because of the helplessness of our air defences.

Today, such missile technology is more easily obtained than ever and has been used many times in recent years. We in Britain will never forget that two of our ships were sunk by Exocets during the Falklands war. In 1986, Italy was shaken by a Libyan missile that struck the island of Lampedusa. Beyond Europe, during one phase of the Iran-Iraq war, Iraq rained missiles on Teheran and other cities. During the Gulf war, Saddam Hussein used his strongest card to attack Israeli towns and an American base in Saudi Arabia with Scud missiles.

In March 1997, China fired four ballistic missiles into the sea near Taiwan during its presidential elections. That did not intimidate the voters, but it caused Lloyd's of London to refuse to insure any ship going to Taiwan, which damaged its economy and that of Japan. Last year, a North Korean Taepo-Dong 1 missile overflew Japan. Today, India and Pakistan are proliferating their missile capabilities, with warheads to match.

Those are recent events which we should not ignore. Missiles have been used to destroy, to threaten and to intimidate. They can affect whole economies and impact on foreign policies. Today, a growing number of third world Governments are buying or developing missiles. Such missiles are easier to man and cheaper to acquire than squadrons of fighter aircraft.

According to Lancaster university, 35 non-NATO countries have ballistic missiles, 18 of which are capable of installing nuclear, biological, chemical or radiological warheads on them. Lancaster university also estimates that 67 non-NATO countries possess cruise missiles. So any future western rapid reaction force in an out-of-area operation now needs far greater protection than was provided during Desert Storm.

Two years ago, as the new Labour Government embarked upon their defence review, it had long been appreciated that the greatest potential menace were the five rogue regimes, some of which have helped each other's missile programmes—Iran, Iraq, Libya, Syria and North Korea. Fired from Libya, North Korean No-Dong missiles with a range of 700 miles would threaten southern Europe, while its Taepo-Dong two-stage rockets, which it is developing, would threaten all the capitals of Europe. Despite all this, the Government's strategic defence review concluded that the risks to Britain from ballistic missiles were many years off.

Since that conclusion was reached, the American Congress has responded to three reports. The Rumsfield commission report last year said that the USA and Europe could be facing a substantial threat by 2010, an assessment which some believe has already been overtaken by recent missile developments in the third world. This year's national intelligence estimate of the CIA concludes that any country, regardless of its missile development experience, could field an intercontinental ballistic missile by 2015. Two weeks ago, the bipartisan committee chaired by Congressman Cox reported that China had spent the past 40 years stealing from the United States nuclear technology which it has spread to unstable regimes around the world, including those close enough to attack Britain and Europe with ballistic missiles.

It was in anticipation of the Cox report that the Clinton Administration withdrew its opposition to a Bill to build a missile defence shield against nuclear attack. It received an overwhelming 67:3 majority in the Senate, and a 3:1 vote in the House of Representatives. So, if the United States now plans to defend itself in this way, why not Europe, and why not the United Kingdom?

When the WEU Assembly debated my report on 3 December 1997, we expressed concern at the rate at which the threat to Europe appears to be accelerating and the length of time that it would take to develop an effective ballistic missile defence shield. We noted that there had been no progress whatever in developing European early warning and anti-missile defence systems. We passed unanimously recommendation 621, which urged our Council of Ministers to pursue with far greater urgency the development of a common anti-ballistic missile defence system, and European Governments to provide the budget necessary; to carry out a specifically European study of the architecture of anti-missile defence systems foreseeable in the short, medium and long term for the coverage of the continent; and to examine the possibility of co-operation with Russia over anti-missile defence.

[Mr. David Atkinson]

In its reply, the Council noted that European nations were participating actively in NATO studies on extended air defence and to develop plans for theatre ballistic missile defence. That was presumably a reference to the new NATO air command and central systems which, in principle, will give Europe an initial capability to defend itself against ballistic missile attack. However, in practice, according to Jane's Defence Weekly of 28 April this year, there are no cohesive efforts under way to develop anti-missile defence for Europe.

In Europe today—unlike in the American Congress—there is no sense of urgency to respond to an accelerating threat, and about the time that it would take to respond to that threat. That complacency is now contrary to the new approach adopted by the United States. In the light of that, I urge the Government to review their review on missile defence. I hope that the Minister of State will respond to those concerns in his reply, and assure the House that the ballistic missile defence of Europe will be in place before new threats emerge.

2.56 pm

Mr. Harry Cohen (Leyton and Wanstead): The Select Committee on Defence, of which I am a member, recently published its report on the future of NATO. There is an important case for reform of NATO. It has been somewhat overshadowed by the situation in Kosovo, but we must come back to it, especially in relation to nuclear weapons, and this debate is a good opportunity to do so.

I successfully pressed for a number of amendments to the report, which I shall run through briefly for the House. One of them called for an improvement in NATO's links with humanitarian aid agencies and for them to work together in peace support operations. Following events in Kosovo, that is now very relevant. My amendments also called for NATO member states properly to respect human rights in their own countries, and to maintain stable democracies and civilian control over their militaries.

The amended report urged restraint on NATO's out-of-area operations where there was no direct threat to NATO's interests; called on NATO to respect United Nations philosophy and ensure that any operation that it undertook was legitimate under international law; called for a strengthening of the role of the Organisation for Security and Co-operation in Europe to allow it to play a fuller part in crisis prevention and management as well as post-conflict reconciliation; contained a welcome for the French formally to re-enter NATO's integrated military system whenever they felt prepared to do so; and called for a strengthening of security co-operation between Russia and NATO, including the European countries of NATO, so that Russia was co-opted into collective security rather than adopting a narrow nationalism. The report made many recommendations in relation to Russia, such as that Russia should help its former military officers to set up small businesses. It expressed concern about anti-semitism in Russia.

I also successfully made amendments to the report concerning nuclear weapons—an issue on which I wish to concentrate most of my speech. The report called for early unconditional ratification by Russia of the START 2 nuclear disarmament treaty and rapid commencement of negotiations on a START 3 treaty between Russia, the United States and other NATO countries with nuclear weapons.

We pay tribute to Ukraine for abandoning its nuclear weapons and call for support for it in dealing with the problems of Chernobyl. We call for a new mission even-handedly to promote non-proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and counter-proliferation objectives. We call for restraint to avoid a new path of nuclearisation. We warn that that could happen if the United States decided to contravene the anti-ballistic missile treaty. That warning relates directly to what the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) has just said. We would be on a most dangerous path to nuclear proliferation if we went for a so-called ballistic defence approach, which would only increase the pace of a new nuclear arms race. We must, therefore, restrain ourselves—as, it is to be hoped, will the United States—from breaking the existing treaty.

I also ensured that the report gave a proper explanation of the rationale for a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons. Ambassador Thomas Graham, the leader of the US delegation to the non-proliferation treaty talks four years ago, put that rationale to the Committee. He said that the world urgently needs to lower the political importance of nuclear weapons and that only the nuclear powers could do that. A first-use policy increases the perceived political importance of nuclear weapons and encourages nuclear proliferation.

Such a political approach is important in states other than those which already hold nuclear weapons, because they might develop nuclear weapons for the same reasons that we developed them. For example, India and Pakistan already give the same reasons as us for having adopted those weapons. That logic could apply to other countries.

In his evidence to the Committee, the Secretary of State referred to the new definition of deterrence when he said that uncertainty equals stability. That seems to be the new creed. However, it encourages proliferation in other states not only of nuclear weapons but of other weapons of mass destruction. Those states could claim that such weapons create uncertainty and, therefore, stability. That is not a good creed.

Ambassador Graham made a further point in relation to the argument about the political importance of nuclear weapons. He said that, at present, Russia puts a heavy emphasis on the first use of nuclear weapons, especially as its conventional forces have withered. We need to move the Russians away from that policy, but they will not even begin to move while we maintain the first-use approach. Ambassador Graham pointed out that nuclear weapons do not offer a proportional response to a non-nuclear attack—for example, one using biological or chemical weapons. Those are weapons of mass destruction, but such destruction would be significantly less than if nuclear weapons were used. The ambassador noted that, under international law, there is a doctrine of belligerent response and that international commitments are waived once there have been such attacks. His view was that a first-use policy is unnecessary and counter-productive.

At the Select Committee meeting on 17 February, I put that view to the Secretary of State, who responded with two arguments. First, he said that nuclear weapons

"are essentially political weapons that are to be used only in the case of last resort; to be used only in the case of national survival."

Secondly, he said that a no-first-use policy could lead the other side

"to take actions in a conventional sense or in an asymmetric sense, (in a chemical or biological context), which would allow them to take risks knowing that there was to be no penalty for doing that."

Those are crucial arguments.

I have already pointed out that such approaches apply to other countries as well and are a driver for proliferation. First use cannot be regarded as a last resort, nor is it a matter of national survival. As Ambassador Graham said, it is not a proportional response—even to chemical or biological weapons. However deadly those weapons may be, they do not threaten national survival. In any case, they are covered by the belligerent-response provision in the international arrangements. If we take the approach of getting in first, that is immensely dangerous; it is the attitude of a Dr. Strangelove.

There seems to be a fear of a massive first strike, but that would be phenomenally risky, whoever undertook it—whether or not there was a first-use policy. Theoretically, it could happen in either case. Getting in first is more likely if there are huge arsenals of nuclear weapons, mistrust and first-use policies on both sides. A no-first-use policy would make that less likely, because it would put pressure on other countries, such as Russia, to agree to the same policy.

In relation to the Secretary of State's point that countries could use asymmetrical weapons—chemical and biological weapons—without penalty, there is indeed a penalty. We have only to consider Iraq to see that there is an enormous penalty for that country's flirtation with chemical weapons. Iraq is suffering a phenomenally heavy penalty and that fact will not be lost on other countries. The belligerent-response doctrine also applies in that case. A no-first-use policy would help to ensure that everyone signed up to internationally agreed treaties on chemical and biological weapons, with proper inspection. As Ambassador Graham pointed out, first-use policies make that much harder to achieve. We need to lessen the political importance of nuclear weapons, but the UK Government and other NATO Governments appear to have no strategy for doing so.

In its response to the strategic defence review report, the Select Committee noted:

"We regret that there has been no restatement of nuclear policy since the speech of the then Secretary of State in 1993; the SDR does not provide a new statement of the government's nuclear deterrent posture in the present strategic situation within which the sub-strategic role of Trident could be clarified. We recommend the clarification of both the UK's strategic and sub-strategic nuclear policy."

The Government's response to the Select Committee on 19 May was the same, word for word, as that given by NATO in its press communiqué, "The Alliance's Strategic Concept", NAC-S(99)65; clearly, it must have been written by British civil servants at the Ministry of Defence. The communiqué stated:

"The fundamental purpose of the nuclear forces of the Allies is political: to preserve peace and prevent coercion and any kind of war."

It continued:

"They demonstrate that aggression of any kind is not a rational option."

That was said at the Washington summit—presumably thanks to those British civil servants. Well, tell that to the Serbs; nuclear weapons certainly did not put them off aggression. That shows how poorly thought-out is our whole current approach to nuclear weapons.

We received an assurance from the Secretary of State that he would consider the meaning of that sub-strategic role. It means lowering the threshold—that nuclear weapons might be used. However, the Secretary of State came up with an answer:

"The purpose of our nuclear forces is to deter aggression against the United Kingdom or its Allies. The Strategic Defence Review confirmed that, in addition to its strategic deterrent role, Trident would also perform the sub-strategic nuclear role, formerly assigned to RAF Tornado aircraft. A sub-strategic element is an essential component of a nuclear deterrent policy. In extreme circumstances of self defence, a capability for the more limited use of nuclear weapons would allow us to signal to an aggressor that he has miscalculated our resolve, without using the full destructive power that Trident offers.—[Official Report, 26 March 1999; Vol. 328, c. 433.]

What a strategy that is—one in which there can somehow be light use of nuclear weapons. That seems to be a contradiction. That strategy—the sub-strategic use of nuclear weapons—is to be used against another nuclear weapons state. Let us turn it around: if someone dropped light sub-strategic nuclear weapons for us for the same reason—to deter us from aggression—what would our response be? Would we accept it, or would a nuclear exchange be likely? That shows how ill-thought-out the policy is. Even if the circumstances are truly extreme, why not have a no-first-use policy? We cannot use nuclear weapons sub-strategically as the Government pretend. For example, can India and Pakistan use nuclear weapons sub-strategically?

Dr. Julian Lewis: I acknowledge the hon. Gentleman's long and consistent commitment to unilateral nuclear disarmament by this country, but let me give an example that shows that matters are not as simple as he thinks. Imagine two nuclear powers, one of which has the capability only to retaliate using large strategic nuclear weapons against cities, and the other the capability to initiate a much more precise and accurate attack against troop and military formations. Does the hon. Gentleman accept that, unless the systems are balanced, there is a danger that one of those nuclear powers might think, wrongly, that it could attack troop concentrations with impunity, because the other side would not retaliate in the only way that it could, against cities, and thus risk losing cities in return? The situation is not as simple as he suggests.

Mr. Cohen: The hon. Gentleman has got it wrong. The lesson of Kosovo is that a response is more likely if troops suffer, so nuclear exchange is more, not less, likely if we start to nuke troops. The hon. Gentleman's argument seems to be in favour of bombing a non-city area. Where is his constituency? It is not in London, is it?

Dr. Lewis: New Forest, East.

Mr. Cohen: Exactly. If the Russians bombed the New Forest as a sub-strategic warning, what does the hon. Gentleman think the Government's response should be? That shows the nonsense of his argument.

[Mr. Cohen]

I refer the House to a parliamentary briefing from the Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament, which makes a series of points about disarmament negotiations: basically, such negotiations are all stuck. The briefing refers to the conference on disarmament in Geneva, the CD. It states:

"After almost four months of negotiation the CD has still failed to agree a work programme for its current session and, as a result, has failed to begin negotiation of a Fissile Material Treaty (FMT) i.e. a treaty that would ban the production and use of the two crucial nuclear explosives—plutonium and highly enriched uranium—that make up nuclear weapons."

The Government say they are in favour of a fissile material treaty, but negotiations are being blocked in Geneva.

The briefing goes on to talk about five proposals:

"The South African proposal for an Ad-Hoc Committee to 'deliberate upon practical steps for systematic and progressive efforts to eliminate nuclear weapons as well as to identify if and when one or more such steps should be the subject of negotiations in the conference'.

The Egyptian proposal to 'commence negotiations on a phased programme of nuclear disarmament with the objective of the complete elimination of nuclear weapons.'

The Belgian proposal (supported by Germany, Italy, Netherlands and Norway) to establish an Ad-Hoc Working Group to 'study ways and means of establishing an exchange of information and views within the Conference on endeavours towards nuclear disarmament'.

The Canadian proposal to establish an Ad-Hoc Committee for 'the substantive discussion of nuclear disarmament issues with a view to identifying if and when one or more such issues might be negotiated multilaterally'.

The G-21 proposal (proposed on their behalf by Cuba) for an Ad-Hoc Committee on Nuclear Disarmament to 'start negotiations on a phased programme for the complete elimination of nuclear weapons within a specified framework of time, including a nuclear weapon convention'."

None of those proposals meets with the favour of the Governments of the UK, the United States and France, who have suggested merely that:

"the President of the CD consults 'on ways and means of establishing an exchange of information and views . . . by holding informal, open-ended consultations . . . by consulting with delegations'" and other such means. Presumably, all that can be done at any time. There is no practical programme of action, nor even a programme for a programme of action. That follows two years in which nothing was achieved except agreement that negotiations could begin in 1999 on a fissile material treaty.

CND states:

"The CD has negotiated all the major multilateral international arms control agreements to date and is the only UN body that has a mandate to negotiate and agree such agreements. If it cannot agree a means to begin the process of ridding the world of nuclear weapons then no one can."

The CND report concludes:

"without a fully implemented Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, without an FMT, with the CD in deadlock and the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty lacking any future direction, no hope of START II ever being ratified and no prospect of START III being agreed and NATO re-emphasising the importance of NATO retaining nuclear weapons as an essential part of their military structure, one has to conclude that there is no hope whatsoever currently of achieving a world free of nuclear weapons.

Whatever window of opportunity existed upon the end of the Cold War has now firmly been slammed shut and the deadlocks and bars been put in place."

The UK Government in their strategic defence review report, and NATO in its Washington press release on the deliberations on its strategic concept, shirk the issues of nuclear weapons reduction and seriously attempting to stop nuclear proliferation. That do-nothing approach does not mean that the status quo will last for ever. Instead, proliferation drives us down the road of shirking action—for example, when India, Pakistan and other countries develop nuclear weapons—and of increasing military intervention, albeit only when it suits us. That makes for a far more dangerous world. Defence in the world is not helped by the current nuclear weapons policy. The Government must return to the subject seriously and with a will.

3.17 pm

Mr. Mike Hancock (Portsmouth, South): I am sorry to be unable to apologise to the Secretary of State in person for not having been here for the beginning of his speech. I was detained representing Parliament on the political committee of the Western European Union in Paris, in which we discussed many of the matters that have been raised this afternoon. I would have apologised to the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) if I had missed his speech as well, but I was fortunate enough—if that is the right expression—to be present to hear it.

It is disappointing that today—European election day—has been chosen for the debate. To hold those elections today was not a sudden impulse—we have known for some years when they were coming—yet the debate was scheduled on 24 March, despite there being time and flexibility enough in our timetable to have it on another day. For it to be held on a day when so many Members are distracted with other matters is a great disappointment to the House and to Members unfortunate enough to be unable to attend. I am sure that there will be no repetition in future and that lessons have been learned.

The debate gives us an opportunity to discuss many matters, but hon. Members who have already referred to Kosovo will not blame me for expressing my thoughts on that subject as well. The Secretary of State brought us the good news which will be universally welcomed, that the Secretary-General of NATO has ordered that bombing should stop. I hope that it is the first of many steps to establish a lasting peace, but achieving that end will probably involve a campaign far more difficult than the 10-week air war carried out over the former Yugoslavia. Nevertheless, we should give a big vote of thanks to the men and women of our armed forces who have done so much, both in the air and on the ground, to bring about what has so far been achieved. We should not forget the enormous commitment of our service men and women to alleviating the plight of refugees in Macedonia, Albania and elsewhere in the region.

I also offer my compliments—I am sorry that Conservative Members do not feel able to do likewise—to the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the Secretary of State for Defence. [Interruption.] I understand that Opposition Members congratulated them last night, but I think it is nice to thank them again today. They have played an important role in showing the determination and leadership that was sorely lacking in some aspects of the run-up to the campaign against Serbia.

We can learn many lessons from this action, not least regarding the lack of military intelligence before and during the campaign.

It appears that few people had any informed knowledge about the reaction of, first, the Serbians and, secondly, Milosevic. No one seemed to grasp his difficult personality and the likely outcome of a bombing campaign against him. We slipped up badly in that area. I am sure that committees throughout NATO and the Parliaments of countries involved in the campaign will be quick to seize the opportunity to learn those lessons and take steps to clarify those matters for the future.

I believe the Prime Minister had to play a leadership role because, on this occasion, the White House showed, at best, slow leadership and, at worst, no leadership. Someone had to give the people of Kosovo and the surrounding area some confidence that there would be an effective response. It was clear to many of us that we had delayed intervention to the point where people would suffer needlessly. I am sure that the failure to provide proper leadership was instrumental in prolonging the air war—and many people suffered as a consequence. I hope that we have learned that strong, firm and determined leadership is necessary. We must give confidence to those men and women whose lives are put on the line by the actions of politicians.

As hon. Members have said, we have won the air war in Kosovo. However, I hope that we are prepared for the real job of winning the peace. We were not prepared for an air war of 10 weeks' duration; I do not believe that anyone in the Ministry of Defence or NATO genuinely believed that it would take that long. I hope that winning the peace will not involve short-term solutions. People should not believe that peace will be won quickly. We must learn some real lessons from the situation in Bosnia. Those who have visited Bosnia recently will be aware of the fragility of that nation. The fabric of Bosnian society would collapse quickly if the troops were withdrawn. The only thing holding that country together is the international community's commitment to keeping troops on the ground.

Mr. Dalyell: Having stayed with his national service regiment in Bosnia for three days last year, does the hon. Gentleman agree that the idea of leaving that country without full military capacity is unthinkable? It is one thing to commit troops, but a completely different matter to pull them out. I did not support the commitment of troops to Bosnia in the first place, but for the life of me I do not see how, morally, we can pull out in the foreseeable future—by which I mean in my lifetime.

Mr. Hancock: Sadly, I think the hon. Gentleman is absolutely right: I cannot conceive of a situation in which it would be either easy or desirable to pull troops out of Bosnia. That outcome could be considered only if some firm democratic framework were established that would give that country's democratic processes some depth. There is no evidence that that is happening: the three communities in Bosnia are as divided today as they were when the fighting stopped. We have the ability to hold the peace in Bosnia and, unfortunately, we will have to repeat that exercise in Kosovo.

Mr. Robert Key (Salisbury): I am slightly mystified by the hon. Gentleman's comments. How does he explain the fact that the Muslim and Christian communities in Bosnia lived together fairly peacefully for some 300 years until Mr. Milosevic turned up? Does the hon. Gentleman think Mr. Milosevic has had no impact on the situation in the past decade? Did he not start the trouble—and learn the error of his ways only recently?

Mr. Hancock: No one dissents from that point of view, but realistically, nobody else is in a position to finish what Milosevic has started. It will take more than a generation to rebuild and bring the communities together. We are mistaken to believe that the mischief perpetrated is the work of a one-man band. There is no evidence to suggest that Milosevic's removal will not be followed by the arrival of Milosevic mark 2. I would like to see the abundant evidence—some hon. Members seem to think it exists—that points to the conclusion that the removal of Milosevic will bring enlightenment to Serbia and peace to the entire region. I doubt it.

Real pain and suffering will continue to be experienced by the next generation to be born and raised in that region. Sadly, Milosevic's legacy will extend well into the next millennium. The 300 years of peace and harmony to which the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) referred have been torn apart by less than a decade of mischief and evil. We have paid a high price for the tolerance that we—among others—showed to the Milosevic regime over the past 10 years. As a community, we should have taken a firmer hand with Milosevic over Croatia and Slovenia.

We owe a debt of gratitude to those in the region who have stood by us. We must help to rebuild and stabilise the shaky fabric of democracy in Macedonia. If we fail to do so, we may have a real problem on our hands. I do not believe the KLA will be an easy force to reckon with. I share the view expressed by others in this House and elsewhere in Europe that, if there is a real attempt to disarm the KLA, that force will fight United Nations soldiers. That is a real possibility. I do not believe that it will be easy to disarm, with Tornados and Harriers, KLA troops holding Kalashnikovs. The troops on the ground will have to remove those weapons physically.

The KLA soldiers will not go home quietly—I have said that in the House before. I met three different KLA groups on three separate occasions and I am far from convinced that the KLA's ambitions are aimed at a free and autonomous Kosovo. Many of the KLA soldiers to whom I spoke came not from Kosovo but from Albania and are fighting for a greater Albania—which includes the whole of Kosovo, Albania, Macedonia and part of Montenegro. They will not settle for second best: they are armed and they are on a roll. It will be enormously difficult to contain the aspirations of the KLA.

It will also be difficult to handle the payback issue in Kosovo. We cannot ignore that fact. I do not envy those men and women in the British and United Nations forces whose task it will be to police Kosovo. That is a thankless job that will continue for 10 years or more. Just look at our experiences in Cyprus: 25 years later, United Nations garrisons are still keeping the communities apart.

Mr. Bob Russell (Colchester): Does my hon. Friend agree that the short-term solution in Bosnia has already become a long-term solution? The overstretch of British troops is such that the European Community needs to devote more resources to supporting operations in Bosnia and in Kosovo.

[Mr. Bob Russell]

Mr. Hancock: I agree. This morning, I attended a meeting in Paris of the political committee of the Western European Union at which members from Italy and France suggested that it would take 2 per cent. of the gross domestic product of all the NATO countries to rebuild Kosovo and Serbia and to restore what we have knocked down in Montenegro. Does anyone believe that such expense would be an easy proposition to make to this House, let alone other Parliaments in Europe? It is reckoned that such a commitment will be necessary not only to keep the peace but to rebuild those areas so that people can go back to them. We shall realise the extent of the damage only when our troops have gone in.

We must consider past experience. Sadly, there are refugees who have spent over 40 years in camps in Palestine. Cyprus has been divided for 25 years, and there is still a huge UN commitment to the island. We need to learn lessons from that, and we must try to build communities and bring them together.

That brings me to the role of the WEU and the Council of Europe. If ever there were a missed opportunity for two organisations to take action, it was the situation in Kosovo over the past 12 months. If the Council of Europe and the WEU had been able to work together, perhaps with NATO's support, and had got to grips with some of the issues, we might not have the result that we have today. Certainly, there must be a role for those organisations in the future, and they need to find that role.

We must consider the small-scale experience of the Multinational Advisory Police Element, made up of the police forces of 21 countries, which is currently operating in Albania and is about to be expanded. That police force is making a determined effort, against all the odds, to bring some semblance of order to the Albanian police force. The task is difficult and, some might say, bizarre, considering the sad state of some of the Albanian police force and its practices in the past.

I have a constituent who has a distinguished war record and was highly decorated for his services in Yugoslavia. I refer to Sir Alfred Blake, former Lord Mayor of Portsmouth and a marine commander, who, for a sizeable chunk of the second world war, fought with Tito and his partisans. He explained to me the difficult and complex nature of the region's people—not only the Serbs, but others—the difficult terrain, the problems of trying to get people to work together and the fragile nature of the operation. Why did not, or could not, our military intelligence—I refer not only to the UK, but to NATO—give us better information about targets and the personalities that we had to deal with?

When we consider what is happening to our defence expenditure, we notice that significant changes and slippages are already occurring. Coming from Portsmouth as I do, I have asked a number of questions about the Royal Navy. It is interesting that there has already been a slow but determined effort to retard or cancel scheme after scheme. That is obviously a disappointment. When one considers those schemes individually, one might think that there are good reasons for cancelling them, but when one considers them collectively, one begins to wonder whether a trend is emerging. Developments that were made two years ago are beginning to slip away and some schemes have been dropped altogether. Some schemes for updating ships will be put on hold for such a long time that they will no longer be practical. I hope that the Select Committee on Defence will consider those issues in the near future.

We have an opportunity today to discuss wider defence issues, and there is a significant trend in defence expenditure that leads me to believe that all three arms of our armed forces are experiencing a drop-back in procurement. Despite the best efforts of Ministers and the assurances made in the House by the Secretary of State, the Minister for the Armed Forces and the Under-Secretary, we are not yet doing enough to retain and recruit the service men and women that we desperately need.pa We have a number of continuing commitments. The Secretary of State rightly referred in his speech to some of the on-going roles fulfilled by our service men and women. We should not forget that we still have a significant garrison in the Falklands which requires a considerable sum from our defence budget. I am glad, however, that we now have a more realistic approach to the islands' south American neighbours. I hope that we are learning that greater friendliness and co-operation will, in the long term, lead to a better future for the people in the Falkland Islands and, possibly, faster progress in reducing our defence commitment to the islands.

Gibraltar has, once again, proved that it is a vital part of our defence interests. It has played a role on two or three occasions in the past couple of years. We need to continue to make a strong stand against our colleagues in Spain to ensure that they do not put undue pressure on Gibraltar. We must continue to assure the people of Gibraltar that we support their view.

It is clear that we shall continue to use the bases in Cyprus for a long time to come. The two sovereign bases have served this nation well. They are home to several thousand service men and women and their families, and I cannot believe that there could be a rundown of those bases.

In Germany, we have a slightly different problem. The rundown of our forces there has caused problems in my area of Hampshire because men and their families have been returned and are experiencing pressures. I should like the Government to demonstrate greater commitment to making sure that those families' needs are better met than at present. The Secretary of State mentioned the Royal Navy's continuing role in combating drugs in south America and the Caribbean. He was right to congratulate the captain and crew of HMS Marlborough on their work.

Such roles give rise to a number of issues but, like Kosovo and Bosnia, they provoke questions about overstretch and the resulting problems for various elements of our armed forces. The "Partnership for Peace" is excellent, and we need to build on it. It brings together people who are currently outside the NATO family. There is a greater need for our people to work with them, but the simple fact of co-operating with countries such as the Ukraine means that service men will spend time there working with the people on exercises and planning. That, too, puts pressure on their units, and overstretch causes many problems.

The House is somewhat depleted, but I am sure that most hon. Members who are present will want to speak, so I shall try not to delay the House too long. However, I want to address the moral obligations that the Ministry of Defence has on four key issues that have existed for a long time. One has been around for nearly 50 years, and I hope that, when the Under-Secretary replies to the debate, he will at least offer some light at the end of what is a very long tunnel.

The first issue is the way in which we have responded to the problems of our nuclear test veterans. I read with interest recently that the Government will make payments to the Fijian Government so that they can compensate their service men who were involved in those tests. I represent a substantial number of ex-service men who went through those tests. Sadly, their number is being depleted because many have become ill and died. Their claim for justice has still not been answered, and our lack of consideration of that issue is a stain on this country's character.

The second issue, for which many hon. Members have fought long and hard, is the treatment of members of the armed forces and their civilian workers who worked with asbestos. Not a day goes by without an inquest into the death of somebody in Greater Portsmouth being reported in the local newspaper, under headlines such as "Civilian Worker in Her Majesty's Dockyard Dies of Asbestos-Related Illnesses"—illnesses which were contracted mostly when delagging warships in the 1950s and 1960s. Sadly, that issue still has not been addressed. If it was right to give national recognition to miners' claims for illnesses that caused them so much distress, surely it is right to do the same for those in the defence industry.

Thirdly, we must continue pressure on the Government to speed up the resolution of problems concerning the illnesses of Gulf war veterans. Fourthly, the MOD must end, once and for all, the barbaric practice of experimenting on animals, whether by shooting bullets into pigs or putting goats into decompression chambers and increasing the pressure until they die. Most people would think that the MOD could have long done without such practices. I hope that those four points, which are major issues to many people, will be addressed.

I take this opportunity, as I am sure other hon. Members will, to thank the reserve forces for their work. It is still not too late for the MOD to recognise the vital role that they have not only played but will yet have to play in Kosovo for a long time to come. I am sure that there are some—even among the three Ministers—in the MOD who feel a twinge of conscience and are willing to think again on the issue.

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): No.

Mr. Hancock: The hon. Gentleman, who is wearing some spectacular House of Commons socks, says that he does not think so. I would be a little more generous. Perhaps he needs to pull his socks up.

Mr. Simpson: Is the hon. Gentleman a candidate?

Mr. Hancock: No; my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester (Mr. Russell) and I are the only two who have not signed up for the campaign trail.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): There is still time.

Mr. Hancock: Sadly, for me, that time has long passed.

We have armed forces of which the whole nation can be very proud. Their commitment is unquestionable. We should thank them, but more importantly, we should ensure that, in their endeavours, they have not just the full support of this House but leadership in government that convinces them that the Government are on their side. On all occasions when asked, on issues across the world, they have been on our side—the right side.

3.42 pm

Mr. John Healey (Wentworth): I should first apologise to both Front-Bench teams, as election commitments in my constituency may mean that I will be unable to stay for the winding-up speeches.

I cannot avoid paying tribute to the unshakeable determination of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his colleagues in their campaign to force Milosevic to back down and to prevent the Serbian capacity committing atrocities in the region. We have grown used to the chilling phrase "ethnic cleansing", but my fear is that it is a euphemism and that, as Serbian troops pull out and ours go in, evidence will emerge to reinforce our sense of rightness in the campaign over recent months.

Nevertheless, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, we face a formidable task truly to settle the situation in Kosovo. During business questions, my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) said that it may take five years to be certain that the military action has achieved its long-term aim. I fear that that may be true, although it is also surely true that the military technical agreement signed last night is a very welcome and important step towards that long-term aim. The signing of that agreement is a major military and political vindication of the action that the Government and NATO have taken in recent months.

I also pay tribute to the soldiers, aircrews and ground crews who have carried out the campaign—some from my constituency and many others from elsewhere in South Yorkshire—as well as to the armed forces and aid agencies that have dealt with so many traumatised refugees in and around the Balkans. Britain, one must remember, has been one of the largest and most active donors in the effort to improve the provision of humanitarian relief for the refugees. The Government's aim of directing the humanitarian effort, in order that the refugees are helped to stay in the region until they are able to return to their homes, is surely right. As a Government, we have committed more than £40 million to that effort, and more will clearly need to be done.

It is obviously right that, if possible, the refugees should remain in the region before returning home, although I welcomed the recent commitment of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister to beef up the United Kingdom's commitment to take refugees who needed to leave the region. I extend a welcome, as many are in Rotherham, to the first refugees from Kosovo who are due to arrive there next week.

It is clearly right that Kosovo has dominated any discussion on, or attention to, military issues in recent months. To that extent, today's debate is a welcome opportunity to reintroduce some of the wider perspectives that the House must consider. In doing so, British forces could truly be said to be a force for good in the world at present. The British armed forces have a proud tradition of promoting peace and stability; Kosovo is just the latest example of it.

[Mr. John Healey]

In Bosnia, our British forces led the way in trying to bring suspected war criminals to justice. In Iraq several years before, Britain, in concert with the United States, led efforts to contain Saddam Hussein. Royal Air Force pilots of course still protect Iraqi Kurds in northern Iraq. The proud tradition extends beyond the previous decade. For more than 40 years during the cold war, British forces were committed to the defence of Europe, and stationed in Europe to undertake that responsibility.

British armed forces have a vital role to play in promoting peace and stability throughout the world, particularly Europe, as they do in peacekeeping and peace-support operations. As my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) pointed out, later this year, Britain is due to sign an agreement with the United Nations to make more of our forces, including all our rapid-reaction troops, available for UN peace-support operations. Should we sign that agreement, we are set to become the first permanent member of the UN Security Council to do so, thereby giving a lead to others.

NATO has obviously played the lead role in Kosovo, but we need to beef up the UN's capacity to play a leading role in future peacekeeping operations, to carry out the so-called Petersberg principles of humanitarian and rescue tasks, peacekeeping, peace-making and, of course, crisis management.

It is fair to say that the new Labour Government have put new emphasis on our armed forces' role in conflict-prevention. That was made tangible by designating one of our armed forces' seven key missions as defence diplomacy and conflict prevention—core missions and responsibilities that underpin defence planning now and in future.

The second way in which the Government have put added emphasis on the role of our armed forces in conflict prevention has been in aiming to realise the aspirations of the commitment of EU states to a common foreign and security policy, on which the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) dwelt so long. I remind him that the CFSP originated under the 1992 Maastricht treaty, which was signed by the Government of whom he was a member. That treaty pointed to the eventual framing of a common defence policy, which was given further impetus in 1997 by the Amsterdam treaty, and added impetus more recently in Cologne.

It seems to me that the aim on the European front should be to reinforce the capacity of European states to act together in pursuing foreign policy and security interests. The Secretary of State underlined that in his opening address when he said that he was determined that the European Union should play a full role on the international stage.

The elements that require further development are fairly clear. We need to develop more common policies, more effective decision-making procedures, shared access to military advice, planning and intelligence, and better political control of the strategic direction when we are involved in crisis-management operations. Above all, we need a stronger European defence capability for use within a NATO, a European Union or a UN framework.

The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon, whom I welcome back to his seat, said several times that he was concerned about the military resources likely to be required should a common European approach be developed further. It is a startling fact that the European members of NATO collectively now spend two thirds as much as America on defence, yet can only project a small fraction of America's military capability beyond their borders. European taxpayers are much more likely to get better value from their defence budgets if their Governments and armed forces can work more closely together.

It may be common sense to share resources and strengthen co-operation in that way, but it is certainly not straightforward. Recent experience in the Balkans has proved difficult, and has provided a learning experience for many European states concerning the difficulties of pooling efforts to prepare and deploy peace support operations beyond our borders. Thirty European states contribute to SFOR, and an unknown number will contribute to the KFOR operation in the coming months.

I am under no illusions about the fact that the military involvement of European states will be essential in the Balkans, and will continue to be essential for the foreseeable future. I am also under no illusions about the fact that developing a common foreign and security capacity will be complex and protracted, and will involve dealing with some of the difficulties that the hon. Member for Stratford–on–Avon set out. Surely, however, that is the right way to go.

There is also the broader area of personnel matters associated with the future of our armed forces and their operation and deployment in the United Kingdom and overseas. Clearly, the extent of our overseas commitments is placing considerable strain on our armed forces, as I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister would concede.

In that context, the major recruitment drive that the Government have recently launched across all three services is welcome, as is the emphasis on quality rather than quantity, and the drive to recruit more women and black and other ethnic minority service personnel. As the Secretary of State pointed out, that will lead to an increase of 3,300 personnel in the Army. The extra personnel will be directed to tackling some of the present shortfall in front-line troops.

May I also direct my hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 585, which has now been signed by 96 Members from both sides of the House, about the International Labour Organisation convention on child soldiers. The Government have been involved this month in the ILO discussions on a new convention that will prohibit the employment of children under 18 in most hazardous forms of labour—and clearly, armed conflict is one of the most hazardous forms of labour that one could imagine.

Although recruiting young soldiers for our armed forces is right, I urge the Minister and his colleagues in the Department to consider seriously the case for not deploying service personnel under 18 in battle zones, thereby supporting the new ILO convention.

I also urge my hon. Friend to give extra emphasis to the new learning forces initiative that has recently been introduced, which offers new opportunities for service personnel to gain accredited qualifications while serving. That will achieve two things. It will help to boost recruitment and retention in the armed forces, but equally, it will help to equip personnel who wish to leave the forces to return to civilian life.

Members of Parliament, especially those who represent areas such as mine with deep-seated high unemployment, will be familiar with the situation of constituents who, having served in our armed forces for five, eight, 10 or even 12 years, return to their home areas ill equipped to take the opportunities that may exist, and unskilled for the sort of civilian jobs available—[Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey), but will the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) contain himself?

Mr. Healey: I welcome a further initiative that the Department has introduced recently—the veterans advice unit. That will act as a single point of contact to which ex-service personnel can turn for advice or information on any matter that they wish.

That is an important step, and will provide a service for ex-service personnel across the board. In that context, may I gently urge my hon. Friend to think about the fact that we should show the same respect and recognition to those who served in the Suez canal zone in the 1950s as we do to those who have served in the Balkans in the 1990s?

3.57 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): I shall begin by referring briefly to Kosovo, because, although this is a debate on a wider subject—defence in the world—much reference has been made to Kosovo, and we can use it as a useful starting point from which to draw some wider lessons. The significance of the Kosovo campaign has been that the House has had to consider how to react as a democracy in peacetime to the resurfacing of the sort of barbarism that it had been thought had been finally defeated earlier this century.

The alliances in favour of, and against, taking military action in Kosovo cut across the usual alignments of party politics. Those of us who supported taking military action at an early stage were disappointed that the Government unnecessarily stated, right at the beginning, that there would be no use of ground forces in an opposed environment.

That sent a signal to Milosevic that that was one major threat that he need not fear. It was a mistake by the Government to send that signal, and it was a mistake by my party to endorse it. I know why the signal was sent: it was because we live in an age in which we fight wars in the full glare of media coverage.

We know that, on previous occasions, the military burden has been gigantically greater on this country. Casualties have run into tens of thousands in a given battle, and millions for all participants over the period of a war. Yet that has been accepted because, during those extreme circumstances, draconian methods of censorship, and to a considerable extent self-censorship, apply. We have only to consider the preparations that were made in southern England before the Normandy landings. Areas in the south of the country were closed for access. They were hermetically secured and there was no way in which the normal rights of civilians in towns and villages in southern England were being preserved.

That was a strange paradox for a democracy. A democracy hates to adopt the methods of the dictators whom it is trying to defeat. Yet, if it is to defeat those dictators, it will have to adopt at least some of their methods. Sir Karl Popper summed up this problem in what he called "the paradox of tolerance", which holds that we must tolerate all but the intolerant—because, if we tolerate the intolerant, the conditions for tolerance disappear and the tolerant go with them. In other words, to a considerable extent, we have to fight fire with fire.

I was pleased that the Government gradually withdrew from the unwise commitment that had been given at the outset not to use ground forces, if necessary, to defeat Milosevic. Assuming that everything works out to plan, that the campaign has come to an end at this stage and democracy is restored in the area concerned—it may be many years after all that has happened when we have access to the documentation, the archives, the considerations, and the intelligence appreciations on which the conflict was eventually decided—I believe that we shall discover that two elements, in addition to the proper use of air power in context as part of a campaign, proved to be decisive. Those two elements, as I indicated briefly last night in response to the Secretary of State's statement, were the involvement of the Russians and the covert threat that, after all, ground forces would be deployed if Milosevic did not comply.

It is worth considering what the outcome would have been if there had been no way of obtaining Russian acquiescence in forcing the Serbs to back down. The outcome could have been very different. It is important that we do not draw from this episode the false conclusion that, whenever trouble arises, whenever dirty deeds, murders and ethnic cleansing, for example, face the democracies of Europe in future, we need only send a few score bombers to bomb the offender. I think that that will be proven in time not to have been sufficient by itself.

I have been surprised at the readiness with which commentators such as John Keegan, a distinguished military historian, have been prepared to say, "I was wrong. I said that bombing alone would not work and it has worked." Perhaps some people are better historians than they are contemporary analysts. Let us wait until the John Keegans of the future have access to the archives and the materials on which proper history can be written. I think it will be found that the diplomatic triumph of getting the Russians on side and the killer threat of ground forces being deployed—if necessary—against armed opposition, made Milosevic surrender in the end.

I shall move on from Kosovo. As has been said, the consideration of wider defence problems has been stymied to a considerable degree by the natural tendency to focus upon the crisis in the Balkans. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), the shadow Secretary of State for Defence, on a masterly analysis of the risks that face us with the creation of a European common foreign and security policy and defence arrangements that will cut across the defence arrangements which have served us so well in NATO.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart), who is no longer in her place, took pride in the award of the Charlemagne prize to the Prime Minister at the hands of Lionel Jospin, the French premier, in Aachen in May. I took the liberty of leaving the Chamber for a few moments to retrieve the press cutting that I remembered of that occasion. There was something that

[Dr. Julian Lewis]

I knew I wanted to lay before the House and I could not rely on remembering it accurately enough if I did not make a check. I am glad that I took the trouble to check. I now know what it was that so jarred when I listened to the hon. Lady. It was the inscription on the medal presented to the Prime Minister. It read, "Peace and Merger in Europe". Unfortunately, I fear that that is being lined up for this country.

Imagine what the effect would have been if the United Kingdom had been merged with a united Europe in many of the wars gone by. We would have been forced to abandon the geographical defence advantages that our country, being an island, has conferred upon us. The arrival of a defence set-up in Europe would mean that, if we disagreed with a majority of our fellow European partners on a defence policy to face down aggression or to respond to a threat, we would be overruled. That would have led in the past to a situation where our salvation and the subsequent salvation of occupied states in Europe could never have been achieved.

I was struck by the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) earlier in the debate about ballistic missile defence. I have been impressed by the fact that my hon. Friend is never afraid to be something of a lone voice or something of a prophet. Some would even say that he is a something a Cassandra. I remember previously listening to him stressing to the House time and again the dangers of the millennium bug. At one stage, he was a voice in the wilderness. However, everyone believes in the millennium bug now. My hon. Friend has moved on and has turned his attention to possible future problems arising from our lack of ballistic missile defence, and the danger that guided missiles could be used to wreak destruction with no protection for this country. Perhaps it could be speculated that the advent of the millennium bug will save this country from the use of ballistic missiles against it. Perhaps after the year 2000, they will not function properly. However, I should not like to gamble with our future security purely on that basis.

Mr. David Atkinson: I thank my hon. Friend for his kind remarks. Is he aware of the report in The Daily Telegraph recently which quoted an American defence official who warned that if Saddam Hussein wanted to send a missile to Europe, 1 January—the next new year—would be the day to do so?

Dr. Lewis: No, I was not aware of that report, but the example of Saddam Hussein is apposite. The point about ballistic missile defence is that it can be applied in three very different contexts.

The first context is that to which my hon. Friend alluded when he referred to the V1 and the V2. The V1, as he rightly pointed out, was the first cruise missile, and the V2 was the first ballistic missile. This country had no physical means of defence against the V2. Although it was possible to create counter-measures against the flying bomb—the V1—it was impossible to do anything against the V2, other than to use deception measures to convince the Germans that they were overshooting the targets when they were falling short, and thus to persuade them to shorten the range still further.

If one can develop a defence against conventionally armed missiles, one will proportionately reduce the weight of the attack. What that means in ordinary language is that, if one can knock down 70 or 80 per cent. of those incoming missiles, one will reduce the damage to one's country by 70 or 80 per cent. However, the situation gets more complicated in the era of weapons of mass destruction, whether nuclear or biological. Under those circumstances it is not good enough to knock down 70 or 80 per cent., because if 20 or 30 per cent. get through, the devastation will be equivalent to total annihilation.

There is therefore another circumstance in which ballistic missile defence is valuable, and a third circumstance in which it is of no value whatever. Ballistic missile defence in the mass destruction era is valuable if the aggressor has at his disposal only a small number of nuclear or biological weapons. Because he does not have anything like an overkill capability, it is worth being able to counter as many of the incoming missiles as possible, as there is a chance of knocking out of the equation all those that would otherwise get through, or at least making a significant difference to the level of damage that the country would suffer.

However, against a super-power equipped with hundreds or even thousands of weapons of mass destruction, it is living in a fool's paradise to believe that ballistic missile defence can save one's country from destruction. In a way, that is a good thing. I have always been a believer in nuclear deterrence. I have always supported our national policy of minimum nuclear deterrence.

That policy depends on the very fact that, once one has the ability to retaliate against an aggressor by replying with 50 or 100 nuclear warheads that will reliably reach their targets, it does not matter whether the aggressor has many thousands of nuclear warheads with which to threaten his victim. Precisely because a relatively small proportion of nuclear warheads getting through in retaliation is all that is required to inflict unacceptable damage on an aggressor, his overkill capability is worthless, meaningless and of no value except perhaps political—certainly, of no strategic significance.

The Secretary of State said that people should not forget the Government before this. Nor, in my view, should people forget the Opposition before this. Who would have dreamed 10 years ago that we would find ourselves with a Labour Government who had, rightly and apparently successfully, stood up to military aggression on a point of principle, as I said in the Kosovo debate the other week, because we were not prepared to see innocent people being murdered and brutalised? Who would have thought that a Government of the Labour persuasion would supervise a successful military campaign that inevitably involved inflicting considerable devastation on a civilian environment?

It is astonishing to see the way in which the workings of the democratic system in this country have paid off. Those of us who fought to persuade the unilateral nuclear disarmers on the then Labour Benches that they were mistaken may have had an intellectual input into the debate, but the people who really deserve the credit for the fact that we now have a Government who are prepared, under the right circumstances, to use military action properly are the electorate of Great Britain who, in 1983 and again in 1987, showed the Labour party that it would not get re-elected unless it dropped the policy of one-sided nuclear disarmament.

I welcome the fact that Labour dropped that policy. It pretended to drop it in 1989, using various formulae such as "We will give up one of ours if the Russians will give up one of theirs." That was rather like someone who lives in a bungalow and his neighbour who lives in a skyscraper each offering to give up one floor. However, between 1989 and July 1991, when the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) wrote an article in The Guardian—where else?—finally admitting that Labour would keep nuclear weapons as long as other countries had them, the Labour party slowly crept back to a responsible position on defence.

As someone who believes more strongly in the defence of this country than in the victory of any particular political party at a general election, I welcomed that, even though I know that it would make my job as a Conservative political organiser much harder in terms of fighting the Labour party in the future. I am glad that Labour did what it did, and I think that now most members of the Labour party are also glad that they did what they did.

One or two Labour Members are not so pleased. Among those I include the hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen), who is not in his place at present. He has consistently supported the unilateral nuclear disarmament line. Because I disagree with him on that, it does not follow that I must disagree with him on every point in his analysis. He was right, for example, when he said that, in terms of deterrence, it is a mistake to say that uncertainty is equivalent to stability.

Over the past 20 years, I have heard that argument advanced by many people who believe in NATO and in nuclear deterrence. They say that the key to deterrence is uncertainty. Well, only up to a point: uncertainty whether one will use force is obviously better for purposes of deterrence than certainty that one will not use force. But the certainty of retaliation with force if necessary is the best deterrent of all.

That was why, to return to the point with which I began, it was a terrible mistake, even if we did not intend to use ground forces in Kosovo, to say that—because we replaced what limited value uncertainty as to whether we would might have had, in our bargaining position with Milosovic, with certainty on his part that we would not do so. As I predicted before, and as time will bear out, it will eventually be discovered that Milosovic gave in when he no longer held to the certainty that we would not use ground forces if he did not comply.

I have some examples from history. During the second world war, we used two different methods of mass destruction on German and Japanese cities. Terrible fire storms were caused by the 1,000-bomber raids and terrible destruction and annihilation were caused by the dropping of the atomic bombs on two Japanese cities. Strangely enough, more people were killed—at least initially—in the fire raid on Tokyo in 1945 than in Hiroshima or Nagasaki. So why did the individual bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki bring about surrender whereas the fire storm on Tokyo did not?

The answer comes back to the word "uncertainty". When the bombers took off for a fire raid, be it on Tokyo, Nuremberg or Hamburg, no one could know in advance with certainty how that would work out. The outcome could have been, as it was in the case of Tokyo, Cologne and Hamburg, absolute devastation. On the other hand, the outcome could have been, as it was in the case of the infamous Nuremberg raid, that the bomber stream would be intercepted, that the fleet of aircraft would be massacred and that the city would hardly be touched at all. Precisely because the target country did not know in advance that it was certain to incur the devastation and destruction that did occur, it was prepared to take the risk of incurring it. But as soon as the Japanese saw that there was no uncertainty, that the dropping of single bombs meant the certain destruction of their homeland city by city, they had no alternative but to surrender. Therefore, the maintenance of deterrence depends on the certainty of one's opponent that he cannot possibly escape the military consequences of defiance and attack.

I am sorry to have dwelt in some detail on that point, but it is essential that a myth is not created by what seems to have been the successful result of the Kosovo campaign—that one can rely on unsupported conventional air power to bring about compliance. One day, we may get into a situation where other decisive factors—the possible use of ground forces and Russia's diplomatic support—may not be available. Then we would discover our mistake too late.

I was surprised at the references made by the hon. Member for Edgbaston to the maintenance of peace, and the achievement, of which she is rightly proud, of being returned to the House—as someone born in Munich—for a British constituency, but I found it difficult to follow the mental processes that led her to conclude that that was something to do with the European Union or any of its predecessor institutions. I am not aware of any military threat to our democratic systems between the end of the war and the creation of those institutions, which was done away with by the creation and the activities of those institutions.

The reason why the hon. Lady was successful—I congratulate her on being elected democratically to represent Neville Chamberlain's old seat—was because Britain, America and Russia won the war. Having done so, they imposed on Germany a system of democracy and helped to resettle western Europe with a system of free independent democratic states. As I have said before, and shall no doubt say again, the lesson of history is that wars seldom, if ever, break out between two democratic states. They break out between combinations of democracies and dictatorships, and dictatorships and dictatorships, but seldom, if ever, soley between democratic states.

As a result of the creation of a system of free independent democratic states in Europe, together with the military alliance of NATO with which they can be involved if they wish, or from which they can distance themselves or withdraw if they wish, the system that has secured the peace for half a century can be preserved. Only now that it has been put to the test, at the end of the century, can we see that it has been capable of dealing with a re-emergence of something that should never have been allowed to get this far.

Therefore, to put at risk the system that has preserved the peace, by messing around, monkeying around and fiddling around for the sake of some basket of trade-offs, as my hon. Friend the shadow Secretary of State said—because the Prime Minister wishes to remain at the heart of European affairs, and he knows that he dare not try to take Britain into the single currency at this point—is folly in the highest degree.

[Dr. Lewis]

I understand that, today, we are not discussing in detail the question of the release of the identity of the soldiers being investigated in relation to Bloody Sunday and I shall be careful what I say. I refer to it only in one connection, although it is a connection that may prove fatal to them. Whatever the court decides, there is a risk that the damage has already irrevocably been done. If their names and addresses have been released quite independently of the court's decision, and if they go on to the internet, there will be no prospect of preventing them from being copied, recopied, published and advertised to those in terrorist organisations who would wish to do the soldiers harm whether they be guilty or innocent.

The internet is not always dangerous. It can sometimes have a use which is more poignant and constructive. I close my remarks by referring to a site which I found recently—the site of the Commonwealth War Graves Commission. There, it is possible, by keying in the name of anyone killed in the first or the second world war, to find out the place and date of death and such other details as were available at the time. I was moved the other day to do that in connection with the father of a close friend of mine, Mr. Ray Brooks of Totton in my constituency. He expressed an interest in learning what details had been retained. Sure enough, up came the information, and the certificate in memory of Stoker 1st Class Bert Brooks of HMS Cape Howe, Royal Navy, which I have here, was duly printed off. The ship went down fighting on 21 June 1940, and he was aged only 33.

We owe peace in Europe and the triumph of democracy to the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of people such as Bert Brooks. It would be a terrible disgrace to their memory if we wilfully destroyed what has been built up so successfully, and what has been tried and tested so recently, by undertaking unwise experiments to modify and replace institutions that have proved their value beyond all question.

4.31 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): I take the view that there should be some time sharing among us when colleagues have been waiting all day to speak, so I hope to be succinct and shall put my speech in the form of questions.

The first question arises out of the speech of the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). I listened extremely carefully to what he said about air power, and this question is perhaps less to him than to my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary. Is it true that air power was decisive? As I understand it, the attacks round Mount Pastic by the KLA guerrillas early last week threatened to split the Yugoslav forces by capturing the road linking Prizren and Pec. At that point, they had to come out from bunkers and from their positions to deal with what were, in effect, land forces.

The KLA fighters were land forces at the time and, in those circumstances, the Yugoslavs took serious casualties—they had to deploy large units and therefore became relatively easy targets, for the American Warthogs in particular. If that is considered accurate by the Ministry of Defence, does it not suggest that land forces were indeed decisive in persuading the leadership in Belgrade to act as it did?

Secondly, I was asked—in rather strident terms at business questions and far more courteously by the Secretary of State for Defence—to apologise. There will perhaps be an apology from me, but it will not come until five years have elapsed. I think that Pandora's box has been opened and the horrors that have been unleashed by the bombing are almost unimaginable.

I say that partly out of experience of Bosnia. As one of those who never wanted us to go into Bosnia in the first place, I have to agree with the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock): how on earth and—this question has to be asked at an early stage—in what circumstances will we ever get out of Kosovo? I do not think that we will do so in my lifetime and I rather doubt whether we will do so in the lifetime of the youngest among us.

My third question is, how exactly do the Government think that the Russians fit into this picture? What is to be the Russian chain of command? Is it not true that the war ended earlier than it would have done because of remarkable Russian good will? That is ironic, because the Russians were sidelined by the United States and the United Kingdom for at least a fortnight at the beginning of the conflict. When we found that immediate bombing did not work, we realised that we needed the Russians.

I shall quote briefly my friend Paul Wilkinson, who is a professor at St. Andrews university. He says:

"A major lesson is that Russia, for all its domestic problems, is still a key player. It is foolish and dangerous to world peace to try to exclude Russia from the top table of international decision making. The same is true of China".

I have a particular question about the Russians, which has been eloquently put in a letter from a man I do not know, Albert McFall, to The Independent. He says:

"If a Nato and Russian peace-keeping force does eventually enter Kosovo, there could be problems in the future.

If as seems very likely the Serb government breaks agreements and resumes ethnic cleansing, Nato would presumably withdraw its peace-keeping troops. The air attacks would start again and Nato would then be bombing Serb and Russian troops who would remain. Would Nato also attack Russian lines of communication such as ships and transport aeroplanes?"

That question needs at least a comment.

The military advisers to Mr. Chernomyrdin, as I understand it, were insistent that there should be an autonomous Russian chain of command and it is reported that there was some conflict between him and his military staff officers. He had to say rather sharply that he alone had President Yeltsin's authority to negotiate, but those people are still there in Moscow and we should take notice of that. What is the Government's understanding in respect of the treatment of Russian troops who may be in Kosovo for a long time?

My fourth question refers to the Kosovars. They think that they are to go back to Kosovo and will get independence, although they also think that we may have gone back on that. Have we inherited another Balkan protectorate? The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South raised very powerfully the question of the KLA, which is now a tough little guerrilla army. Those partisans are unlikely to welcome the transition from beneficiaries of NATO close air support to disarmed wards of NATO peacekeepers now serving as the outriders of Serb sovereignty, if it be the case that Serb sovereignty is to remain.

I think that disarming the KLA is an horrendous prospect, partly because I am sufficiently old to remember my contemporaries going to Malaya when I was in the Rhine Army. One of the problems in Malaya was that we could not tell the difference between a civilian and a guerrilla. It would be the easiest thing in the world for the KLA fighters to melt away, pretend to be civilians and then—unless there is a rigorous chain of command, which I gather does not exist in such a form—simply reappear.

It is difficult to be sanguine, and how on earth will we make sure that the KLA surrenders arms? I am afraid that my question of Tuesday to the Prime Minister remains: is there any evidence that the KLA will be any more willing to give up its arms than the IRA? If NATO troops enter Kosovo, the peacekeepers may find themselves having to protect Serb civilians from the KLA. It is undoubtedly true that Agin Ceku—who, incidentally, is a Croat—and Hashem Thaqi, who is one of the political leaders, are among a whole group who are absolutely determined on revenge. It seems that we will be in Kosovo for a very long time.

On 8 June, in The Independent, Timothy Garton Ash wrote:

"So you thought it was all over? Don't fool yourself, please. There are several nightmares still ahead. Even if the Yugoslavian military finally accepts withdrawal terms, they—and especially the paramilitaries—can make a last round of bloody mayhem on the way out. On their heels will follow the KLA, a rag-tag army of furious young men, who have seen comrades killed, sisters raped, families deported.

I and the public know

What all schoolchildren learn.

Those to whom evil is done

Do evil in return.

Auden was right; and these Albanians will do evil in return."

They are determined to do so. How will we prevent them? It will be a mightily difficult job.

Yesterday I asked about war crimes, which, I understand, are not mentioned in the peace proposals. I also understand that the Russian Parliament is unwilling to accept a draft resolution calling on all concerned to help in the investigation of atrocities.

Fifthly, the Prime Minister urges the Serb people to overthrow their ruler, and says that there will be no money while he remains. Some of us think it more likely that, if left to themselves, the Serb people will deal with President Milosevic. If we try to insist, even at this stage, that they chose a ruler on our terms, is it not more probable that President Milosevic's power and grip will be strengthened? As the policy towards President Milosevic and war crimes was left out of the formal document, I now ask what it is.

Sixthly, may we have some facts about the massacres? The Albanians have repeatedly said that all these people have been massacred. The fact is that, although they are in a terrible state, many seem to have emerged. In war, all sorts of things are exaggerated, and one does not know what to believe. Undoubtedly appalling atrocities have taken place, but it would be helpful to know the scale of those atrocities, and in particular to know about rape. Serbs have vehemently denied that rape has taken place on a large scale. No doubt it has happened from time to time, but they deny it, and I think that it is now up to us to produce evidence relating to what is, after all, an emotive subject—and rightly so.

Seventhly, may we have some information about the attitude to depleted uranium? A survey should be carried out as quickly as possible, especially in respect of those removing tanks that have been hit by armour-piercing shells. I may be in a slightly different position from Ministers in this regard, but in Iraq I saw the results of depleted uranium—used in the Gulf war by, I think, the Americans rather than us. There is every evidence that these appallingly emaciated infants are victims of that kind of shelling, and we really do need to conduct a survey as soon as possible.

When I asked about that last night, the Secretary of State for Defence replied:

"On the environmental impact, certain aspects of Yugoslav life will be affected by the bombing."—[Official Report, 9 June 1999; Vol. 332, c. 749.]

That is certainly true, but the scale of the environmental catastrophe affects all of Europe: environmental catastrophe knows no boundaries.

My eighth question is this. What is the assessment of the number of soldiers who will return in the next few months to find that they have no jobs, because their factories have been knocked out? It is a classic problem: a returning army finds that there is unemployment, and inability to work. Therein lies huge mischief.

Ninthly, I want to ask about the clearing of cluster bombs and other armaments. Kosovo is littered with unexploded cluster bombs—dropped by us, I understand. They are not very different from land mines. The Ministry of Defence can take great credit from the land mines treaty, but, although the seriousness of that problem has been recognised, we have not been told who will clear up the cluster bombs.

General Sir Michael Rose has said:

"As the peacekeepers prepare for the formidable tasks ahead of them, they will be reflecting that, in the Balkans, nothing unravels so rapidly as a peace plan where the details have not been clearly defined and agreed by all sides."

My final point is this. What will be done about conflict prevention? In particular, what will be done about the Carnegie report, which has been with the MOD for two years, and about the crisis management unit proposed by the Finns?

I promised to share the allotted time, and I will stick to that promise.

4.47 pm

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): The Chamber has shown itself to be fully representative today—representative, perhaps, of the apathy in the country in regard to the European elections, and the lack of attention that we politicians sadly display in regard to defence matters—even on the day after the signing of the historic agreement between the commanders of the Yugoslav armed forces and NATO on the withdrawal of Serb forces from Kosovo.

Before I say anything else, I must pay tribute to the courage and dedication of our forces in the Balkans, and in particular to the crews of the Royal Air Force, both in the air and on the ground. Air power has shown itself to be the crucial determinant of events in this conflict—as, indeed, it did in Operation Desert Fox, in the Gulf war and in the earlier Falklands war. Although air power has had its detractors during this conflict, we must remember that it is highly unlikely that the Serb negotiators would ultimately have signed without its decisive and devastatingly accurate effects on their compatriots.

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

The European Union's common foreign and security policy will prove to be no effective substitute for the integrated command structure of NATO and the existence of assigned formations to NATO on the part of its member states. The policy, which my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) so eloquently criticised, is much more. It is—I quote from paragraph 5 of annexe 3 of the Cologne summit communiqué:

"a new step in the construction of the EU".

It is much more the construction of a new political step than the creation of a more effective military defence for our country, western Europe and our alliance as a whole.

Indeed, there is a risk that the European Union's common security and defence identity, which will subsume the role of the WEU by the end of next year, will not, in practice, offer the assurance of complete mutual defence commitment that is enshrined in the Brussels treaty, notwithstanding assurances to the contrary in the communiqué. I believe this to be the case because of the participation in the common foreign and security policy of neutral states such as Eire, Sweden, Austria and Finland, which, in their various ways, have stood aside during the great challenges of the cold war and have not participated in a number of the operations in which our alliance has been engaged in the Gulf and elsewhere. Indeed, there is a risk that token obeisance to in the phraseology of paragraph 5 of the EU Cologne summit presidency communiqué—will replace the possibility, which should become a reality, of applicant countries such as the Baltic states becoming full members of the NATO alliance.

"consideration of ways to ensure the possibility for WEU associate partners to be involved"—

We should remember that, in London not so long ago—in fact, only a few weeks ago—Foreign Secretary Ilves of Estonia emphasised the crucial benefit to his country and to his two Baltic neighbours of full participation in the Washington treaty's mutual defence obligations for the Baltic states. The Baltic states are democratic. They have the rule of law. In every way, they are as much entitled to be full members of NATO as to be full members of the European Union. The EU's common foreign and security policy provisions are no substitute for the genuine security guarantees that NATO membership could offer to the Baltic states.

The risk is heightened by the demarche—the initiative—towards good relations with Russia, which I fully understand, in the Cologne summit communiqué. Friendly relations with Russia are, of course, fundamental to peace and security in our continent, but we must never allow Russia to dictate the membership of NATO, or to preclude the enlargement of NATO through the accession of democratic nations such as the Baltic states or, for that matter, Romania and Bulgaria, which, by virtue of the rule and law and democracy, are fully entitled to that membership.

I must criticise, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon—I quote from the annexe to the communiqué—

"the need to undertake sustained efforts to strengthen the industrial and technological base, which we want to be competitive and dynamic".

The objective of the Cologne meeting was laudable in this respect. Everyone wants better value for money for the defence forces. Everyone wants to ensure that defence procurement is, in the jargon, smart and efficient and presents the best equipment for our armed forces at a price which we can afford, but the means that the European Union has chosen will militate directly against such competitiveness and dynamism. The European armaments agency of the leading EU nations will inevitably accord priority to procurement from EU member states and institutionalise European protectionism against the most cost-effective defence equipment in the world, which is usually American.

The common foreign and security policy summit declaration contains no mention of heightened transatlantic co-operation in weapons procurement. That flies in the face of the commercial benefits derived by British Aerospace, Rolls-Royce, GKN and many other leading British defence equipment companies from their participation in the north American market.

Paragraph 5 of annexe III of the Cologne summit communiqué speculated that

"by the end of the year 2000 . . . the WEU as an organisation would have completed its purpose."

The end of the Assembly of the WEU would be a great loss, as a speech by my hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on ballistic missile defence, clearly demonstrated. He has been a rapporteur of his committee on that subject and has contributed a great deal to the work of the WEU and the Council of Europe.

Defence budgets are introduced by national Governments and passed by national Parliaments, so it is fitting that the European parliamentary deliberative body on defence issues should be the Assembly of the WEU, whose delegations comprise Members of national Parliaments, not the European Parliament. The latter's Members have no place in their national Parliaments, little democratic endorsement from their electorate if today's turnout is replicated elsewhere in the European Union, and no direct effect on national defence budgets or defence policy debates.

The intended takeover of the WEU by the European Union is clear from the common foreign and security policy assumptions about the EU taking responsibility for the strategic studies centre and the satellite reconnaissance facility, both of which are WEU institutions.

There is a risk that the creation of a European common foreign and security policy supremo in the person of Mr. Solana, the former socialist Foreign Minister of Spain, will compare unfavourably with the traditional efficient partnership of a European Secretary-General and a United States Supreme Allied Commander Europe for NATO.

Would Britain's intervention in the Falkland Islands war have been facilitated had there been a Spanish EU common foreign and security policy supremo in post? I doubt it. The British victory owed almost everything to United States support, while European backing was singularly absent.

The greatest risk in the European Union's obtaining a defence role in its own right is that it will acquire an instrument for the potential physical coercion of recalcitrant member states—an armed capability against possible secessionist nations.

That may seem alarmist today but, since the European Union asserts the primacy of EU law over that of its member states, is developing its own corpus juris and offers no mechanism for withdrawal from the treaties—the unanimity that such a procedure would require is ruled out in practical terms by the British Prime Minister and others—the alarmism which I display on the issue today could prove to be the realism of tomorrow.

4.59 pm

Mr. Tony McNulty (Harrow, East): Sadly, I must begin as a number of other hon. Members have done by apologising to your good self, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to both Front-Bench spokesmen, as I doubt whether I will be in my place for the replies. I should add my apologies to those who are waiting for me where I am going, as I will get there rather later than anticipated, but that is by the by. For reasons that I will discuss, I thought it important to be involved in this debate.

As an aside, I have also been asked to mention that hon. Members who have a right and proper concern about nuclear proliferation and defence in the world could do no better than attend tomorrow's debates on private Members' Bills. Hopefully—it is a great hope—the Nuclear Safeguards Bill, promoted by my hon. Friend the Member for Putney (Mr. Colman), will be No. 4 on the Order Paper. I come to the Friday sittings. That Bill seeks to ratify a protocol that would make inspections of countries with nuclear capabilities easier to carry out than is the case now.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): The Bill is No. 5 on the Order Paper.

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman tells me that the Bill is No. 5, so support in spirit, if not in physical presence, will be welcome tomorrow when we shall also be discussing football hooliganism, on which I shall not dwell now.

It was a little churlish of the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples), who is not in his place now, to have a little dig about the Adjournment debate on a subject as important as defence being held on European election day, but it is easily done. Imagine my joy on leaving the Chamber, knowing that the last time there were European elections the recess happened to spill over into them, to look up what I thought was the equivalent date in 1989—8 June—and seeing that the Conservative Government had tabled a debate on the Army for that day. I thought that that was a nice little reproach to the hon. Gentleman, until I discovered that the European elections in 1989 were a week later, so my point is not well made. Equally, those who cherish the arts and our heritage may throw up the same remark about what the last Government did in 1989 because arts and our heritage were the subject of the Adjournment debate on 15 June. So, head counts, asking where everybody is, the various little digs that we make and the games that we play in this place are inappropriate, certainly from those on the Front Benches.

In both 1992 and 1997, I was perhaps not as aware as I should have been of how significant defence was and is to my constituency. I have the great pleasure—at times a dubious one; I shall come on to that towards the end of my comments—of having Raytheon, Racal and Marconi in my constituency, as well as RAF Stanmore Park, although sadly no more, RAF Bentley Priory, which has consolidated the work of RAF Stanmore Park and is significant in terms of the RAF, and a Territorial Army unit. Given that background, defence must be of significance and interest for me. That does not mean that I must speak up in favour of everything in connection with Raytheon, Racal or Marconi. Occasionally, this presents me with dilemmas, but I shall come on to that.

I am mindful of the fact that others wish to speak, so I shall dwell on three matters and keep my comments fairly brief: the United Nations; Kosovo, which cannot be ignored; and, given what I have just said about companies in my constituency, procurement—smart or otherwise.

Last year, the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) and I, together with others, shared a trip to New York essentially to visit the United Nations. It showed me my profound ignorance of the real internal machinations of the whole range of institutions that make up the United Nations and how they engage with each other. We were there a week or so before the first abortive sorties over Iraq. The planes were literally pulled back at the last moment.

My most lasting impression is of the discussions with both the Security Council personnel and its admin staff, and the peacekeeping staff. They were saying emphatically that, given the collapse of the cold war, the United Nations must reassess and refocus its activities. Those elements have been brought sharply into focus by Kosovo. Back in October or November last year, they were saying that political and military regional bodies had to do much, much more. That means NATO, the Western European Union or the European Union, and equivalents such as the Organisation of American States and the Organisation of African Unity.

Post cold war, as we move into the new millennium, we find that regional conflicts invariably start with—and are sometimes contained within—internal conflicts within a nation. That forces us to reconsider our view of international relations. Even in some democratic areas—certainly in some tyrannies—civil wars, ethnic conflicts or other internecine strife predominate. We have moved away from bloc against bloc or nation against nation. Regional conflicts and power struggles, perhaps carried out by proxy in an internal conflict, as in the Democratic Republic of Congo, are challenges that the military and political architecture of regional and world military relations are not grasping. That is why the United Nations, and in particular the veto power of the five permanent Security Council members, was found wanting.

I want to consider some of the remarks of those who opposed the conflict in Kosovo, because many of them did not make sense. I preface my remarks on the Kosovo conflict and settlement by noting that it is essential that we learn real lessons from the conflict of the past 75 days. Ultimately, I would welcome an apology from my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), but he is right to say that we will not see the consequences of the fallout of the conflict for at least five years.

If we learn only the lessons of the past 75 days, we will have failed. We had to go through the Kosovo conflict because we did not learn the lessons of the previous 10 years in the Balkans in Bosnia. I am not making a party political point and knocking the previous Government, but we did not understand fully what the wrenching away of the autonomy of Kosovo meant. Going back further, we did not understand what the death of Tito meant to the holding together of Yugoslavia. We must consider the reverse domino effect of Slovenian independence, Croatia, Bosnia, Kosovo, Krajina, Vojvodina—throw it all in. If we do not understand the complexities and what really went on in that period, but concentrate only on the past 75 days, we will not learn the real lessons of south-eastern Europe and the Balkans. That would be cause for regret.

[Mr. McNulty]

If we do not analyse properly the sometimes abject failures of Europe and America in dealing with what happened in the Balkans over the past 10 years, we will plant the seeds of further failures. I do not, as my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow perhaps would, include what we have achieved in Kosovo as a failure, because it was very necessary. If we do not analyse the past 10 years properly, no amount of Balkans Marshall aid for Serbia post Milosevic will enable us to bring peace, stability and harmony not only to Kosovo but to the entire Balkan region.

The role played by this House over the past 75 days and before was often strange and perplexing. I freely admit that all Front Benchers acted with discretion and responsibility, but there is a fine line between enjoying the fruits of democracy and maintaining responsibility. I do not think that a significant party leader who, half way through a military action, calls the whole thing unpardonable folly is grown up or responsible. That was shaming, and it should be said loud and clear. That individual should not forget it.

I do not think that it is grown up, responsible or appropriate in the middle of a military action for someone from a military background who is now a Member of Parliament—I am deliberately not naming individuals because it would not be that helpful and many of them are not here; we will have plenty of time to name them later—to call for the head of the commander of the armed forces. "Guthrie must go" is not that useful or appropriate a thing to say half way through a war.

If I am honest, there has perhaps been more intolerance and unworthiness on the Government Benches in disagreements on Kosovo before and after the conflict. I absolutely exclude my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow from that.

Mr. Robathan: The hon. Gentleman is being uncharacteristically unreasonable, if I might put it that way as a compliment. In the absence of the person who said, "Guthrie must go"—I did not necessarily agree with my hon. Friend—the hon. Gentleman should note that those of us who have at any stage, as the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) has, served in the armed forces, tend to be cautious before we say, "Let us get in there, boys." I do not state this expecting any praise, but it is part of being in the armed forces that one's life is possibly at risk and the lives of the soldiers under one are at risk. We know what happens when people are killed, and we care about that. The hon. Gentleman has been reasonable, but he should realise that most people of military background do not want to see war for that very reason.

Mr. McNulty: I am grateful for that intervention, and broadly I accept it, but it does not exonerate the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), who said half way through a military action that the commander-in-chief should go. If people have legitimate doubts in a democracy, they can express them, but in their role as politicians rather than in the military, they must accept that with their democratic freedoms come real responsibilities.

Yesterday was the fifth anniversary, or perhaps the 10th—it may be even longer; I cannot remember—of the introduction of broadcasting of the Chamber on television. [Interruption.] Radio broadcasting was probably 10 or 15 years ago. It is a train-spotting thing that I read birthday columns and anniversary dates, but I do not remember.

The rights and responsibilities of politicians in a democracy are writ large. We have heard of the strength of the internet. The strength of mass broadcasting is phenomenal. We all know that a word out of place here goes straight down to Belgrade state television. People should make their comments within that context with some tolerance of other opinions and some caution. I contend that no one in the Chamber is a warmonger. No one wanted to run gung-ho to bomb Serbia or its people to hell and back. No one glories in military action.

I defer to the hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan); I have no military service. I had throughout my life no intention of going into the military in any capacity. That is not to deprecate people who do; we owe a hell of a lot to them. It has been glib in the past 75 days for people to say on their behalf what should and should not happen. I deprecate that, but equally I deprecate those who oppose military action, saying, "There is any number of gung-ho armchair generals here", or, "There are plenty of Biggles here. They do not need me." It was suggested that, if one were in favour of the military action, one could not care less about the lives of the individuals on the front line or their families back at home, and that we regarded it all as some elaborate computer game. I do not take that position. I merely say that those who opposed, and will continue to oppose, what we tried to do through international action in Kosovo should speak with responsibility in a democracy.

It is not right for people to say, as was said at the start of the action, that it was a profound political mistake to suppose that Milosevic was not supported by the mass of patriotic Serbian people, who form one of the great fighting nations of Europe. When we read those words now, 75 days on, half of them sound like a party political broadcast for Milosevic's socialist nationalist party—or whatever it is called. Such words were spoken by grown-up, serious politicians. The words that I noted were spoken by someone who has served for decades in this Chamber. One has to believe that, for some Members on both sides of the House, partisan preferences prevailed rather than the good of our military, the interests of our country and the success of the action. That is reprehensible.

The words that I quoted were spoken by a Conservative Member, but all hon. Members will be aware that I could find equivalent words spoken by Labour Members, which

I should condemn equally. However, when one condemns such words or seeks to engage with them, intolerance creeps in. During the first Adjournment debate on the conflict, I said to one of my right hon. Friends, "What you are saying is all very interesting, but it is not going to do anything for the people of Kosovo. If not this route, what is your alternative?" The best that he could say—and, being practically the Father of the House, he had one up on me—was that perhaps I did not get into the Chamber that often.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened to what the hon. Gentleman has to say. If he wants to personalise his contributions in the way that he has done, he ought to satisfy the House that he has notified all the right hon. and hon. Members to whom he refers before making those remarks.

Mr. McNulty: I fully accept that, Mr. Deputy Speaker. When I began my speech I said that I was deliberately not going to make such remarks and then I strayed. I shall not do so in future.

Last night, when one of my hon. Friends made some points in relation to the statement on Kosovo—the happy statement that we are at the beginning of a resolution, at least of the military aspects of the situation, although I accept that there is much to do on the peacekeeping and political side—another of my hon. Friends described him as "tired and emotional". As we all know, that is the Private Eye code for being less than sober. I do not think that that was appropriate.

My key point is that, in peacetime or during military action, when the House discusses—as is right and proper—defence or military issues, we should be aware that we have a cherished, democratic Chamber, and that brings responsibilities. During the debates on Kosovo, I think that those responsibilities have been abused, and systematically abused, by some hon. Members, although happily by only a few. None the less, that is to be deprecated.

Also to be deprecated is the scant regard for any intellectual depth or rigour in the analysis pursued by some hon. Members. From some Members on the Labour Benches, we hear what might be best described as Mickey Mouse Trot analysis, in which the reality was not how to stop such a brutal tyrant, end ethnic cleansing and stop this madness in Europe at the tail end of the 20th century. Instead, we heard of some elaborate plot—no doubt, an imperialist one—by NATO, in support of economic interests. Stripped bare, that had nothing to do with the military integrity of south-east Europe or Europe, or with British defence and military interests therein; it was all some woeful American ploy to colonise south-east Europe, along with the rest of Europe on an imperialist basis. In the middle of a military action, the House and the people of this country deserved far more than that sort of Mickey Mouse analysis.

We also deserved far more from those Conservative Members—none of whom are in the Chamber at present, I am happy to say—who, half way through the process, did not merely make passing comments about the way in which we should carry out the action, but gave real succour and support to those who opposed us and who might have been firing at our troops, if we were not at the stage that we reached last night. Those Members gave our opponents succour by totally undermining the way that we were going. If they were here, I would happily name them. I think that my analysis will stand.

We need to return to such issues to ensure that all Members of the House conduct themselves properly at all times, but especially at times of military action. Given that our proceedings are recorded and broadcast, it is not appropriate for hon. Members simply to dismiss those with opposing views. I was not elected to bomb other nations or to impose sanctions on them—I am not a warmonger, nor is any Minister. It is outrageous that any hon. Member on either side of the House should show such scant regard for their responsibilities in a democracy as to suggest that anyone who supports action such as that taken in Kosovo is some sort of Biggles or warmonger.

It is crass to believe that, had we followed the suggestions of those who criticised and carped from the sidelines but who offered no alternatives for action—they proposed that we should do nothing while atrocities were committed—we would have reached the stage that we reached last night, of having hope that there will be a lasting settlement. That is nonsense.

Some people now tell us that, had we spoken to the Russians 75 days ago, we would have got to where we are now. They are wrong. Others ask why Kofi Annan was not brought in some time over the past 75 days and why he and the United Nations were not allowed to sort things out. What were they doing during the 10 months prior to our reaching the unfortunate stage of having to take military action?

I hope that all those who, from their comfortable armchairs, attempted to undermine our military action of the past 75 days will look to their laurels and reflect on the sequence of events that has brought us to the unfolding of the peace process. That process will take a long time. Even if an international presence has to stay in the Balkans for a long time to police the area after the return of the refugees to Kosovo, that will be far preferable to our action of the past 75 days, because it may lead to lasting peace and stability.

Finally, I turn to the fairly complex matter of two significant programmes that are crucial to the future of military procurement over the next couple of years. The first is the ASTOR programme—the airborne stand-off radar programme. On behalf of my constituency, I happily recommend that we accept the Lockheed Martin bid, which fortunately includes Raytheon and Marconi, both of which are located in my constituency. Together with Back Benchers on both sides of the House who have similar constituency interests, I hope to persuade Ministers that that is the right way to go.

I have greater difficulty with the other programme, but Members of Parliament have to make decisions regardless of their constituency interests. The programme concerned is BVRAAM—the beyond visual range air-to-air missile programme—which is also essential in terms of smart procurement. My difficulty is that, on the one hand, there is an American-led bid that includes Raytheon, whose headquarters are in my constituency; and, on the other, there is a European bid centred on the Meteor programme, which is led by Alenia Marconi Systems and Matra British Aerospace.

Even though I have two profound and competing constituency interests, I am bound to say that, on balance, I recommend the European bid, not least because it carries an air-to-air capability that the Raytheon bid does not have. I have met and discussed the issue with representatives of Raytheon and Marconi and, despite my dual interests, I have concluded that the European and Marconi Meteor programme is preferable.

[Mr. McNulty]

I shall conclude where I began—I apologise for speaking for longer than even I had anticipated—and stress that defence and military interests are crucial. I wish that hon. Members would take more interest in those issues: they should not constitute the undignified and untrendy wing of international or foreign affairs. The defence industry is a significant employer. When we embark upon military action—I hope that we will not do so again during my term in this place—[HON. MEMBERS: "Four years."] Please let me finish. I hope that that means there will be peace for 20, rather than three, years.

As and when there is military action, those of us in democracies must act in a grown-up and responsible fashion. I fear that, in debating this action over 75 days, some hon. Members have demonstrated a far from grown-up and responsible attitude. That is to their discredit, and I hope that they will reflect on their actions long and hard in the coming weeks and months.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I call Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith.

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

5.26 pm

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): Hon. Members are saying "Hear, hear" because they want me to be brief. I think the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) is being a little unfair to hon. Members. He assumed that anyone who disagreed with him or did not agree totally with the Government was somehow guilty of disloyalty, of letting down the troops or of being cackhanded. The hon. Gentleman suggested that those hon. Members did not know what they were talking about—or that, when they did, it is was not very palatable.

If the hon. Gentleman had been in the House during the Suez crisis, the Falklands conflict or the Gulf war, he would have heard plenty of criticism flying around the Chamber—just as there was during the second world war. That is how it should be. There is a limit beyond which people should not go, but they should not be muzzled just because this country is involved in a conflict that is hardly controversial. It would be terrible if hon. Members were muzzled in that way.

Mr. McNulty: The hon. Gentleman makes my point far more eloquently than I can. I suggested that many hon. Members went beyond that line. I do not deny that hon. Members should engage in democratic debate.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: The hon. Gentleman keeps using the word "many". Some hon. Members might regret what they said, but they have apologised and I do not think that their comments were particularly reprehensible. There is no doubt that their views were controversial, but our troops were not in action—we were not in the middle of a Passchendaele scenario. One must have a sense of proportion in such matters.

It is generally agreed that our debates were conducted in a good spirit—although one criticism is worth making. I thought it was wrong to give notice—it was not just the Government's responsibility—of our intention not to send in ground troops. It is a good idea to keep that kind of information in reserve and perhaps state our willingness to use a ground force in some circumstances—some observers went further than that. On the whole, I believe the Government played a notable role in defining NATO's policy, which generated considerable public support and backing from this side of the House.

In that connection, I shall follow up some of the comments made by the Opposition spokesman, my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples). I do not wish to speak for longer than is necessary, but I think that we should stress this important point. When the defence industry in this country develops its ability to contribute more powerfully and effectively to our defence structure and to advance technology, it should not be leaned on by Government if it enters into a marriage with American companies.

I have visited the United States many times in recent years and toured many factories. I assure hon. Members that American industry trusts us and thinks that we have something to offer. It does not believe that, if American industry enters into an alliance with us for making equipment, we will leak import information to the opposing side or to its competitors. That is an important point.

I wish to develop some other issues raised by my colleagues. I have no doubt that the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) were particularly welcome. He drew upon his great experience gained in the Royal Air Force, and his remarks about the importance of air power were confirmed during the Balkans conflict.

I joined the NATO parliamentary assembly in 1981 and therefore frequently come into contact with military and civilian members of the North Atlantic Alliance. NATO's vitality, resilience, adaptability, the power within its grasp and the influence that it brought to bear from 1981 to the present convinced me that, politically and militarily, it is a force that deserves our full support. When we went through the worst period of the cold war, that force helped to preserve peace. In fact, I wonder whether many of us would be here today, speaking our minds, if NATO had not existed.

It is therefore little wonder that, when the awful situation in the Balkans came to the crunch, I could not contemplate NATO's failure. To have done so would have spelt the end of the most successful political and military alliance in our history. As the cold war ended, the Berlin wall came down and the Soviet Union ceased to exist, one questioned the extent to which people jumped on the bandwagon and said, "There is no need for NATO. We need something else."

I shall turn in a moment to the European security and defence identity. It is my fervent conviction that no steps should be taken to undermine the effectiveness of NATO. The new strategic concept that it announced at the Washington summit last month should lead us to believe that there is no security architecture alternative to that presented by NATO. The statement that was issued at the Washington summit recognised NATO as an organisation capable of playing a constructive and defining role in underpinning the stability and peace without which prosperity, democracy and respect for human rights cannot exist. That is NATO's raison d'etre.

I shall quote some of the comments made in that statement in Washington last month:

"Fifty years ago, the North Atlantic Alliance was founded in troubled and uncertain times."

The statement reminded us of what had been achieved and then continued:

"This new Alliance will be larger, more capable and more flexible, committed to collective defence and able to undertake new missions including contributing to effective conflict prevention and engaging actively in crisis management, including crisis response operations. The Alliance will work with other nations and organisations to advance security, prosperity and democracy throughout the Euro-Atlantic region. The presence today of three new allies—the Czech Republic, Hungary and Poland—demonstrates that we have overcome the division of Europe."

The statement later added that those three new members would not be the last. That point was also made by my hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood.

We recognise that, if NATO extends its boundaries, it must learn to co-operate with those countries, notably Russia, which fear the advance of the new NATO strategic concept. I have found no difficulty with that because I know very well that we have no designs on Russia. On the contrary, as many hon. Members have pointed out in today's debate, we have taken extensive steps to work with the Russians and to ask them to come on board. In a minor way, we in the NATO parliamentary assembly have taken our own initiatives. We have had Russians accompanying us, and they have been invited to NATO headquarters to discuss exactly what their difficulties are and the extent to which NATO is trying to bridge the gap that existed between the old NATO and the old Soviet Union.

I have no doubt that the attempt is working because of the willingness to extend NATO's umbrella from the Atlantic across Europe and to fight, through the Founding Act—which was signed by NATO and Russia only in 1997—for the Russians to co-operate with the new NATO strategic concept. That leads me to believe that we now have an opportunity to lay to rest for our lifetime—and, one hopes, for ever—conflict in Europe. For too long, we have suffered instability and bloody wars. I accept the criticism of all who thought that we could have intervened sooner in Bosnia. But we all know democracies; we take time to learn the lessons and to act on them.

We must consider not only how far we can develop the new institutions that have been formed under the Founding Act, the European-Atlantic pact and so on, but whether we can strengthen those already in the alliance. I shall quote from the communiqué and the statement of intentions made in Washington recently concerning the European Union:

"The European Union has taken important decisions and given a further impetus to its efforts to strengthen its security and defence dimension. This process will have implications for the entire Alliance, and all European Allies should be involved in it, building on arrangements developed by NATO and the WEU. The development of a common foreign and security policy includes the progressive framing of a common defence policy. Such a policy, as called for in the Amsterdam Treaty, would be compatible with the common security and defence policy established within the framework of the Washington Treaty."

All the way through that statement and others explaining in more detail the objectives of NATO's new strategic concept, there is an emphasis on a European security defence identity in NATO. My worry is that there are those who, for other reasons, think that the time has come for those in a European pillar to express themselves not necessarily within NATO.

European countries have rightly taken decisions that will require close co-operation between NATO and the WEU and, if appropriate, the European Union. It has been set out clearly in treaties that it is sensible for the EU to develop a sense of responsibility toward its foreign duties. That is why there is talk of a common foreign and security policy. The EU ought to debate those matters. I can understand such talk, but I hope that I will not be accused of having an attack of Europhobia if I suggest that it is one thing to have such a common policy, but another to create, in analysing one's needs and policies, some special European defence identity that is separate from America.

Labour Members, including the Prime Minister, would deny to one's face such an intention, but I know people on the continent—I mix with them through the NATO Parliamentary Assembly—who have not always been happy with what they call "American domination". They fail to realise that the only reason why we had peace during the cold war and why we can have stability and security and take on the responsibility of the Balkans is that the Americans are on side.

Such people do not talk about a European defence identity; they talk about a Euro-Atlantic security system. That is what it is and, unless we recognise that fact, I fear that, once again, we shall place an impossible burden on some European countries that do not want to take responsibilities—they rarely have in the past—or carry the clout that is necessary for the influence that we think important to stability in the Euro-Atlantic area; such stability inevitably leads to ever closer co-operation with the former Soviet Union.

I shall not go into too much detail because I am about to finish my speech. Ten of the members of the Western European Union are also in NATO and the European Union but, when we consider the countries that are in NATO but not the EU, we see a problem. They are the Czech Republic, Poland, Hungary, Turkey, Norway and Iceland. There are also other countries that are not in NATO or the EU, such as Estonia, Bulgaria, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia and Slovenia.

When all those people and all those countries are spread across all those different organisations, why muddle things? Why make things more difficult than they already are? We already have a club worth belonging to, which has worked well. Let us not assume that the European security and defence identity would somehow be better served and more effective if we rearranged the furniture. I do not see why it should be.

Of course one gets worried about that idea. Within five minutes of being appointed, Mr. Prodi was talking about a European army—someone quoted him earlier in the debate. We cannot have that, not when defence is a matter of life and death. It is unrealistic to suppose that we have reached such a degree of comfort with our allies in western Europe that deciding whether to go to war or spend money on defence is a matter that can be taken away from national parliaments.

I beg Government Members, especially defence Ministers, to ask themselves this question. It is one thing to have a row with the Americans about bananas;

[Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith]

we could have rows with the Americans day after day about trade, and even argue among ourselves. However, if we are to have an argument about defence—

Mr. George Robertson: I always listen to the right hon. Gentleman with great care, because he has a lot of experience, and it is true that we share a close relationship with our allies across the water. We have not fallen out with the United States. The communiqué from the Washington summit made it clear that NATO and the Americans welcomed the initiative being taken forward.

The whole purpose of the Prime Minister's speech and what followed from it is to build European capabilities so that we can complement, not duplicate or compete with, the efforts being made by the United States and NATO. Only an hour ago, I spoke to Defence Secretary Cohen, and congratulated him on, and thanked him for, the United States' contribution to the air campaign. All four Defence Ministers have said that we are committed to building European capability so that we can act with the United States when that makes sense; but alternatively, so that we can take military action sensibly and effectively when the United States does not want to be involved.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: I understand what the right hon. Gentleman says; his intentions are pure, and would not undermine anything that I have said. That is his view—but there are other views, and they exist among his European allies. That is the point.

People talk about a federation. I am not a Europhobe; I am happy about co-operation with the European Union, but I want to draw a line here. It is difficult to assume that a Europe-wide institution can make decisions for us on matters of life and death. It cannot. Such decisions must be made by consensus, in which case I want a consensus within a wider organisation—one that involves the Americans.

I know what I hear from some senators and congressmen, decent internationalist blokes though they are, who suspect that there are people in Europe who resent what they call American dominance of the alliance, and feel that Europe would be freer, more independent and more responsive to European needs if it had its own defence identity—not within NATO, as is stated in the text of the summit. A European identity is what they hanker for. We cannot deny that when we know that Mr. Prodi is talking about a European defence system and a European army. However, if we adopt that approach we will seriously weaken our position.

I am darned if I can believe that an international organisation that merges into a federation involving a wide range of issues, such as economics and politics, can put defence into the same basket. It is not the function of an international organisation, on a vote, to send people to war, where they may possibly lose their lives. If there is consensus, certainly, but if it is to be done, it should be on the basis of the NATO Alliance, with all its strength and might.

It is difficult for me to assume that we are on the right lines when we do not talk sufficiently, and do something, about the lack of capability in Europe. Only two countries in western Europe—the United Kingdom and France—can act internationally. That is one of the issues that we should be discussing with our continental friends, so that we can get some action out of them rather than talk about institutions. That would be a way of making progress.

We have a duty to bring stability to Europe. The first and difficult problem on the agenda is to ensure that stability and prosperity are brought to the people of south-east Europe as a consequence of peace. It will be difficult, and I am indebted to an article in a publication entitled "The World Today", which drew my attention to the seriousness of the problem that we face. It reads:

"'No language can describe adequately the condition of that large part of the Balkan peninsula, Serbia, Bosnia, Herzegovina and other provinces—political intrigues, constant rivalries, a total absence of public spirit, hatred of all races, animosities of rival religions and an absence of any controlling power.'"

The writer of the article adds:

"Those were the words of Benjamin Disraeli in 1878. They are all too apt today."

5.47 pm

Mr. Andrew Robathan (Blaby): I am delighted to be able to take up the words of my right hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith), not least because I know of similar words from the 19th century. No one could ever accuse my right hon. Friend of being anti-European because he has made a career of not being so. The fact that he should draw attention to the concerns that many of us have about a drive towards a common European defence policy is extremely important. I trust that right hon. and hon. Members on the Treasury Bench will take heed of that.

On a day when British troops are going into what may turn out to be hostile territory in the former Republic of Yugoslavia, it is depressing that so little interest is shown in defence in the House. I know that the European elections are taking place. However, my presence and the presence of every other Member will make no difference to the turnout in my constituency and in all others, and in the regions. It is depressing beyond belief that there are only three Labour Members present, one a Back Bencher, only two Liberal Members and only eight Conservative Members. There are far too few of my hon. Friends in their places and it is a great pity that there is only one Labour Back Bencher present on an historic and worrying day.

I shall concentrate my remarks on Kosovo, not least because I will not be here next week. Many of the points that I wanted to make have already been made and I will not repeat them at too great length. I had many concerns about the campaign, which I made public. I was deeply sceptical that bombing alone would bring the Serbs to the negotiating table. However, it appears that it has done so, and we have an agreement. The Minister will know that not everything is clear, but I congratulate NATO and the Government on what has been achieved so far. I hope that the process will continue and I hope also that all the refugees will go home as soon as possible. It is to be hoped that, eventually, we shall see democratic rule established in Serbia, quite apart from anything else.

It will not surprise anyone when I say that I have a few qualifications. I do not think that there is anybody present to gainsay me—no Member, anyway—when I say that, when I was in the Army, I was taught the principles of war. As I recall, the first principle was the selection and maintenance of the aim. The aim on day 1 was to prevent humanitarian disaster and ethnic cleansing, and we know that that did not happen. There is no doubt that the principles will have to be rewritten. We know that surprise went out of the window long beforehand. As I am sure that the Minister recognises, the staff colleges will need to re-examine those principles before they try to teach them to any young officer, as I was at the time.

The situation in Serbia, Kosovo, Montenegro, Macedonia and Albania is not better than it was before the bombing campaign started. That does not mean that the bombing campaign was wrong, but we have to admit that the situation is no better than it was then.

We have a long-term commitment, as we have heard, and a huge financial commitment, which Britain, together with others, should be generous in meeting. We also have a huge commitment in terms of troops.

Is the Minister confident that the settlement will lead to some form of democratic administration being established in Kosovo? It has not been democratic up till now, as is self-evident. Rugova appears to represent the Kosovo Albanians, as far as it is possible to know, but it would be tragic if our actions had produced a worse situation in Kosovo than existed before.

The position of the Serbian minority in Kosovo was raised yesterday by the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell), among others. It is extraordinarily important that we do not replace one form of ethnic cleansing with another. NATO and the United Nations have turned a remarkably blind eye to the situation of the Serbs in Krajina, who were expelled—ethnically cleansed—by the Croatians, yet we seem to be extremely pally with the Croatian regime of President Tudjman. That is as close to hypocrisy as one can get. One child, one woman or one man is just as good as another child, woman or man, and ethnic cleansing by one group is just as bad as ethnic cleansing by another.

That leads me to the question of who our enemy in Kosovo will be. Troops need to know who their enemy is. When they come across two bands of people shooting at each other, whom are they to defend? It will be extremely difficult. None of us wants to see British troops or others killed in any crossfire, just as we do not want to see people killing each other in Kosovo.

What is the future of the Balkans to be? I say to hon. Members in all parts of the House that the future of the Balkans must be in the hands of the peoples of the Balkans. It is not for us to determine exactly what should happen. Britain, NATO and the United Nations should beware of trying to be the policemen of the Balkans. Down that road may lie chaos.

I have many friends currently in the Balkans who are likely to go into Kosovo in the near future. I will not name them, as that would probably blight their careers for ever. I wish them and everyone else well as our armed forces go in. They will have a great deal to contend with, as we know. In particular, NATO is likely to take casualties from land mines. It is the worst of all things when someone is killed not in action but just walking down a street or through a wood.

On a more flippant note, the old adage warns that we should not go to war in the Balkans or march on Moscow. We have gone to war in the Balkans. I am going to Moscow next week, and I hope that the Minister can assure us that we will not be marching on Moscow next week.

One overriding lesson emerges from the Kosovo campaign. NATO has shown determination and unity, and NATO has achieved success. I shall not repeat what was said extremely well by my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Wealden. However, the Government speak of a common European security identity, which undermines the organisation that has achieved so much and is likely to sideline America in the North Atlantic Alliance. I find that extremely worrying.

I have served in Northern Ireland. I think that I am the only hon. Member present who has done so, although one or two officers and officials in the House have. I speak with feeling because I have seen the intimidation, fear and daily barbarity that can go on in some of the ghettos in Northern Ireland. I have been to funerals of friends and I have spoken at funerals of soldiers, and I have friends still serving there in the armed forces. The Government cannot bend over backwards any further to accommodate the terrorists in Northern Ireland. The Minister will know that we must keep troops there to combat the terrorism.

I particularly speak on this occasion of members of the special forces who have done such sterling work in Northern Ireland in the past. If soldiers fear that they will be identified for any action that they take, if they believe that their lives or those of their families may subsequently be threatened, they will not take the action that we require of them. That is blindingly obvious, but it needs to be stated.

Some in public life, including me and many hon. Members, receive advice and assistance on our personal security. But we understood that that might be a possibility when we went into public life. My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King) are tailed by heavies in Range Rovers. Lord Mason still has an escort, and I am sure that other former Ministers do too. We expect that, but public servants do not. They expect to be protected by the Government. We must protect public servants or we betray their trust. I am sure that the Minister and the Secretary of State will agree.

I caution the Minister to read the headline of the City edition of the Evening Standard today which says, "Paras go in". If we want the paras to go into Serbia, Kosovo or elsewhere, we must protect them, wherever they may be, and we must protect past paras from the prying eyes of murderous terrorists.

I served for 15 years in the armed forces and I was single throughout that time. Single men enjoy being active, on operations and abroad. I was away in various different countries for 12 months in one 15-month period. It was lucky that I was single because a wife would not have tolerated it. However, I had no chance of getting married because I could not meet anyone. Those whom I did meet probably did not fancy me. However, it is a single man's life—or a single woman's life—and young single people enjoy being on operations. But in peacetime, families, and single people who want a social life, become tired of being on operations, and they will vote with their feet and leave.

Retention policies are marvellous but, as the Minister knows, there will be no retention policy if people are fed up with being on operations. For each person on operations, another should be preparing for operations and another recovering from operations. If 40 or 50 per cent.

[Mr. Andrew Robathan]

of the armed forces are on operations, that will not be possible. That would be a great tragedy for Britain and its armed forces.

The armed forces—I used to say this to the previous Government, so the Minister need not parrot it back to me—are too small for the country's and the Government's ambitions. If we are not careful, the common European defence policy will mean that we will not have the Americans to help us either. We have insufficient troops, and, if we are to maintain those ambitions, we may need to pay more for defence.

In the past few weeks, several generals have told me and, I am sure, others, that, based on their experience in Bosnia, the only people who could be trusted when they signed an agreement were the Serbs. They saw that as a bit of a paradox because they did not necessarily have a great deal of time for the Serbs, who had murdered, pillaged and raped. However, they did say that, when the Serb generals put their name to a document, they stuck by it, whereas the Croatians and the Bosnians did not. I very much hope that that turns out to be the case in Kosovo.

5.59 pm

Mr. Keith Simpson (Mid-Norfolk): We in the Chamber are indeed an inclusive body of men and women, although a number of colleagues have said that this important debate on defence policy has been unfortunately timed. I know, for example, that the Chairman of the Defence Committee has written formally to the Leader of the House—and, I believe, to Madam Speaker—to protest about the debate being held on a day on which, for good reasons, a large number of colleagues want to be in their constituencies.

Many hon. Members who would have liked to have contributed were unable to attend, and I mention two of my colleagues—such stalwarts as my hon. Friends the Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Reigate (Mr. Blunt). I should also like to mention the absence of another colleague, but for a different reason. My right hon. Friend the Member for Kensington and Chelsea (Mr. Clark) was unfortunately struck down with a brain tumour at the weekend, but I am glad to say that he is recovering reasonably well. I feel his presence in the Chamber; sitting over my left shoulder, he would have undoubtedly made a number of contributions, both from a sedentary position and from the Floor of the Chamber. I am sure that all Members of the House wish him the best for the future.

We have nevertheless had a good debate and we have heard 11 Back-Bench speakers, a number of whom have had to leave to vote or to return to their constituencies—to quote apathy, in the words of Viscount Whitelaw. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) spoke about Britain and her role in defence. I do not necessarily agree with some of her conclusions, but she spoke warmly. My hon. Friend the Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson), who has done a considerable amount of work on ballistic missile defence, raised an important point, which I and other colleagues raised in the defence equipment debate.

The hon. Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen), who is a member of the Defence Committee, talked, in his inimitable manner, of his reservations about nuclear weapons. The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock), speaking on behalf of the Liberal Democrats, talked with great feeling about the situation in Kosovo and referred to cuts in defence expenditure. I have to say to him that it would have been helpful during the debate on the strategic defence review if the Liberals had voted for our amendment pointing out the cuts in defence expenditure and in the Territorial Army instead of abstaining.

The hon. Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) rightly spoke about the outstanding part played by our armed forces, not only in Kosovo, Northern Ireland and Bosnia, but in the United Kingdom, where they work so hard. My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who has been tremendously consistent in his view that what we are doing in Kosovo is right, once again gave us a superb tour d'horizon on nuclear deterrence and history.

I was surprised that the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) restrained himself and talked only about the effectiveness of the air campaign. I think that he asked only eight or nine questions of the Minister; somebody behind me jokingly said that he would ask about 79, but, in his own way, he has always been very consistent. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) used his speech largely to attack a number of hon. Members, many of whom were not in the House. I might disagree with those hon. Members, as might Ministers, but they nevertheless have the right to express their views.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ruislip–Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who completed long service with the Royal Air Force, spoke well on behalf of those who agree with his critique, saying that the European security and defence identity is no substitute for NATO. My right hon. Friend the Member for Wealden (Sir G. Johnson Smith)—who, dare I say it, has considerable experience in defence matters going back decades—also spoke forcefully on why our main defence effort should be within NATO.

My hon. Friend the Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan), who was the last Back-Bench contributor, brought to the debate his own perspective, which was gained from serving in the armed forces. All Members recognise the fact that, without the men and women who make up our armed forces, this debate on our wider defence policy would be rather academic.

The debate is taking place 10 months after the strategic defence review, and 11 weeks into the bombing campaign against Serbia. As many hon. Members have pointed out, it has been influenced by unfolding events in Kosovo: the welcome news of the Serbian agreement to the military framework, given by the Secretary of State last night, and the news that he gave us this afternoon about the decision by the Secretary General of NATO that we could end the bombing campaign.

I compliment Ministers, and all the military and civil servants in the Ministry of Defence. I understand the strain that they were under, and appreciate all the work that they put in. During the Gulf war campaign, I served as a special adviser to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King), and I know what the responsibility involves. I pay tribute to Ministers on their ability—on the whole—to present information to the House, and to accept with considerable good grace the comments and, at times, criticisms made not only by Opposition Members, but by some of their hon. Friends.

The paying of that fulsome tribute, however, will not restrain me from commenting on aspects of the Government's defence policy that I believe need changing or modifying.

All hon. Members have rightly said that the British armed forces are real force multipliers. Their sheer quality, their professionalism and the fact that—dare I say—they have a demonstrable war-fighting capability enable them to deter and, when they must use that war-fighting capability, to defend our freedoms. However, they obviously need the resources that will allow them to maintain that high standard: equipment, and the support that they and their families need.

Ironically, last night's statement, like earlier statements, is being overtaken by global communications. The same happened during the Gulf war. I am struck by the frequency with which Ministers who come to the House in all honesty to present what they think is information are behind the internet or, indeed, CNN. This is an opportune moment for us to assess British defence policy against the Government's own baseline, the strategic defence review. We need to assess it in terms of foreign and security policy, then in terms of commitments and resources, and finally in terms of equipment and people.

I must tell the Minister, in a gentle manner, that—along with many other hon. Members—I am still waiting for answers to questions that we put to Ministers during the defence equipment debate on 26 April.

Mr. Spellar: They have had nothing else to do since then.

Mr. Simpson: I am aware of that, but I have telephoned twice, and have twice been given promises—not by the Minister's office, but by another office. As I say, I am making my point in the gentlest possible way, but I must say that debates such as this are rather a waste of time if hon. Members who ask questions are given no answers.

The MOD will of course want to assess the role of the armed forces in the continuing conflict, but I think that many hon. Members expect both the Government as a whole and the MOD to make their own inquiries about the origins of the conflict—about where we made the right decisions, where we made the wrong ones, and how we should correct our mistakes.

Finally, let me ask the Minister when we can expect the publication of the defence White Paper which now replaces the statement on the Defence Estimates. Can we look forward to receiving copies before the summer recess?

I want to say a little about the baseline of the strategic defence review. I remind the House that both the Select Committee on Defence and the Conservative Opposition pointed out that the real element that was missing from the report—an element that is still missing—was a foreign-policy baseline. We have not had a proper Government foreign policy debate since May 1997, and I believe that one is needed now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) outlined Conservative Members' deep reservations about the way in which the Government have, crab like, moved away from maintaining a European defence and security policy under the umbrella of NATO towards something that many people believe will end up competing with NATO. As many of my hon. Friends have pointed out, that will compete with resources. Many serving officers, some of whom are directly involved in Kosovo, are also deeply sceptical about the effectiveness of a European defence organisation that is outside NATO. The one thing that the Kosovo conflict has proved is that, however creaky NATO has been, it is effectively the most significant political military organisation to which we belong.

Another equally significant development during the Kosovo crisis has been the articulation by the Government that we are moving into an era of humanitarian intervention. In a speech in Chicago in April, the Prime Minister laid down what became called the Blair doctrine, outlining a policy of humanitarian interventionism, with a number of caveats. That is an important development, but we have not discussed it yet in the House.

If the Government are determined to go ahead with a policy of humanitarian interventionism, it will have an enormous impact on our foreign policy, on our relations with NATO, on the structure of our armed forces and on resources. Will there be a debate on that at some time in the Chamber? Will there be any geographical limits to humanitarian interventionism? What co-ordination have the Government had with the United States of America and our European allies? As a number of my hon. Friends have pointed out, 80 per cent. of the air power and many of the strategic assets in the Kosovo campaign were provided by the Americans.

What are the implications of the Blair doctrine for British defence policy, particularly in terms of the budget, equipment and personnel, given the resources constraint that is built into the strategic defence review? Finally, will there be a reassessment of the SDR and will that form part of the defence White Paper?

In an ideal world, we would have established our foreign and security policy before allocating the necessary resources. When the strategic defence review was published, it was obvious to all informed sources that there was a cut in the budget—about £1 billion. Treasury calls for efficiency savings are making it even more difficult for Ministers to deliver what in management terms we have to call a military output. Even before Kosovo, my hon. Friends and I argued that a cut in defence expenditure while maintaining and, in some areas, increasing commitments, undermined the credibility of the SDR.

Events in Kosovo and the consequence of the Government's declared foreign and security policy of humanitarian interventionism totally undermine the financial basis of the strategic defence review. That is not something that merely I put forward as a Conservative spokesman. Many hon. Members find that members of the armed forces and their families recognise that fact. They are not taken in by politicians coming out merely with trite political propaganda. They are intelligent, sensible people and understand that there is that contradiction.

Will the Government now admit that their claims that the SDR would establish our defence requirements in the period to 2015 have been undermined by the cuts and seriously been questioned by international events? What representations have the Minister and his colleagues made to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Prime Minister about the level of resources for the defence budget?

[Mr. Simpson]

Failure to address the major question of resources, which underpins the SDR, will result in a significant lack of confidence among members of the armed forces.

One of the major consequences of the Government's failure to match resources to commitments has been the serious problem of overstretch and retention, as touched on by my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby.

As of 22 April—the figures are probably higher now—89 per cent. of land command, which is the deployable Army, is either committed to, or warned for, operations. The Secretary of State himself said this afternoon that 50 per cent. of the British Army was preparing for, deployed in, or recovering from, operations.

The armed forces are there to be used and they expect that. They are not to be kept in a band box, shined up and never used. However, everyone recognises—the Government recognised it in the SDR—that there is a limit to how much longer we can continue that level of commitment without members of the armed forces voting with their feet, as my hon. Friend the Member for Blaby said.

I hope that the Government will deal with that problem directly—that will take some difficult decisions. I know that they are hoping that the Kosovo commitment will not continue on such a scale or for longer than six months, but, as General Sir Roger Wheeler, Chief of the General Staff, reminded us in a lecture at the Royal United Services Institute for Defence Studies on 17 February 1997:

"We are now in our seventh year in Bosnia, despite the original deployment being ordered on the strict understanding that it was for six months only."

Long overseas deployments and back-to-back deployments mean that more trained personnel are leaving the armed forces than recruits can be brought in. I am sure that the Minister will remind us that the Government have dealt with the problem of recruitment, but for every service man who is coming in through the front door, two or three are leaving through the back door.

The latest shortfall in numbers of trained personnel is 4 per cent. for the Navy, 6 per cent. for the Army, 2.5 per cent. for the Royal Air Force and 8 per cent. for the Royal Marines. For every soldier, sailor or airman who is not there, others have to stand in and work harder.

The Government have failed, despite all their remedial efforts and hype, to resolve the relationship between commitments and resources. If anything, matters are worse than they were a year ago. How are Ministers going to resolve that?

The most glaring example of the SDR failure is the cuts in the Territorial Army and its subsequent reorganisation. Under pressure from my hon. Friends and many Labour Members, the Government were forced to make concessions in their reorganisation in the autumn. The Secretary of State acknowledged last night that 10 per cent. of our forces in Bosnia now come from the TA. Any significant war fighting in the Balkans would directly involve a large-scale call up of the TA.

The Government were wrong to cut the TA to extent that they did. Many TA soldiers are now reluctant—because of the Government's cuts and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry) said last night, because of worries about the security of their employment and pensions—if they are called up for service.

I have raised a series of issues in the debate and I have done so not merely to play some sort of intellectual ping pong. I hope that the Minister will recognise that many of those questions were put to me by serving members of the armed forces, civil servants and, not least, people in British defence industries.

I want British defence policy to be proactive. I believe, as do all my hon. Friends, that Britain has a part to play on the world stage. I fully support our membership of the United Nations and our leading role in NATO but, if we are to undertake that sort of role and if we expect our armed forces to go into harm's way almost continuously, we must either cut a commitment somewhere or put in more resources.

General James Wolfe, who died at Quebec, said that war was an "option of difficulties". Today, defence policy is an option of difficulties and I hope that the Minister will be able to offer us some thoughts for consideration.

6.19 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. John Spellar): First I give the apologies of the Secretary of State for not being present for the winding-up speeches. He has a long-standing engagement, hosting Her Majesty at beating the retreat. I have just had a message from his office and I am pleased to inform the House that the United Nations Security Council resolution has been passed. The voting was 14 in favour with only one abstention. It will now go to the North Atlantic Council for it to authorise NATO's deployment. I am sure that that is welcome news to the House and the forces.

It is only natural that much of the debate has focused on events in the Balkans. Whether one is critical or supportive of Nato's actions, one cannot deny the importance of what is happening there and, indeed, evolving even as we have been speaking. It is not surprising that the subject has pre-occupied hon. Members this evening, but it is also important to look at the broader context, as a number of hon. Members did, and, as the Secretary of State said in his opening speech, not to forget that much else has occupied us over the past 12 months.

It has been a debate with a number of the usual suspects and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) said, with a number of absentees. We should have liked to see the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) after the Scottish electorate gave him their view of his intervention. The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) apologised for the hon. Member for Reigate (Mr. Blunt), but I should have preferred to have seen him here himself tonight apologising for his disgraceful attack on the Chief of Defence Staff—but let us leave that aside.

We have seen events in Kosovo confirming the analysis that we conducted to inform the strategic defence review and the foreign and security policy framework in which it was set.

At the time of the SDR, as the hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk (Mr. Simpson) said, our policies and plans were met with approval by our allies. It was recognised by a wide variety of independent commentators as radical, imaginative, well reasoned and forward looking. The SDR was given good reviews by academics, journalists and diplomats from Los Angeles to Moscow to Tokyo. Most importantly, it was welcomed by the men and women of our services. Britain was seen to be giving a lead in adapting to the realities of the new millennium and the post-cold war environment.

Our defence and security policy is founded on Britain's need, as a trading nation with a strongly international outlook and a considerable number of citizens living abroad, to be involved on the world stage. The Government's defence and security policy aims to provide and improve our abilities to take our place on the world stage.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East said, the British have never been ones to stand idly by. Our policies are designed to ensure that we are not forced to. In particular, they are designed within the context of the NATO alliance. That is why the United Kingdom made a significant contribution to ensuring that Nato's 50th anniversary summit in Washington set a challenging agenda to keep Nato relevant for the future and commemorated 50 years of keeping peace in Europe. I am sure that the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis), who spoke at some length about the history of NATO, will also recognise the key, initiating role of the post-war Labour Government in setting up NATO and the support of subsequent Labour Governments for that organisation.

Headlines at Washington were naturally dominated by Kosovo, where the display of Nato unity was of immense military and political value, but several other important decisions were also taken on the further adaptation of Nato.

The new strategic concept sets out clearly Nato's key tasks, giving proper emphasis to non-article 5 missions and clear guidance on the development of flexible, deployable and sustainable forces suitable for all Nato missions.

The UK was active in developing the defence capabilities initiative, which should allow the alliance to develop forces that are ready to undertake the range of operations we may face in the future. The hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Maples) spoke of his concern about duplication and in that context mentioned heavy lift. We in the alliance will be absolutely delighted to have duplication of heavy lift. When we took over the strategic defence review, one of the key areas on which we focused—indeed, one of the key deficiencies that we inherited—was a shortfall in heavy lift. We are making major efforts to rectify that in terms both of sea and air lift. The initiative echoes the principles that underpinned our strategic defence review. We are pleased about the emphasis on making European forces, including multinational forces, more effective.

We are also closely involved in the Western European Union's audit of European defence capability and aim to ensure that both initiatives are complementary, mutually supporting and, most importantly, result in a sustained drive to improve defence capability. I think that that is what Conservative Members should have concentrated on in their orations on Europe.

Washington marked the culmination of much of the work to create a European security and defence identity within the alliance. As has rightly been said, that was initiated by Michael Portillo when he was Defence Secretary at Berlin in 1996. The United Kingdom has been instrumental in establishing a programme to continue that development. Decisions taken at the summit will ensure that the European pillar of the alliance is a vital element in our drive to give Europe a greater voice in foreign and security policy.

As well as formally welcoming the three new NATO European members at the highest level, the summit clearly reaffirmed our commitment to future enlargement. We agreed positive language naming all nine current aspirants and stating their right to seek membership, backed up by practical advice and assistance in shaping membership action plans. There was also a meeting with countries from south-east Europe at which a consultative forum on security was established.

That puts the European security and defence initiative in its proper context. I was slightly surprised that the contributions of the Opposition spokesmen were dominated by that subject. It is an important issue but I understood the difficulty of the Conservatives, for whom everything seems to come back to Europe. They are like those who believe that the Freemasons, the Bilderberg group, the Rockefellers, or, in the good old days, the communists and Trotskyists, were the root of every problem. European issues are important but the balance must be got right.

Even discussing defence, the Conservatives talked as if there were a polarisation between the European defence industry and our relationship with the United States. However, British companies and defence industrial policy very much aim to get the best of both. In many ways, the consolidation of the European defence industry is designed to enable British and European industry not only more effectively to compete, but more effectively to collaborate, with American industry. We said that both in opposition and in government. The consolidation of the American industry means that it is necessary for us to match it that so that we can bring something to the table in discussions. That is understood not only by us but by our American partners.

At a recent conference addressed by me and the American Under-Secretary, John Hamre, it was asked whether we were creating fortress Europe. We are not. Equally, Fortress America is not a sensible option. We have to get the balance right. Equally, we have to consider consolidation of the European defence industry and that is already moving along, not only commercially but with the letter of intent.

There is also the harmonisation of requirements. Having a range of slightly different requirements for roughly similar products across Europe means that we get less effective military capability for the money that we spend and a less effective European defence industry. That is why I am pleased to draw the House's attention to a statement made today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State that the British Army will get the medium-range TRIGAT to provide its medium-range anti-tank guided weapons systems, in collaboration with France, Germany, the Netherlands and Belgium. Contracts will also be let for the project definition phase of the next generation light anti-armour weapon.

Those are important developments and part of the development of the European defence industry, because mutual dependency is becoming an increasing feature of defence equipment procurement. We need to recognise that and consider it within the context of, for example, discussions about Bishopton and Royal Ordnance. In the United Kingdom, there has been a reduction in orders for ammunition from £300 million a year to about £70 million or £80 million a year. That is mirrored across Europe. To cope with that will require consolidation and specialisation but also assurance of supply, which requires mutual dependency. That cannot be done by companies alone; it will involve Governments. We need to do it within a co-operative framework and we must not be frightened about whether that is part of some overall Euro-plot. It is good business and sensible business, and good defence. So that debate will continue.

[Mr. John Spellar]

It is necessary to clarify for hon. Members what the European security and defence identity is about. It is not a question of competing with NATO. We have made that clear throughout negotiations with our allies and partners. St. Malo recognises that military capabilities for EU-led operations might be drawn from multinational or national sources outside the NATO framework. However, that merely reflects the fact that not all European capabilities that are currently answerable to the WEU are assigned to NATO.

We do not support the further development of military capabilities outside the NATO framework purely for use in EU operations. That is supported by the United States, which supports the impetus to create an ESDI. It has expressed concerns that were rightly identified by the hon. Member for Stratford-on-Avon and also our concerns that any moves should not result in decoupling, or lead to duplication or discrimination against NATO members that are not members of the EU. That is consistent with our approach.

We believe that Kosovo has demonstrated, not undermined, the enduring strength and value of the transatlantic alliance. It has also emphasised the need for Europe to play a stronger part in that alliance. I am sure that that is a cross-party view. The progress that was made on the initiative at last week's Cologne European Council capped a busy and productive spring. Rapid progress has been possible because the focus of the debate has been on practical requirements, not institutions—practical requirements for defence decision making in the EU and for strengthening European military capability. We are sure that that outcome will be good for NATO and for transatlantic relations.

There is a strand of opinion in the United States that questions whether the United States bears too much of the burden and whether Europe bears its share. We aim to ensure that Europe plays a full and active role.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Edgbaston (Ms Stuart) stressed the need for Europe to be able to act. I have identified the ways in which we are developing that ability. She also rightly stressed the role of British leadership in Europe.

The hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) talked about ballistic missile defence technology. We are certainly not complacent, but we recognise, as I am sure that the hon. Gentleman does, that the technology is changing extremely rapidly. It would be premature at this stage to acquire such a capability because it might prove ineffective. However, we are monitoring developments on the risk posed by ballistic missiles and cruise missile technology and the technology available to counter them. We are participating in a NATO study and will work closely with our allies to inform further decisions. We are also aware of the considerable cost of ballistic missile defence and of the need to prioritise expenditure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leyton and Wanstead (Mr. Cohen)—

Mr. Cohen: Before my hon. Friend comes on to me, may I comment on his response on ballistic missile defence technology? The one point that my hon. Friend missed out was that there is a treaty in existence. His missing it out implies that we would be prepared to agree with the United States that the treaty can be abrogated. Will he refer to that treaty?

Mr. Spellar: My hon. Friend should not draw that conclusion from what I said. I was talking about our interest in keeping in touch with, and considering, technology. We should have to consider treaty arrangements in parallel with that.

My hon. Friend helpfully read out not only his own views on several subjects, but the replies of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. That saved me a considerable amount of time. He also drew particularly helpful attention to the role of NATO, and especially of the UK, in retraining Russian officers to enable them to enter civilian life and find gainful employment. That has been of great assistance and has been much appreciated.

The hon. Member for New Forest, East started off with an interesting dissertation, which sounded for all the world like an Oxford seminar; I checked and found that he had attended that university and had been awarded a DPhil, so it was hardly surprising. I was most taken by his remark that he believed more strongly in defence than in a victory for one political party. From that, I draw the conclusion that he also believes in the need for a national defence policy. I shall deal with that later.

I was pleased that the hon. Gentleman had found the Commonwealth war graves internet site to be so useful. That site has been widely appreciated and heavily used. It has been of considerable help to many families. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for mentioning it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) made a considerable number of extremely detailed points. He would not expect me to reply to all of them this evening, but I or another Minister will certainly reply to him in the near future.

The hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) is not in his place, but told me that he would have to leave the Chamber before the end of the debate. Not surprisingly, he mentioned the importance of air operations and paid tribute—with which I am sure that we all agree—to the air crews who served over Kosovo.

The hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock) stressed the need for rebuilding in Kosovo. The hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Robathan) also pointed out that a considerable of amount of such work would need to be done. I am sure that both hon. Gentlemen will be encouraged by the discussions on south-eastern European stability. There is a need to recreate civil society and organisation as well as the important job of physical reorganisation and building.

I was slightly surprised by the concern of the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South over procurement drop-back. I do not think that he really has read the answers to which he referred.

Mr. Hancock: I have.

Mr. Spellar: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman has not drawn the right conclusions. I should certainly be more than happy to discuss the matter with him if he has some particular concerns.

I was also slightly taken aback when he said that not enough was being done about recruitment. I fully accept that we need to make further improvements in retention, but the recruitment story is a very good one. In all the services, the advertising campaign has been extremely good—as have the activities of the recruiting teams, including the ethnic recruiting teams. Ministers and senior officers can keep sending out the message, but what really gets through to the young man or woman in the West Bromwich labour exchange—which I visited recently—is hearing what life is like in Her Majesty's forces from people from the many communities. Those people are our best salesmen and they are doing extremely well. We are proud of them and are pleased with the work that they undertake.

The hon. Gentleman said that the case of the nuclear test veterans had not been examined. The case has been extremely well examined. I regret that he does not accept the answers that we, and the best scientific advice, have come up with. The case has been considered by the National Radiological Protection Board, not once but twice. People are entitled to make criticisms, but if they do so from a scientific standpoint, they should do it in proper scientific papers. Those papers should be published in peer reviewed journals so that they can be subjected to the scientific method. That is what the NRPB has done and that is what anyone else who wants to undermine or attack its arguments should do.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned those who have been afflicted with asbestosis and the other cancer that I always have difficulty pronouncing. He appeared to be speaking about civilian employees as well as service personnel, but my understanding is that civilian employees have all along been able to bring industrial injury compensation cases, and that the difficulty has been with service personnel, who have only more recently been able to bring such cases. I should be grateful if he would clarify that point.

Mr. Hancock: I was talking about both categories—civilian employees and service personnel. Service personnel never had that right before and they continue to have problems. Civilian employees have a problem of proof, because it is extremely difficult for them to gain access to documentation relating to their work, which in some cases was carried out 40 years ago. If a former dockyard employee spent his entire working career working for Her Majesty at the Royal Dockyard in Portsmouth, it should be obvious that the contamination came from that source. Such matters should be agreed in compensation cases but, sadly, they are not.

Mr. Spellar: I am sorry if there are such cases. My hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces will consider such cases as part of his general review of the problem. I should have thought that it would have been easier for dockyard workers to demonstrate the source of contamination than, for example, some of the people with whom I used to deal as a union official: contract workers on the Clyde who moved from company to company and were never formally employed in the shipyards. They had to get attestations from people who had worked with them or from employers, but the companies involved no longer existed. If there are unreasonable difficulties, I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman brought them to our attention and they will be examined.

Like other hon. Members, the hon. Gentleman spoke about the role of the Territorial Army. The hon. Member for Mid-Norfolk referred to the 10 per cent. who are already serving in Bosnia, and we value their role. I have visited TA units and I know that, in some areas, there was disappointment about some of the decisions that had been made; however, other units that were receiving new equipment and could see their future role felt a sense of excitement and renewed interest. The picture is more balanced than has been said and we do the TA no service by ignoring that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Wentworth (Mr. Healey) spoke about the refugees and the work in the camps. A few weeks ago, I was down in Maidstone with the Royal Engineers. All of us—in fact, the world in general—have been hugely impressed by the speed and professionalism with which they erected new camps for refugees. We remember seeing on television the tide of refugees coming across the border. The speed with which that apparent chaos was resolved by getting the refugees into proper camps where they had proper feeding facilities is a tremendous tribute to our personnel, who have continued to work in other camps. That demonstrates the role played by our armed forces in that region.

My hon. Friend mentioned defence diplomacy, which we stress strongly. In the former Soviet Union and in eastern Europe, our military personnel have undertaken a great deal of work, in particular to enable the transformation and evolution of the military in those areas. I have already referred to the retraining work in Russia.

My hon. Friend also referred to the campaign by the International Labour Organisation in respect of 18-year-olds and under-18s in the armed forces. In correspondence with him and other hon. Members, Ministers have set out the reasons why our recruitment policies are as they are. It should be stressed that the real difficulty with the recruitment of young people relates to those who are snatched and forcibly conscripted, either into armed forces, especially those of third world countries, or into paramilitary organisations and roving bands. There is a world of difference between such people and those who have been recruited in proper circumstances, with the consent of their parents, with the option to leave at certain stages, and with a whole range of other protections. We should not confuse the issues.

My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East raised one or two procurement issues. We were spared on this occasion questioning by my hon. F the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) who usually asks about that subject. My hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East informed me that he had to leave the Chamber, and I will write to him about the matters that he raised.

[Mr. Spellar]

I draw hon. Members' attention to the question of resources and expenditure, particularly in terms of the Kosovo operation. That matter has been raised previously—although not in this debate. Expenditure to the end of May totalled £43 million compared with £37 million to the end of April. That is actual additional expenditure and does not include committed expenditure or the cost of expended ordnance. I thought it useful and important to give those figures to the House tonight.

Kosovo is but the latest and most dramatic example of the wide range of activities undertaken by Britain's defence in the world. First, the Government's commitment to make Britain a force for good in the world is no empty promise. We continue to have worldwide interests and worldwide influence, as well as a huge number of British nationals around the world. Furthermore, the dedication and professionalism of British forces is known and admired across the globe.

Mr. Hancock: How do the Government propose to support the President of Montenegro and his democratically elected Government, who will be subjected to enormous pressure from Milosevic and his regime now that he does not have Kosovo to boss around? Will NATO and the Ministry of Defence give support to the President and his regime?

Mr. Spellar: As I have told the hon. Gentleman, we are concerned about stability in south-east Europe and in the Balkans. As we pointed out to those who were critical of our operations in Kosovo, Milosevic's recent actions were simply the last in a long line of atrocities perpetrated by him and his regime. The countries of Europe—particularly the countries of the region—are anxious to put a stop to that instability and those atrocities. That view is shared by the international community. The hon. Gentleman will have noticed that the Serbian forces retreated into Serbia—and that was indicated clearly in the documentation.

Secondly, our forces' successes have displayed their capabilities and proved that their effectiveness is second to none. Hon. Members will not be surprised if I join all of those who have this evening paid tribute to our forces. We are not unusual in doing so. One has only to talk to a hurricane victim in central America, a Kosovar refugee or a service man from another country to understand why our armed services are held in such high regard across the world.

Thirdly, while we have rightly heard about the difficulties associated with our forces' levels of activity, we should not forget the up side—to which the hon. Member for Blaby drew attention. As he knows, our service personnel are never more satisfied than when they are actively engaged on operations: when they know that they are doing the job they are trained for and making a real difference to the world.

Mr. Robathan: I am sorry to interrupt the Minister, but I am listening carefully to his speech. British personnel also want to return to their families and have time off at some stage.

Mr. Spellar: We certainly understand that. That is why the Secretary of State has introduced several policies that will make the services more family friendly and help our armed forces personnel to move more easily into the outside world when they finish their service. The adult learning services have provided a great advantage. I visited RAF Cosford two or three weeks ago and I talked to several service men who are taking part in training using their training credits. They greatly appreciate that opportunity, which not only adds to their value to us but gives them portable skills to use in the outside world.

As hon. Members know, the new format of the defence debates, which differs from the previous single-service debates, was devised as a result of a bipartisan discussion about how we could more effectively debate defence roles in the Chamber. I think that it is working, and it will no doubt evolve.

The format raises a deeper issue, to which I alluded when I referred to the speech by the hon. Member for New Forest, East. In the previous Parliament, my colleagues and I argued repeatedly that we needed a more mature and consensual approach on defence matters. For reasons that I shall not go into tonight, the Conservatives did not take that up. We repeated that request from the Government Benches and attempted to accommodate other opinions in the strategic defence review process. Many hon. Members on both sides of the House who take an interest in defence have responded, and we shall continue our endeavours to change the way in which we deal with defence issues. That will be good for Parliament, it will be good for the country and, most importantly, it is the right thing to do for the men and women keeping watch tonight in the hills of the Balkans.

Question put and negatived.

COMMITTEES

Ordered,

Public Accounts

That Mr. Derek Twigg be discharged from the Committee of Public Accounts and Mr. Barry Gardiner be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Ordered,

Public Administration

That Dr Lynda Clark, Mr. Fraser Kemp and Mr. Rhodri Morgan be discharged from the Select Committee on Public Administration and Mr. Desmond Browne, Mr. Brian White and Dr Tony Wright be added to the Committee.—[Mr. Jamieson.]

Scottish Borders (EU Structural Funds)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

6.51 pm

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I am pleased to be able to follow the wide-ranging debate that the House has just had on the important issues on defence in the world. I make no apologies for trying to refocus the attention of the House on the important issues facing the Scottish borders in relation to the distribution of the next programme of European Union structural funds. It would be difficult to exaggerate how important that is to south-east Scotland.

Before I embark on the main body of my remarks, I state my hope that, if my hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you will allow him to contribute briefly to the debate.

This is an appropriate day for a debate on European funding because we are having a European election, and the importance of the European Parliament in distributing structural funds in future is an essential part of the political argument that has been raging—or not, as the case may be—in the campaign.

Will the Minister say a few words about the consultation process that has been undertaken in recent weeks? Will that process continue? I fully understand that he may not be able to say as much as he would like because the consultation process has to be concluded, and we look forward to that. I heard a rumour, however, that there were early indications of proposed lists that might be published in the next few weeks. Will the Minister comment on that, if he can? I do not seek state secrets, although if he would like to reveal any state secrets, I should be quite happy to hear them. If he has any advance information about that consultation process, it would be good if he could put the Government's position on record.

If the Minister has an opportunity to have constructive meetings with colleagues, then no doubt colleagues not only from south-east Scotland but throughout the world will be beating a path to his door. Such meetings would be useful, and my hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale and I would like to underline the earlier request for a meeting that we made in a letter.

As I said, it is difficult to exaggerate the importance of this issue to the future economic well-being of the Scottish borders region. The next programme of European funding will run from 2000 to 2006. Before I turn, briefly, to that programme, I shall, even more briefly, refer to the situation in the remainder of the current funding year.

The Scottish borders is coming to the end of a very constructive and important period of objective 5b funding. I would argue that the money that we have received since 1994—a crucial £24 million or £25 million—has been put to very good effect. The benefits are there for all to see. I hope that, in the remaining months of the current period, we will be able to make the best use of what money there is, and, in the dying days of the existing programme, construct a bridge between it and the new programme, which will take us into objective 2 territory once the reforms are implemented on 1 January next year.

The Secretary of State and, indeed, the Under-Secretary, have said that they will use their good offices to divert at the last minute any unallocated funds from other parts of the country. A carefully worked out and detailed programme in the borders would put any unallocated funds that the Under-Secretary might be able to find to very good use. Ministers promised to do their best. I understand that the task is not easy, but anything that the Under-Secretary might be able to say about the process would be extremely valuable to local people, who would then know whether the projects on which they have worked will be confirmed and can proceed. That would be a very valuable bridge from the current programme, as it winds down, to the new one.

We all know that, under the new set-up, objective 2 funds are designed to try to deal with a process of conversion in areas of the European Community that are suffering difficulties. They are supposed to address difficulties in areas facing economic change in manufacturing or service industries, or changing social backgrounds. Declining rural areas are particularly mentioned as targets for objective 2 work over the next six years, and—appositely for the coastal communities in Berwickshire that I represent—depressed fishing areas are specifically referred to as deserving help. Such factors are important and all applicable in diverse ways to south-east Scotland, which puts us in a good position to qualify for objective 2 help.

In passing, I again congratulate the Government on the cushion of the safety net, as a result of which the amount of money available under the current objective 5b status may be reduced only by a maximum of one third. That is a valuable cushion, of which I hope we shall make very good use.

As the Under-Secretary will know, any area of the United Kingdom cannot automatically or easily meet the core criteria. To that extent, the deal was bad for the UK. There is no automatic eligibility for areas such as south-east Scotland, although I would argue that the Scottish borders area has a very good case in many respects. However—I underline this—we need central Government support. Co-operation at ministerial and official level between the Scottish Office and our professionals in the local enterprise company and the local authority has been excellent, and we are grateful for that, but we need some political support from the Government—and we need it now.

I have two or three further points to make—none of them will be new to the Government or the Under-Secretary because they are well aware of the case that has been submitted. I endorse the excellent written submission made by the local enterprise company and the local authority. I shall highlight one or two points of the submission in reinforcing the case.

I should like the Government to look particularly at the new work being done by the Centre for Educational Sociology at Edinburgh university, because it has identified something that I did not realise. The reason why local unemployment is artificially low is that such a high proportion of young people leave the area just after leaving school. Given that many would not find jobs if they stayed in the area, unemployment would be higher than the Scottish average if such people were added to the count. That important factor is argued at some length in the official submission.

[Mr. Archy Kirkwood]

Secondly, I draw attention to the part of the submission about difficulties facing agriculture, given that 33.3 per cent. of businesses in south-east Scotland in 1996 were based on the primary sector. That is a crucial factor for us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale and I spent Monday afternoon with people from our local National Farmers Union, and they reinforced the fact that was clearly shown in the local authority survey conducted earlier this year—that the agricultural sector in south-east Scotland is having a very difficult time.

It being Seven o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mrs. McGuire.]

Mr. Kirkwood: I have only one more point to make, and I was trying to get it in before 7 o'clock, but I failed.

I want to draw attention to fisheries, because the new objective 2 schemes provide us with a new opportunity to help distressed fishing areas. According to the figures that we have worked out locally, between 10 and 15 per cent. of the Berwickshire travel-to-work area depends on fish landing and processing, and the ancillary sectors.

I know that the Minister is an expert on some of the relevant issues, and realises how important fishing is to coastal communities. Landings of fish at Eyemouth have slumped in the past 10 years from 8,000 tonnes to 5,000 tonnes, according to figures produced in the past few months. That is a worrying trend, and I think that objective 2 funds could address the problem constructively if we use them properly.

The Scottish Office working party report did valuable work in identifying what needs to be done, and came to the conclusion that, in terms of trying to deliver that programme for the future, it was important that continued access to European structural funding should be continued in some way and at some level into the new programme.

Objective 2 status for the whole of the Scottish borders is a crucial target for us, and I hope that we can count on the Government's support in trying to achieve that end.

7.1 pm

Mr. Michael Moore (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) for inviting me to contribute to this short debate, and I also thank the Minister for agreeing to my participation.

Most of the key points have already been made by my hon. Friend, and I shall reinforce some of them. In particular, I must emphasise the grim couple of years that we have had in the borders, with thousands of job losses and the widespread collapse of farm incomes, which affects nearly every significant sector of the local economy.

We have had many responses from the local enterprise company, the council and the Government—a contribution that my hon. Friend and I have been more than willing to acknowledge in the past, and I am happy to acknowledge it again. The partnership between the different political parties and the different agencies has worked, and we are keen for it to continue.

It is evident to all of us that we need to continue with the diversification of the borders economy and ensure long-term support both for new industries and for the many successful continuing businesses in key sectors such as textiles. In that context, the continuing availability of structural funds for the borders, and winning back assisted area status, will be critical.

My hon. Friend mentioned the borders working party report, which was published as recently as March. It is a solid document with real proposals and good pointers for the future. I want to draw the Minister's attention to two or three of those. On page 7 it is acknowledged that over the past few years. The report continues:

"The availability of European money has been extremely important to the Borders"

"The Government is . . . committed to reallocating unused European structural funds for use in the Borders."

Like my hon. Friend, I hope that the Minister will—if not this evening, soon—be able to respond to our concerns and perhaps honour the pledge made to the borders in that respect.

The most important section in the working party report states:

"The Working Party believes that the availability of European new Objective 2 funding will be crucial to the rebuilding of the Borders economy and any reduction or removal of European funding could have a serious adverse effect on the timetable for carrying forward initiatives and achieving the objectives"— that is, the objectives of the new economic strategy.

The report puts things clearly and eloquently, and I endorse what it says.

A number of the factors that will be difficult for us have already been mentioned and I do not want to repeat too much of what my hon. Friend has said. One such factor is the migration of young people. We have a growing population, but that is accounted for largely by the commuter belt around Edinburgh and by the increasing numbers of retired people, who are welcome in the borders but are masking the underlying trend of young people leaving the area.

We hope that the Government can continue to support our case and will recognise that, with our rurality—ours is the second most sparsely populated area in the United Kingdom after the highlands and islands—and our industrial dependency, which, paradoxically, is the second highest in Scotland, and with 2,500 jobs lost already in the past couple of years, matters are serious and need to be addressed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and I will go to Brussels on Monday to speak to the European Commission about these very issues. We hope that we take with us Government support and can be assured of on-going efforts on their part to secure new objective 2 status. We have seen already that the Government have recognised the problems of the borders and we hope that, in on-going representations to Europe, they will support us in seeking some of the solutions.

7.6 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Calum Macdonald): I congratulate the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) on securing the debate. I also congratulate both him and the hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Mr. Moore) on their contributions to consideration of the important matter of European structural funds and the borders. It is not the first time that we have debated the subject. I pay tribute to the way in which both hon. Gentlemen articulated the interests of their constituents in what is obviously a difficult time for the borders area.

As has been said, structural funds have played their part in contributing to economic development in the borders and in Scotland. The benefits are already clear across the whole of the borders area, and we can expect further benefits to flow over the next few years as projects mature and as their longer-term aims are realised.

Both hon. Gentlemen raised two principal concerns—the current borders objective 5b programme and whether additional funding can be found for that, and the prospects for the area in the next round under objective 2.

Structural fund assistance was introduced to the borders as a result of the previous reform, way back in 1993. At the time, the programme partnership, which includes all the local agencies, was unanimously of the view that the level of EC resources provided for the borders programme was inadequate to meet the needs of the area. Although strong arguments for additional resources were then advanced, nothing was done. All eligible areas had been allocated funding based on an agreed set of criteria already used for disbursement of objective 5b funds.

In recognition of the serious impact of recent job losses in the area, the new Government made a commitment last year to try to find unspent EC resources to allocate specifically to the borders, and we intend to deliver on that commitment. On the basis of the Government's commitment, the borders objective 5b partnership drew up a mini-programme, as the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire mentioned, based on immediate and longer-term need, with the expectation that additional EC resources would be made available at some stage before the end of 1999. The necessary processes take time, and they are still continuing as I speak.

Officials in the Scottish Office Development Department approached various project sponsors towards the end of 1998 and again in February of this year, to establish precisely what the projected spend profiles would be in their various projects. The exercise involved a review of the forecast financial uptake of projects approved to date, together with an accurate assessment of what was likely to come forward for structural fund support during the remainder of 1999.

That exercise concluded that £2.2 million could be reallocated for use by the borders to advance the projects approved by the programme monitoring committee as contained within the mini-programme, and I am pleased to be able to confirm the Government's intention to reallocate that funding.

The process of transferring funds will take a little time as it has to be cleared by the European Commission, although we do not have any reason to suspect objections or difficulties with what we propose. In the meantime, the borders project sponsors will be allowed to proceed with those projects approved subject to the availability of funds, but at this stage it must be at their own risk, given that final approval is in the hands of the Commission.

I have no doubt that the additional EC funds to be made available to the borders, together with an equivalent amount of co-finance from the various public sector authorities, which together amount to a package of more than £4 million, will be of significant assistance to the area. As the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire said, the Government promised to find the money last year in recognition of the special problems of the borders. We are sticking by that promise and are well on the way to delivering.

Let me deal with the future of structural funds after the current programme period finishes in December. Briefly to set the context, member states largely signed up to the Commission's broad aims of concentration, simplification and preparing the way for a much-enlarged European Union. However, although we accept that concentration inevitably means reduced coverage for existing member states, we were determined that that should be achieved in a fair and even-handed way among all member states.

For the UK, as has been pointed out, that presented a particular challenge. At the time of the last allocation of structural funds, in the early 1990s, UK unemployment was extremely high and the UK was in the grip of a serious recession. As a consequence of that high unemployment and other factors, the UK received extensive coverage under objective 2.

The picture in the late 1990s and as we head into the next century is very different. The new Government have achieved the lowest levels of unemployment in 22 years. Low unemployment would inevitably mean dramatically reduced coverage of objective 2, unless the UK could negotiate an alternative. That is why the Prime Minister proposed and pushed so hard for a safety net. Securing that safety net in respect of objective 2 was a priority every bit as great for the Government as getting a good deal on the highlands and islands, although it may have received less press attention.

The Prime Minister won his argument on the safety net at the Berlin summit at the end of March. The safety net delivers for the UK as a whole much larger coverage of objective 2 than would otherwise have been available. It doubles the population coverage that we would otherwise have got, from 6.5 million to 13.5 million people.

Having secured the safety net, we must allocate that coverage fairly within the UK, and in a way that is acceptable to the Commission. The first step in that process has been to engage in wide public consultation, as has been mentioned, on objective 2 coverage. That consultation finished on 25 May, and we have been considering carefully the range of submissions received.

The next step is for the Government to propose a list of areas to the Commission. It is intended that that should be done in July, but it is likely to take three or four months before final agreement is reached between the Government and the Commission on the list of designated areas.

As soon as there is a definitive list of eligible areas, decisions can be taken by Ministers in the new Scottish Executive on the mechanics of operating the new programmes. Clearly, the final level of eligibility will be significant in determining programme areas and committee structures.

[Mr. Calum Macdonald]

In the interim, however, time will be used constructively. Plan teams in Scotland have been established and have met regularly since the beginning of March to do the preparatory work needed for drafting new programmes. Although the eligible areas obviously remain unknown, it is still possible to undertake much of the economic analyses and priority setting in advance, particularly as all areas currently eligible will receive transition funding at the very least.

Again, it is thanks to the Prime Minister that we shall have six years' transition for all areas losing eligibility, instead of the four years proposed by the Commission for current objective 2 and 5b areas. That will allow all areas the opportunity to develop strategies over a reasonable time scale, even if they fail to qualify for full funding in the new round.

Given the future realities of enlargement, it is important to remember that these may well be the last available structural funds for most of Scotland, whether in transition or fully eligible, and that future eligibility will be concentrated on the areas in greatest need. All partners must accept that, in view of the future concentration, there will inevitably be areas that lose eligibility. With reduced funding available to a smaller population, the emphasis must be on targeting the most deprived areas.

I understand how the borders area is placed, and how the eligibility criteria in the regulations affect its relatively high dependence on the industrial sector, the discernible decline in industrial employment, the sparse population, the out-migration that was mentioned, the high proportion of agricultural employment and the fisheries dependency around Eyemouth or the Berwickshire coast. As has been said, those factors are well brought out in the case submitted by Scottish Borders council.

I appreciate the fact that partners in the borders, along with many others, are concerned about the likelihood of future funding under objective 2. Obviously, I cannot give any assurances at this stage in the process, but I can promise that careful attention is being given both to the cases submitted by areas and to the data available to the Government. The Government will look carefully and hard at the relative and respective merits of the cases put forward and will use open and transparent criteria for the final selection.

Finally, I emphasise the importance of the role of the partners in the borders, and any other area in Scotland which is pursuing objective 2 funding. They know the local priorities and local problems best, and it is for them to develop and implement exit strategies accordingly. It is for the partners to ensure that they make the best possible use of whatever funding they secure, be it objective 2, objective 3, transitional or rural diversification funding.

I hope that what I have said has been helpful to the hon. Members for Roxburgh and Berwickshire and for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale and their constituents, and that this evening's announcement will be positively received in the borders.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes past Seven o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 11 June 1999

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Orders of the Day

Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered

New Clause 1

AVAILABILITY OF INTERNATIONAL FOOTBALL BANNING ORDER IN RESPECT OF UNCONVICTED PERSONS

'(1) An application for an order under section 1 of this Act may be made by a relevant authority if it appears to the authority, in relation to any person, that making the order would help to prevent violence or disorder at or in connection with designated football matches.

(2) In this section "relevant authority" means any chief officer of police.

(3) Where an order is made under this section, the court may, if it thinks fit, impose such conditions in the order as may be imposed where an order is made in respect of a person who has been convicted of a relevant offence.'.—[Mr. Maclean.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

9.34 am

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following: New clause 2—Availability of domestic football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons—

'(1) An application for an order under section 6 of this Act may be made by a relevant authority if it appears to the authority, in relation to any person, that making the order would help to prevent violence or disorder at or in connection with prescribed football matches.

(2) In this section "relevant authority" means any chief officer of police.'.

Amendment No. 33, in clause 1, page 1, line 11, after 'offence', insert

'or to which an application has been made under section (Availability of international football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 34, in page 1, line 18, after 'accused', insert

'or to the person who is the subject of an application under section (Availability of international football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 35, in page 1, line 23, after 'accused', insert

'or to the person who is the subject of an application under section (Availability of international football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 36, in page 2, line 5, after 'conditionally', insert '; or

(c) following an application under section (Availability of international football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 37, in clause 4, page 6, line 12, at end insert—

'(1C) Subject to subsection (3) and section 17 below, an international football banning order has effect in relation to a person who is the subject of an application made under section (Availability of international football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons) for a period determined by the court making the order—

(a) which begins with the date of the making of the order;

(b) which is not longer than 3 years; and

(c) which is not shorter than six months.'.

Amendment No. 38, in clause 6, page 7, line 24, after 'applies', insert

'or to which an application has been made under section (Availability of domestic football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 39, in page 7, line 34, after 'accused', insert

'or to the person who is the subject of an application under section (Availability of domestic football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 40, in page 7, line 39, after 'accused', insert

'or to the person who is the subject of an application under section (Availability of domestic football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 41, in page 8, line 2, after 'conditionally', insert & ; or

(c) following an application under section (Availability of domestic football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons).'.

Amendment No. 42, in clause 8, page 9, line 12, after 'years', insert

', except in respect of persons who are the subject of an application under section (Availability of domestic football banning order in respect of unconvicted persons), in which case the period shall be not less than six months nor more than two years.'.

Mr. Maclean: This is an important group of new clauses and amendments. New clauses 1 and 2 seek to bring into legislative effect the suggestions made by my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on Second Reading. The Bill has not been amended much in Committee. However, it relates entirely to those who have been convicted of offences. The clause concerning international football banning orders relates to those who have been convicted, as does the clause on domestic banning orders.

As was said extensively on Second Reading, there might be a great many people whom football intelligence officers, the National Criminal Intelligence Service and chief police officers know to be dedicated troublemakers who can be violent, but who have not been convicted of an offence.

I intend to explain why it is important to explore the possibility of including that group, and I am keen to hear the reaction of the Government. I do not intend to force the new clause to a vote, but it is worth exploring, as the Bill—which does some good things—could leave some serious gaps. With the Euro 2000 championships coming up, it is important that we do not have gaps in legislation.

[Mr. Maclean]

I am conscious that making the changes that I am suggesting may unsettle or destabilise the Bill. I am conscious also that the new clause probably has not been thoroughly drafted, but it is not a bad attempt. However, certain technical amendments might be necessary if the new clause were to be accepted.

The Bill deals with convicted people. Bolting on a new clause—even one which is in order—concerning unconvicted people may destabilise the thrust of the Bill. It may be better in due course for the Government to propose separate legislation—or, if they wish, to propose a series of new clauses in the other place to frame in legislation the intended purpose of the new clause.

The amendments grouped with the new clauses are consequential. Both new clauses propose to do the same thing, essentially. New clause 1 relates to international banning orders, and refers to

"any chief officer of police".

I am happy to accept under that description chief constables, the Commissioner of the Metropolitan police—who is not technically a chief police officer, but a civilian appointment—and the director-general of NCIS, who is a chief officer of police rank. It is important that the director-general of NCIS be included, as NCIS ran the football intelligence unit and is spearheading the effort against violence perpetrated by hooligans in this country and overseas. The new clause would include also the Commissioner of the City of London police.

I want to give those officers the power to apply the measure in relation to "any person". I must use that phraseology, because I mean "any person"—including those who have not necessarily been convicted of a relevant offence. That would include all those whom the officers suspected, because of evidence or intelligence, of being involved in football hooliganism or violence, or indecent chanting or racist abuse at matches—the troublemakers whom they are currently monitoring—as well as those who had been taken to court but not convicted. I will say more later about the civil liberties implications, which may worry some people of a more sensitive disposition.

The power would appear to be draconian, but an order would not be imposed merely on the say-so of a chief officer; he would have to apply to the court. The new clause does not specify what level of evidence would be necessary to satisfy the court. It may be difficult to determine what level of evidence would be appropriate to secure an order without jeopardising police operations.

A similar proposal was in the Government's consultation paper on football-related legislation. The Minister said in Committee that she was interested in the concept, but that the Bill might not offer the right opportunity and the Government might want to explore the idea further at a later stage. The proposal was dropped after consultation because it aroused considerable controversy.

Some of the respondents were concerned about what would constitute sufficient evidence and others were concerned that courts might be presented with hearsay evidence. I do not rate that point very highly because that danger exists at present and the court would always rule such evidence out of order. It is up to the court whether it believes a police officer who says that he saw someone doing something. In the case of an unconvicted person, the evidence presented might not be enough to gain a conviction but it might satisfy the court that the person had committed some acts that merited the imposition of a domestic or international banning order.

I am more concerned about the risk of intelligence information being compromised, although I am sure that we can get round that. We will not go into the details of how NCIS operates. I would not go further than its press release on its football intelligence unit and the operation of its local football intelligence officers in each force. All one can say is that it is highly effective.

It was my experience during Euro 96 that the intelligence-run policing operation conducted by all police forces and co-ordinated by the Met was absolutely superb. Many people—some of them, sadly, from my own patch, north of Penrith, in Carlisle—got tooled up, got into their minibus, set off to have a good ruckus and were very much surprised when they were intercepted along the route by the police and the pickaxe handles, knives, chains and bottles were taken off them and they were locked up.

The same expression of surprise was seen on the faces of miscellaneous foreign supporters who boarded planes, got to Heathrow, passed through customs and immigration and then were intercepted by the police because of the football intelligence work of overseas police officers attached to the co-ordination unit at the Met and NCIS. Intelligence-led policing works. We were able to deport those foreign hooligans immediately as well as prevent our domestic ones from getting to matches. The fact that they were detained in cells overnight and could not get to matches was highly effective.

9.45 am

Such intelligence-led policing depends on the knowledge of NCIS and local police officers of who the troublemakers are. The new clause is designed to build on that operation and allow us, rather than merely detaining the hooligans in a cell overnight or questioning them for a few hours so that they miss the match, to go one step further and present information to a court, perhaps with video evidence.

I am conscious that presenting video evidence to a court could compromise intelligence, so it must be left to the police and NCIS to decide how much evidence to give, taking into account the risk that if they do not give the court sufficient information—if all they have are rumours, gut reaction or a bobby's instinct—they will not get the banning order. We do not need to prescribe too much detail in legislation.

I do not see too great a risk of intelligence being compromised. I would leave it to the good sense of the police to keep their intelligence sources intact, as there are much more valuable gains to be had in the long run with convictions of some of the nastiest hooligans, which must be a more pressing concern than gaining a banning order against one individual.

The new clause has aroused some concerns about the scope for civil actions against the police on the grounds of their presenting uncorroborated information to the court. Certainly, that is a risk. It is possible that people may claim to have been defamed by the police. If the police have laid information before the court about an innocent member of the public—innocent in the sense both of the person being unconvicted and of the information being wrong—there would of course be scope for action, but it would not be any greater than the present scope for action against the police on a whole range of, in my opinion, bogus issues. The number of law suits against the police is rocketing. It has become the newest and juiciest racket for getting money from the state. A group of lawyers has no doubt moved on from medical negligence cases to action against the police.

Probably the greatest concern is about civil liberties, and some of my more sensitive colleagues may want to speak about that. I have not had unanimous, wholehearted supported from them for the new clause, although I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford will want to support me this morning.

Some of my hon. Friends may say that the new clause is a sledgehammer to crack a nut. They may think that it is disproportionate to the mischief being created, and that we would be passing draconian measures in providing that some people who have not been convicted of an offence may be banned from travelling overseas, or may be subject to a whole host of sanctions imposed by the courts.

Subsection (3) would allow those sanctions. It states:

"Where an order is made under this section, the court may, if it thinks fit, impose such conditions in the order as may be imposed where an order is made in respect of a person who has been convicted of a relevant offence."

My new clause would give the courts the right to impose the same range of penalties and restrictions—including passport removal—on those who have not been convicted as they may already impose on those who have been convicted.

I appreciate the civil liberties concerns about such a provision, but we should remember that—thank goodness—we are not dealing with hundreds of thousands of people. Although I am not arguing that it is acceptable to remove the civil liberties of even one person, the fact is that we are dealing with a few hundred or—at the very most—a few thousand dangerous hooligans, whose civil liberties will not be removed on the whim of a police officer or a chief police officer. Their civil liberties would simply be restricted on the basis of evidence presented to the court that they would be a danger and might cause violence if they were to go to a football match. The courts would be able to decide whether to grant an order, and what conditions to impose. I do not think that such restrictions are extremely draconian.

Restricting someone's freedom of movement and travel is, of course, a potentially severe measure. I should therefore be very keen to hear the Minister's views on whether my proposals—or an amended version of them—would satisfy the requirements of the European convention on human rights. I realise that—as the Government have not seriously contemplated including my new clause in the Bill today—the Minister may not have taken legal advice on its compliance with the ECHR. However, if she has a view on whether we may be on dangerous ground in relation to the ECHR, the House would be interested to hear it. Nevertheless, I think that it should be possible for a court to restrict someone's freedom of movement and travel within the European Union without falling foul of the ECHR.

My proposals are not totally new or off the wall, as there are some precedents for imposing an order in cases in which an offence has not been committed. Anti-social behaviour orders, for example—which were introduced in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998—allow a court to impose any prohibitions considered necessary to protect persons in the local area.

Incidentally, during that Act's passage, the official Opposition tabled an amendment to introduce football behaviour orders in cases in which a person had acted in such a way as reasonably to give cause to believe that an order was necessary to prevent him from disturbing good order at any designated football match outside the United Kingdom, or during the period before or after any designated football match. The amendment was not pressed to a Division—as some of my colleagues were merely testing the water—and was withdrawn.

I am, therefore, not on entirely new ground in suggesting that it is appropriate to go to a court to obtain an order restricting the freedom of movement of an individual who has not been convicted of an offence in cases in which there is evidence suggesting that the person is a troublemaker or likely to commit violence.

As other hon. Members wish to speak, I shall not go on for too much longer. I merely wish to draw attention to some of the NCIS statistics on football violence and disorder, some of which were quoted on Second Reading. The NCIS view on the matter is very important. In its December 1998 press release, NCIS said:

"The National Criminal Intelligence Service today warned that they were becoming increasingly concerned about the number of incidents of football hooliganism being reported by their football section and by the network of FIOs"— football intelligence officers.

Bryan Drew went on to say:

"Although it is too early to say that the overall downward trend for football-related arrest figures over the past five years is being reversed, the signs are not encouraging."

He was referring to the fact that, although the overall figures for football-related offences and convictions had been dropping, he had noticed that there were more arrests for the more violent football-related offences of affray, violent disorder and missile throwing. He said that those had "shown a marked increase over the previous season."

Bryan Drew continued:

"This season, the ugly face of football hooliganism has continued to make its unwelcome presence felt. The numbers of people involved remain comparatively small, but it is hard core, well organised and hellbent on causing mayhem. It is using football matches as a cover for its criminal activities."

Mr. Drew went on to talk about the fact that, although incidents of violence were declining inside the grounds, they were increasing outside or away from them.

On Second Reading, when I stated that statistics showed about 1,000 arrests for football-related violence, Labour Members made the point that that number could be only the tip of the iceberg. I accept that, usually, the majority of those committing a crime are not arrested and convicted. So it is quite possible that many hardcore football hooligans have not been arrested by police, or that, if they have been, the evidence was not sufficient to obtain a conviction or—under clauses 1 or 6 of the Bill—a banning order.

My new clause would permit police, in limited circumstances, to take action against those other well-known offenders—whom every Opposition Member talks about; they know who they are—who regularly follow football matches and foment violence, but manage to be on the back line when police move in to make arrests. The police have information and video evidence on those people. In many cases, police may have sufficient evidence to convince a court—in the terms of my new clause, although they may not have enough evidence to obtain a conviction—that the liberty of those people should be restricted.

[Mr. Maclean]

New clause 1 is worthy of an airing, and I should be interested to hear what my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford has to say about it. I was very interested in his comments, some time ago, on the potential for such a new clause. I should also be interested to hear why he has resiled from the tough stance that he proposed taking on such a provision. I am sure that he wants as many of these hooligans locked up—or at least prevented from causing trouble overseas, ruining the good name of Chelmsford and other parts of the United Kingdom—as I do.

As my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford says:

"For far too long, a small minority of mindless, moronic football hooligans have besmirched the reputation of football in this country and dragged the game into the gutter by their anti-social behaviour."

My hon. Friend knows the rest of his press release. He was suggesting taking tough action to deal with those people.

I hope that, today, my hon. Friend will tell me that tough action will indeed be taken. If he cannot accept my new clause, I hope that he will he go away and—as he has been working very closely with the Minister, as his press release states—perhaps by the time the Bill goes to another place, propose similar new clauses. As he is keen on Government legislation, perhaps next year he could even promote an entirely new Bill to implement similar measures. Nevertheless, I am keen to hear why he has decided that it is no longer appropriate to include such a provision in his Bill.

Mr. Simon Burns (West Chelmsford): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on his new clauses and the way in which he spoke to them. I have much sympathy with many of his comments. He mentioned some earlier comments of mine and I make no bones about the fact that when I announced that I would introduce the Bill, in late December, I had hoped to be able to include provisions to give powers to the courts, in certain circumstances and under certain controls, to place international and domestic banning orders on people unconvicted in a British court but who the police and courts have reasonable grounds to believe would commit an offence if they travelled to a football match.

10 am

Clearly, such a power could not be used willy-nilly to settle scores, to undertake round-ups or to bring hundreds of people before the courts. It would have to be used with great responsibility, because—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border said—it raises civil liberties issues. However, the police and NCIS know of a number of people who are determined to cause misery and suffering to pursue their own agendas and to benefit from crime under cover of the crowds associated with football matches. In many ways, the organisers of such activities have escaped action in the courts and it is the thugs on the ground who have been charged with offences—the same problem arises with drug-related offences.

In those circumstances, I thought it might be right to include a provision in the Bill to give the police an opportunity to make a case to the courts for them to determine whether there were reasonable grounds, in exceptional circumstances, to restrict the attendance of unconvicted individuals at football matches. The provision would have included opportunities for the individuals to attend the court and make the case for their innocence. If the courts were not convinced and believed that the authorities had presented a compelling case, the individuals would have a right of appeal. In that way, safeguards would have been in place.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border said, precedents exist in English law for such provisions, and he cited the Crime and Disorder Act 1998. I mentioned on Second Reading the powers relating to individuals on bail and, in exceptional circumstances, to those involved in difficult child custody cases. The courts already have, and use, similar powers.

In the past two years, the Conservative party has become a listening party, and I believe that that is commendable. It is time politicians were prepared to listen, because we do not always have all the answers to all the issues. I listened carefully on Second Reading to several speeches from hon. Members on both sides of the House. They were supportive of the Bill, but they expressed strong concerns about the powers we have been discussing. I have also met several outside organisations and listened to their concerns about those powers.

Mr. Maclean: Am I right in thinking that the Football Association has said that the powers would be helpful?

Mr. Burns: My right hon. Friend is right, and I did not wish to give the impression that every organisation associated with or interested in football is against the powers. Indeed, I would like to see those powers on the statute book in some shape or form so that the police and the courts have another weapon in their armoury to combat the problem of football hooliganism. However, I am also a realist, and as I thought more about this highly contentious issue, I came to the conclusion that it would be more sensible not to pursue it via a private Member's Bill.

In effect, the new clauses would give the courts the power to impose a penalty on unconvicted individuals if their background leads the courts to believe that they might commit acts of violence or other forms of hooliganism. Denying the right of freedom of movement to an individual is so serious that I believe that it should be done by Government legislation rather than through a private Member's Bill. It gives me no pleasure to say that, because I would like the authorities to have those powers alongside the other powers in the Bill.

The Minister made it clear in Committee that she and her hon. Friends support the principle behind the powers in the new clauses and I hope that the Government will seek to include them in criminal justice legislation as soon as possible. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border said, last year the Opposition sought to introduce a similar proposal on Report to the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, although we did not push the matter to a Division.

I am afraid that I cannot support the new clauses today for the reasons that I have given, but I hope that the Government will introduce their own similar legislation when parliamentary time permits. I also hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border, in the light of my comments, will feel able to withdraw his new clause.

Mr. Tony Clarke (Northampton, South): I shall be brief. I welcome the acceptance by the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) that the matter is complicated and that the proof of the Bill would be in its implementation, not in what is said about it here. I agree that the courts may find it difficult to decide whether an offence had been committed and, if so, whether it was football related. Such matters, and others, were discussed in Committee.

However, I wish to challenge the assumption, made by the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), that there is an upsurge in hooliganism in the domestic game. He used the phrase "tip of the iceberg", and talked about the serious offences of affray, violence and missile throwing. The increase in arrests for those offences has nothing to do with a resurgence of football violence and hooliganism, but stems from our greater ability to deal with such problems.

For example, the introduction of closed circuit television has been probably the most important step forward in combating hooliganism. The offences of affray, violence and missile throwing are readily detected on CCTV, which means that courts and authorities are able to take action.

Mr. Maclean: In the pursuit of brevity, it is possible that I did not make myself clear. I accept that the number of arrests has fallen over the past five years and that there is not a great upsurge in violence. However, I was quoting a Labour Member who said on Second Reading that the people who are arrested are always the tip of the iceberg and that many others commit violence but are not arrested. That was the only point that I wanted to make. Bryan Drew of NCIS has said also that although the number of those arrested is declining, the proportion of more violent offences is rising.

Mr. Clarke: I accept that explanation, but I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept that the Bill is not about violence in the domestic game. It is a tidying-up measure, dealing with issues such as racism and the behaviour of English fans abroad. Legislation to tackle such problems is needed.

I accept the view of the hon. Member for West Chelmsford that a private Member's Bill may not be the way forward. However, I hope that we can continue this debate in the spirit of trying to iron out the difficulties, so that when the Government propose measures, perhaps in a Criminal Justice Bill, there will be total support in the House for dealing with the few remaining hooligans who are responsible for the lingering disrespect for Britain in Europe. Those hooligans arouse nothing but disgust among true football fans.

10.13 am

Mr. Eric Forth (Bromley and Chislehurst): It is perhaps surprising that this debate has attracted so little attention among hon. Members. More than many others, it goes to the heart of the difficult balance that Parliament has to strike, in what we regard as a free society, between the powers given to the authorities and the historic freedoms for individuals that we guard so jealously.

I regret that I part company with my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) over the new clause. I do that rarely, but am obliged to do so on this occasion. New clause 1 would alter the balance that I have described in a completely unacceptable way. I cannot understand why so few hon. Members are in the Chamber this morning, given that it will be left to this thinly attended House to determine that balance, as it would be affected by the new clause and the associated amendments.

One of the most fundamental rights of our citizenry over many centuries is that a person who has not been convicted of an offence is regarded as innocent until proven guilty by due process of law. That right is the subject of the new clause. It was implied in the comments made so far that the law and society are in a weak position with regard to wicked people seeking to act in a way that we find distressing or unacceptable.

However, we already have legislation on the statute book such as the Sporting Events (Control of Alcohol Etc.) Act 1985, the Public Order Act 1986, the Football Spectators (No. 2) Act 1989, the Football (Offences) Act 1991 and the Criminal Justice and Public Order Act 1994, as well as the Crime and Disorder Act 1998, to which my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border have referred. Given that list, and the other provisions in this Bill, one would have thought that the cumulative effect would be that the authorities had sufficient powers to deal with people whose behaviour is deemed to be unacceptable. Yet my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border is not content. He wants to alter, in a very significant way, the balance between the power given to the authorities and the rights of individuals. The new clause and the associated amendments go much further than I should have thought conscionable for anyone.

With his typical openness and frankness, my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford has told us that, even though some similar provision remained part of his thinking, he had accepted on Second Reading and in subsequent conversations and consultations that the proposal did not have the necessary support. I agree. I rather regret that my hon. Friend has urged the Government to introduce similar measures and I hope that the Government, too, will perform a listening exercise among their Back Benchers.

10.15 am

My hon. Friend stated in a press release that he was considering the approach embodied in the new clause and that he intended to raise the matter in Committee. On Second Reading, however, Government Back-Bench Members broadly in favour of the Bill and with a long-standing interest in such matters expressed their reservations and indicated that they would not be able to support this measure. Given that background, I was surprised when my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border brought the new clause back for consideration today.

[Mr. Eric Forth]

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) was in listening mode when he took account of those Labour Members who said that he should not include measures such as those embodied in the new clause. Similarly, on Second Reading I was persuaded by him that there was some merit in the proposal, which is why I decided to table the new clause for consideration today.

Mr. Forth: I accept, of course, my right hon. Friend's explanation, which renders irrelevant my earlier suspicion that, having served with such distinction in the Home Office for so long, he had approached the matter with what I can only describe as a Home Office mentality. In other words, I was concerned that his instinct was that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the authorities rather than to the individual, rather than the other way around. That would not normally be typical of my right hon. Friend, but I assumed that his long and distinguished Home Office experience must have contributed to his tabling of the new clause, although that is a matter for him and not for me.

However, the new clause is before us. I contend that it would affect one of our most fundamental and cherished rights for individuals, which we have guarded through the centuries. It is an irony that Britain, through organisations such as the United Nations and the Council of Europe, has hectored, lectured, guided and inspired other countries to adopt our approach to individual liberties and civil rights, which we have said have great importance for us. Those of us who travel to other legislatures, in the Commonwealth and elsewhere, know that legislators and members of the judiciary in those countries consider individual rights and civil liberties to be of key importance at the end of the 20th century. We can take much of the credit for that, although our American friends might say they had something to do with it, and I would not argue with that. It must surely be inappropriate to challenge our liberties as the new clause does.

In his excellent exposition, my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford said that when he first decided, at the Committee stage, to add the new clause to the Bill, he wished to reassure us that the power would be used not willy-nilly, but responsibly. Such siren words are often used. We are told, "Don't worry, folks—these huge, draconian powers will be used responsibly. Trust the authorities and all will be well."

We have heard that sort of thing time and again down the centuries and across the globe from people who wish to encroach on individual liberties, and my hon. Friend is at it again. Do not worry, he tells us: were there any such prospect of that—I was glad to hear that he accepts that there might be, even if he is urging the Government to consider the new clause—the authorities would use the power responsibly, and we could all sleep in our beds at night without being bothered.

I do not find that reassuring. That is not the likely outcome of my hon. Friend's exercise. Surely the onus must be on those who seek to alter the balance to reassure individual members of society that they will be protected. That is the whole point of our judiciary procedures, and I thought that it was also the point of the European convention on human rights. I do not support that convention, and I mention it only because I have to accept that it exists and that we have gone a long way towards incorporating it in our law. I regret that.

Given, however, that the nation and the House of Commons are committed to the convention, I doubt whether the Bill would survive scrutiny by those who believe in the convention. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border skipped over that point, and I can understand why. I should not use the convention as a principled argument against the Bill because I did not advocate its incorporation into our law, but incorporation has happened and the convention is therefore relevant.

Mr. Maclean: I was not going to mention the convention, although I may return to it later. My right hon. Friend has cast doubt on some of the intelligence gathered by NCIS. May I persuade him in its favour by using the powerful words of Pierre Picone, the divisional commissioner in the Parisian football intelligence centre? Commenting on the world cup in 1998, he described British police intelligence as accurate, thorough and diligent. Georges Querry, the French security co-ordinator, said that the intelligence had been exceptional. I am sure that my right hon. Friend will find their words powerful and persuasive.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend should know me better than to quote foreigners at me. I rarely find them persuasive. I shall certainly take no lessons on civil liberties and individual rights from anyone from France. Anyone who has seen the CRS in operation will know that French respect for individual liberties is, to say the least, scant. I am not impressed by my right hon. Friend when he tells me that some Frenchman in authority is trying to reassure me, him or anyone that things will be all right. If anything, my right hon. Friend reinforces my doubts. Yet again, we are hearing someone in uniform telling us not to worry because these enormous powers will be used with great discretion. It matters not whether that is said in French, English or any other language. I simply cannot accept it.

I see the drift of where Bills such as this are taking us. I feel no happier about the new clause than, to be frank, I did about some of the things that my own Government did over the years. It is quite wrong for legislators to argue that it is increasingly justifiable to use the powers of the Executive to reassure the mass of people that individuals will be restricted. That easy and seductive argument has been used to justify many things, but our attitude historically has been that the individual should be given the benefit of the doubt until due process has demonstrated that he should not.

That principle seems to be slipping away. Increasingly, we are told that the benefit of the doubt should be given to the authorities and to society rather than to individuals, and the reassurances that we have heard this morning are used to justify that drift. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford originally argued—and has only half back-tracked from that argument today—that we should not worry because the Bill would be dealt with by the courts. We are supposed to be hugely reassured by that, but recent events in the judiciary lead me to doubt it.

My hon. Friend also said that there would be a right of appeal, but I do not know whether he was right. I see no reference to a right of appeal in the new clause. Does he assume that there will be such a right, or is it to be provided in some other way? Even if it exists, a right of appeal will merely worsen the peculiar position in which someone who has not been convicted of any offence can be dragged before the courts and put through a distressing process. That person is supposed to be reassured because he or she will have a right of appeal, but I do not find that reassuring. I shall not go into all the ramifications of the availability of legal aid or proper defence representation.

Mr. Maclean: I believe that my right hon. Friend supported the legislation on protection from harassment which I introduced. That twin-track legislation created a new criminal offence and provided new civil powers, under which someone alleged to be harassing anyone in any way could be dragged before the courts so that an injunction or banning order could be made. My right hon. Friend was an avid supporter of that legislation, and I was very grateful to him.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend is untypically wrong. He will recall that, as a member of the Government in which he and I served, I was bound by collective responsibility. I was faced with the classic dilemma of those who serve in the foothills of Government, as I did for many years. In considering a Bill such as that introduced by my right hon. Friend, I had to decide whether to be bound by collective responsibility and to support it or to resign from the Government. No doubt I struggled with my conscience, but it would appear that I decided, on reflection, to remain in the Government, to lend reluctant support to my right hon. Friend's Bill and to continue to play my modest role. That is my recollection of what happened. My right hon. Friend's characterisation of my avid support of his measure is not how I remember it.

Mr. Maclean: Having listened to my right hon. Friend for all these years, I cannot believe that he would have put the prospect of advancement before the freedom of the individual.

Mr. Forth: As it happens, I did not get much advancement. I would characterise my prospects as those of survival rather than advancement. Perhaps my right hon. Friend and I can meet later to reminisce over our period in the foothills of Government and the constraints that came with it.

I am not persuaded by the argument that individuals are protected because the matter will be dealt with by the courts, although that does provide the reassurance of due process and judicial protection. Nor was I reassured when my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford said that there would be a right of appeal. Individuals are to be pulled in by the authorities and put through a harrowing judicial process—I shall challenge the process later—with a rather undefined right of appeal, to which the Bill does not refer.

10.30 am

Fortuitously, that brings us to one of the main thrusts of my right hon. Friend's argument. He went on and on about something called NCIS, in which he seems to have enormous faith. I do not know much about that body. The more I hear of it, the more it sounds like a shadowy, sinister body of people. I do not know whether they are in uniform, what constraints are on them, or within which statutory framework they operate; but the more I hear of them the more worried I become.

I hear more and more about covert surveillance and people being picked up in car parks and whistled off here and there. My right hon. Friend seems to think that that is all good stuff. His period in the Home Office seems to have assured him that if such a body is prying into what is going on in citizens' lives and picking those individuals up and whisking them off into custody, we should all be reassured. I am not sure that I am. I would be even less reassured if I thought that if the new clause were accepted, that sinister group, which no doubt has the enormous resources that such groups always have these days, could pick up people who have not been convicted of any offence but are simply suspected or accused of doing something or being minded to do it. That is what my right hon. Friend seems to be saying.

That brings us to another crucial part of what is being suggested. From what my right hon. Friend has said, it appears that people will not necessarily have had to do something. This sinister body, NCIS, has simply to believe or have reason to believe that people are minded to, or are going to, commit an offence. That would be sufficient to whistle them off, deprive them of their liberty and put them through some harrowing court procedure.

Mr. Burns: I am a little concerned about my right hon. Friend's use of the word "sinister". The work that NCIS does to advance the cause of law and order is tremendous. Will he be reassured by the fact that it was the Government in which he, my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and I all served that set the body up, presumably through primary legislation which he supported at the time?

Mr. Forth: The more I hear, the more I worry about what went on in the Home Office over the past 18 years or so. It is funny that I should say this, but if I had been a Back Bencher between 1988 and 1997, I might well not have supported a lot of this nonsense that I now learn that Government were enacting. I was constrained by collective responsibility and therefore obliged to support the legislation.

I am not at all certain whether I would have supported the creation of that body. In a gesture of friendship to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford, I will not use the epithet "sinister"—I will think of a more appropriate one in the next few minutes. However, it is a fact that I am unaware of what it does, as are most people, and yet there it is, working away quietly and secretly, allegedly on our behalf. Nevertheless, it appears to have wide powers.

My point, which is surely key to the new clause, is that my right hon. Friend seems to suggest that, having carried out its surveillance, gone to these car parks and done what it does there, all that NCIS needs to do is to satisfy itself that an individual member of society may be minded to commit some act related to football. That will be sufficient for that person to be deprived of his or her liberty and whisked off to a judicial process in a court. I will refer to the other authorities mentioned in the new clause in a moment, as I accept that they have a role to play as well—this is a multi-stage process.

[Mr. Forth]

How quickly or even whether the individual would have access to a court is another matter, as is the question of whether they would be held in custody for an undefined period before they had access to the judicial process. I wonder whether my right hon. Friend has given that matter sufficient thought and whether he can provide any assurances that the individual, having been deprived of his or her liberties on more or less flimsy grounds, would at least have the reassurance of having the case considered promptly rather than having to wait, or what is worse, being incarcerated for any period of time. My right hon. Friend did not mention that and I do not know whether it is in his power, or even that of the Minister, to reassure me. At the least, there is an area of doubt about which we should be extremely concerned.

My right hon. Friend said that we should not be too worried and he listed some extremely important people who would be involved and whom he obviously thought we could trust implicitly. He mentioned chief constables and the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis as coming within the definition of relevant authorities in the new clause. It states:

"any chief officer of police".

However, he spoiled the whole thing because he swept into his definition someone called the director-general of NCIS. The difficulty is that it is one thing for us to give a proper role—a discretionary role or role of judgment—to chief constables and the Commissioner of the Metropolitan police, as we traditionally do and have done for many years in statute, but it is quite another to go a stage further and to give such a role to this shadowy figure, the director-general of NCIS, of whom I had not heard until now, although obviously I should have done.

I do not know where that person comes from, what his or her statutory authority is, or anything of the kind; nor do I know what constraints are on the director-general of the type that we are increasingly placing on chief constables—the new Greater London Assembly will have an important role in the part played by the police in Greater London, as the Minister well knows. Perhaps my right hon. Friend can reassure me.

Mr. Maclean: I am sure that my right hon. Friend, with his new computer facility, will soon be surfing on hyperspace. Then, he will find all the NCIS press releases and information about Mr. Bryan Drew, the director-general of NCIS. Nevertheless, the important point is that NCIS now has the same statutory basis as an ordinary police authority under the Police Act 1997—another wonderfully libertarian piece of legislation that I had the pleasure to put through the House. That Act created a service authority too. Therefore, the director-general is in the same position as a chief constable, with an elected service authority to give the democratic accountability element.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend, who has set my mind at ease, but only within the limited terms in which I asked the question. Perhaps he has slightly restored my confidence in the Home Office during the term of office of the Government in whom I served and in some of the legislation in which he played a distinguished part. He has given me some confidence.

We have established, and it has usefully been placed on the record, which demonstrates the value of this little debate, that the director-general of NCIS—we now even know his name—is, slightly reassuringly, subject to the same accountabilities and constraints as are placed on the other authorities. However, the director-general is not mentioned in my right hon. Friend's new clause. Therefore, if we mistakenly agree to it, which I hope we will not, I am not sure that merely because my right hon. Friend has said so the director-general would be included in subsection (2), which states:

"In this section, 'relevant authority' means any chief officer of police".

I suspect not. That may be one of the defects to which my right hon. Friend, with his typical candour, referred during his opening remarks on his new clause.

Were the House to accept new clause 1, that point may have to be reconsidered in another place. I do not want to quibble on technicalities—we try to avoid that and debate, as I am doing, the substance of issues—but we have already found a flaw. We have flushed out what may be a serious lacuna in the drafting which would have to be corrected were we, mistakenly, to proceed with it.

The court access that may or may not be available in this encroachment on individual liberties must be considered. What if the relevant authority was not immediately available to make a judgment? The covert operations, following surveillance operations by NCIS, have swept people from the car park and whisked them off in a black van to some dank cell—but it is all right because a relevant authority will quickly consider the matter and decide whether to pass it to the courts. What if the relevant authority is not available?

Mr. Maclean rose—

Mr. Forth: I want my right hon. Friend to listen. I think that he is going to reassure me again, but I want to put this on record. What if the chief constable or director-general of NCIS were at an important conference on civil liberties? What if they were abroad boasting about how Britain had a sacred regard for civil liberties? If they were, I hope that they would admit to what NCIS was getting up to. I suspect that my right hon. Friend is going to bail me out again.

Mr. Maclean: It will be a source of deep regret to my right hon. Friend, but we no longer have any dank cells. They are too warm and cosy for his liking. The term "chief officers" should encompass deputy and assistant chief constables, all of whom are of Association of Chief Police Officers rank.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Alan Haselhurst): Order. It is time for me to assist the House. The debate is going far too wide in dealing with the issues raised in new clause 1 on international banning orders. New clause 1 is about whether such orders should be extended to unconvicted persons.

Mr. Forth: I was merely querying a term in the new clause, but I shall not trespass further on your good will, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Apparently not unreasonably, subsection (3) states:

"the court may, if it thinks fit, impose such conditions in the order as may be imposed where an order is made in respect of a person who has been convicted of a relevant offence".

This is the crux of the matter. I do not blame my right hon. Friend for this because it was how he had cleverly to construct new clause 1, but it is not obvious from the wording that unconvicted persons can have their freedoms and liberties restricted. We must consider carefully not only new clause 1, but new clause 2 and the consequential amendments Nos. 33 to 42 to get a full sense of what subsection (3) really means: someone who has not been convicted of any offence in our judicial process can nevertheless be made subject to an order restricting his liberties. Never mind all the objections that I have briefly outlined, this is where I part company from my right hon. Friend. I stand firmly by the view that unless someone has been properly convicted through our judicial process, we should not be able to take such measures.

10.45 am

Later, we will discuss other important provisions concerning the removal of passports, which I find equally threatening, but here we are discussing a simple principle. I cannot agree with my right hon. Friend's approach. I am unhappy with his mechanisms for dealing with the matter. I am unhappy about the role of NCIS and of the chief officers, whom we now learn can be almost anyone in the bizarre world of the Home Office. I am unhappy about the lack of reassurance in respect of court proceedings and the alleged right of appeal, which appears nowhere in the new clause.

I am even more unhappy about my core objection. I was half relieved when my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford said that he does not support new clause 1, but I was appalled when he went on to urge the Government to introduce a Bill of their own to do it, but we will leave the fight for another day. I hope that the Minister will be more reassuring and remember what her Back Benchers said on Second Reading. I hope that she will not be persuaded by my hon. Friend; we will find out soon. I vigorously oppose new clause 1, as I hope the Minister will.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border will reconsider, cast to one side his distinguished service in the Home Office, and reflect on the matter in a fresh light as an even more distinguished Opposition Back Bencher. I hope that he is aware of the importance of individual liberties as against those authorities in whose company he moves so effortlessly. I hope that he will think again and that we do not have to divide the House on the matter.

Mrs. Eleanor Laing (Epping Forest): My hon. Friend the Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), who has previously dealt with this matter for the Opposition, unfortunately cannot be here, so I stand in his place.

This debate is important because we are not merely debating the addition of a short new clause to a short Bill: we are considering a vital principle of the operation of the civil law. My right hon. and hon. Friends and the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Clarke) have highlighted the difficulty of achieving the right balance between the freedom of the individual and the necessity of protecting innocent bystanders. That is what the criminal law is all about.

I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on his carefully balanced presentation. I am delighted that he has been listening. I agree that the Bill is better as it is, without new clause 1.

We had an excellent consideration of the principles in the debate between my right hon. Friends the Members for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—a debate that was unusual as my right hon. Friends normally agree with each other. In taking the argument carefully to pieces and reconstructing it, they have quite properly—as is the duty of the House—given us the chance to consider the principle before us, as did the hon. Member for Northampton, South, who also spoke well.

The Opposition do not disagree in principle about what we are all trying to achieve in the Bill. We are all trying to achieve a better regulation of football supporters' behaviour and to give the right amount of power to the police and other authorities so that they can deal with hooliganism in football grounds and in connection with football games. We all want to achieve the same thing for the great sport of football at which our countries—I stress the plural—are so good on the world and the European stage. It is such a shame that, often, the achievements on the pitch are diminished and besmirched by what happens off the pitch. The Opposition therefore have no disagreement with the measure in principle.

There has been some confusion about the similarity between the provisions of this Bill and those in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 relating to ASBOs—for the uninitiated, ASBOs are antisocial behaviour orders and are a vital part of the 1998 Act. ASBOs restrict freedom without a criminal conviction, but they cannot be imposed without resort to the civil court. An ASBO can be imposed only after a legal hearing, whereas the provisions of the new clause would result in a much more summary administration of justice. It is not correct to argue that the effect of the new clause would be similar to the imposition of ASBOs. I shall be interested to know whether the Minister agrees with that point. ASBOs do not go quite so far in administering summary justice as the new clause would.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford that the Opposition would welcome further discussion of that matter, if the Government want to pursue it in a future Bill, as they have indicated that they might. I conclude by pointing out again that what we are trying to achieve is the important balance between the liberty of the individual and the protection of the public. That is a fine balance, but I strongly believe that it is the duty of the House always to protect first the freedom of the individual. The Opposition support the Bill as it stands.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Kate Hoey): This has been a most interesting and enjoyable hour and a half. I thank the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) for tabling the new clause. We spent much time on Second Reading discussing the issues that it raises, even though they were not specifically included in the Bill. Those issues were also discussed in Committee, although not in relation to a particular clause. We have now considered a specific clause and the right hon. Gentleman is to be congratulated on having given us that opportunity to discuss the important question of how we deal with football hooliganism committed by people against whom it is not possible to use the normal court proceedings. On Second Reading and in Committee, we were aware that there were several serious concerns about such measures; they were also expressed in response to the football consultation document, "Review of Football Related Legislation", to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred.

[Kate Hoey]

The document considered the introduction of tougher ways to deal with unconvicted hooligans. The response to the public consultation exercise was mixed and demonstrated serious concern about introducing bans without prior conviction. We have discussed the matter with the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and have taken into account the views of hon. Members on both sides of the House and of respondents to the public consultation exercise. As the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mrs. Laing) pointed out, in all legislation we must strike a balance between the civil liberties of the individual and those of the general public.

We must also take into account the practical and operational concerns about how the measures proposed in the new clause would work. The obtaining of such an order would rely exclusively on the quality of intelligence and information put before the court by the police and the prosecutor. In presenting that information, as the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border pointed out, the police may be required to compromise their intelligence-gathering mechanisms, including information on informants. We may not like informants, but in reality, they can sometimes play an important role in combating crime—especially organised crime.

I am surprised that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) seems to know so little about the National Criminal Intelligence Service. It is an important organisation, which carries out a wide range of work combating criminal activity—especially organised crime. Its headquarters are in my constituency—a few minutes' walk from the House—and I am sure that, if John Abbott, the director-general, is fortunate enough to read the account of this debate, he will want to invite the right hon. Gentleman to visit NCIS. As the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border said, anyone who sees what NCIS is doing will not fail to be impressed. The service operates in a statutory framework; it is accountable and is required to report to a service authority. It may further reassure the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst to know that the chairman of that service authority is a former Member of the House, Sir John Wheeler. I hope I have reassured the right hon. Gentleman that NCIS is not a sinister organisation, but a most important one.

Clearly, it would be an operational decision for chief officers whether to acquire the evidence required to stop an unconvicted hooligan travelling abroad. We are also concerned that some overseas jurisdictions may look to this proposed new power as a means by which they can deport suspected offenders from their country without prosecution, on the basis that when such people returned to this country they would be liable to action in the courts here. The right hon. Gentleman will remember how annoying it was to see people behaving appallingly in European countries and being instantly sent back here. We wanted those countries to take people to court and we are co-operating with other European countries so that that can be done. We want to continue to encourage the jurisdictions in which the offence has been committed to use the due process of law in that country to seek convictions. It was most disturbing to see footage of people behaving violently, and to know that the next day they would be sent back to this country—probably free—and that we could do nothing about it.

We should also consider the position of information gathered in a foreign jurisdiction and the ability to make use of it in a court in this country. At present, the taking of video material is subject to privacy laws in some countries and those laws place restrictions on the use of such material. There are difficult, practical problems as to how we obtain the evidence in order to convict hooligans through the judicial system.

The Bill, as it is constituted at present, would introduce a range of measures to strengthen and improve the existing banning process and its effective enforcement. If those measures are introduced, they will have a significant effect. They will make a difference, by increasing the number of banning orders while sending out a strong preventive message. We clearly have to monitor the effectiveness of the Bill—if it is passed—in terms of offences committed and the number of orders. We need to be in possession of that information before we can further consider the significant new powers proposed in the new clause.

The right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst may well be right to say that we shall have to revisit this debate in future, and it is possible that we will need those extra powers. However, given that the Bill's existing provisions command the support of so many people, we must wait and see how they work in practice.

11 am

Mr. Forth: Does the Minister share my reservations about the speed of access to the court procedure that might be available, were the approach she has set out to be taken? She acknowledges that that question might have to be re-examined, so I am putting down a marker as much as anything else. However efficient NCIS may or may not be, and however accessible the chief constable and all the other people mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) may or may not be, unless access to the court process is quickly available, we run the risk of seriously encroaching on people's liberties without their ever having been convicted of anything.

Kate Hoey: The right hon. Gentleman is right. If the Bill had been proposed as a Government measure, such assurances, checks and balances would have to be carefully considered and speed of access ensured. However, the Bill is not a Government Bill, although we are supporting it wholeheartedly, and the hon. Member for West Chelmsford has made his views known on the subject.

We need time to monitor how the additional powers to deal with convicted hooligans that the Bill will give when enacted work in practice. There is cross-party concern that we should do all that we can to prevent known hooligans from going about their activities freely. There is support both within the House and outside for ensuring that such people cannot travel abroad, which is why we inserted provisions dealing with the removal of passports. We do not want our country's name to be besmirched by the disgraceful incidents that have been witnessed over the past few years.

I acknowledge the sentiment behind the amendments and have some sympathy with them. We shall discuss with the Opposition and all interested parties what further action can be taken in the light of monitoring the effectiveness of the Bill. However, the amendments do not command the universal support that the Bill's other provisions command, and to insert contentious provisions into a private Member's Bill presents greater difficulties. Although that is not in itself a reason not to proceed—sometimes it is necessary to do things that substantial numbers of people dislike—the success of football legislation relies on a vast range of factors, including policing, intelligence, effective stewarding, closed circuit television, safer and more comfortable grounds and effective ticketing policies. Most importantly, it also relies on the support of those who are affected—the football supporters.

The provisions of the Bill as it stands have achieved widespread support. Including the amendments at this time, without the detailed consideration that I have mentioned, would be likely, at best, to reduce confidence in the legislation and, at worst, to alienate the very people whose support we need in order to combat hooliganism. For those reasons, and in the light of the assurance that we shall keep the legislation under review, I hope that the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border will withdraw his new clause.

Mr. Maclean: This has been an important debate and it has been quite contentious at times. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is right: it is a pity that on such an occasion, when we are making important amendments to the criminal law, the House is not packed with some of our great parliamentarians from both sides indulging in a debate on the freedom of the individual and civil liberties.

I have listened carefully to the speeches made. There are a few key points on which I wish to reassure my right hon. Friend and a few comments I wish to make on the Minister's speech before I decide whether to withdraw the new clause. For the sake of brevity, and so that I did not stray too far out of order, I did not explain fully what NCIS was and what it did. I apologise for my arrogance: having worked with NCIS when I was a Minister at the Home Office, I assumed that everybody knew what the acronym stood for. It stands for National Criminal Intelligence Service—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman does not need to explain that to the House—it has all been done before.

Mr. Maclean: I shall give my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst a briefing on NCIS later, or he can tune in to its website and read the information there. As for an invitation to visit, if NCIS is as sinister as he believes it to be, I do not think that he will need to ask for an invitation, for the second he steps outside the door of the House, he will be swept off the street, taken to a dark cell and briefed by John Abbott himself. But NCIS is not a sinister organisation.

I did not specifically mention NCIS in the new clause, because I did not think that I had to. I took the view that the phrase "chief officer of police" includes the Commissioner of the Metropolitan police and the head of NCIS, who has to be of chief officer rank before taking that post.

Mr. Forth: Can my right hon. Friend and the Minister guarantee that, were I to go anywhere near NCIS, I would have immunity?

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend has not committed any offence under the terms of this legislation and he is not suspected of being a violent hooligan or of causing disorder, nor do I believe him to be suspected of committing any of the other crimes with which NCIS concerns itself—drug dealing, terrorism and paedophilia. Therefore, I believe that he is safe.

Kate Hoey: It might be worth clarifying the question of the term "chief officer of police". That category includes chief constables, the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis and the City Commissioner, but it does not include the director-general of NCIS, even though he is of similar status. In practice, NCIS passes intelligence to chief officers of police. It does not initiate prosecutions itself, so the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) is quite safe.

Mr. Maclean: That was an extremely helpful clarification of that part of my clause. Even though the term "chief officer of police" in my new clause does not include the director-general of NCIS, there would be no glaring lacuna in the law, because NCIS would pass on the information and act as an intelligence-gathering body for the whole British police service, and local chief officers would then use the powers designated in my new clause to go to the court. Unless my right hon. Friend has any other specific concerns about NCIS, I do not propose to make further reference to it.

My right hon. Friend was concerned about balance. It is a serious matter to extend the criminal law to curtail the freedom of movement of individuals who have not been convicted of an offence, but similar powers already exist in the Protection from Harassment Act 1997. That Act allows people—men or women—to go to court to obtain an injunction to prevent someone from hanging around outside their flat, even though that person is doing nothing but hanging around, when they feel threatened or harassed by that person in those circumstances. The principle before us is similar.

If we can build into our legislation the principle that someone can be prevented from phoning another person, sending that person flowers, or hanging around outside that person's flat, surely it is no greater step to provide that, when the police apprehend that there may be violence and disorder and the courts conclude that that is so, a person may be prevented from travelling to a venue to commit that violence or disorder.

Mr. Forth: I am beginning to suspect my right hon. Friend of being a closet Marxist. He appears to be talking about irreversibility and inevitability, saying that, because we have done something before, we can do it again now. Has he not considered the possibility that what we did before can be proved to have been wrong, or that we got the balance wrong on that occasion? Surely my right hon. Friend does not believe that it is adequate to argue that, because we have done something before, it must be all right to do it now?

[Mr. Forth]

Mr. Maclean: I am not making that point. I am not following the Marxist supremacy of law point that I learned and forgot about 30 years ago. My point is simply that there is a precedent: the proposal does not break new ground. In fact, the measure is in the Crime and Disorder Act 1998 which refers to disorderly and disruptive children. I am not saying that we should extend the measure to this legislation because we have done so before.

There is potential for extending the measure to deal with problems of violence and disorder. The figures are decreasing: the arrest rate has fallen to 13.4 per 100,000 spectators in the past year, compared with 15.7 in the previous season. In 1997-98, arrests totalled 3,307, compared with 3,577 in 1996-97. Although the total has decreased—there were 1,000 drink-related arrests, 500 arrests for disorderly behaviour and about 300 for threatening behaviour—the numbers of violent disorder and affray offences, at 65 and 52, is double those of the previous season. Although the number of offences overall continues to decrease—many of the offences are minor, including drink-related offences and breaches of exclusion orders—the nasty offences, such as violent disorder or racial or indecent chanting, have increased. The police have pointed out that the figures show that football hooliganism at home is continuing to decline. Criminal intelligence—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The House extends to the proposer of a new clause the privilege to speak a second time in order to allow him to reply to the debate. The right hon. Gentleman should not make his arguments all over again.

Mr. Maclean: My apologies, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was attempting to respond to the points raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth)—I had better not try to respond to all of them. I clearly may not be able to persuade him to my point of view. I am not saying that, because few people will be affected, it does not matter if we deprive them of their civil liberties.

Mr. Tony Clarke: I do not wish to get the right hon. Gentleman in trouble with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I refer him to his comments about the increasing number of arrests for racial and verbal abuse. Will the right hon. Gentleman congratulate the vast number of football supporters in this country who are responsible for bringing about those arrests? People are less tolerant of racism and fascism at our football grounds, and supporters are making stewards aware of unacceptable behaviour. That has led to an increase in the number of arrests.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely correct. Because the number of arrests has decreased and football grounds have become safer, people no longer expect to attend matches and have cans thrown at them. They expect to attend football matches with their families, as rugby spectators have been able to do for 100 years. Football supporters are now less tolerant of that sort of behaviour.

Nevertheless, there was a small increase, from 10 to 33, in the number of people arrested for racial or indecent chanting. The police have said vociferously in their press releases that, while they are concerned about that increase in hard core offences, the number of offences has declined in relation to the number of people attending football matches. That figure has increased dramatically, yet the overall arrest rate has fallen. That means that more decent, honest people and fewer hooligans are attending football matches.

My new clause seeks to deal with the small number of hard core supporters to whom the police continually refer. As with any criminal activity—terrorism and so on—the hard core offenders hide behind those in the front line and foment violence and disorder, but they are not convicted.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is now repeating himself. He is using almost exactly the same language as he used in his opening speech, and I am not prepared to accept that.

Mr. Maclean: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I was led slightly astray by the intervention of the hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Clarke).

A further point relates to the European convention on human rights, of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst suggested the new clause could fall foul. I do not think that it will. As I suspect the Minister is not seriously contemplating enacting the measure, she will not yet have checked with the ECHR provisions. However, if something has judicial approval and is to go before a court, I think we may be satisfied on ECHR grounds.

Kate Hoey: I mentioned this matter on Second Reading. We are satisfied at present that the measures outlined in the review document in respect of unconvicted persons would not, in principle, be in breach of the ECHR or the EC treaty, provided that sufficient safeguards were in place. However, if we were to pursue the measures, we would have to ensure that they complied fully with all our international obligations.

11.15 am

Mr. Maclean: I am grateful to the Minister. That is the best possible answer that my right hon. Friend could receive. I do not need to elaborate on it one iota as it responds fully to my right hon. Friend's concerns—

Mr. Forth: Except that, if this measure were to be compatible with the ECHR, it would confirm my view that the ECHR is pretty useless.

Mr. Maclean: I may agree with that point of view on many occasions—indeed, I may agree with it now. However, my right hon. Friend objected to my new clause on the basis that it could fall foul of the ECHR. The Minister says that it will not, and it is not adequate for my right hon. Friend to respond by saying, "Well, the ECHR is rubbish".

The Minister touched on a crucial point concerning evidence. The police may not wish to go to the court and seek a banning order if they do not have sufficient evidence, or if their evidence is based on information from informants or on the release of other information. However, that point does not work against my new clause because the police might be in that position at present. Because they can secure a conviction only by revealing a valuable source of information or intelligence, the police may decide in a variety of cases—including football-related cases—to ask the Crown Prosecution Service to drop the case. That happens on rare occasions—we may not know about them—and it will be no different in future. If the only way of persuading the court to grant a banning order—either domestically or internationally—is by revealing certain information to the court, and therefore to the accused, the police may decide that, because such evidence could not be provided in camera or in private, it is not worth the candle and they will not proceed. I do not think it destroys my new clause to acknowledge that the police will not pursue a conviction in some cases. That is a judgment for them.

My right hon. Friend—who is not officially learned yet—referred to the speed of access to the court process. The police will be seeking banning orders. They will not sweep people off the streets, as my right hon. Friend suggested, and keep them in cells for days before taking them to court. Even if there were no other provisions in the criminal law, it would be in the interests of the chief officer of police to sweep a hooligan off the street, to take him to court as soon as possible and secure a banning order. The offender could then be released back into the public domain, but he would not be able to travel to a particular football match.

Mr. Forth: Does the chief officer—whoever that may be—have control over the speed of the court process? I believe there are two separate issues. It is one thing for the chief officer to enforce the provisions of the new clause and quite another to give the individual who is subject to this measure any reassurances about the extent to which the judicial process will be readily available to him.

Mr. Maclean: Of course the chief officer cannot dictate when people will get to court. Nevertheless, those people are not kept in police detention for the whole time.

Mr. Forth: Where are they?

Mr. Maclean: They are at liberty.

Mr. Forth: Are they in the car park?

Mr. Maclean: If people are arrested in the car park and they have weapons of violence, they could be committing an offence, so they could be arrested and charged appropriately. The point about my new clause is that it seeks a banning order to stop people travelling overseas to a football match. It is not necessary for the police to keep them in permanent custody to achieve that, but it is in their interests to get the banning order and release the people into the public domain. They must then report into a police station, hand over their passport or comply with any conditions imposed by the court. My right hon. Friend need not be worried that access to justice would be too slow and that it would therefore deny individuals their liberty.

I have tried, with the new clause, to extend criminal law. I appreciate that I have suggested moving into an area that causes deep concern to some of my hon. Friends. The Minister is also concerned that there are loose ends, and she wants the current legislation to bed down before taking the step of introducing banning orders for people who have not yet been convicted of a criminal offence. Clearly, if I were to pursue the new clause to a vote, I would not have the unanimous approval of the House and, in any case, I would lose my customary partner teller.

Bearing it in mind that my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has been persuaded by the Government to do a U-turn and that the Minister advises me not to pursue my new clause now—I greatly respect her opinion on a range of issues—I shall not do so, although it has been worth while airing the arguments. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1

International Football Banning Orders

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 10, in page 1, line 17, leave out 'the duty of' and insert 'available to'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 11, in page 1, line 23, leave out 'shall' and insert 'may'.

No. 1, in page 1, line 26, at end insert—

'(2B) Where a court makes an international football banning order, it shall state in open court that it is satisfied that there are such reasonable grounds as are mentioned in subsection (2) above and give reasons why it is so satisfied.'.

No. 22, in clause 5, page 6, line 31, leave out

'shall be under a duty to'

and insert 'may'.

No. 6, in page 6, line 40, at end insert—

'(5B) Where a court makes an international football banning order, it shall state in open court that it is satisfied that there are such reasonable grounds as are mentioned in subsection (5) above and give reasons why it is so satisfied.'.

No. 23, in clause 6, page 7, line 32, leave out 'the duty of' and insert 'available to'.

No. 7, in page 7, line 42, at end insert—

'(3A) Where a court makes a domestic football banning order, it shall state in open court that it is satisfied that there are such reasonable grounds as are mentioned in subsection (2) and give reasons why it is so satisfied.'.

Mr. Forth: The amendments take us into new but not entirely unrelated territory because the wording that I seek to amend is another attempt to curtail the traditional freedoms of the courts and the judicial process. The Bill says:

"Subject to subsection (3) below, it shall be the duty of the court to make an international football banning order in relation to the accused if it is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that making the order would help to prevent violence or disorder at or in connection with designated football matches."

In other words, the Bill gives a statutory instruction to a court to do something. That strikes me as a step too far.

I have always understood that traditionally, in this country, we prefer the court to be given the maximum discretion to make its judgment in the light of the full circumstances known to it at the time. It is not even for this House to seek to pre-empt what might happen in a court. The whole point of our judicial process and court proceedings is that the court will listen carefully to the arguments of both sides. It must then make several decisions, the first of which is whether the defendant is guilty or innocent. The next is concerned with sentencing. In doing that, the court will have to take into account all the circumstances made known in the proceedings and, most obviously, decide whether there are any mitigating circumstances.

[Mr. Forth]

The provision in the Bill therefore strikes me as peculiar, to say the least. I have always been uneasy about the Bill, but this sort of provision has made me even more uneasy. I cannot understand why my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) cannot be content with normal judicial proceedings. Instead, most uncharacteristically, he resorts to wording such as that in clause 1 and seeks to use his Bill as a vehicle to prescribe to the court what it will do. My hon. Friend cannot know what will happen in court.

Mr. Tony Clarke: I do not want to destroy the right hon. Gentleman's argument so early in the debate, but does not he accept that all we are suggesting is that the court should have a duty—rather than a discretion, as at present—to consider imposing an international banning order? One of the problems in the game today is that many of our hooligans turn up at international fixtures abroad, irrespective of the fact that they have committed an offence and been charged and sentenced, but an international banning order was not imposed on them because the court failed to consider the possibility. All we are doing is requiring the court to consider those orders, rather than leaving that to its discretion.

Mr. Forth: I can see the sense in what the hon. Gentleman is saying and I am interested in his argument. It might be worth reviewing the entire statute book to find out whether we can insert into every statute an obligation that the court should consider this, that or the other as an appropriate penalty. I am tempted by that prospect, although it is not a process that we would usually undertake.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) catches your eye in this debate, Mr. Deputy Speaker, because his experience is most apposite. He might be able to set this debate in the context of the efforts that I seem to recall the previous Government made to bring in minimum sentencing provisions. At that time, as a fellow member of the Government, I thought that the process was very dubious. Although I think that in many cases the actions of the courts are pretty weedy and wishy-washy, and I should be very tempted to bring back mandatory capital punishment for almost anything, I was constrained by another view, which prevailed on that occasion. I believe that, whether I like it or not, I have to respect the ability of the courts to use their proper discretion and judgment in the full knowledge of the circumstances at the time.

Like me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, you must often meet constituents who have read a story in a newspaper and ask, "Why on earth did the court let the defendant off with such a ridiculously light sentence?" You may well reply, as I do, "I do not know because I was not in the court at the time. I did not sit through the proceedings. I did not hear the evidence and I was unable to look at the accused and assess his or her demeanour. I was unable to take account of the full range of circumstances and regrettably, therefore, I cannot come to a judgment." I am always tempted to err on the side of harsh penalties, but I always resist that temptation. Clause 1 and amendment No. 10 take us into the same territory. We have to respect the court's judgment, given the knowledge that it has at the time.

My next part of the argument is similar, and relates to our old friends "may" and "shall". Clause 1(2A) says:

> "Where the court has power to make an international football banning order in relation to the accused but does not do so, it shall state in open court that it is not satisfied that there are such reasonable grounds as are mentioned in subsection (2) above and give reasons why it is not satisfied."

Again, a requirement in the Bill seeks to encroach on the discretion of the court. Surely such decisions must be left to the court's discretion, even if it is stated in open court that it is not satisfied. I can imagine circumstances in which the court might judge that it is not entirely appropriate, proper, fair or reasonable to state openly why it has reached one judgment or another.

I should have thought that we should generally err on the side of openness. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford—typically, because he is an open sort of guy—has sought to include that openness in his Bill. All I am suggesting, however, is that my hon. Friend, in all his reasonableness, might accept that every now and then there might be circumstances in which such openness might not be appropriate. However, the Bill would not allow the courts to have that degree of discretion. That is why I am arguing that "shall" should be "may". I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford will see the sense in that, will return to his normal, reasonable demeanour in these matters and will allow the courts to have a degree of discretion.

11.30 am

The argument behind amendment No. 1 appears to go in the opposite direction. Interestingly, I might be about to argue against myself. The amendment reads:

> "Where a court makes an international football banning order, it shall state in open court that it is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds as are mentioned in subsection (2) above and give reasons why it is so satisfied."

I am beginning to have second thoughts. I am wondering whether I am breaching the principle that I have outlined. I do not want to spend excessive time on this matter, notwithstanding its importance, because there are many other important matters that we want to discuss. However, should we be introducing distinctions and saying that it would be justified to allow the courts discretion in one case but not in another? Against that background, I am inclined not to press amendment No. 1.

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend will recall that when we were drafting amendment No. 1 we took the view that we should copy the order set out in clause 1(2A). The clause contains "shall" and we used "shall" in the amendment. If my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) were willing to accept an amendment to clause 1(2A), to insert "may" in place of "shall", it would be appropriate to have "may" in amendment No. 1. We were merely copying what was already in the Bill.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for reminding me of why I did what I did. I am merely saying that we should be careful in this instance to ensure that we are as consistent as we can be. I am arguing, I hope consistently, that we should wherever possible give the courts—the judicial process—as much discretion and flexibility as possible. After all, the courts are fully aware of the circumstances at the time. The argument will have been advanced in the courts one way or the other.

As I have said, we may not always agree with the courts, but we respect their judgment. I accept that, perhaps with some reluctance. However, I think that we should always respect the discretion of the courts and allow them to do what they think is appropriate. That is why I am puzzled—I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford will be able to help us and so set my mind at rest—that the wording of the Bill is extremely prescriptive.

I am anticipating what my hon. Friend might say, but we return to an earlier argument. It seems that the argument runs that we are dealing with such outrageous and heinous crimes and activities that we must take every possible action and make available every power to the courts, the authorities, chief officers of police and all those who are involved in the process, to reassure society that these matters will be dealt with properly. I understand that motivation.

Anyone outside this place and any of our colleagues who are sadly not in their places today will read the title of the Bill, the Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, and think, "That is probably all right. It seems that it is a fairly minor measure." However, we have discovered that it is not a minor measure. In my hon. Friend's enthusiasm to deal with these matters in his apparently innocent and relatively restricted Bill, he has allowed to creep into it the sort of measures to which I have referred.

I wonder whether my hon. Friend has consulted the representatives of the magistrates and those of the judiciary. Perhaps the Minister has taken the trouble to ask those to whom we give the responsibility to exercise their discretion in the judicial process whether they would welcome constraints being placed upon them, either now or in future.

The hon. Member for Northampton, South (Mr. Clarke) made an interesting point to which we might return in future. He made the intriguing suggestion that perhaps whenever in future we are legislating in this way, we should outline in Bills the thoughts that we have collectively in this place on the sort of penalties that might be properly considered by the courts, or even provide them with a menu from which they could make selections. That would be breaking new ground but it might go part way to answering the problem to which I referred when constituents come to us to ask, "Why did not the courts do this, that or whatever?" We would be giving the courts a range of options. However, we are not in that business.

I hope that I shall be given some explanations and reassurances, and some background that explains why my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford came up with the form of words that appears in the Bill, what he thought he would achieve, and whether he shares my worry that we are doing something that we might live to regret, setting a precedent of which my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border seems suddenly to be so fond. I hope that we shall not hear, "We have done it before so it is all right." I would rather hear it said, if I may draft a speech for my right hon. Friend, that if we believe that the things done in the past were not correct or have had an adverse effect, we should have the openmindedness and flexibility to say, "That was not the proper way to do it. We have the balance wrong. We are encroaching too much on individual liberties and court discretion"—and on all the other areas of our tradition that I thought were sacrosanct and hallowed. It appears that they are no longer considered in that way.

Some extremely important principles arise from this modest Bill, which contains some quite serious threats to the great traditions of our polity, our judicial process, our history and things in which we have taken such pride. I hope that I am not overstating the position, but I think that the amendment will give an opportunity to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford, and perhaps the Minister, to tease out some of the arguments and to reassure me. I hope that I shall be reassured, and that is one of the objects of the amendment. If I am not, we may have to take a very serious look at these matters.

Mr. Burns: As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said in ably speaking to this group of amendments, they fall broadly into two groups. If the House will allow me, I shall keep to those two groups. I shall deal first with amendments Nos. 10, 11 and 23 and then deal with the points that arise from amendments Nos. 1, 6 and 7.

In many ways, I am saddened to have to tell my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst that I am not attracted to the amendments. They go to the heart of the Bill and if they were to be accepted they would, to my mind, seriously undermine and undo what I consider is the good work of legislation in giving the authorities—the police and the courts—greater and enhanced powers to deal with those whom I have described before as a small, mindless group of moronic hooligans who cause such a problem.

The effect of my right hon. Friend's first group of amendments within the group as a whole would be, as he rightly said, to remove the duty on courts to make an international and domestic banning order where a football-related offence has been committed, and the court is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the order would help to prevent violence and disorder at or in connection with future football matches.

In effect, the amendments would give the courts a discretionary power to make such orders if the relevant conditions were fulfilled. I fear from the evidence that is available so far that the courts have been using their discretion in a wide way, in effect to dilute the laws that are currently in place, because of a reluctance to use a power that will have dramatic effects in preventing hooligans from attending matches and causing the problems from which this country and others have suffered far too much.

For the benefit of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst, the latest figures that I have—I assume that they are still more or less correct because they go to 16 April—show that on 16 April, there were

[Mr. Burns]

113 international banning orders and about 400 domestic banning orders. If the amendments are used to reintroduce the discretionary power, that will seriously undermine the Bill's aim—which is to deal with the problem more effectively.

Mr. Maclean: In my experience, if one tries to tie a court's hands in one area it will free them up in another. Even though clause 1(2) says that if the court does not like being tied to that, is there not a danger that it will conclude, "We were not satisfied that there were reasonable grounds"—thus giving itself an out in that sense?

"it shall be the duty of the court to make an international football banning order"

Mr. Burns: My right hon. Friend raises a valid point. It is difficult to give him a completely accurate and straightforward answer, because the matter is subjective. He may be correct in some circumstances, but I am not convinced that the courts would behave in that way.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst should not forget that although the courts have the freedom not to impose a banning order, if they do not use that power, they must give reasons why they have not done so. I believe that it is perfectly reasonable for a court to explain why it has decided not to exercise a power that it has under the law to impose a banning order.

On amendments Nos. 1, 6 and 7, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said that he might be arguing against himself. He was being slightly harsh on himself in that respect. However, it does seem contradictory—and unnecessary, over-regulatory and a burden on the courts—to impose on courts an obligation to state in open court why they are imposing a banning order. More often than not, when a person is sentenced, having been convicted of an offence, the judge or magistrate is more than ready to explain why they are imposing the sentence and why they consider it justified.

My right hon. Friend hinted that he might not press these amendments, which suggests that I may be pushing at an open door. I believe that, on reflection, he of all people, given his excellent record of seeking to break down the over-burdensome regulation within the state, would feel that it would be unnecessary and unfair to burden courts, judges and magistrates with such an obligation.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is stretching it a bit too far. His Bill says that the court shall state in open court why it is not imposing an order. He then suggests that it is an over-burdensome new regulatory power to insert a similar power saying that the court shall state in open court why it is imposing an order. I do not think that that is as heavy a regulatory burden as he suggests. Judges are capable of giving their reasons very simply.

Mr. Burns: In a way, my right hon. Friend is making my point, because I mentioned earlier that judges and magistrates, when imposing a punishment or sentencing someone who has been convicted, state their reasons for doing so. I consider that it would be burdensome and nanny-statish to regularise into law something that is already common practice on, to all intents and purposes, a voluntary basis.

I was seeking to explain to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst that, given his reputation and his crusade to prevent individuals from being overburdened at the hands of the state, he may decide to follow his gut instinct not to press that set of amendments. I hope that, when he has had an opportunity to listen to the full debate, he will feel that, whereas it has been extremely useful and important to discuss the issue, it might be sensible not to press the amendments. I leave it in the capable hands of my right hon. Friend to take that decision at the appropriate time.

11.45 am

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) may have been persuaded by the eloquence of my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), but I have not been yet. This is a small but important group of amendments. As my right hon. Friend said, we are trying to restore the traditional discretion of the courts.

I have a few years' experience of producing legislation in the Home Office, and any legislation that appeared to limit the discretion of the judiciary was always fought hard by it. I suspect that, unless we are willing to contemplate the amendments, when the Bill goes to another place later this afternoon, it may not be so satisfied with legislation that imposes a duty on a court to do something, and uses words such as "it shall state in open court"

when it prefers discretion. I have not had a chance to consult the Magistrates Association yet, but usually, as a principle, it likes to ensure that any legislation imposing obligations on the court does not tie its hands, but gives it flexibility to impose whatever penalty it wishes beneath a maximum level. Usually, the association does not like minimum penalties. Magistrates like to have that freedom. It is a traditional freedom, and we have got into trouble when trying to limit that discretion.

Clause 1(2) says:

"Subject to subsection (3) below, it shall be the duty of the court to make an international football banning order in relation to the accused if"

the court

"is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that making the order would help to prevent violence" and so on. The danger is that when my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford has tied the court's hands in the first line,

"it shall be the duty of the court"

to make a banning order, in borderline cases where judges would have liked to have a discretion they will say, "We do not really want to make the order". Instead, they will rule that the evidence was not good enough and that they were not satisfied that there were reasonable grounds for making an order. That is not a corruption of justice; it is an inevitable part of our human nature.

Mr. Burns: May I put another scenario to my right hon. Friend? The courts may decide that the offence that the individual has committed is not serious enough to warrant a banning order, so, using their discretion, they do not impose one. They then give their reasons and make the precise point that they do not consider that the offence was serious enough to warrant the issue of a banning order. Is not that the way around the problem that is exercising my right hon. Friend so much?

Mr. Maclean: I do not think that it is. I take the subsection as it is presented in the Bill, and as my hon. Friend has proposed it. He needs to come up with a different form of words to ensure that, in all cases where the evidence is clear cut and any person in their right mind would impose a banning order, the courts would do so. He is trying to tie the courts' hands in a way that they will try to escape; they will use the second part of the clause to get out of imposing a banning order in those borderline cases. They will merely state that they were not satisfied that there were reasonable grounds for imposing one.

Mr. Burns: The proposal is that it should be the duty of the court to make an order if it is satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that making the order would help to prevent violence or disorder at designated football matches. If the court regards the offence of which the person has been convicted as relatively minor within that ambit, it may feel that the individual will not cause violence or disorder at a future match, and will not issue the order. The court will then give the reasons. That is perfectly reasonable.

Mr. Maclean: It may be pedantic but my concern is that, by using the words "shall be the duty", my hon. Friend will increase the likelihood that the courts will use the excuse that the potential is negligible or that there are not reasonable grounds. Courts and magistrates do not like being tied strictly to an obligation to impose a particular sentence, because there will be borderline cases where they think that the sentence is not appropriate. The clause allows the court to deal with borderline cases, which cannot use a discretionary power, only by exaggerating the last part of the clause—by saying that it does not believe that the order will help to prevent violence or disorder, or that the grounds are not substantial.

Mr. Tony Clarke: Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that we are simply trying to bring clarity to the decision-making process of the court? Does he further accept that the judiciary sometimes gets it wrong? Until December 1998, only three international banning orders had been made. That was in a year when we witnessed terrible scenes of trouble in France during the world cup, perpetrated by so-called England fans. Does not that prove that, so far, the judicial process has failed? The hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) is seeking to bring clarity by determining which offences would and would not warrant an international banning order.

Mr. Maclean: I am always keen to have clarity in the law, and this House has, over the years, tried to bring clarity to the law. However, the proposal will not necessarily cause an increase in international banning orders, as the hon. Gentleman suggests. If one wants to get a lot of people banned, there is no point in giving the court the power to be satisfied that there are reasonable grounds that making the order will prevent violence or disorder.

If a court decides that it is not entirely satisfied, it can say that although the individual concerned may have convictions for affray, hooliganism or violence, on this occasion it does not think that an order will help to prevent violence abroad. The court will not make the order because the person has not satisfied the reasonable grounds provision. Not all courts will behave like that in all circumstances, and the tightening of the law will mean that we can expect more banning orders.

I am merely suggesting to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford that if one attempts to tie the hands of judges by putting in the words "shall be the duty", the judges—in an attempt to get the liberty not to impose orders—will extend the last half of the proposal and conclude that there are no reasonable grounds.

Time and time again, I have heard the argument that if a sentence appears too severe, the court will not convict. We have heard the argument that if capital punishment were brought back, juries would not convict an obviously guilty person because they did not like the consequences. That applies to a whole range of sentences. If courts, juries and judges do not like the inevitable consequences of a guilty verdict because they do not like the compulsory sentence that they must impose, in borderline cases they will conclude that the person is not guilty after all.

Also, we should not make it compulsory that reasons "shall be" given in open court. I would prefer to use the word "may", which would give the courts the traditional discretion for which they have fought for years—and for which they used to fight me when I, as a Minister, tried to take it away. In another place, more attention will be paid to that.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst made most of the arguments for the amendments powerfully, and I need not bore the House by repeating them. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford was in danger of misleading himself when he said that he did not like amendment No. 1 because it says that where a court makes an international football banning order, it "shall state" the reasons for that decision in open court. The amendment was drafted in that way because we wanted it to be consistent with the preceding subsection as we were working on the assumption that my hon. Friend or the Government might not accept our amendment to change "shall" to "may".

Amendment No. 1 would be a sensible addition to the Bill. I profoundly disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford, who suggested that it might be an awful burden to impose on the judiciary or the magistrates. In the past, we were dealing with three cases, and now we may be dealing with, at most, 100 cases per annum coming before the 30,000 or so magistrates in this country.

There is already an obligation in the Bill that the court "shall state" in open court where it is not satisfied. I hardly think that it is a great burden if the court has to make a simple statement when it has imposed an international banning order. Courts must do that in a range of cases, particularly in terms of all offences concerning children and young people, in which they must state their reasons in much greater detail.

[Mr. Maclean]

I strongly urge amendment No. 1 on the House, but if my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford and the Minister continue to resist it, I would not wish to waste the time of the House by dividing on it. However, I hope that it will be considered seriously in another place.

Mrs. Laing: It is comforting that the House is now back to normal and my right hon. Friends the Members for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) are in harmonious agreement. I am not, however, in agreement with them. The Opposition support the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns).

We have before us a very important point of principle on the criminal law. It is important to give sufficient discretion to the courts and to the judiciary. There must be some discretion in the way in which judges or magistrates deal with the law in making a judgment after considering the particular circumstances of a case, but it is up to the House to make the laws for them to interpret. That important distinction is often overlooked when we are considering the extent to which the courts should be bound by the letter of the law.

It is important to get the balance of discretion right in any Act of Parliament, and I feel strongly that the Bill as it stands allows sufficient discretion. The Opposition do not support the amendment.

12 noon

Kate Hoey: The Government feel that the amendment would weaken the Bill. It would be wrong to remove the duty placed on courts to make banning orders when a football-related offence has been committed and they are satisfied that there are reasonable grounds to believe that an order would help to prevent violence. It is very important to remember what happened when the courts had discretion: in December 1997, there were only nine restriction orders in force and it was clear that the courts were not using the discretion available to them. They did not even seem to realise that they could impose the orders.

The Home Secretary had to write to the Magistrates Association and point out that such orders were available, and by the end of June 1998 the number in force went up to about 60; it is now about 150. Those may still be relatively low numbers, but it is important that we say that, when the evidence is there and the courts are satisfied that the person has been convicted of a football-related offence, an order should be imposed.

The courts will still have discretion and I do not think that they will be so terrified of issuing banning orders that they will refuse to convict, as the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) seems to imply. Our magistrates are not like that and we would not expect them to act in that way.

I hope that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) will withdraw the amendment. If there is such strong feeling in the other place, presumably the matter will be discussed there, but I do not think that the amendment is necessary. It would water down the Bill, and the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has clearly put the case why the provision should remain as it stands.

Mr. Forth: The argument is about how far we in the legislature are prepared to trust the judiciary. The Minister has made it clear that she believes that the judiciary can often fail properly to interpret Parliament's views. Interestingly, she said that, if given a bit of a nudge by the Home Secretary of the day, the courts may buck up their ideas and start to realise that penalties are available of which they were previously unaware. That provides a counter-argument, as it suggests that the wording in the Bill may not be necessary.

For the sake of making progress—but reluctantly, I must admit—I will not press the amendment to a vote, but I want to put down a marker and say that we should all think about this matter very seriously.

Mrs. Laing: Does my right hon. Friend agree, as a point of principle, that it is up to Parliament to make laws and that if too much discretion is given to the courts we will end up with judges making laws, which must be wrong?

Mr. Forth: I am not sure about that. I understand exactly the point that my hon. Friend is making, but the principle may lead in directions which, to some people, seem very threatening. Some people may, for example, want to bring back mandatory hanging for sheep stealing—perhaps that is a good example of the point that she was making—although I suspect that, currently, the majority view is that that would be unwise, and that it is always better to leave the discretion at the point at which the knowledge exists: the court, which has had its proceedings and taken full account of the circumstances, mitigating or otherwise.

I therefore remain to be convinced that it is proper for this place, and Parliament generally, to constrain the courts by stating in too much detail what they will or will not do. Hon. Members do not sit in the courts, on the jury or on the magistrates' bench. Now that I think of it, some of my hon. and learned Friends are on the bench, but most of us are not.

I do not wish to delay the House, and I am sure that we shall return to the argument on another occasion. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 12, in page 2, line 4, leave out 'absolutely or'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 24, in clause 6, page 8, line 1, leave out 'absolutely or'.

Mr. Forth: The House will be relieved to know that amendment No. 12 deals with only a narrow—but important—point and need not detain us for too long. I really am quite worried about the vording in this part of clause 1(3). My amendment is therefore a probing one, so that I may clarify and ensure that I—and, therefore, the House—fully understand what my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and the Government understand to be thrus of the provision.

Clause 1(3) states:

"An international football banning order may only be made—

(a) in addition to a sentence imposed in respect of the offence of which the accused is (or was) convicted".

In other words, a banning order may be in addition to a conviction. The clause goes on, however, to provide that an order may be made

"(b) in addition to an order discharging him absolutely or conditionally."

That is what worries me.

I can certainly appreciate the point of imposing a banning order subsequent to a conviction. I can also fully appreciate—although I am less happy about it—imposing a banning order in addition to an order conditionally discharging someone. Although I am no legal expert, I assume that a conditional discharge entails an element of guilt, and that a banning order would therefore be related to an act containing at least an element of guilt.

I part company with the Bill—this is the point of amendment No. 12—where it provides that a banning order may be made when someone has been discharged absolutely, as I really wonder whether that is the proper way to proceed. It seems to me—as a non-legal expert—that, if someone has been absolutely discharged, they have not been convicted and are not guilty of the offence.

In those circumstances, I cannot for the life of me see how one can justify imposing an international banning order—unless we are back to where we started in the debate and are saying, "We haven't been able to convict you in this case, or even to impose a conditional discharge—we are discharging you absolutely. But we don't much like the look of you, or your friends. These NCIS people are telling us that there's something pretty flaky about you, and that your behaviour is peculiar. We therefore have some reason to restrict your freedom. So, under the powers given to us by the Bill, we shall impose an international banning order, although you have been absolutely discharged." That really would be too much.

The provision would—as we have found time and again in the Bill, in provisions curtailing the court's discretion or dealing with people with or without convictions—tilt the balance too much. One of the traditions of our law is the presumption of innocence until proven otherwise, but here we have a provision that would mean that even if a person had been absolutely discharged, the courts would still have the power to restrict his freedom. I hope that I have misunderstood the position, because I find it unacceptable.

Mr. Maclean: I confess to the House that although I support my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) on a range of his amendments, my name should not appear in the list of supporters of this amendment. I did not study this amendment carefully when my right hon. Friend showed it to me and I told the Clerks in the Table Office that I would happily sign all his amendments. I must part company from my right hon. Friend on this amendment.

An absolute discharge is still a conviction. I have never considered absolute discharges a sensible sentence in English law. If someone is convicted, they should face some penalty, however slight. Nevertheless, while the concept of an absolute discharge remains, it is still a conviction. It is not a finding of not guilty or of innocence: it is a finding of guilt where the court, in its infinite stupidity, declines to impose a sentence. The only penalty is that the person still has the stigma of having been convicted by the court. The hope is that someone who has been absolutely discharged will not repeat the offence because he will know that he will face a much heavier sentence next time.

An absolute discharge is a conviction without a sentence, so it would be inconsistent to remove it from the Bill. If we were to do so, people who were convicted and given a £10 fine or a few hours' community service would be caught by the legislation, but someone given an absolute discharge for the same offence would not be caught. At the lower end, some of the penalties for the football-related offences are very slight. A few hours' community service or a £10 fine do not rank much higher than an absolute discharge.

Mr. Forth: I am following my right hon. Friend's argument closely, as ever. Is he saying that if someone has been found technically guilty, but the court recognises that the offence is so minor that it does not require any penalties, such a severe restriction of freedom as an international banning order is still justified?

Mr. Maclean: If there is a fault in the system, it is the existence of the absolute discharge. If my right hon. Friend is successful in the private Members' ballot next year and introduces a measure to abolish the absolute discharge, I shall be happy to support it. However, the absolute discharge currently exists and courts can and will impose it.

By the way, this is not a matter of technical guilt: one is either innocent or guilty. Someone may be blatantly guilty but, for some good reason—personal circumstances or the feeling of the court that the person is highly unlikely to offend again, which is often the case when absolute discharges apply—the court may decide not to impose a financial or any other penalty. If the court wants the conviction to stand, it imposes an absolute discharge.

12.15 pm

Mr. Forth: If the court has been persuaded that an individual is highly unlikely to repeat an offence, how on earth can one justify an international banning order? The point of such an order is to ban someone who is likely to do something unpleasant, but my right hon. Friend has just said that absolute discharges are given to people who the court reckon will not do something unpleasant. We cannot have it both ways.

Mr. Maclean: Different courts and time scales are involved. When a court gives a person an absolute discharge, it does so for one of many reasons. A court examines an offence, convicts the person who it is convinced committed it, and then disposes of that person in one of many ways—by means of a term of imprisonment, a fine, community sentence or custody. Alternatively, it may grant an absolute discharge. One of the dozens of possible reasons for that decision may be that, in the opinion of the court, that person is unlikely to commit another offence.

Weeks, months or years later, that person may come before a different court because there is a possibility that he will be involved in football violence. That new court will have to consider whether the terms of clauses 1 or 6 are satisfied, and whether an international or domestic banning order is appropriate. In such circumstances, the new court may conclude that, as the earlier absolute discharge is still a conviction, a banning order may be appropriate because the person has not behaved himself in the interim.

[Mr. Maclean]

I am conscious of the point that my right hon. Friend makes, which is that an absolute discharge feels like no penalty at all. The only penalty faced by a person given an absolute discharge is the fact that the discharge is still a conviction: that person has been convicted of an offence for which a financial penalty or a period in custody has not been imposed. Nevertheless, an absolute discharge remains a conviction and so has to be included if this part of the Bill is to be logical and consistent.

My right hon. Friend may say that absolute discharges are a load of nonsense and should be reformed. I agree, but we cannot do that in this Bill. While the absolute discharge remains available to courts as a sentence and a penalty, we must include it in this Bill. I sincerely apologise to my right hon. Friend that I did not study the amendment carefully enough when I signed up to it. I studied it in more detail overnight, and I have to oppose it.

Mr. Burns: I do not want to disappoint my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), but I share the views of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean).

This is a narrow point, but my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst rightly said, when moving the amendment, that this part of the Bill applies to international and domestic banning orders with regard to people who have been given absolute discharges. However, my right hon. Friend supported the Public Order Act 1986, which provided that exclusion orders—the old domestic banning orders—covered people who had received absolute discharges. This part of the Bill merely provides that people on whom international banning orders are imposed will be treated in the same way that the 1986 Act treats people in relation to domestic banning orders.

I hope that that goes some way towards reassuring my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst about the consistency of the proposal.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful for that, but I am a bit worried about the approach adopted by my hon. Friend and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean). The implication is that I must always and absolutely support measures that I have previously supported in the brief time since I entered the House in 1983. Nothing could be further from the truth. My hon. Friend has been in the House for a considerable period, and he will know that we can all look back and regret what we have done. All of us change our hearts or minds sometimes. Even as eminent a person as the Prime Minister has been known to change his mind on the odd occasion. If we look back at what the right hon. Gentleman thought in, for example, 1983, we can detect a few differences because he has since taken a more mature judgment. My hon. Friend may know that I thought something was a good idea in my impetuous youth, but now that I am a statesman, I may not necessarily agree with it any more.

Mr. Burns: I fully accept that point. Let me try to reassure my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border made a cogent case, but I shall try to clarify matters further. If a court considers an absolute discharge to be the appropriate disposal, it may be satisfied that the person involved is unlikely to be involved in future disorder. The court would not necessarily issue a banning order in such a case, although, as a result of the amendments that we discussed earlier, the court would have to give a reason for not issuing an order.

For that reason, the amendment moved by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst is not necessary, and it would not enhance the Bill. I urge him to withdraw it in the light of what my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border has said.

Mrs. Laing: Once again, we are in the uncomfortable position of hearing my right hon. Friends the Members for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) disagree. Once again, we must consider how the amendment would work. It may be appropriate that no penalty should be imposed in some cases, even where a person is found guilty. However, the purpose of a banning order is to prevent future offences. It may therefore be appropriate, if an unconditional discharge is imposed, for the court to have the power to impose a banning order to prevent future offences. I agree, therefore, with my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford, West (Mr. Burns), and I hope that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Forth: The amendment offers a clear example of why a non-lawyer intervenes in these matters at his peril. I confess that I am not a lawyer and that I have no legal training or experience—in the lack of which I am in distinguished company. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border is virtually a lawyer by dint of his long and distinguished service at the Home Office, and he knows much more about these matters than I can ever hope to. I wholeheartedly accept what he has said. He placed his trust in my wording of this modest amendment, but I had betrayed his trust because my assumptions were mistaken. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford for correcting me so courteously, and even more grateful to the Minister for not rubbing salt into the wound. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Maclean: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 2, line 13, at end insert—

'(6) Any person placed under a duty to report to a police station as specified in an order under subsection (5) above shall have the right of appeal to the court within fourteen days of the imposition of the order.'.

I have pleasure in moving the amendment, which stands in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and myself. On this occasion, I can perhaps make amends for not managing to talk to my right hon. Friend properly in the past few days to advise him on the latent faults in the previous amendment. I have great pleasure in supporting him on this occasion because this amendment is on exactly the right track. It is consistent with the spirit of civil liberties that he has espoused this morning and, at last, it deals with a right of appeal, about which he is very keen.

The amendment would provide for a right of appeal within 14 days against the imposition of a requirement to report to a police station under a banning order. The House will be aware that the Bill as drafted places a duty on a person who is subject to a reporting requirement under such an order to report to a specified police station in England or Wales. At present, the person concerned can report to any police station without prior agreement or notice, which does not hinder travel.

This little amendment is important. Its aim is to ensure that, should a police station be specified to which it is in practice unreasonable or difficult for the person to report, an appeal would be possible. In the vast generality of cases, there should be no problem. It is highly likely that the police station specified will be near the individual's home or work, or in many cases both as those will not be too far apart.

One of the worrying aspects of football hooliganism is that some of the people convicted have, unfortunately, hailed from Carlisle. They were involved in some ghastly football violence. I said "unfortunately" because Carlisle is next door to my constituency and one likes to think that we do not do that sort of thing up there. However, there was a nasty pocket of football hooligans in Carlisle.

One such hooligan, who was targeted at Euro 96 or the world cup, had a business. In fact, a few of the hooligans were business men. They travelled and had company cars. I cannot remember what business they were in, so I will not say whether it was insurance, banking or whatever, but it was a highly respectable business and they were apparently highly respectable and successful business men, which just goes to show that hooligans are not all the mindless morons about whom my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) talks. They are mindless morons when they get involved in violence, but some of them are not merely lager-swilling louts who sit in a pub all day doing nothing; they are successful business men and hooliganism is a dark and sinister side to their characters.

I have no truck with such people. If they commit an offence, I am happy for them to be locked up for as long as the court thinks appropriate. However, if a reporting restriction is to be imposed, the last thing that I want is for those people to lose their jobs or find it impossible to continue in their work and to become a new burden on the state. If they are travellers or computer salesmen, or if their job is to travel throughout the country, I want to ensure that they can appeal to change the police station to which they report or to bring some flexibility into the system.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): Might not the fear of losing one's job act as an extra deterrent? In a sense, the amendment would make it easier for such people to offend without fear of losing their jobs.

Mr. Maclean: I entirely disagree. That concept is not built into the amendment. Losing one's job is not a penalty in the Bill. If we want to build that into the legislation we should do so, but we should not make loss of employment an accidental facet of a requirement to report to a police station. That requirement is in the Bill so that the police can keep tabs on hooligans. The police know that they are reporting to the station and not going overseas or somewhere else to commit violence. That measure is not built into the Bill as a threat to their employment, which is a different concept. If fear of losing one's job is to be the deterrent, I am happy with that. If we are going to make it part of the sanction that hooligans face a danger of losing their jobs, we should have the guts to build it into the legislation. If they go to prison or custody, they may lose them anyway. Depending on their business, people may be dismissed for certain offences. Companies will not want to employ people with convictions for violence.

12.30 pm

The provision is a simple, sensible, reporting requirement, and I am merely saying that while that is all right for most working people, many are now taken away by their work, such as salesmen or contract workers. It is not only building site workers but computer contract workers and electrical engineers. If their job means that they can be suddenly taken away, they should be able to get the police station to which they have to report changed to make it more convenient and avoid putting their employment at risk.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford will not say that my amendment will weaken the Bill, because it will not dilute it. It is not a wrecking amendment. If he rejects it, I will not press it to a vote and risk damaging the Bill, but it is sensible to give people whose work means that the police station may have to be changed a right of appeal. If he has a better way to build in such flexibility, I would be happy to accept it.

Mr. Burns: I reassure my right hon. Friend that I am not going to say that his amendment seriously weakens the Bill. I hesitate to say this, because as Ministers we all too often said it; and now in opposition, I find that Ministers say it to me so often that it drives me to drink but, sadly, the amendment is defective. There is a right of appeal in respect of the issue of an order. I appreciate that that was not his point but I hope that he is reassured on that.

On my right hon. Friend's narrow point about a right of appeal in respect of the police stations to which people are designated to report, unfortunately his amendment is defective, because the duty to report is within five days of making the order where as his amendment refers to 14 days. That is no big deal, because if we accepted the principle and its urgency we could adjust it.

I wish to reassure my right hon. Friend about the nub of his argument. When an order is being imposed and the arrangements are being made about the police station to which a person has to report, there is an opportunity for that person to discuss them with the courts and the police to ensure that they are convenient and do not impose undue hardship. In making orders, the courts will not be giving additional punishment by imposing the most complicated arrangements to cause problems for people but ensuring that they turn up at the right time and place to surrender their passports so that the law is implemented and effective.

[Mr. Burns]

Mr. Maclean: Does my hon. Friend accept that the police and the person involved can discuss it until they are blue in the face and pick the best police station, but that that will not help if he is sent by his work to the north of Scotland for two weeks or told that his job will take him around the country? The work force are more mobile than ever before. How does the Bill tackle that?

Mr. Burns: I appreciate that. The individual can ask for further consideration to be given to genuinely changing circumstances. However, my right hon. Friend will also have come across individuals who seek to avoid their responsibilities. The Child Support Agency is an example of some people having become highly skilled at abusing the law and the requirements imposed on them to the nth degree. If one is not careful, under this measure, individuals would abuse that position and would try to bring the law into disrepute and make it less effective than Parliament wants it to be. On those grounds, I ask my right hon. Friend to reconsider the matter and to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Forth: I am now rather confused. Normally, our little debates help to clarify matters—as did the previous debate—but I am somewhat confused by the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). To say—as has been said—that we should not worry too much about the measure, as it is not intended to be penal, and that we do not intend to make it difficult or inconvenient for the individual, but rather to make it as easy as possible, strikes me as slightly bizarre in the context of our debate.

All morning, we have been told about individuals who have committed the most ghastly and heinous acts and are a threat to society. Now, we are told that we are trying to find the most convenient outcome for such people. That strikes me as somewhat odd. Perhaps it is typical of the court leniency that has been mentioned during the debate. However, that matter is for another day. The more I consider it, the more I am tempted by the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean): that were I—God forbid—ever to come high enough in the ballot for private Members' Bills, that subject might merit my attention.

Be that as it may, I am not clear about the object of the exercise. I guess that it is to prevent certain persons from going to football grounds—that is the most obvious object—but I am distressed to hear that there is no intention to subject them to any penal element. I am even more confused by my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford saying, in effect, "Don't worry, because the individual will be able to discuss the matter and make representations about it during the court proceedings". Of course, he will—or, at least, I hope so—because that is what judicial proceedings are all about. If the matter were so simple, we should never need the right of appeal in any case.

According to what my hon. Friend said, we need only tell the accused individual that, during the court proceedings, he and his legal representative would be able to make all the points they wanted; they could ask the court to take this or that into consideration and should trust the court because it would all turn out all right.

Mr. Burns: I obviously made my point inadequately and it caused confusion. What is important is that a police station is designated to which an individual has to report. That individual will be able to ask the court to take certain factors into consideration in determining a police station at which attendance would not cause an undue penalty. On the other side of the coin, if a court convicts and sentences someone to a prison sentence, I am sure that my right hon. Friend would not expect the court to start discussing with the prisoner at which prison it would be convenient for him to serve his sentence.

Mr. Forth: I thought that was not part of the penalty. We cannot have it both ways. If it is to be part of the penalty, I should build a large police station in Stornoway and insist that everyone reported there. That would have the required effect. However, that, apparently, is not what we are saying. We are saying, "Don't worry. You will be asked to report to a police station, but it will be very convenient and probably warm; you might even get a cup of tea when you go there." The way things are going, I should not even be surprised by that. It must be one thing or the other—either it is part of the penalty or it is not. If it is not part of the penalty, that is a different matter.

If the idea is simply to make sure that individuals are where we want them to be at a particular time, to prevent them from going anywhere near a football match—although why anyone would want to go near a football match is quite beyond my comprehension, but apparently there are those who do—we are in different territory altogether.

Mr. Burns: I hesitate to intervene as I do not want to delay the debate and talk out my Bill. However, I hope that my right hon. Friend realises that the measure refers to international football banning orders. If a court imposed such an order, an individual would have to turn up at a police station not less than five days before a match to hand in his passport, to prevent him from travelling overseas where he could cause problems at the football match or in the surrounding area. The provision merely states that the courts have to sort out a police station for the person to go to at a certain time. Of course the courts will try to find a police station that is convenient to the individual, so that it gives no further encouragement to the individual not to comply with the banning order.

Mr. Forth: It is getting worse and worse—we have not got to the cup of tea yet, but I sense that it is imminent.

However, we need not fall out over this matter. I was persuaded by the arguments of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border, whose knowledge of police stations is far greater than mine as a result of his having been in far more of them than I have, and I defer to him in this case. The more I hear from my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford the more worried I become, however, because it all seems very soft and easy going; but I shall not prolong my comments on amendment No. 2 because I am anxious to reach the amendment dealing with the surrender of passports, which will be another debate altogether. I shall be guided on this occasion, as on so many others, by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border, but I am not entirely convinced.

Mr. Maclean: I, too, am not convinced by the arguments of my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). I am not convinced, although I am willing to be corrected by the Minister or anyone else, that handing in the passport is the sole purpose of specifying a police station. The court can impose any conditions it thinks fit, and I was under the impression that specifying the police station to which the person must report might involve more than a single visit to hand in a passport: for example, there could be a requirement that the person should report there regularly.

However, I see from head movements in the Chamber that I am wrong and my hon. Friend is right, but even if he is right and the purpose of specifying the police station is solely to do with the handing in of the passport, it makes sense to introduce a degree of flexibility to deal with a small number of cases. For example, say it is decided for a person who lives and works in Penrith that Penrith will be the reporting station where he must hand in his passport five days before a football match. Say that person then discovers that he is being sent to work on a contract in the Devon and Cornwall police area. Surely it should be fairly simple to specify a police station in Devon or Cornwall.

Such cases may constitute only a tiny minority, but I am not entirely convinced that there are powerful arguments against their being provided for. I am not in the business of diluting the Bill or making life inconvenient for the police; nor am I in the business of allowing people a right of appeal to change the police station where they must hand in their passport every other day and around every single police station in the country. I accept that there would be clever fly-boys who would try to make a mockery of the law by taking advantage of such flexibility.

However, as I said, we would be dealing with only a small number of people, all of whom would be on the NCIS computer and that of their local police force. With the police national network up and running and all the digital communications that were installed under the previous Government, on which the current Government are no doubt building, it should be quite possible for the police services of the UK, which are all now in touch with each other, simply to effect a change—for example, that the reporting station for an individual has been moved from Penrith to Penzance.

Nevertheless, today is not the day when I shall try to persuade my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford to deal with that point. I suspect that, when the Bill goes to the other place, their lordships in their infinite wisdom will conclude that the matter deserves their attention. At that time, my hon. Friend may have to table an amendment—one that is more correctly drafted than my own—to deal with this small but important point. It is the small but important improvements that give us the best criminal justice legislation in the world, which is why we should never be afraid to deal with the small issues as well as the mega-issues. However, since I do not intend to pursue the matter today, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2

Relevant offences

12.45 pm

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 3, in page 3, leave out lines 20 to 25.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 4, in page 3, leave out lines 27 to 29.

Mr. Forth: These amendments have two quite different aspects that are important in their own right. One of them refers, coincidentally, to a comment made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), who reminded the House that the more difficult it is to define an offence, the more difficult it is to obtain a conviction. We are well into that territory here.

In his enthusiasm to make this Bill as all-embracing as possible and to ensure that individuals can be caught in several different ways, my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has excelled himself. This clause contains a definition of offences, which includes

"any attempt, conspiracy or incitement to commit that offence" and references to

"aiding and abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of that offence."

I have scant knowledge of the law, but I believe that it is well known that it is difficult to obtain a conviction for the offence of conspiracy—and rightly so. That is because one is involved in all sorts of areas that are rarely subject to the normal availability of evidence and so on. Cases are based much more on hearsay evidence, subjective judgment and the like.

The Bill contains an even less easy definition, which is

"any attempt, conspiracy or incitement"

on the one hand, and

"aiding and abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of that offence"

on the other. I am worried that, if that definition remains in the Bill, it may encourage the misuse of resources by the shady NCIS organisation, which has untrammelled surveillance and other powers about which I am becoming increasingly alarmed. I am sure that, if I were summoned to attend upon NCIS, I might never emerge from the building.

I am concerned that if those words remain in the Bill, that will encourage the authorities—I am not keen on that word, but at least it is more neutral and less pejorative—to spend an enormous amount of time and energy pursuing those offences that are so poorly defined. One can imagine setting out to prove in a court of law that someone had attempted to conspire or incited to commit one of the related offences or, worse, aided and abetted, counselled or procured the commission of an offence.

What does "counselling" the commission of an offence mean? I do not know whether it is a term of art in the law or whether it is a new provision dreamed up by someone. I think I understand "conspiracy" and "incitement"—if pushed, I might even understand "aiding and abetting", but I am not sure whether I will ever understand the legal definition or implication of "counselling" the commission of an offence in the context of the individuals about whom we are talking.

[Mr. Forth]

All morning, we have heard references to the kinds of odious individuals who are involved in football offences, including disorder. They are mean-minded and violent individuals, and it is a complete mystery to me how counselling the commission of an offence will apply to them.

I might not usually be too worried about that, but we are legislating. If the House is to allow itself to be put in the position of endorsing such wording, the Bill's sponsor and the Minister must be prepared to set out—to satisfy me, if no one else—how they envisage a conviction could be obtained in a court of law for counselling the commission of an offence.

As I have said, I have doubts about "aiding and abetting" and "procuring", to say nothing of "conspiracy" or "incitement". My worry is not only that the provision might encourage the authorities to occupy much of their time and effort in pursuing prosecutions of those offences, but, on the other side of the coin, that the wording could, at worst, draw into the net many individuals who are barely, if at all, involved in the commission of those offences.

It is obvious that most of the right hon. and hon. Members who have participated in these debates have a clear idea of the people with whom they want the Bill to deal: those who commit, or allegedly commit, offences or cause disorder at football matches. When one start to talk about conspiracy, incitement and counselling, we potentially draw in a much wider group of people who have a much more tenuous connection with the offences, and subject them to all the processes that we have been discussing.

I shall give an example. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border is very fond of car parks, and he has been telling us with pride how the shady people of NCIS, with all their intrusive surveillance mechanisms, hang around in car parks and listen to people's conversations. They then finger their collars, whisk them off to a luxurious cell, give them a cup of tea and tell them that they have been nicked.

That would be bad enough, but what worries me about the wording that my amendment seeks to remove is that somebody who may be having an innocent conversation with one of the aforesaid people might readily be drawn into that process. The NCIS man will be waving a copy of this legislation, if it ever becomes an Act, and will say, "Oi mate. I'm having you for counselling the commission of an offence. I saw you in the act of counselling. You were standing in the car park talking to an odious individual, and our high-powered, sensitive devices that intrude on individuals' privacy told me that the conversation that you thought you were conducting privately involved counselling the commission of an offence."

I am slightly overstating the matter to emphasise my point, but I hope that I shall be reassured that what I have described will not happen. That, however, is my reading of the Bill. I suspect that in their enthusiasm for the Bill, its promoter and the Minister have allowed it to be drawn so widely that it has the potential to draw into the process a large number of people. That increases the risk of miscarriages of justice and of court proceedings going wrong. It further strengthens the arguments about rights of appeal that have, rightly, been put forward during the proceedings. I hope that we shall take the issue very seriously and examine it closely.

The Bill's promoter may want to argue that the provision is absolutely essential to the Bill's viability. The Minister may tell me that the provision about conspiracy, incitement, aiding and abetting and, in particular, counselling, is absolutely essential if the Bill is to have the intended effect. I remain sceptical. I should have thought that the panoply of existing law and the huge, shadowy organisation that moves mysteriously in society, trying to identify people of whom it disapproves and to drag them to court, would be quite sufficient, but it seems that we are going even further.

We ought to know much more about that provision. Let me make it clear that I want to delete it. The burden of proof is on those who want to leave those words in the Bill, and it is not unreasonable for me to expect them, particularly my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford, to explain clearly how they believe those words add to the Bill. That is my first concern.

Amendment No. 4 deals with something equally worrying. Clause 2(2)(a) reads:

"For the purposes of paragraphs . . . above—

(a) a person may be regarded as having been on a journey to or from a designated football match whether or not he attended or intended to attend the match".

I think that I understand the purpose of that provision but it gives rise to misgivings on my part. It strikes me that certainties will exist if somebody is in attendance at a football match—presumably with CCTVs everywhere in our lives, he will be spotted. The Minister proudly said earlier that actions captured on video would be beyond doubt. It may be that if an individual attends a match and misbehaves in the way that is defined in the Bill, he can be dealt with legitimately. However, the Bill goes beyond that, obviously deliberately.

I am asking my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford and the Minister whether they are absolutely satisfied that the provisions of this part of the Bill are as they should be and that there is no possibility of serious miscarriages of justice. The subsection is drawn extremely widely:

"a person may be regarded as having been on a journey to or from a designated football match whether or not he attended or intended to attend the match".

That is throwing the net very wide.

This part of the Bill worries me the more I think about it. We are no longer focusing on the people with tattoos who behave outrageously, carrying and using offensive weapons and so on; we are talking about another group. Earlier, we were talking about those who counsel others to do something. It is a bizarre thought that the sort of people who commit the offences with which we are concerned will be subject to counselling. As I have said, I want to hear more about that.

We have moved on to talk about a different and much larger group of people who have not been on the journey to the match and who may or may not have attended it. There is scope within the Bill, if lines 27 to 29 remain in it, to draw into the process people who are entirely innocent, or who are involved only peripherally, or who are drawn in inadvertently. For example, they may have been travelling with the alleged offenders and, therefore, may be drawn in. There is the potential greatly to complicate the processes that would follow the identification of the alleged offenders.

I need many reassurances about this part of the Bill, which takes the matter much further than it need do or should do. The wording is dangerous and rather loose. I hope that having reflected on it, my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford and, perhaps, the Minister will say, "This is not necessary to the core purposes of the Bill. There are worries here and there are possibilities of things going badly wrong. Therefore, we are prepared to go along with the amendment and take out these parts of the Bill."

Mr. Maclean: Once again, my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth), with his customary rhetoric and lucidity, has clearly set out our concerns, as reflected in the amendment. That being so, I can be relatively brief.

I could not hope to match my right hon. Friend's eloquence but I share his concerns, which are reflected in amendment No. 3. Clause 2(2) contains the words:

"Any reference to an offence in paragraphs (a) to (q) above includes . . . a reference to any attempt, conspiracy or incitement to commit that offence".

It is a long time since I studied law, but as I have said to the House on numerous occasions, I got out before I was totally corrupted. I am not a qualified lawyer, although I took a law degree in Scotland about 30 years ago. I cannot remember whether a reference to an "attempt, conspiracy or incitement to commit that offence"

means that the person has been convicted for an attempted offence, an attempted conspiracy or whatever.

1 pm

The point that I am inadequately trying to make is, does the reference to "attempt" or "conspiracy" mean that it is enough for the police to be of the opinion that, whereas others have been charged with an offence of affray or violence or disorder, an individual has been involved in it, attempted to commit it, was conspiring to commit it or incited others to do it but has not been convicted of attempt or conspiracy or incitement? I presume that the references are to people convicted of attempt or conspiracy or incitement.

Mr. Burns indicated assent.

Mr. Maclean: Nevertheless, I am concerned that the wording brings a very indistinct category of individuals within the scope of the Bill. The category is not as clear cut as that of those who have been convicted of an offence, and I am not certain that it would be possible or feasible to prosecute an individual on such grounds. Specifically, such a prosecution might be over-dependent on police intelligence, which would be compromised as a result.

Therefore, although the provision may seem to my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) to be a good little catch-all—without it, one may get all those convicted of an offence, but miss someone who has been convicted of an attempt to commit the offence or of conspiracy; and, naturally, my hon. Friend wants to catch those people—he may, by inserting that catch-all, produce an unenforceable piece of legislation.

I do not feel too strongly about amendment No. 3, but the subject is worth exploring. I shall listen if my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford or the Minister say that the safeguard is essential and that many nasty hooligans have been convicted of attempt or conspiracy. I share the law's view that conspiracy and attempted violence are as important as actual violence. In fact, those behind the scenes who are conspiring to commit violence, or aiding and abetting or fomenting it, are often the most evil, and my new clauses 1 and 2 were designed to get at them. I am happy for them to be caught, if that is sensible; I simply want clarification that the provision does not go a stage too far, inserting an unenforceable passage or weakening a sensible and tough provision.

Amendment No. 4 relates to those who are regarded as being on a journey to or from a football match even if they did not attend the match or did not intend to attend the match. It is the second part of that which worries me. Those who did not intend to attend a football match can be deemed to be on the journey to it even when they were not. That could catch innocent people.

The law is obviously trying to catch those who buy tickets to a football match, intending to go to it and to have a punch-up, and those who intend to go into the vicinity of a match—although not attend it—and to have a punch-up nearby. Those people are fair game. I am happy for those football hooligans who have no intention of attending a football match, but intend to be outside the ground or in the pub nearby committing their violence, to be caught. However, I am worried that—as my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst eloquently said—the provision could sweep in people who are not football hooligans, but are travelling to the same place at the same time on the same day, or who are in the company of some of those nasty people, but have been swept up in the violence.

My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford may say that if people travel in a minibus alongside violent hooligans, to get a free ride to the town where the football match is taking place, it serves the blighters right if they get swept up. I do not take that view. Sometimes, trains are hired for special outings or events, and the wives or families of those attending the event take advantage of the availability of the hired coach, bus or train to shop or do other activities while others attend the football match. There may be examples of people who are seen to be travelling with football hooligans and nasty scum being innocently swept into the provisions. I hope that my hon. Friend or the Minister can reassure me that that will not be the case.

The amendments are probing, as there are doubts in my mind. I would be happy if my hon. Friend said that had I understood the Bill and the other legislation correctly, I would not have these doubts. However, I would seek an assurance before I am satisfied. I have no intention of weakening the Bill, but I do not wish it to be diminished or discredited by catching a few genuinely innocent people.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst mentioned counselling. I believe that we are referring to the old-fashioned counselling in the criminal law sense, meaning advising someone to commit an offence. It is not the new-fangled, touchy-feely, "I feel your pain" or "Give me a cuddle" counselling with which the country is now awash. If legislation were proposed to deal with the million new counsellors who give everyone a cuddle every time it rains, I would support it if it meant that they were banned for life and sent to prison. That is the sort of counselling we need to outlaw.

[Mr. Maclean]

Mr. Forth: I accept what my right hon. Friend says, but does he seriously imagine that the kind of people whom we are told repeatedly commit these offences will be the subject of what he has defined as counselling? I have a mental picture of someone with a shaven head, tattoos and other accoutrements who is about to commit ghastly crimes in the name of being a football supporter. Who will counsel—by whatever definition—that person to do something illegal?

Mr. Maclean: My right hon. Friend has not seen some of the new members of the probation service. That will get me a few letters. My right hon. Friend has misled himself—he has counselled himself unwisely. We are talking not about sitting down and giving these scumbags a cuddle, but about the technical, legal sense of counselling, where someone aids, abets or advises someone to commit an offence. If the other form of counselling were one of the penalties appropriate to these people, I would be worried that the Government had gone really soft on crime.

Kate Hoey: This part of the Bill does not create new offences—we must make that clear. Whether they have been confused with the new form of "counselling" or not, these criminal offences exist. The Bill merely proposes to enable the court to make a banning order if someone is convicted of one those offences.

The amendments would significantly reduce the ability for action to be taken against those who use football as an excuse for their behaviour. Adding to the list of football-related offences the offences of conspiracy and incitement would provide the courts with the ability to take banning order action against those convicted of such offences.

Everyone who knows anything about conspiracy will accept that it is difficult to obtain convictions for offences of that nature. The people most likely to be involved in committing those offences at football matches are those who plan and organise the activities of others. They tend to avoid being the subject of banning orders, for the simple reason that they themselves do not commit the acts of violence or disorder. That is why we can discuss "unconvicted football hooligans". These people will not be caught committing violence or disorder, but they are the motivators, instigators and planners who escape the powers at present available to the courts under existing legislation. The Bill is intended to bring those people within the ambit of the law.

Our original document went out to wide consultation and we were especially interested in the response on this matter. Many respondents who understood what went on behind football violence supported our proposals. The Football Supporters Association, which, along with the National Federation of Football Supporters Clubs, tried to show people that a minority were responsible for the violence, felt that it was important to add conspiracy. We have listened and we think that the provision is necessary.

The Bill is designed to tackle the problem of those who use the environment around football matches to cause trouble and stir up violence. I appreciate that the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) does not go to football matches, but if he did he would know that many people go without tickets, with no intention of going into the ground; they simply take the build-up of people and the organisation that goes into it as an opportunity to hide behind the vast majority of law-abiding supporters.

Having no intention to attend the match does not, sadly, mean having no intention to cause or be involved in acts of hooliganism around the ground, or on the way to or from the match. By showing that the person's journey was principally in connection with a football match, the provisions will extend the banning order process to those who commit offences outside the ground without any intention of entering it.

I understand why the right hon. Gentleman felt that he should explore the amendments, and in particular amendment No. 4, but I believe that they would weaken the Bill. The genuine, decent supporters prefer the Bill as it stands, so I hope that he will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful to the Minister for that explanation. She said that the offences are not necessarily new, and that, allied with the very helpful explanation from my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean), gives me some reassurance that we are on fairly familiar and secure territory in terms of the definition of offences. I can now see, as a non-attender of football matches, that there may be a category of people who are not readily identifiable, but bear a large part of the responsibility for the offences.

I am still not entirely satisfied that there is no danger that a wider group of innocent people might be drawn into the process by the very wide wording in the Bill, but on this occasion I am prepared to give my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and the Minister the benefit of the doubt. They appear to be sure that the provisions are essential and would not give rise to the risks that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border and I outlined.

I still have my doubts, but I am sufficiently reassured not to press the point. I therefore beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

CONDITIONS AND DUTY TO REPORT

Mr. Forth: I beg to move amendment No. 16, in page 4, leave out lines 19 to 25.

This is the amendment that I have been waiting for, although I will try not to make a meal of it. I well remember an impassioned speech on Second Reading by my hon. Friend the Member for Lichfield (Mr. Fabricant), who expressed grave reservations about this aspect of the Bill. I am only sorry that he is not with us today. I would have liked to hear the speech again, it was so good. I will try to make up for his absence by my own modest contribution.

I share my hon. Friend's reservations about the surrendering of passports. I know that we can get very misty-eyed about passports. There are those who believe that the British passport—in its excellent old form, as opposed to the dreadful little maroon thing that we are all now stuck with—goes back a long way into our history, but I do not think that it does. The Minister may correct me, but I think that the British passport in its magnificent previous form dated back only to about the 1920s. Be that as it may, the passport was and remains a powerful symbol of a number of different things.

1.15 pm

A passport is not merely something that we possess and are able to show—many authorities, of course, require it to be shown for various purposes—but is an expression of our sense of national pride and identity, which are very important to us. In the context of the Bill and the amendment, however, a passport is the symbol and statement of one's inalienable—at least I thought that it was inalienable—right to travel freely and untrammelled.

Part of our consideration of the Bill should include the extent to which it is necessary to hold and produce a British passport to travel across the European Union. I should like to hear the comments of my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) and of the Minister on whether the compulsory surrender of one's passport would prevent one from travelling across the European Union. Although, in a sense, the point deals with an argument that is the reverse of the one that I want to make, it is relevant to our consideration.

I have heard it argued that one can and should be able to—I have done it myself on one or two occasions—travel throughout the European Union without having to show a passport, and that any other method of identity should be adequate. Are my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford and Ministers sure that, if someone's passport were to be confiscated, that person would be prevented from travelling? It is one important aspect of the argument, although, strictly, not germane to the amendment.

I am much more worried—this is why I tabled amendment No. 16—that the authorities will be able to march in and compulsorily take away one's passport. As I said, I am no great fan of the European convention on human rights, but I know that there are those—not least Liberty—who argue that temporary removal of one's passport may well be a contravention of article 1 of the convention's first protocol. Allowing the authorities to take someone's passport may well be a worry for those who are fans of the convention.

As interestingly, Liberty is also arguing that to require surrender of a passport might conflict directly with our international obligations to guarantee freedom of movement under article 12 of the international covenant on civil and political rights. I never thought that I would hear myself arguing that, as I am not a great fan of the covenant. I always regard that type of thing as international verbiage. I could use a much ruder word, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but you probably would not allow me, and the House will get the sense of what I mean. Nevertheless, hon. Members will need reassurances that, in so far as we think that those guarantees are important, the Bill will not contravene them.

I am really interested in a much more fundamental and British point. How content are we that our authorities should be in the business of taking away our passport and saying that what we always thought was one of our fundamental rights—the freedom of travel—is to be removed? Around the world, people take the view that their right to leave their country is one of their most important freedoms.

I am sure that, internationally, over many decades, if not centuries, we have rather pompously taken that view, and said to people, "We are very proud that our citizens are free to escape from the authorities if they think that they are being unreasonable." Almost the entire United States is populated by the successors of those who sought freedom and escaped not only from countries on the continent—many of whom came to the United Kingdom for their freedom—but from the United Kingdom. Therefore, let us not underestimate the importance of the issue.

Mr. Peter Brooke (Cities of London and Westminster): I am surprised that my right hon. Friend has not alluded to the remarkable statistic that only 12 per cent. of Americans carry passports—which demonstrates that, having got there, they have no desire to return.

Mr. Forth: Indeed. As someone who has recently returned from the United States—voluntarily, I should add—I appreciate exactly what my right hon. Friend is saying. Nevertheless, the fact remains—it is part of the case that I am trying to make—that, for a very long time, we have argued that the ability to leave the country freely and untrammelled is a very important element of individual and political freedoms and of civil liberties. The proposal in this case is that, as part of a penalty and as a guarantee that people will not travel abroad possibly to do things of which we disapprove, we will make them surrender their passports. That is a serious step to take.

The point was made on Second Reading that there is a precedent for such a move. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) also made the argument, saying, "Don't worry, we've done it before, so it's all right now." I am not sure that it is all right now. The fact that, in a moment of weakness, the Government of whom I was apparently a member allowed the removal of passports does not mean that I can rest easy that we are to do it again. The fact that we have mistakenly done something before does not mean that we should compound the mistake by doing it again.

I am not convinced that as serious a measure is the right step in the context of this Bill. It may be justifiable for offences such as treason or murder, although I would like to hear the arguments and I would not accept them readily. I do not know whether the offences we are contemplating, however awful they appear, justify the power to remove passports. We should not forget that the Bill is called the Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, and yet we are talking about taking people's passports away. What is the world coming to? Have we lost all reason? Are we out of our minds? Are we suggesting that offences related to football should be dealt with through the compulsory removal of people's passports, which will mean the removal of one of our most sacred rights?

I sense that the Minister will tell me that I should not worry because we can already remove people's passports for many other reasons. I am not convinced by that argument. It seems to me that people are not aware that their passports could be removed. It is time that they were. Perhaps this debate will assist in the process and I can expect the streets to be filled tomorrow with angry people saying, "We didn't realise that this country had come to this." Perhaps this is the point at which we should start to reverse the process and say, "This is something up with which we will not put." We should say that we do not believe that the authorities are justified in taking passports away that easily and readily and denying people their freedom to travel and to leave the country, especially if we believe that the authorities are acting unreasonably.

[Mr. Forth]

I have been surprised, just in our little debate this morning, by the extent to which the Bill has pushed out the frontiers of the powers of the authorities to encroach yet further on the freedom of individuals. I know that my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border will tell me that we have already done it, so we can do it again. That argument is wearing increasingly thin with me and, I suspect, with others.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have listened carefully to the right hon. Gentleman and, on occasions, he repeats his case. He makes his points effectively, but it is against the rules of the House to make the case twice in the same go.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The argument has obviously lost its effectiveness, so I had better not pursue it any further. I want to hear a positive and comprehensive case made for these provisions, because if it is not, we should remove them.

Mr. Burns: As my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) said, this is a serious matter. His amendment would mean that the courts would not have the power to impose passport surrender as a condition of an international banning order. That goes to the heart of the purpose of this part of the Bill.

I urge my right hon. Friend to think again. The amendment would destroy the Bill's purpose of tightening up international banning orders. My right hon. Friend is right to say that taking away people's right to travel abroad is a serious step, but we must see it in context. The people involved will have been convicted of serious crimes. On the authority of a court, banning orders are imposed to prevent people from travelling abroad, during limited periods, when there is reason to believe that they might repeat the trouble overseas that brought about their conviction in the first place.

Current practice shows that there is no point in imposing a banning order if there is no effective way to enforce it. The only effective enforcement of international banning orders is the withdrawal of passports, albeit for a brief period. Although such orders may be imposed for a number of years, people are not prevented from going abroad on holiday or in pursuit of their personal business. The effect is simply that they are not allowed to have their passports for five days before a match is played abroad.

Mr. Forth: Does my hon. Friend agree that the requirement to report to a police station is equally effective in preventing someone from travelling? In any case, may not a person want to travel abroad legitimately, for urgent family or even business reasons that are quite separate from football?

Mr. Burns: On the first point, in theory my right hon. Friend may have a case. However, current practice does not work, as people do not turn up at police stations when football matches take place. That is why we must tighten the law.

On my right hon. Friend's second point—that genuine family or business reasons may exist that require travel abroad—my response is to say, "Tough." The decision to issue a person with an international banning order preventing him from going to a football match is not taken lightly, but follows a conviction in a court.

It is odd that my right hon. Friend should argue, in effect, that the system should fit in with an individual's personal arrangements. Taking away a passport is a punishment as well as a way of preventing a repetition abroad of acts of violence. We should not roll over like little dogs wanting their tummies tickled to fit in with the arrangements of a person who has committed an offence but who then wants the state to bend over backwards to make it easier for him to travel abroad, even if the purpose is not to attend a football match.

My right hon. Friend is, like me, a member of the party of law and order. I know that he has a genuine desire to protect the vast majority of people who are innocent. He has talked skilfully and reasonably about civil liberties, but I have heard nothing about the civil liberties of the vast majority of innocent people who go to football matches for an afternoon or evening of entertainment but who inadvertently get caught up in the behaviour of the mindless minority that causes so much misery.

We must stiffen our resolve and take the actions that all responsible people, in football and the law, are urging us to take. They want us to give the authorities more powers to prevent the activities of the violent minority.

Finally, I want to reassure my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst about the legality of the proposals within European human rights legislation—a matter that came up on Second Reading. Like the Minister, I have sought advice from the Home Office, and can assure my right hon. Friend that the Bill is entirely compatible with European obligations and human rights considerations. I hope that he will be able to withdraw his amendment.

1.30 pm

Mr. Brooke: I have one question to put to the Minister, which my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) omitted to ask. I share my right hon. Friend's pride in holding a British passport. My first passport said that Ernest Bevin, His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, "requests and requires" in the name of His Majesty, et cetera, and I was able to go bravely abroad holding that passport. I am out of date on the statistics relating to the issuing of passports but one felt greater pride having acquired one's passport from Peterborough, from which it took 40 days to arrive, than one did if it had come from Belfast, where the process took only four days.

My question to the Minister is important. I do not wish to intrude on the Minister's private grief, but inner London Members have been communicating over the past six months with the Home Office about the passports of constituents that the Home Office has lost. Some 80 per cent. of the passports of Thais—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The right hon. Gentleman is perhaps discussing business that might be more appropriately raised on another occasion. The loss of passports and difficulties with the Passport Agency are not entirely relevant to the amendment.

Mr. Brooke: I hesitate to allow even a scintilla of controversy to enter into my relationship with you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as you have always been extremely kind to me. However, the amendment seeks to remove the provision that the passport

"should be returned . . . as soon as reasonably practicable after the match has taken place."

My right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst did not ask the Minister for a guarantee that the Home Office—whether through the police or in its own right—will in fact be able to find a passport when its holder comes to ask for its return, and that is the assurance that I seek.

Kate Hoey: I shall respond first to the point made by the right hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Brooke). Clearly we will not be dealing with huge numbers of passports. The right hon. Gentleman may know that there have been only 150 international banning orders over the past two years. A small number of people will have to leave their passports at a police station, and I am confident that the police will not get themselves into the recent difficulties experienced by the Passport Agency.

I strongly oppose the amendment, as must anyone who has sat through the Second Reading and the Committee debates. It relates to the most crucial part of the Bill. The constituents of the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) would be the first to tell him that if a court has ordered that someone should be prevented from travelling abroad, that person should be stopped from going. We have not been able to prevent people from travelling, and some of the disgraceful incidents that have occurred in Europe involved people who had been served with international restriction orders.

Prevention has not been possible because of the way in which the orders have operated. The Bill will toughen up the law so that people will have to attend a named police station and hand in their passport five days before a match. If they do not do so, the police will know that they will travel, and something can be done to prevent it. That is the point of the Bill.

Mr. Forth: Can the Minister advise me whether it is possible for someone to travel to other European Union countries without a passport? I am fairly certain that it is possible to move freely in and out of the United Kingdom and among the other countries that are parties to the Schengen agreement without a passport, but with some other satisfactory means of identification. If that were so, it would seriously undermine the effectiveness of the measure that the Minister described.

Kate Hoey: The right hon. Gentleman should be absolutely clear that such people would not be able to get back into the country without a passport. Therefore, they would be choosing to spend the rest of their lives in another country. I understand what he implies, but if we want the law to be upheld, it is important that we find ways to prevent people, as far as is possible, from getting around the law. If this measure is not enacted as drafted, they will be able to do so.

The aim of the measure is not to prevent the individual going about his or her lawful business. That is why the passport must be returned as quickly as possible. Sometimes, it may be returned when the person turns up at the police station to meet the reporting requirement. The location and timing of the match may mean that the person could get the passport back quickly and not have to wait even until the end of the match. We do not envisage that the passport will be retained for any longer than is necessary. That guidance will obviously be issued to police forces.

On the civil liberties aspect, article 12 of the international covenant on civil and political rights protects freedom of movement and the right to leave one's country, as the right hon. Member for Bromley and Chislehurst said. However, that article also allows Governments to restrict the right in the interests of public order and a wide range of other things. Clearly, this Bill and measure relate to that provision. The Government are satisfied that the provisions of the Bill comply with all our obligations under the covenant. I therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Forth: I am grateful, as ever, to the Minister. Her last point simply reinforces the view that most international agreements are not worth the paper they are written on. If we can comply with some high-sounding, high-falutin', verbose international piece of nonsense and still remove people's passports, it does not say much for the protocol, covenant, convention—call it what you will.

I am not sure that it is that impossible to get back into this country without a passport. I am pretty sure that I have done it myself. I think that if one pitches up at immigration control and can satisfy the officers that one is a bona fide Brit, they will tend to let one in—and so they damn well should, as opposed to some of the other people who are allowed into the country. I do not think that what the Minister said was true, but she may want to take advice on it. It is a matter for another occasion.

This is not either the occasion or the opportunity to take this matter as far as it should be taken. It is prime territory for the other place while it is still fully functioning, fit and feisty. I hope that when Members of the other place consider this Bill, and I am sure that it will shortly proceed there, they will study the provision carefully and satisfy themselves that they would want it to remain in that form in the Bill. I can see some of the strength of what the Minister has said, but I am not totally convinced.

This is not a matter on which I should properly divide the House at this stage. It is sufficient to express my reservations, to allow the provision to remain in the Bill for the time being, but to flag up the fact that it is disproportionate to the aims of the Bill and, therefore, should be seriously considered. On the basis of this short debate, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 4

DURATION AND TERMINATION OF ORDERS

Mr. Maclean: I beg to move amendment No. 17, in page 6, line 6, leave out 'ten' and insert 'fifteen'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 18, in page 6, line 7, leave out 'five' and insert 'seven'.

No. 19, in page 6, line 11, leave out 'six' and insert 'nine'.

No. 20, in page 6, line 12, leave out 'three' and insert 'five'.

No. 21, in page 6, line 16, leave out 'two–thirds' and insert 'one–third'.

No. 25, in clause 8, page 9, line 11, leave out 'one year' and insert 'six months'.

No. 26, in page 9, line 11, leave out 'three' and insert 'five'.

No. 27, in page 9, line 12, at end insert—

'(1A) In section 33 of the 1986 Act (application to terminate order) for subsection (1) substitute—

"(1) A person in relation to whom a domestic football banning order has had effect for at least one–third of the period determined under section 32(1) above may apply to the court which made the order to terminate it.".'.

No. 28, in page 9, line 17, leave out 'six months' and insert 'three months'.

No. 29, in page 9, line 18, leave out 'level 5' and insert 'level 4'.

Mr. Maclean: I shall be brief as we shall reach Third Reading shortly. I want to test the water with these amendments, which seek to increase the minimum and maximum periods for which banning orders can be imposed while allowing appeals for termination of orders to be made earlier. I am giving my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) a chance to toughen the Bill drastically while increasing the court's discretion in using the penalties.

The amendments affect clauses 4 and 8. The Bill provides a maximum period of 10 years for a banning order for someone who has been imprisoned. The amendment suggests 15. In cases not involving imprisonment, the Bill suggests five years and the amendment seven. The minimum periods in the Bill are six years and three years; the amendment suggests nine and five. Clause 8 deals with the period of effect of orders under section 32 of the Public Order Act 1986. It is currently no less than one year and no more than three, whereas I suggest not less than six months and no more than five years. We are lowering one end of the scale while increasing the other.

The other important change allows application for termination of orders to be made earlier, although that is coupled with the possibility of longer maximum sentences. That could be a better way of ensuring that the courts have the powers to impose stiff bans where necessary, but they can choose much longer or shorter periods. If the ban is longer, people will have the right to appeal against it after one third of the period rather than two thirds. The provision increases flexibility while allowing the courts to thump those whom they wish to penalise.

Mr. Burns: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his remarks. I hope that he does not feel that I am a wimp. I am tempted, but I do not want to go down that route, however attractive it may be. We must take a balanced and acceptable approach to penalties so that they are not so harsh that people lose sympathy with the general aims of the mechanism. The Bill has the balance right. The penalties both fit the crime and will be seen as reasonable because they allow individuals to go back to the courts to ask, in respect of international banning orders, for the last third of the sentence to be rescinded on the ground of good behaviour. I think that that applies after a year of the sentence has been served in respect of a domestic banning order. I hope that my right hon. Friend will not press the amendment.

Mr. Forth: This is slightly bizarre. My hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) was almost frothing at the mouth a moment ago about the need for the severest possible penalties. He came close to accusing me of being a wimp on law and order, to which I am unaccustomed. Now he says that we must not go too far or be too harsh and that the penalties are all right.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) said that we have to satisfy ourselves about proportionality and appropriateness. We are prepared to take the drastic step of removing someone's passport; we have just been told that that is essential to make the Bill work. However, we must also consider what will be left of the discretion of the courts. What will be available to them to ensure that appropriate penalties are applied? If nothing else, the maxima will give some guidance to the courts about what we had in mind in legislating.

As I argued earlier, we should not tie the hands of the courts too much. If we were to set severe maximum penalties, that would show the courts that some of the offences that might be committed under the provisions of the Bill were so serious as to merit severe penalties. However, for some reason, the promoter of the Bill does not seem to think so. He seems to think that it is one thing casually to take away someone's passport, but another thing to send a person to prison for a long time. That does not show much consistency. However, I shall again defer to the superior experience of my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border and be guided by him, although I remain somewhat uneasy.

1.45 pm

Mr. Maclean: I am glad that my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) made those points in his customary lucid style. I too was uneasy about the response of my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford to the amendments. It seems inconsistent to go to the extreme step of taking away a person's passport, but not to allow the courts the freedom to increase the period of the banning order from 10 to 15 years. I was not even proposing a compulsory maximum; I merely wanted to give the courts that extra flexibility in the cases of those vile hooligans to whom my hon. Friend is strongly opposed. In those cases, the court could determine that a 15-year ban might be appropriate.

I suspect that the House will have to deal with this matter again when the Bill returns from another place. In the interests of making progress, I shall not force the matter today, but I suspect that the noble Lords at the other end of the Corridor may take a different view. My hon. Friend has not persuaded me. He said that he was almost tempted to accept the amendment. I hope that, if he is presented with amendments to the Bill when it returns from the other place, he will be prepared to accept some of them—in order to give the courts greater flexibility and freedom to impose tougher sentences, if they want to do so.

As I shall clearly not make further progress today and the House wants to move on to other matters, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

1.47 pm

Mr. Burns: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

I am delighted to have had the opportunity to pilot this important measure through the House. I am proud to have been associated with it. After the obscene behaviour in France last year and because of the far too many occasions in this country when a small band of mindless hooligans have caused so much damage, not only to the reputation of football but to the enjoyment of other people—the vast majority of law-abiding football supporters—we need to take action to block loopholes in the law in respect of racist and indecent chanting. We also need to give the police, the courts and the authorities greater powers to bring to book and to punish those who indulge in that sort of unacceptable and illegal behaviour.

I shall not detain the House for long, but I want to pay tribute to my right hon. Friends the Members for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) and for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) for the way in which they have raised a series of important issues during Report. They gave the House the opportunity to debate matters of concern to them and to some other hon. Members.

I am grateful that a large majority of hon. Members on both sides of the House agree with the Bill—as do interested parties outside the House, ranging from the Football Association, the Football Supporters Association and others to the law enforcement agencies and the National Criminal Intelligence Service. The Bill does not cause party political divisions, so I also pay tribute to, and thank, the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for the helpful way in which she has assisted me—as have her civil servants, led by Mr. Alan Brown. He has done tremendous work in helping to inform me on several highly technical and difficult issues. That has ensured the smooth running of the measure through its stages in the House, and its improvement in Committee. Shortly, my Bill will leave the House and go to another place. I trust that their lordships will give it swift passage, so that a badly needed measure that commands great support is on the statute book by the end of July, comes into force by September and is in place for most of the next football season, when it can do something positive to minimise the sort of behaviour that has become all too familiar, both in this country and, especially, overseas.

1.50 pm

Mr. Ivor Caplin (Hove): I want to say only a few words and concur with the remarks of the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns). I congratulate him on the way in which he piloted his Bill through Second Reading and in Committee. As a football fan, I am pleased that the Bill is now making speedy progress, as I hoped it would when I spoke on Second Reading. I shall focus my remarks on two clauses, 9 and 10, which deal with racist chanting and ticket touting, against both of which I have been campaigning for some time.

I am pleased that, today, we as a House have an opportunity to say once and for all that we oppose the racist chanting that has bedevilled football for many years. We should be aware of its intrusion into cricket and other sports, which might be an issue that my hon. Friend the Minister will wish to discuss with colleagues, including our hon. Friend the Minister for Sport.

On Second Reading, I said that ticket touting was not entrepreneurship, but robbery. I have no doubt that stronger regulations to stop ticket touting are welcome in this country. I hope that we shall be able to use that framework as the basis for discussions with our European partners about how to strengthen the framework for overseas football.

1.52 pm

Mr. Tony Clarke: I congratulate the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on introducing his Bill, which highlights and tackles the loopholes that have enabled football hooligans to continue to flourish.

To a certain extent, the media have misrepresented the debate in such a way as to make us believe that we still have a problem in our domestic game. That is not true. In the main, football has cleaned up its own act, largely through the efforts of supporters working hard within their clubs. Now, we are addressing loopholes that enable hooligans to cause trouble abroad and to chant racist slogans at matches, and we are acting to rid ourselves of ticket touts.

In the other place and when the Bill returns to this House, I hope that two fundamental points that still cause me concern are addressed. The first relates to football-related offences and my hope that we will find a way to give some protection to third parties who get caught up in violent events. People go to bars for many reasons—for a stag night, for a night out with friends or as regulars—but if they get caught up in violence that is construed as being football related, they might fall foul of the restriction orders that we impose.

The second point relates to racist chanting. The Minister may be aware of concerns that I voiced in Committee, that although we have corrected one anomaly—that of a chorus being defined as at least two people before action could be taken; that has now been reduced to one person—we have not corrected the anomaly relating to repeated utterance. Although action might be possible under a breach of the peace, unless the offending comment is repeated, it might be difficult to obtain a conviction.

If ever a reason was needed for legislation of this nature being on the statute book, it was provided this week in Four Four Two, in an article about a self-confessed hooligan and Chelsea fan by the name of Martin King. The article states:

[Mr. Tony Clarke]

"On one occasion, King, whose passport was recognised by a copper when he was off to watch Chelsea in the Cup Winners' Cup, told an officer he no longer followed football and was going wine-tasting in France—by sheer coincidence on the same day the Blues were playing in Europe. 'Sorry to bother you lads,' replied the policeman, who handed King back his passport."

For that reason, we must not let this matter drop. I wish the legislation every success, in its present form or as a Government measure.

1.55 pm

Mrs. Laing: I wish briefly to commend my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) for introducing this excellent Bill, which, as has been shown this morning, enjoys wide support throughout the House. It will have far-reaching consequences, so it is right that we have considered the arguments in depth today. I also commend my right hon. Friends the Members for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) and for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) for their assiduous examination of the Bill. However, as I appreciate that brevity is necessary to ensure that the Bill does not run out of time, I am happy simply to commend it to the House and to leave the rest to the Minister.

1.56 pm

Mr. Forth: It always makes me nervous when I hear hon. Members say, "This Bill has wide support on all sides of the House." My memory goes back to the Child Support Agency, which similarly enjoyed the support of both sides of the House, and which subsequent Conservative and Labour Governments attempted to put right many years later. My right hon. and hon. Friends will recall many measures that were introduced in a rush of enthusiasm and received widespread support throughout the House, and which almost invariably turned out to be some of the worst pieces of legislation ever inflicted on the voters and taxpayers. I hope that this will not be one of them.

I have expressed my reservations about the Bill. I understand why my hon. Friend the Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) has introduced it and I accept that there is support for the measure. However, I add in parenthesis that the amount of support—visual, vocal and physical—has not been exactly overwhelming today. The House has its own peculiar reasons for working in this way and moving mysteriously its wonders to perform, so I shall leave that to one side.

I remain somewhat uneasy about the extent to which in this Bill, as in others, we are shifting the balance—slowly but inexorably—away from the traditional rights enjoyed by individuals in this country to benefit "the authorities", whoever they are, and who take many forms in this country, as in others. They have ever greater powers and resources, and technology is widely available to them. I am sure that, in most cases, that is a force for good and reassures the majority of law-abiding people. However, we must acknowledge that, every now and then, there is a distinct danger that those huge mechanisms and enormous powers will go wrong and be abused—usually inadvertently, but sometimes deliberately. Above all, our prime responsibility in the House of Commons is to seek to protect the individual.

I hope that we have discharged that responsibility in this case and I hope that the Bill's wider powers will not go wrong in any way. I hope that I am proved wrong, but I must express that reservation. I accept that my hon. Friend's Bill will proceed, having received due process and proper debate in the House and in Committee. It received a good debate on Report—which is the only way I believe legislation should be able to proceed. My hon. Friend came high in the ballot and he has handled the Bill impeccably. I congratulate him on carrying the House with him. It now remains to be seen to what extent the other place will examine the matter. I support Third Reading.

1.59 pm

Kate Hoey: I congratulate the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on successfully getting his Bill through all its parliamentary stages. I am grateful for his co-operation during the Bill's drafting and its progress through the House, and for the skilful way in which he has approached that. I am grateful to other hon. Members for their informed, considered contributions to debates on these important measures, which aim to maintain and enhance the high quality of our national sport and the prominence that it enjoys. We must maintain that by looking after the interests of the decent, law-abiding supporter. The supporters' interests remain paramount, and I was pleased with the constructive contributions to the consultation process made by many of those who represent them.

As we all know, the introduction of the Bill will add to our sophisticated legislative process for dealing with football-related offences. We all recognise, however, that legislation is only part of the solution to that problem. As the hon. Member for West Chelmsford has said throughout the debate, the most important people who can help us, and whom the Bill is really about, are the decent supporters. They will benefit from the measures.

I do not want to go into recent international results on the pitch which have, sadly, not gone too well for the home countries, but we continue to hope that we shall have representation at the Euro 2000 championship in Belgium and Holland. We have already entered into discussions with our colleagues to work out the details of policing and security for that competition.

We want to ensure that all supporters travelling from this country are able to enjoy football in a safe, secure environment, as the vast, well-behaved majority do. They are just as sickened by the shameful antics of the tiny minority who, regrettably, tarnish the image of decent supporters as well as that of our country. That is why we shall continue to seek to introduce measures that prevent those who commit football-related offences from travelling abroad.

The Bill will help to promote the positive aspects of good behaviour. It sends out a strong message that there are firm measures to deal with those who view football as a battleground, not a playing field. We do not want those people associated with our game, and we should all work together to get rid of them. The Bill takes a good step towards that.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, considered.

Clause 14

RESTRICTION ON BRINGING CHILDREN INTO THE UNITED KINGDOM FOR ADOPTION

2.3 pm

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 8, leave out lines 17 to 22.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): With this, it will be convenient to discuss amendment No. 10, in page 8, line 20, leave out from 'knowledge' to end of line 22.

Mr. Maclean: The amendments are small but potentially important. Clause 14 is in the miscellaneous and supplemental part of the Bill and will insert into section 56 of the Adoption Act 1976 restrictions on people bringing children into the United Kingdom for adoption, contrary to any regulation that may be prescribed by the Secretary of State. The amendments do not deal with those regulations. Leaving aside whatever requirements the Secretary of State may prescribe in those regulations, it is important to have penalties for anyone who breaches the restrictions in clause 14.

My concern is with subsection (4), which says:

"Proceedings for an offence under this section may be brought within a period of six months from the date on which evidence sufficient in the opinion of the prosecutor to warrant the proceedings came to his knowledge; but no such proceedings shall be brought by virtue of this subsection more than three years after the commission of the offence."

The amendments in my name and that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bromley and Chislehurst (Mr. Forth) would have one of two effects. Amendment No. 9 would delete the whole of subsection (4), and as an alternative, amendment No. 10 would delete the last part, which is the bar on prosecution more than three years after the commission of the offence.

It is worth while probing these matters to ascertain the views of the Minister and of the promoter, the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten), on the reasons for the provision of three years. I appreciate that there cannot be an indefinite period. Clearly that would be an injustice. However, when the Minister was last in his place on a Friday we were debating putting people on the so-called black list in the context of the Protection of Children Bill. I cannot remember the time limits for backdating offences in that Bill or for saying that people could be put on the register even if their paedophiliac activity or their abuse of children happened many years ago. I think that the time scale in that Bill was much longer than three years.

Nevertheless, we are talking not about child abusers but those who have adopted a child, or who wish to do so, who have committed an offence by bringing somebody into the United Kingdom for adoption. They have done that not because they wish to abuse the child but possibly as a result of a misguided sense of loyalty or a misguided decision that they can help the child, or possibly for wrong and selfish reasons. They may not wish to comply with the law or may not comply with it, but they wish to breach the law to adopt a child illegally.

In those circumstances, we should be sending out a slightly stronger signal. A bar after three years perhaps sends too weak a signal. If an offence has gone undetected for three years, those concerned will know that they will get away with it. If we conclude that it is wrong in any event for people to commit such an act, we should not put a three-year bar on their being prosecuted for the offence.

I cannot remember what the usual bar on criminal prosecutions is. Is there a limit of seven years? The period is different for many different offences. However, three years seems to be a highly restrictive period within which to bring a prosecution once there is evidence that a crime has been committed.

Amendment No. 9 would remove the obligation on a prosecutor, on discovering that a crime has been committed, to act within six months of his feeling that there is sufficient evidence. That is slightly too restrictive. Do we need to have a time limit? I think that there is an obligation on the Crown Prosecution Service in any case to move as speedily as it can, and there may be good reasons for it taking slightly longer than six months to commence proceedings.

Inevitably, in circumstances involving the illegal adoption of children or of bringing children into this country to adopt them improperly, people will have behaved deviously. The facts will possibly be difficult to ascertain. The prosecutor might need more time to put together a case that will stick in court. I cannot see that there will be a fundamental injustice to the accused person, or the person who may be accused, if proceedings are not commenced within six months.

I agree, of course, that there should not be a ghastly sword of Damocles hanging over someone's head, where they are told that proceedings may be brought against them and it takes years and years before any prosecution is or is not brought. That is not appropriate. However, we either need a period that is longer than six months or we do not need a period to be prescribed; the matter can then be left to be dealt with under the normal rules and subject to the obligation that already applies to the CPS to bring prosecutions as speedily as it can provided that it has sufficient evidence.

We must examine carefully the bar after three years. In many cases evidence may come to light only when the child has started school. In some cases it may come to light only when the child has come of age, has applied for a national insurance number, or has a health problem and is taken to a doctor when aged five, seven, nine or whatever. In those circumstances the doctor or the health centre may discover that the child was adopted improperly four, five or six years before. The authorities should then have the right to prosecute. If this is regarded as something for which there should be a penalty, I suggest to the Bill's promoter that we should not have too short a cut-off period, as that would prevent the prosecution taking action against people who should be punished but who committed an offence five, six or seven years earlier.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley (South-West Surrey): I appreciate the opportunity to contribute at this late stage to the debate on this important Bill, especially on amendments Nos. 8 and 9. As I served as chairman of the juvenile court for many years and then, in my capacity as a Minister, was involved in the early stages of consideration of this difficult issue, I am delighted that the Bill has reached a critical stage and looks as though it will pass successfully on to the statute book. Would that it had been a wider adoption Bill.

[Mrs. Virginia Bottomley]

Undoubtedly, amendments Nos. 8 and 9 relate to the area that has caused most pain and suffering. They concern a vexed and sensitive question, because introducing criminal offences in child care matters is always a serious step. Too often, families felt provoked into abusing the rules and the system because of the resistance and insults that they received from local authorities and adoption agencies. I was greatly perplexed that, at a time when so much effort was going into creating new fertility treatments with in vitro fertilisation and other such steps, there was so much resistance and prejudice against intercountry adoption.

Of course it is a profoundly serious step for a child to leave its natural country and live in another land, but for those who saw the alternative—frequently, institutionalisation without health care, education, nurture or love—the opportunity to give a child a loving, caring home in this country proved irresistible. Too often, those families who tried to go through the proper channels found themselves rejected and resisted at every turn.

No one could condone taking a child from one country to another without using the proper processes, but I ask the Minister and the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten)—the Bill's promoter—whether there will also be a countervailing power to take action against local authorities that simply refuse to co-operate with intercountry adoption. I accept that many have changed their tune. To hear the British Agencies for Adoption and Fostering—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I remind the right hon. Lady that we are considering a specific amendment, which is far narrower than the points that she is making at the moment.

Mrs. Bottomley: I stand corrected, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I hope that the House will understand the relevance to the amendments of what I am saying. My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) is discussing the issue of the six months and the three-year maximum. I believe that legislation should be passed only if it will be perceived as reasonable and will be acceptable to families and to those implementing it. The present unreasonable state of affairs has caused many people to feel affronted and provoked.

I hope that, if my right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border can achieve reassurances on several points, he will not feel the need to press his amendment to a vote, because it seems to me that, after three years, a child and a family should be free of the background threat that a prosecution might be lodged. I do not believe that a family can conceal a child for more than three years, and after three years, the child has become part of that family. If difficulties were emerging, almost certainly they would have come to the notice of health visitors, schools or social workers. Six months is necessary because, regrettably, it is possible to conceal a child for six months, and that child might well be at a particularly sensitive stage of development at which he or she needs the support of health visitors, teachers and other specialist providers.

2.15 pm

My right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border should not press this matter further, subject to reassurances from the Minister that the unreasonableness of the statutory agencies will be tackled and that there will be discretion over taking action against families. A criminal offence in such matters is extremely serious. The Campaign for Intercountry Adoption—which has members in my constituency—has made some important points about cases where it would be inappropriate to take a legalistic and persecutory approach. With a great deal of good will towards the Bill, I ask the Minister to offer some reassurance to help my right hon. Friend to withdraw his amendments.

Mr. Mark Oaten (Winchester): These important amendments hit at the heart of the Bill—the prevention of a practice that no hon. Member wants to see continue: the practice of bringing children into this country without reference to the proper procedures.

The current procedures in this country are far too weak to deal with the problem as it stands. Existing legislation would not allow any mechanisms for the authorities to tackle a couple who had brought a child into this country and had sought to keep the child hidden here for six months. If that couple were successful and the authorities found out about the child after seven months, the authorities would have no powers to tackle them. That is wrong, and nonsensical.

As the right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) said, we can all imagine circumstances where a child could be hidden for six months. The critical point in the Bill—and the reason why I hope that the right hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) will withdraw his amendments, which would take away the power—is that it would provide the ability to extend the six-month period to three years. That would mean that we would not need to discover the event within six months, but that the provisions would kick in at the point at which the offence was discovered. If, after a year and a half, the authorities discovered that a child had been brought in, they would have the power to take action. That is what we all wish to see.

I understand the concerns of the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border about the three-year period, and his point that if individuals have broken the law, there should perhaps not be a limit at all. I thought that the right hon. Lady made the point very well that we can be satisfied that any problems or offences would have come to light in three years. Surely after three years it is reasonable that the family should be able to carry on without the threat of legal action. If abuse is discovered in the family after more than three years, other forms of law could kick in to tackle it. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will withdraw his amendments.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. John Hutton): The right hon. Member for South-West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) speaks with great knowledge and wisdom on child care matters, and she raised a number of issues concerning the amendments. I assure her and the House that the Government will keep all aspects of adoption law and practice under active review. One of the purposes of the Bill is to create a new responsibility for local authorities to operate an intercountry adoption service. No one will be able to opt out of legislation passed by the House.

The points made by the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) were dealt with effectively by the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten). I remind the right hon. Gentleman that, under the Magistrates Courts (Procedure) Act 1998, there is a six-month bar on prosecutions for summary offences.

The Bill provides for a new summary offence, and to show the seriousness with which we will treat offences of bringing children into the United Kingdom outwith the regulations, we propose to extend to three years the period within which a prosecution can be made.

The amendments are directly contradictory: amendment No. 9 would require that proceedings could be brought only within six months of the offence being committed, which is the present situation, but amendment No. 10 would contradict that by providing that proceedings could be brought with no time limit at all. The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border had better make up his mind.

Because of the current restrictions on bringing summary proceedings for these offences, no proceedings have ever been brought against a person for bringing in a child in breach of the adoption legislation. That situation is unacceptable and the Bill is designed to correct it.

Mr. Maclean: This has been a useful debate. I tabled the amendments as probing amendments and I am very conscious of the wisdom of what my right hon. Friend the Member for South–West Surrey (Mrs. Bottomley) and the Minister have said. I was in toughening-up mode this morning. We spent the whole morning trying to get draconian new provisions into the Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill and perhaps I was being a bit too severe in trying to remove the three-year limit in this Bill.

I accept that in prosecuting family cases we need to have a different yardstick and a more sensitive set of rules than in prosecuting football hooligans. Following the wise words of reassurance, I am happy to beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Order for Third Reading read.

2.21 pm

Mr. Oaten: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill has wide support from individuals and groups involved in adoption. I have been extremely encouraged by the cross-party support for the provisions throughout our proceedings, especially in the excellent Second Reading debate.

Many of us have been concerned about the recent increase in the number of couples who, in seeking to adopt children from a foreign country, have not had the best quality of service from local authorities—the Bill is designed to tackle some of those issues—but we would all be more concerned about those individuals who have gone down that route as a way of avoiding some of the controls that are in place for the adoption of children in the United Kingdom.

The Bill is an attempt for the first time to deal with the grey areas by proper regulation. The most pleasing provision is the adoption of the Hague convention, allowing the House finally to ratify it, having signed up to it in 1993. It is an embarrassment to this country that we have taken so long to ratify the convention, which will institute an agreement on the recognition of various standards. Given that it is based on the fundamental rights of the child, I hope that its ratification will mean that we have enshrined clearly the principle that the child's interests must be paramount in the way in which adoption takes place.

The Bill provides for ways in which we can stop the criminal activity of bringing children into this country by those couples who seek, by one means or another, to avoid going through the proper procedures. We have, rightly, good controls for adopting children within the United Kingdom, and it would be wrong to think that one can try to avoid those controls and get a second-hand or second-rate child from another country. That is why the Bill tightens the provisions on couples who may pay for private home study reports and bypass the social work system, as well as the provisions for individuals who bring children into the country.

The Bill also reminds local authorities of what is required of them and of how they should respond to those who go to them for advice and approval for adopting. I hope that the provisions will mean that the quality of local authorities' performance matches that of my local authority, Hampshire, which has become expert in managing the process, and that a culture will develop in which authorities take a positive attitude towards the whole question of intercountry adoption. We should also, because of changed and improved practice, see far fewer individuals trying to bypass the law and bring in children, late at night, in the boot of a car.

I believe that the Bill is both tough and tender, not only recognising intercountry adoption and trying to improve performance, but saying to those who want to hinder that performance that the strong hand of the law will stop them. Ultimately, the child's individual rights are more important than are those of people trying to adopt, for whatever reason. I hope that the House will pass the Bill, which I warmly endorse.

2.25 pm

Mr. Hutton: As the hon. Member for Winchester (Mr. Oaten) said, the Bill aims to achieve two important objectives. The first is to introduce measures that protect children living abroad and who are to be adopted by people resident in the United Kingdom. The main instrument of achieving that objective is ratification of the 1993 Hague convention on intercountry adoption. Enactment of the Bill will enable the convention's articles to be subsumed within our own substantive law, and thereby to enhance the quality and effectiveness of adoption law.

The second important objective is to place intercountry adoption within a clear statutory framework, thereby enabling regulations to be made to ensure that, within these islands, only those who are approved as suitable to become adoptive parents by a local authority or adoption agency are able to proceed to complete the adoption process abroad. As the hon. Member for Winchester said, the Bill's provisions to introduce new offences are absolutely necessary if we are to protect the welfare of children, by preventing them being brought to the United Kingdom for the purposes of adoption without authority.

[Mr. Hutton]

The Bill also reaffirms the Government's view that privately commissioned home study reports for the purposes of adoption—whether prepared in connection with the convention or not—are unacceptable. In future, only a local authority or approved adoption agency will be able to provide a home study assessment.

The Bill also provides, for the first time, that intercountry adoption is put on a sound legal footing. I believe that that should make the procedures for convention adoptions, and the majority of other intercountry adoptions, more straightforward and effective and less bureaucratic. I should like to emphasise, however, that the last thing intended in the Bill's preparation was that it should place obstacles in the path of those who wish to adopt from abroad. That is not our intention.

The Government support the Bill not only for its important measures, but because it will provide the facility by which people may be assessed and their application processed within a clearly understood and workable framework. I believe that the Bill will achieve all of that. I also believe that, ultimately, the provisions will enable us to deliver a better and more effective service to intercountry adopters.

I very warmly congratulate the hon. Member for Winchester on promoting his Bill. He has done the House a great service in giving us the opportunity to improve our regulations and law on the matter. I hope, as he does, that the House will now give the Bill a Third Reading.

2.27 pm

Mr. Nick St. Aubyn (Guildford): I think that it was evident on Second Reading that the Bill has the support of the whole House. Today, we all wish it on its way with good speed.

Unfortunately, one or two comments that I made on Second Reading provoked a little confusion, particularly among Labour Members. It really does need to be made clear that—as the Minister has just said—the responsibility placed on local authorities by the Bill is very great. If the rights of the child are to be fully recognised, we must also develop an international standard by which the quality of those wishing to adopt is judged.

I believe that such an international standard would also enlighten those of us in the United Kingdom. The policy of too many local authorities—on matters such as age and interracial adoption, for example—is too restrictive, because they are spoilt for choice. When it comes to international and intercountry adoption, a child who is refused a home in the United Kingdom may be subject to much looser rules in another country. I therefore believe that we must address the issue as soon as possible, preferably as part of a much more comprehensive adoption Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill

As amended in the Standing Committee, further considered.

Clause 3

EFFECT OF FORFEITURE ORDERS.

Amendment proposed [14 May]: No. 36, in page 2, line 20, at the end to insert the words—

'(c) in Northern Ireland, to the Crown Court'.—(Mr. Forth).

2.29 pm

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael J. Martin): I remind the House that with this we are discussing the following amendments: No. 37, in clause 5, page 3, line 42, at end insert—

'(c) in the case of businesses or parts of businesses carried on solely or primarily in Northern Ireland, the Lands Tribunal for Northern Ireland.'.

No. 38, in clause 6, page 4, line 6, at end insert—

'(d) in relation to Northern Ireland, the Secretary of State'.

No. 35, in clause 7, page 4, line 13, leave out subsection (5).

The right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) had the Floor on 14 May.

Mr. David Maclean (Penrith and The Border): I was concerned about non-application of the Bill's provisions to Northern Ireland, as the Bill applies them to northern Scotland—I mean to all of Scotland. If they applied only to northern Scotland, my relatives would not be so worried about them. I was trying to develop the argument that there is an inconsistency in this part of the Bill, as Scotland now has its own Parliament.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed on Friday 23 July.

Remaining Private Members' Bills

REFERENDUMS BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on new clause proposed [21 May] on consideration of Bill, as amended in the Standing Committee.

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 23 July.

NUCLEAR SAFEGUARDS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

PRESCRIPTION CHARGES (HORMONE REPLACEMENT THERAPY) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

RESTRAINING AND PROTECTION ORDERS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

COUNTRY LANES AND VILLAGES BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

BIRTHS AND DEATHS REGISTRATION (AMENDMENT) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

ENERGY CONSERVATION (HOUSING) BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [30 April].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 23 July.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [12 March].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 23 July.

PENSIONS (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

WILDLIFE AND COUNTRYSIDE (AMENDMENT) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

REGULATIONS ON SMALL BUSINESSES (REDUCTION) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

HARE COURSING BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

LICENSING (YOUNG PERSONS) BILL

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Not moved.

AGE LIMITS ON HEALTH CARE BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

HEALTH CARE AND ENERGY EFFICIENCY BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [23 April].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 23 July.

ACCESS TO ENVIRONMENTAL INFORMATION BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

PLANNING APPEALS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

BUS FUEL DUTY (EXEMPTIONS) BILL

Order read for resuming adjourned debate on Second Reading [12 March].

Hon. Members: Object.

Debate further adjourned till Friday 23 July.

PUBLIC HOUSE NAMES BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

EUROPEAN PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (GIBRALTAR) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

ROAD TRAFFIC REGULATION (CYCLE PARKING) BILL [LORDS]

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Objection taken. Debate to be resumed on which day?

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): If we are not too busy, Friday 23 July suggests itself.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

WAITING TIMES (NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

STREETWORKS BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

ROYAL PARKS (TRADING) BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Hon. Members: Object.

Second Reading deferred till Friday 23 July.

Planning (Use Classes)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Hill.]

2.35 pm

Mr. Stephen Pound (Ealing, North): I am delighted to reach that part of the day's business normally described as the graveyard slot.

The vexed issue of planning and funeral parlours is of great concern to my constituents. For many years, one of my constituents lived next to an excellent local newsagent and tobacconist shop, where sustenance for mind and body was available through a wide display of specialist magazines and tobaccos from many continents. To her horror, one day she found that a funeral parlour had appeared almost overnight in the small parade of shops.

My constituent came from Northolt, and immediately contacted the council and demanded to know what it was going to do. The response from Peter Causer and Janet Thomas in the planning department was that nothing could be done, because of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1987. Extraordinarily and bizarrely, that order places newsagents and many other retail outlets in the same use category as funeral parlours.

I have no objection to funeral parlours and funeral directors operating in the high street. They provide an essential service with considerable sensitivity, which is greatly appreciated, and they are extremely supportive of the local community. I do not consider their presence in the high street in any way inappropriate. By and large, they make good neighbours—there are few complaints about loud music, for example.

However, Mike Churchman, speaking for one of the larger groups of funeral directors in the country, has drawn attention to the fact that many people object to funeral directors operating in the high street. In many ways, that stems from English people's fear of death. We still believe that it will never happen to us, and that death is an awesome and frightening thing. I do not subscribe to that view. I have been told that there will be great rejoicing when news of my death sweeps west London. Death is not something to be especially sad about.

The relevant planning regulations appear ludicrous. Elsewhere in my constituency, a funeral director's establishment is located between a barber and a balti shop. That may seem appropriate to some, who perhaps believe that all tastes are catered for in that parade of shops, but there is something about it that does not seem right.

The deeper I looked into the 1987 order, the more I realised that the Government have failed people in the past because the use classes are so ill drawn. I had intended to confine myself to funeral directors and funeral parlours, but I have found it impossible to resist the temptation to wander slightly further afield—although remaining within the ambit of the use classes order.

The old pie and mash shop next to the Methodist church in Greenford closed down and was reopened, on the following Monday, as Crikey O'Reilly's Irish pub. I take second place to no one in the respect in which I hold Greenford's teetotal Methodist community, and the placement of the pub was completely inappropriate.

Fortunately, after several discussions with a small focus group at the pub, it was agreed that the name would be changed to the Belmullet Tavern, in honour of one of the most delightful parts of County Mayo. I have been honoured to visit that tavern on many occasions since. However, the difficulty is that the A3 use categories permit a food retail outlet—in this case the pie and mash shop—to be changed into a pub.

It gets worse. The categories are so badly drawn that the old unrestricted A3 uses have led to an over-concentration of pubs and, even more sinisterly, such things as super-pubs. I believe that the Minister is familiar with the concept of super-pubs and will discuss them later. Planning fails in these cases and it is left to licensing magistrates to resolve the difficulties, which is impossible.

The distinction between the A3 use class, which covers super-pubs, and the D2 class, which covers dancehalls and nightclubs, is extremely blurred. It is ludicrous that a cinema can be converted into a late-night dancehall without permission. The primary use of a building can vary depending on the time of day, and enforcement is extremely difficult if sui generis use is not proven.

The A1 use category—traditionally known as the coffee bar and sandwich bar category—and the A3 use category have a blurred distinction. In modern, fashionable outlets of a type completely unknown to me, but which those who live in more fashionable parts of London tell me are called Pret a Manger—does it mean ready to eat?—seating is a dominant feature. In many cases, on appeal, inspectors have used an extremely broad definition of primary use and allowed considerable change so that A1 units have become A3 units by default. We clearly need a separate classification.

As I delved deeper into planning law, I found out about business use classes B1, B2 and B8, and the situation is even worse. Permitted development rights to change units of 235 sq m to B8 use are being exercised in conjunction with amalgamation, which is causing extraordinary problems for local amenities and roads and the character of areas. The difficulties are significant, but nothing can be done.

Finally, the position of museums, art galleries and libraries is worse still. I freely admit that Northolt is not over-blessed with those. In fact, to be perfectly honest, there is none. I have a large collection of old Fulham football club programmes that could form the basis of a library, and we have a lot of graffiti that could start off an art collection, but, within the D1 non-residential institution category, any museum, art gallery or public library—some hon. Members may have such things in their constituencies—could turn into a place of worship, a nursery or, worst of all, a private school. I wonder how any of my hon. Friends would like it if their cherished local art gallery suddenly became a private school or a place of worship without any need for public consultation or planning approval.

There is a dichotomy in the regulations. In 1987, the Bromley and Chislehurst tendency ruled the roost, and the Government supported the idea that there should be no restrictions on business men and business women—probably just men in those days—so that they could ride rampant and roughshod. The idea was that life should be made easier for business people: if they were allowed to do what they liked, a thousand flowers would bloom. We have moved on since the days of that absurd, libertarian, laissez faire philosophy, recognising that regulations and restrictions in planning law provide sensible guidelines and parameters, and should involve public consultation and participation.

[Mr. Stephen Pound]

What most upset my constituent in Northolt was not the funeral parlour in the high street—she did not object to that, and nor would most sensible people—but the fact that the local authority planning department was not involved in any way and that there was no public consultation. The normal process of democratic accountability simply did not work. Her experience tells me that the categories are clearly wrongly drawn.

I understand that there may possibly still be an instinct within the House to go against regulation—we have a Select Committee on Deregulation and, by and large, deregulation is a good thing. However, we must recognise that the amendments in 1987 to the Town and Country Planning (Amendment) Act 1972 drew the lines too widely and have created too many problems. Like all Londoners, I look to my hon. Friend the Minister for London and Construction to resolve that and many other problems in his response.

Many hon. Members come to the House with great and noble ambitions. Many come through these doors determined to bring world peace and amity by the end of their first term. Many of us seek to increase the sum total of human happiness by our activities. I am a modest man—many of my friends say that I have much to be modest about—and I do not immediately seek world peace and the happiness of all. I want a reclassification of the Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1987. Is that too much to ask?

Would it not be possible for the Minister to say—graciously, as ever—that among many other things it is the task of the Government to correct some of the wilder anomalies fuelled by the free market dogma of the previous Administration and to recognise that an important principle is involved? Planning officers are trying to do a job and to consult and work with the local community, but they are being prevented from doing so by the ways in which the use classes are drawn. The consequences for the local community, not merely in terms of democratic accountability, but of the changing nature of an area, are profound and, in many cases, to be regretted.

I suppose that I should, but I make no apologies for taking the time of the House on this matter, which may seem of specialised interest to most people. It affects us all. I offer that to the House and I finish in earnest anticipation of the response of my hon. Friend the Minister.

2.47 pm

The Minister for London and Construction (Mr. Nick Raynsford): First, I must congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Pound) on securing this debate and giving us a subject that is of grave importance to his constituents and others who are concerned about the planning system.

I am also grateful to my hon. Friend for writing to me in advance with further details of his concerns, which as he said, wandered slightly wide of the designation, "Planning regulations for funeral parlours".

Referring to one of the more memorable comments by the former Prime Minister, Lord Attlee, my hon. Friend described himself as a modest man. I am not sure that my hon. Friend should be so modest. He has made a most significant contribution to the House in the two years or so in which he has been here, and he has certainly enhanced the sum of human happiness and amusement in this Chamber. I hope that in my response I will be able not merely to answer his questions, but to respond to some extent in kind.

I noted the example with which he opened his speech. Some people who take an interest in health matters might well consider that the change of use from a tobacconist to a funeral parlour was a related use. I leave that thought with my hon. Friend.

I disagree that there will be any cause for rejoicing in his constituency at the death of the Pound—a situation that none of us look forward to. I congratulate him in his success in securing the change of name from Crikey O'Reilly's to the Belmullet Tavern and I will not ask how long it took his focus groups to secure that happy outcome.

Finally, before I come to the serious side of the debate, I suggest that the flexibility to allow a change of use from a museum or art gallery to a place of worship or a school, about which my hon. Friend expressed concern, might be to the benefit of Ealing, North because it can work in the opposite direction. The change of use to a museum or art gallery might be easier without the requirement for specific planning consent. The creation of the hon. Gentleman's museum of Fulham football club memorabilia might therefore be easier to achieve.

It may helpful if I set out the legislative and policy background. The Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1987, which I will refer to as the UCO, sets out classes of land use. Changes within each of those classes do not require planning permission. In addition, the town and country planning general permitted development order grants a general permission for specified changes of use between some of these classes.

Both the UCO and the permitted development order are well-established measures in the town and country planning system. The UCO was introduced on the ground that the changes of use that it permits will have a broadly similar impact, for instance, in terms of noise, traffic and visual appearance. The intention is to strike an appropriate balance between the need to facilitate development and to protect local amenity and the environment.

The UCO plays an essential role in delivering a positive, proactive planning system that helps business and local communities to thrive. It removes from businesses and others the requirement to seek planning permission from the local planning authority for uses that are generally uncontroversial and do not adversely impact on local amenity. The UCO is kept under review so that problem areas can be addressed or particular matters clarified. Since 1987 only five amendments have been felt to be necessary.

I shall now move on to the first specific area of the UCO about which my hon. Friend commented—funeral businesses. Funeral directors' premises are included in the A1 shops class of the order, so a change to use by an undertaker from a shop does not require planning permission. That is on the basis that they have similar land use implications and provide a service to visiting members of the public. However, any works arising from the change of use may require a planning application to be submitted to the local planning authority.

Following a review of the UCO in 1991, the previous Government decided that funeral directors' premises should remain in the shops class. They felt that when people have to cope with bereavement, they should expect to be able to contact an undertaker in the locality. I agree with this view, and I think my hon. Friend does because he spoke warmly of the quality of service provided by funeral directors in meeting genuine needs. If such businesses had to be located well away from other shops and people's homes, it would only add unnecessary inconvenience to the distress of the bereaved.

We know that some would like funeral uses to be removed from the shops class of the UCO. Difficulties have, on occasion, arisen when shops in residential areas have changed to that use. Clearly, the siting of such businesses close to neighbouring developments such as old people's homes can be a delicate matter and may cause disquiet. However, those are isolated instances and we have no evidence that there is a widespread problem that would justify removal of funeral directors' rights under the UCO.

As my hon. Friend rightly acknowledged, funeral businesses traditionally conduct themselves with discretion and sensitivity appropriate to the nature of their work. They adhere to their trade associations' code of conduct, which sets standards to address the more delicate aspects of their work. Funeral directors are well aware of the need to minimise as far as possible the distressing connotations of the service. Funeral businesses are generally perceived in their communities as an uncontroversial and, indeed, valued presence in residential and shopping areas.

While funeral directors' premises fall within the UCO, funeral directors' chapels of rest are generally treated separately. If I may lapse into Latin, the technical term is sui generis, that is, outside the use class system. Mortuaries would also be sui generis unless ancillary to some other use of land, such as a hospital or clinic. That is because such activities are more likely to have an impact on local amenity and generate concern. Sui generis uses require specific planning permission for any changes to or from that use. A planning application would, therefore, be required for a new chapel of rest or a mortuary. That gives the local planning authority the opportunity to assess the impact of the proposed change of use on amenity and on the environment, and to consider any representations from interested parties. Local authority environmental health officers also have responsibility for ensuring that the required public health and safety standards are in place in chapels of rest. In addition, Government guidance sets out recommended standards of siting and design for public mortuaries.

In cases where a chapel of rest forms part of a funeral directors' premises and is ancillary to it, it is for the local planning authority to determine, on the particular facts of each case, whether the premises as a whole should fall within the shops class. That is very much a matter of fact and degree. Ultimately, of course, interpretation of the law is for the courts.

Where a planning application is necessary, local authorities are required to determine the application in accordance with the development plan for the area unless material considerations indicate otherwise. Development plans must take account of central Government policies. Those policies may also be material to decisions on individual planning applications. The Government have not issued specific planning guidance relating to funeral directors uses. However, planning policy guidance note 6, on town centres and retail developments—PPG6—promotes A1 shop use in existing centres where they are easily reached by public transport and conveniently located for those without a car. PPG6 also promotes the retention of facilities in local centres and neighbourhood shops. The aim of the Government's planning policy is to contribute to the regeneration of existing town centres and high streets.

Sustaining town centres depends on flexibility in the use of floor space. It is widely recognised that vacant properties can blight town and district centres. The presence of outlets that provide essential services, such as funeral parlours, may, therefore, actually have the effect of protecting, and enhancing the prospects of, other businesses.

My hon. Friend also referred to changes of use within the A3 class. That class comprises uses for the sale of food and drink, and of hot food for consumption on the premises. Class A3 uses may include restaurants, cafes, wine bars, public houses and takeaway establishments. The class was introduced to reflect the loosening of the traditional boundaries between the different types of catering establishment. When my hon. Friend referred to Pret a Manger, in a sense he made my case by pointing out the difficulty of distinguishing between those premises where people may eat on the premises and those where they may take food away for consumption elsewhere. Those boundaries are increasingly blurred in the patterns of retailing that are becoming more familiar to us. The aim of the use class order is to enable the trade to adapt to changing trends and demands without making businesses operate in an unduly rigid framework.

In general, the freedom to change use within the food and drink class has caused little difficulty. However, we have received a number of representations, including comments from the London Planning Advisory Committee and the Local Government Association. Their anxiety is that some changes of use within the class—for example, the change to use to a themed pub or super-pub, to which my hon. Friend referred, or from a pub to a drive-through takeaway—can lead to new, or more, intensive activity and give rise to concerns about such issues as parking, noise and public order.

As my hon. Friend acknowledged, there are extensive controls outside the planning system that local authorities can use to remedy problems such as those. For example, local authorities have wide-ranging powers to prevent or abate noise under part III of the Environmental Protection Act 1990. In addition, under sections 93 and 94 of that Act, local authorities can issue a street litter control notice, which requires the occupier to take steps to keep the area free of litter. That may involve sweeping, or providing and servicing litter bins. Failure to comply with the order could result in action through the magistrates court.

Under the Licensing Act 1964, it is open to magistrates to revoke, or to refuse to renew, licences for public houses and to impose certain other remedies where local residents are suffering unreasonable noise and nuisance. My hon. Friend will be aware that the Home Office is currently undertaking a review of liquor licensing laws. Those controls are all part of the wider picture. Having said that, I know that there are concerns about the existing planning controls and I can assure my hon. Friend that we are giving them very careful consideration. I hope that he will accept those assurances in the spirit in which he opened the debate.

[Mr. Nick Raynsford]

My hon. Friend is concerned about the change from light industrial to office use permitted by the B1 class. The 1987 UCO amalgamated those formerly separate classes. The change was, in part, prompted by the changing relationship between industrial and office uses, especially in the field of high technology, and because those uses appeared to have no significantly different environmental impact. The changes were designed to afford more flexibility in the use of premises and thus to foster enterprise in local communities.

My hon. Friend is concerned that the freedom to change to office use might have had an adverse impact, and other hon. Members have made representations on the grounds that it might lead to a fall in light industrial premises and a decline in business diversity. In the past few years, we have received few representations about the issue, other than from the City of Westminster in respect of specific local problems. As with the issues relating to the A3 class, we are considering the points that have been made.

The recent White Paper, "The Future of Transport" contained a commitment to look for ways of improving the planning system's delivery of an integrated transport strategy, including a review of the UCO and relevant aspects of the permitted development order. Our intention is to examine the changes of use allowed under the UCO and part 3 of schedule 2 to the permitted development order to establish what transport implications they may have, in terms of traffic generation and car parking. That work might involve considering some of the use classes mentioned in today's debate.

In conclusion, the Government are well aware that there are aspects of the UCO that have caused concern in some locations and in some particular cases. However, we would need evidence of more widespread and significant problems to justify amending the UCO, which currently affords valuable freedoms and flexibilities that enable businesses to respond appropriately to changing economic and market circumstances and trends. We shall continue to monitor closely the operation of the order.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing these issues to my attention today. I assure him that the debate will contribute significantly to the Government's continuing interest in those matters, and to the monitoring of the performance of the use class order and the general permitted development rights.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at two minutes past Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 24 May 1999

DEFENCE

Territorial Army

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was (a) the ceiling on personnel numbers and (b) the actual strength of the Territorial Army in each month between May 1998 and May 1999; and if he will make a statement. [83629]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 12 May 1999]: The following is the information.

TA strengths by month May 1998 to April 1999

Month	Total
May 1998	55,735
June 1998	55,612
July 1998	55,070
August 1998	54,737
September 1998	54,145
October 1998	53,847
November 1998	54,430
December 1998	54,031
January 1999	53,466
February 1999	52,312
March 1999	51,456
April 1999	50,438

Note:
Figures do not include Non Regular Permanent Staff (NRPS)

The establishment of the Territorial Army between 1 May 1998 and 1 May 1999 was 69,000. There is no ceiling on TA personnel. The drawdown in numbers evident from the start of 1999 reflects the gradual drawdown to the post SDR establishment of 41,204. It is our intention to recruit to the full establishment.

RAF Aircraft (Sales)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many surplus RAF aircraft have been sold in each of the last five years; and to whom they were sold. [84567]

Mr. Spellar: The numbers of surplus RAF aircraft including helicopters sold in each of the last five years by the MOD's Disposal Sales Agency were as follows:

Year
1994	154
1995	54
1996	34
1997	61
1998	45

A small number of these aircraft were sold to the armed forces of India, Oman, Uruguay and Sri Lanka. The majority, however, went to over 130 UK and overseas commercial enterprises and individuals. To identify each of these, and to seek their agreement to being named, would incur disproportionate cost.

Falklands Garrison

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer of 10 May 1999, Official Report, column 19, on the Falklands garrison, what is the strategic reason for maintaining a garrison in the Falklands; and if he will make a statement. [84899]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Our garrison on the Falkland Islands is a demonstration of the Government's commitment to ensure the security of the Falkland Islands and to uphold the right of the Islanders to determine their own future. We will continue to provide a garrison comprising air, and land sea assets, backed up by the capability to reinforce if necessary.

Eurofighter

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the first full squadron of Eurofighter aircraft will be in service with the RAF; and what was the original date expected. [82522]

Mr. George Robertson: I am withholding this information in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information relating to Defence, Security and International Relations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Members' Salaries

Mr. Ashton: To ask the President of the Council if she will list the increases in Members' salaries and office expenses from 1971 to 1999. [84123]

Mrs. Beckett: The information requested is as follows:

Parliamentary Salary (£)	Effective date
3,250	16 October 1964
4,500	1 January 1972
5,750	13 June 1975
6,062	13 June 1976
6,270	13 June 1977
6,897	13 June 1978
9,450	13 June 1979
11,750	13 June 1980
13,950	13 June 1981
14,510	13 June 1982
15,308	13 June 1983
16,016	1 January 1984
16,904	1 January 1985
17,702	1 January 1986
18,500	1 January 1987
22,548	1 January 1988
24,107	1 January 1989
26,701	1 January 1990
28,970	1 January 1991
30,854	1 January 1992
30,854	1 January 1993
31,687	1 January 1994
33,189	1 January 1995
34,085	January 1996

Parliamentary Salary (£)	Effective date
43,000	1 July 1996
43,860	1 April 1997
45,066	1 April 1998
47,008	1 April 1999

Note:
Until 1 July 1996, Ministers in the House of Commons received an abated amount of the parliamentary salary.

Allowance for office expenses (£)	Effective date
500	1 October 1969
1,000	1 January 1972
1,750	1 April 1974
3,200	1 April 1975
3,512	13 June 1976
3,687	13 June 1977
4,200	13 June 1978
4,600	13 June 1979
6,750	14 February 1980
8,000	13 June 1980
8,480	13 June 1981
8,820	13 June 1982
12,000	13 June 1983
12,437	13 June 1984
13,211	1 April 1985
20,140	1 April 1986
21,302	1 April 1987
22,588	1 April 1988
24,903	1 April 1989
27,166	1 April 1990
28,986	1 April 1991
39,960	1 April 1992
40,380	1 April 1993
41,309	1 April 1994
42,754	1 April 1995
46,364	1 April 1996
47,569	1 April 1997
49,232	1 April 1998
50,264	1 April 1999

Note:
From 1 April 1980 an additional allowance of up to 10 per cent. of the sums shown has been available to provide pensions contributions for Members' employees.

WALES

Organic Farming

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to introduce measures to encourage farmers to shift to organic production methods. [84562]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The Organic Aid Scheme provides direct financial support for conversion to organic production. Subject to the approval of the European Commission, the payments rates available under this scheme will be increased to the following:

£s per hectare

	(a) Arable Area Payment Scheme eligible land	(b) Improved grassland	(c) Unimproved grassland/rough grazing
Year 1	225	175	25
Year 2	135	105	10
Year 3	50	40	5
Year 4	20	15	5
Year 5	20	15	5
Total	450	350	50

The Welsh Organic Food Sector Action Plan, launched in March, sets out an agenda for developing the organic sector in Wales, with the aim of encouraging an expansion of organic farming to 10 per cent. of Welsh agricultural produce.

The Organic Conversion Information Service will continue to provide free advice to prospective organic farmers.

In future, following the transfer of powers, these issues will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Health Service

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made, for each of the new NHS trust areas in Wales, of the number of posts which have been terminated in executive and directorate structures as a direct result of the recent reorganisation of the health service in Wales; and if he will make a statement. [84727]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Across the new NHS trusts in Wales the number of senior managerial posts has so far been reduced by a total of 80, as follows:

NHS Trusts	Senior managerial posts
Gwent Healthcare NHS Trust	12
Pontypridd and Rhondda NHS Trust	9
University Hospital of Wales and Llandough Hospital NHS Trust	5
Cardiff and District Community NHS Trust	4
Swansea NHS Trust	15
Bro Morgannwg NHS Trust	12
Carmarthenshire NHS Trust	5
North West Wales NHS Trust	4
Conwy and Denbighshire NHS Trust	5
North East Wales NHS Trust	9

Further reductions in managerial and administrative posts are expected to take place throughout the year.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the present regulations applying to genetically modified trial crops in respect of the need to prevent cross-contamination. [74864]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 5 March 1999]: The risk of cross pollination is assessed for each case as part of the approvals process and consent would not be granted if cross pollination would cause harm to human health or the environment.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 24 March 1999, Official Report, column 240, on genetically modified organisms, what was the name and position of the representative of the US State Department who made the representation to his Department. [80835]

Mr. Meacher: The US representative was Mr. Frank Loy, Under Secretary for Global Affairs at the State Department.

Advisory Committee on Releases into the Environment

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria he will employ in appointing new members of the Advisory Committee on Releases into the Environment. [81387]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 19 April 1999]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend, the Member for Wellingborough (Mr. Stinchcombe) on 11 May 1999, Official Report, columns 106–07.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the outturn, estimated outturn or planned level of core investment excluding the Jubilee line extension in London Transport for the years 1993–94 to 1999–2000, in 1999 prices. [82419]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The requested information is in the table.

Constant 1998–99 prices in £ million

	LUL	PFI[1]	LTB and other LT Businesses[2]	Total core business investment excluding JLE[3]
1993–94[4]	556	0	38	594
1994–95[4]	563	0	28	591
1995–96	522	122	31	675
1996–97	395	145	24	564
1997–98	334	165	37	536
1998–99[5]	415	53	35	503
1999–2000[6]	335	161	29	525

[1] The PFI figures are not estimates of what the private sector is investing in London Transport. Rather they are London Transport's estimates of what investment in PFI projects would have cost had LT undertaken the investment themselves.
[2] LTB and other LT Businesses include LT Buses, LT Property, Victoria Coach Station, PASS, LT Museum and Group Services.
[3] Also excluding other smaller ring fenced activities including Croydon Tramlink, Dial-a-Ride, Crossrail, LUL works at Kings Cross for the Channel Tunnel Rail Link and London River Services pier purchase and construction.
[4] 1993–94 and 1994–95 include expenditure by London Buses Limited subsidiaries, which have since been sold to the private sector.
[5] Estimate
[6] Planned

Conventional Plant Breeding

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the environmental impact of herbicide-resistant oil seed rape varieties created by conventional plant breeding methods; what controls exist on such plants; and if he will make a statement; [82071]

(2) what recent assessment he has made of the adequacy of the regulatory systems for crops created by conventional plant breeding in respect of their potential environmental impact. [82072]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 April 1999]: No formal assessment has been made of the environmental impact of herbicide-resistant oil seed rape varieties created by conventional plant breeding methods or the adequacy of the regulatory systems for crops created by conventional plant breeding in respect of their potential environmental impact.

However, concern over the environmental implications of herbicide-tolerant crops (whether produced by genetic modification or conventional methods) have been raised on several occasions by the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE), in particular in their annual reports for 1996–97 and 1998.

The Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food is co-funding research on the management of genetically modified herbicide tolerant crops through the so-called BRIGHT project.

The guidelines developed by the industry grouping SCIMAC (Supply Chain Initiative on Modified Agricultural Crops) for growing herbicide tolerant crops also applies to both conventionally bred and genetically modified crops.

In their report on the EC Regulation of Genetic Modification in Agriculture at paragraph 178, the House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities recommended that, from now on, any crop with novel traits which may have the potential to impact significantly on the environment should be subject to an oversight system.

In responding, the Government recognised that regulating on the basis of process rather than product could lead to anomalies and undertook to ask ACRE to advise what might be done to address the issue raised by the Committee. ACRE have now taken this task on. However the Government consider it right that the focus is on the genetic modification of organisms since this can result in the crossing of species barriers where potential risks have to be particularly carefully assessed and managed. The EC legislation on genetically modified organisms reflects this view.

Road Traffic

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the volume of road traffic which is accounted for by journeys to and from places of work. [83041]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 5 May 1999]: In 1997, the volume of road traffic accounted for by journeys to and from places of work was about 97 billion km, 26 per cent. of the total of 368 billion km for all car and taxi traffic in Great Britain.

British Transport Police

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with representatives of British Transport Police on the future role and responsibilities of their service; and if he will make a statement. [84744]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government announced on 31 July 1998, Official Report, column 637, their intention to seek to establish, when a suitable legislative opportunity arises, an independent national police authority for the British Transport Police (BTP). Subject to Parliament's approval the legislation would also place the jurisdiction of the BTP for all railway land (including the London Underground and the Docklands Light Railway) on a statutory basis. Following consultation the Home Secretary is also considering an extension to the BTP's jurisdiction outside the railways in specific circumstances. If acceptable this would also be included within the legislation. My officials meet regularly with senior officers from the BTP to discuss a range of issues.

Limestone Pavements

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to implement the measures to protect limestone pavements in the United Kingdom proposed by the Wildlife Trusts. [83843]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 20 May 1999]: Limestone Pavement is a priority habitat under both the Habitats Directive and the UK Biodiversity Action Plan. Under the latter, the Wildlife Trusts are members of the Limestone Pavement Working Group, which is seeking to ensure no further losses in extent or quality. The Group is preparing a report on what further measures may be necessary, and I shall consider any recommendations carefully.

Recycling

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will specify in contracts between his Department and construction companies the use of a minimum percentage of recycled materials; and if he will make a statement. [84898]

Mr. Raynsford: The Department follows the advice of the "Green guide for managers on the government estate", published in March 1999 to promote more sustainable construction. This guidance refers to the importance of using recycled materials and ensuring future recyclability in obtaining best value. The Environment Agency has adopted a target for the engineering works it procures that 20 per cent. of the aggregates used should be from secondary sources, while the Highways Agency is encouraging the adoption of material specifications which make recycling technically practical.

The Department is helping the Government Construction Clients' Panel to develop a methodology for assessing how well Departments and Agencies procure and manage their built assets against indicators of sustainability, which are expected to include criteria relating to the re-use and recycling of materials. In addition, the Department is working with representatives of the whole construction industry to develop a strategy for more sustainable construction. This strategy, which will set out how the industry intends to contribute to sustainable development, is due to be published later this year.

Butterflies (GM Pollen)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the effect of genetically modified pollen on butterflies. [85285]

Mr. Meacher: I am aware of the recent report in "Nature" about the possible adverse effects of pollen from genetically modified insect resistant maize on the Monarch Butterfly in America. The maize in question has had a gene from a naturally occurring soil bacterium "Bacillus thuringiensis (Bt)" inserted which allows it to produce a toxin that kills corn boring insects.

Information from this laboratory study will be considered carefully, and ACRE will be asked to advise about the implications for existing approvals for the planting of this GM crop in the European Community. The GM crop used in the study is not being released in the United Kingdom, either experimentally or commercially. Since the European Corn Borer, the pest controlled by the Bt toxin, does not occur in the UK, this GM crop is unlikely to be grown here.

DETR are aware of potential risks of GM insect resistant crops to non-target and beneficial organisms, and are funding research to investigate these. This research will underpin regulatory decision making and inform ACRE's deliberations.

SSA Review

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the objectives of the standard spending assessment review. [84968]

Mr. Meale: The broad objectives of the review of revenue grant distribution are set out in paragraph 5.16 of the White Paper, "Modern Local Government—In Touch with the People". These are:

> to investigate thoroughly whether there is a better way of determining the distribution of revenue support grant which is simpler, more stable, more robust and fairer than the present arrangements for SSAs.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what meetings he has had with Ministers of other Departments in connection with the review of standard spending assessments. [84969]

Mr. Meale: Details of meetings between Ministers are not disclosed in line with exemption 2 of part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Local Authorities (West Midlands)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures his Department has taken to develop mechanisms for sharing (a) information and (b) best practice between local authorities in the West Midlands. [85273]

Mr. Meale: The Government have established the Beacon Council Scheme to spread best practice among all local authorities. Beacon councils will host a nationwide programme of open days and other events which will enable all councils to share their experiences and learn from the best. Applications for beacon council status, to be made by 31 July, have now been invited with publication of the brochure, "The Beacon Council Scheme: How to apply".

Walking and Cycling

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what measures the Government are taking to increase walking and cycling in urban areas. [85260]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department is supporting the implementation of the National Cycling Strategy and we are about to publish a national strategy for encouraging walking.

We have made it clear to local highway authorities that we expect to see local cycling strategies and local walking strategies included in their Local Transport Plans. We have already issued detailed guidance to authorities on the features to be covered in Local Transport Plans.

We shall continue to publish technical advice for local authorities on measures and designs which will benefit cyclists and pedestrians.

Busking

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he will make a decision on London Transport's proposals for changes in their byelaws concerning busking. [85319]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Regional Transport and the train operating companies are in the process of making new byelaws. The majority of operators have submitted new byelaws to the Secretary of State. Once those from the remaining companies are received, the Secretary of State will consider all the representations from affected persons made in connection with the byelaws. In due course he will make a decision to approve, modify or refuse the byelaws.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to consult buskers on the proposed London Transport byelaw changes relating to busking; and if he will make a statement. [85321]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There are no provisions in the legislation requiring the Secretary of State to consult interested parties before he makes his decision to approve, modify or refuse London Regional Transport's new byelaws. This was an issue for London Regional Transport to consider before they made their new byelaws. London Regional Transport were required to advertise the byelaws and invite persons affected to make representation to the Secretary of State. The Secretary of State will consider any representations, including those from buskers, before he makes his decision.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what criteria London Transport intends to apply when giving permission for individuals to busk on London Underground. [85320]

Ms Glenda Jackson: London Regional Transport have submitted new byelaws to the Secretary of State for his approval which would allow them to give written permission to buskers. The criteria to be applied would be a matter for London Regional Transport.

Air Circulation (Aeroplanes)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what regulations exist concerning the frequency with which air is circulated in planes; and what changes there have been to these in the past three years; [84790]

(2) what representations he has received about air circulation in planes; and what proposals he has to change the regulations relating to the circulation of air on planes; [84791]

(3) what health risks are associated with inadequate air circulation on planes; and what monitoring activity he undertakes. [84792]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We regularly receive correspondence from Members of Parliament and the public on this issue.

The standards for the ventilation of the passenger compartments of aircraft form part of the requirements under which individual aircraft types are certificated. The standard for new types of aircraft being placed on the UK register is contained in Joint Aviation Requirement 25—Large Aeroplanes. These requirements have not been changed in the last three years. However, they are in the process of being amended to reduce the maximum permitted amount of carbon dioxide to bring them into line with the equivalent US requirement.

The degree of re-circulation is determined by the aircraft designer and in some cases may be adjusted by the crew. Even when the air conditioning is set at its lowest level, the air in a modern aircraft cabin is changed every three minutes on average. The oxygen used by passengers is a small proportion, approximately 5 per cent. of the oxygen supplied at the minimum flow rate. The oxygen level in the cabin therefore remains at around 20 per cent. for the duration of a flight, which is almost the same as normal atmospheric oxygen levels.

There is no evidence of links between air quality, flow rates and the spread of disease. The filters used in most modern aircraft are similar to those used in critical wards of hospitals, operating theatres and burns units, and provide protection against the circulation of biological agents such as viruses. However, the spread of disease is facilitated when large numbers of people gather in close proximity. This has nothing to do with air quality but is a matter of personal contact.

While the re-circulation of air poses no risk, the air pressure in aircraft in flight, which is roughly equivalent to the atmospheric pressure at 8,000 feet above sea level, can affect people with respiratory diseases such as bronchitis, emphysema and bronchiolitis. Those affected are advised to consult their own doctor and the airline before travelling.

We have no plans to seek further changes to the JAR-25 requirements on air quality.

White Asbestos

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on progress being made on banning the importation, sale and use of white asbestos. [84877]

Mr. Meacher: On 25 May the Health and Safety Commission will consider draft Regulations to restrict further importation, supply and use of white asbestos. I expect to receive their recommendations by the end of the month.

Fireworks

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the levels of harassment and nuisance caused by misuse of fireworks. [84694]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

Fireworks, provided they are used sensibly and safely, can provide pleasant entertainment. I am, however, aware that the thoughtless misuse of fireworks by a small element of the population, mostly unsupervised children, can result in local disturbance, nuisance and harassment.

It is important, therefore, to regulate the sale of fireworks. Relevant legislation comprises the Explosives Act 1875, as modified by the Control of Explosives Regulations 1991 and as amended by the Explosives (Age of Purchase) Act 1976, the Consumer Protection Act 1987 and the Fireworks (Safety) Regulations 1997. Under the 1875 Act, it is an offence to discharge a firework in a street or public place. The 1997 Regulations, among other provisions, make it an offence to sell certain types of firework to any members of the general public and to sell other types to anyone under 18, or in some cases, under 16. There is a maximum penalty of £5,000 or six months' imprisonment or both.

For over 20 years, Government-organised firework safety awareness campaigns run in collaboration with local authority trading standards departments, fire services and the fireworks industry have aimed to heighten awareness of the dangers from the misuse of fireworks. The Government consider the safety of the public as paramount and will keep under consideration the effectiveness and coherence of legislation, policies and strategies to ensure that problems and potential problems are addressed in a practical way.

European Nuclear Installations

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what risk assessment exercises have been undertaken with other European countries concerning the potential threat to the United Kingdom population from their nuclear installations over the millennium period. [84256]

Mr. Battle: I have been asked to reply.

The UK has long been aware of the potential risks from nuclear installations over the millennium period and has been co-operating for several years with countries in Europe and beyond, both on a bilateral basis and through the European Union, International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) and the OECD's Nuclear Energy Agency (NEA), to help ensure that any risks are properly addressed. The UK's nuclear safety regulator—the Health and Safety Executive's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII)—keeps in proactive touch with the considerable activity in other countries to address safety issues and continues to follow developments closely.

In the event of any nuclear emergency, the IAEA and the European Union have established and tested international systems for early notification of any overseas nuclear accident. The UK also has bilateral arrangements for the early notification of any nuclear accident with a number of overseas governments. The Government's National Response Plan, co-ordinated by the Development of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, makes arrangements for the UK's response in dealing with any consequences of an overseas nuclear accident. This is supported by the RIMNET national radiation monitoring system, which gives the UK a second independent warning mechanism, should for any reason the early notification system fail.

PRIME MINISTER

European Army

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has held with President Prodi on the establishment of a European army. [84092]

The Prime Minister: There is no question of creating a European army and there have therefore been no discussions on this matter with Mr. Prodi. We have, of course, already identified a need for renewed debate on European Union common foreign and security policy and the statement of principles agreed at the British-French Summit at St. Malo was an important step forward. Our aim is clear: to enable the European Union to have a more united and influential voice in world affairs. This must be backed up, when the need arises, by effective military capability. We are taking a leading role in this debate. We have, however, made clear that the deployment of forces must remain a decision for national Governments.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to hold regular formal meetings with the first Ministers of (a) the Scottish Parliament and (b) the National Assembly for Wales; and if he will make a statement. [84629]

The Prime Minister: I will meet Ministers and Secretaries from the devolved administrations from time to time.

Iraq

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 12 May 1999, Official Report, column 309, for what reasons the Government have made no assessment of the effect of depleted uranium on the water supply, and water-table and on the health of the civilian population in Iraq. [84579]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 18 May 1999]: The Government have not seen any peer-reviewed epidemiological research data to support the claims that there has been an increase in ill-health in southern Iraq, attributed to the use of depleted uranium based ammunition by coalition forces during the 1990–1991 conflict.

The Government understand however that the World Health Organisation is in discussion with the Government of Iraq about proposals to improve health care in Iraq. The proposals—which are still at the outline stage—will only be developed into more detailed documents if the Iraqi Government decide to take the proposals forward.

Cabinet Meetings

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to answer questions on the length of Cabinet meetings. [85062]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on 30 April 1999, Official Report, column 281.

Horse Industry

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Prime Minister if he will assess the advantages of designating a lead department to deal with Government responsibilities in respect of the horse industry. [85209]

The Prime Minister: The Government recognise the economic importance of the horse industry in rural areas. A number of Government Departments currently have responsibility for different aspects of the horse industry and the division of these responsibilities is kept under review.

Cancer Treatment

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to co-ordinate a meeting to discuss new cancer treatment initiatives. [85077]

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) on 20 May 1999, Official Report, columns 401–02.

HEALTH

Psychiatric Staff

Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many black and ethnic minority (a) psychiatrists and (b) community psychiatric nurses are currently registered in England and Wales. [84111]

Mr. Denham: The information available for England is given in the tables. These figures refer to England only. The statistics for Wales are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

The Department is reviewing the collection of ethnic statistics with a view to improving the quality and coverage of the information we collect.

NHS Hospital and Community Health Services (HCHS): All doctors in the psychiatric speciality by ethnic group: England at 30 September 1997 — Numbers

		Ethnic groups
	All staff	White	Black	Asian	Other	Not known
Psychiatry Group	6,620	4,300	310	950	620	450
Child and adolescent psychiatry	750	570	20	70	40	50
Forensic psychiatry	280	190	10	30	20	20
General psychiatry	4,220	2,640	220	650	410	290
Learning disabilities	500	300	20	90	60	30
Psychiatry of old age	710	460	30	100	80	40
Psychotherapy	180	140	0	10	10	20

Notes:
1. Figures rounded to nearest 10
2. '0' denotes 5 or less
3. Totals may not equal sum of components due to rounding

Source:
Department of Health—medical and dental workforce census

Number of staff in psychiatry group by ethnic groups and grade in England at 30 September 1997 — Numbers

		Ethnic groups
	All staff	White	Black	Asian	Other	Not known
All staff	6,620	4,300	310	950	620	450
Consultant	2,450	1,770	70	260	180	170
Staff Grade	300	120	20	80	60	20
Associate Specialist	180	60	0	70	40	10
Registrar Group	1,280	910	70	130	100	70
Senior House Officer	1,380	790	120	220	130	110
House Officer	10	0	—	0	—	0
Hospital Practitioner	60	40	—	10	0	0
Clinical Assistant	980	610	20	180	110	60
Other	0	0	—	0	0	—

Notes:
1. Figures rounded to nearest 10
2. '—' denotes zero
3. '0' denotes 5 or less
4. Totals may not equal sum of components due to rounding

Source:
Department of Health—medical and dental workforce census

NHS Hospital and Community Health Services (HCHS): Nurses working in the area of community psychiatry, by ethnicity, in England as at 30 September 1997

Wte

	All staff	Ethnic groups White	Black	Asian	Other	Not known
Total	10,720	9,200	430	190	510	390
Manager	190	170	10	10	10	*
Other 1st Level	8,380	7,120	290	160	380	250
Other 2nd Level	430	300	20	*	10	20
Nursing Assistant/Auxiliary	1,720	1,620	110	20	110	120

Notes:
1. Figures should be treated with caution as they are based upon the 68 per cent. of HCHS organisations reported 90 per cent. or more valid ethnic codes for non-medical staff.
2. Figures exclude learners and agency staff.
3. Figures are rounded to the nearest ten.
4. Due to rounding totals may not equal the sum of component parts.

Source:
Department of Health Non-Medical Workforce Census

Cancer Screening

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each type of cancer the type and effectiveness of the screening tests currently available on the NHS; and if he will make a statement. [84688]

Mr. Hutton: There are currently two cancer screening programmes routinely available on the National Health Service.

The NHS Breast Screening Programme invites women aged 50–64 years for screening by mammography every three years. Since 1988 when the programme was introduced the United Kingdom death rate from breast cancer has been falling faster than the European average. Based on current detection rates it is estimated that the programme is saving up to 1,250 lives each year.

The NHS Cervical Screening programme invites women aged 20–64 years for a PAP test at least every five years. The test is designed to detect cervical abnormalities which if left undetected and untreated might develop into cancer. The incidence of cervical cancer has been falling at a rate of about 7 per cent. each year since the national programme was introduced in 1988 and experts estimate that the programme prevents around 3,900 cases of cancer per year. Further evidence from the Imperial Cancer Research Fund suggests that the cervical screening programme may have prevented 800 deaths in 1997.

Fluoride

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received about the addition of fluoride to drinking water in Staffordshire; and if he will make a statement. [84767]

Ms Jowell: The Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation", invited comments on the contribution which fluoridation can make to improved oral health. Of the 604 comments received from the West Midlands region 595 were in favour of fluoridation and nine opposed. We will be announcing our policy on fluoridation in a White Paper on public health which will be published shortly.

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the elective waiting list totals for the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital for each month from May 1995 to date. [84861]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is in the table.

Date	Total waiting list
June 1995	4,201
September 1995	4,269
December 1995	4,481
March 1996	4,358
June 1996	4,325
September 1996	4,083
December 1996	3,990
March 1997	4,245
June 1997	4,047
September 1997	4,057
December 1997	4,653
March 1998	5,422
May 1998	5,482
June 1998	5,362
July 1998	4,996
August 1998	4,827
September 1998	4,601
October 1998	4,337
November 1998	4,095
December 1998	4,058
January 1999	4,050
February 1999	3,966
March 1999	4,083

Eye Tests (Pensioners)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate how many pensioners in Shrewsbury and Atcham have had free eye tests since their introduction. [84864]

Mr. Denham: We estimate that there are some 21,000 residents aged 60 and over in Shrewsbury and Atcham and will therefore be eligible for a free National Health Service sight test. Some will have already been eligible for NHS tests on income grounds or because of predisposition to eye disease.

NHS Board Directors

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many directors serve on National Health Service trust boards operating in (a) Doncaster and (b) Barnsley; and how many of those directors reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency. [84988]

Mr. Denham: The current non-executive directors serving on the boards of National Health Service trusts operating in Barnsley and Doncaster are shown in the table. Information is not held centrally on the Parliamentary constituencies in which directors reside.

Name	Post type	Appointment	Term	Post town
Barnsley Community and Priority Services NHS Trust
Councillor Thomas Sheard	Chairman	1 December 1997	30 November 2001	Barnsley
Mr. Brian Key	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1997	30 November 2000	Barnsley
Mrs. Josephine Ruth Lees	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1996	30 November 1999	Barnsley
Mrs. Margaret Michaels	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1997	30 November 2001	Sheffield
Mr. Keith Ellis	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1998	30 November 1999	Barnsley
Mr. William Newman	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1997	30 November 2001	Barnsley
Barnsley District General Hospital NHS Trust
Mr. Gordon E. Firth	Chairman	1 November 1998	31 October 2000	Barnsley
Ms Lynn Joyce Ambler	Non-Executive Director	1 November 1996	31 October 2000	Barnsley
Mr. C. Barry Taylor	Non-Executive Director	9 November 1998	31 October 2001	Barnsley
Mrs. Linda Burgess	Non-Executive Director	9 November 1998	31 October 2001	Near Barnsley
Mr. Robert Walker	Non-Executive Director	1 November 1996	31 October 2000	Sheffield
Mrs. Judith Watts	Non-Executive Director	4 November 1997	31 October 2001	Barnsley
Doncaster Healthcare NHS Trust
Mr. David Bertram	Chairman	19 December 1997	30 November 2001	Doncaster
Mrs. Sheila Bryant	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1996	30 November 2000	Doncaster
Councillor Jean Maureen Elwick	Non-Executive Director	16 December 1997	30 November 2001	Doncaster
Mr. Graham K. Vaughan	Non-Executive Director	27 October 1998	30 November 2001	Doncaster
Mr. David Charles Miller	Non-Executive Director	11 December 1996	30 November 2000	Doncaster
Doncaster Royal Infirmary and Montagu Hospital NHS Trust
Mr. Richard D. Kitson	Chairman	1 December 1996	30 November 2000	Doncaster
Mrs. Janet Conroy	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1998	30 November 2002	Near Doncaster
Mr. Thomas J. Keegan	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1998	30 November 2002	Doncaster
Mrs. June Hawley	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1997	30 November 2001	Near Doncaster
Mrs. Carol Shekle	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1996	30 November 2000	Doncaster
Mr. Colin D. Ambler	Non-Executive Director	12 October 1998	30 November 2001	Doncaster
South Yorkshire Metropolitan Ambulance and Paramedic Service NHS Trust
Dr. Bernard Kingston	Chairman	16 January 1998	31 May 1999	Sheffield
Mrs. Patricia Battersby	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1998	30 November 2000	Sheffield
Mrs. Sandra Holland	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1997	30 November 2001	Doncaster
Mr. Sean Mahon	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1995	30 November 1999	Sheffield
Mrs. Anita Cartner	Non-Executive Director	1 December 1998	30 November 2001	Rotherham

Millennium Working

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce a national scheme to compensate nurses who will be working over the millennium period. [84977]

Mr. Denham: We have no plans to agree any new specific national arrangements for staff over the millennium period. Guidance was issued to the National Health Service in Health Service Circular 1999/097, copies of which are available in the Library.

Anaphylaxis

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what advice is issued by his Department to local education authorities over the treatment of children of school age suffering anaphylactic allergic reactions; [85264]

(2) what advice his Department has received on the appropriate treatment of anaphylactic allergic reactions in school children, from (a) the Anaphylaxis Campaign and (b) professional bodies; [85265]

(3) what guidelines his Department has issued to local health authorities on the provision of advice to local education authorities in developing care plans for pupils suffering from potentially life-threatening medical conditions. [85266]

Ms Jowell: The Department and the Department for Education and Employment issued joint guidance in October 1996 on "Supporting pupils with medical needs in schools". The guidance, which was sent to health authorities and local education authorities, covers treatment and the development of healthcare plans for pupils suffering from potentially life threatening medical conditions, including anaphylaxis. It was produced after extensive consultation with interested parties, including professional bodies and voluntary organisations such as the Anaphylaxis Campaign.

In March 1999 the Department and the Department for Education and Employment launched a new website, "Wired for Health", to provide teachers with health information on a range of conditions, including anaphylaxis. The website gives direct access to advice from the Anaphylaxis Campaign on anaphylaxis and schools.

Long-term Care

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 321, concerning long-term care, if his Department will assist interested bodies in promoting a full public debate on the findings of the Royal Commission. [85057]

Mr. Hutton: The Royal Commission's report has already stimulated an important debate on this complex issue and the Department has been happy to assist that, as well as responding to the hundreds of contributions received in correspondence from individuals and organisations. We will continue to take account of the views of all interested parties and use these to inform decisions we make on the proposals over the coming months.

Cancer Treatment Initiatives

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to co-ordinate a meeting to discuss new cancer treatment initiatives. [85078]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Marsden) on 20 May 1999, Official Report, columns 401–02.

Medical Student Places

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to publish his list of new medical student places. [85079]

Mr. Denham: Allocation of student places to universities in England is the responsibility of the Higher Education Funding Council for England. The Funding Council is working with my Department to produce recommendations for the allocation of additional medical student places, and an announcement is expected in the next few weeks.

Investing in Dentistry

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what reasons underlay the refusal of the bid for funding under the Investing in Dentistry scheme submitted by Paul Carlin of Shipley Bridge, South Brent, Devon; [84078]

(2) how many dental practices in England and Wales have received funding under the Investing in Dentistry project in each year since its inception; and if he will provide a breakdown of what it has been spent on. [84206]

Mr. Denham: The Investing in Dentistry (IID) initiative only applied to General Dental Services in England. IID was launched in September 1997 and continued until April this year. Requests for funding could be submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State at any time during this period. To date, 282 IID funding requests have been approved, primarily to help towards the cost of opening new dental practices, relocating existing practices to larger premises, and providing extra surgeries. A further 140 are currently being assessed.

Mr. Carlin's Investing in Dentistry funding request was refused because it did not meet the requirements of the IID scheme. The criteria used in deciding on proposals is set out in the circular Health Service Guidance (97) 38, copies of which are available in the Library.

Nursing Homes (Care Costs)

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the average cost of four years' care in a nursing home. [75527]

Mr. Hutton: The average cost of four years' care in a nursing home for elderly people is estimated to be £73,000.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of (a) those people who have been in long-term care or nursing homes for four years or more and (b) all people in long-term care or nursing homes continue to pay part or all of their fees. [75528]

Mr. Hutton: Information is not collected in the form requested, but we estimate that about 9 per cent. of people in nursing homes make no contribution to the cost of their care as they have been placed by the National Health Service. All others contribute in part or in full.

Aricept

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of (a) the social costs and benefits of Aricept for Alzheimer's patients and (b) the savings in respite and other long-term care resulting from the use of Aricept. [84274]

Mr. Hutton: The Department has made no such assessment.

The Health Technology Assessment (HTA) programme is considering a research project looking at "new drugs for dementia". Full proposals will be considered at a specially convened meeting in June which will include Professor Tom Walley (Chair of the HTA pharmaceutical Panel) and Professor Kent Woods (Director of HTA). Due account will be taken of the findings of the AD 2000 project, a large trial organised through West Midlands National Health Service Regional Office, which has included consideration of the social costs and benefits of Aricept for Alzheimer's disease and the savings in respite and other long-term care resulting in the use of Aricept.

Audiology Services

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what cost benefit analysis his Department has carried out or draws upon to inform its current policy towards the supply of digital hearing aids through the NHS. [84304]

Mr. Hutton: Digital technology in hearing aids is very new so at this stage only manufacturers' evaluations are available and there is no independent cost benefit analysis. National Heath Service trusts purchase hearing aids from a range that is supplied by the NHS Supplies Authority and they may also purchase hearing aids from commercial suppliers to meet individual clinical need.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

NATO Operations

Mr. Malins: To ask the Attorney-General if he will place in the Library copies of the external legal advice taken by Her Majesty's Government on the legality of the present NATO operations against Serbia. [85076]

The Attorney-General: Any legal advice taken by Her Majesty's Government on this, or on any other matter, is subject to legal privilege and thus confidential.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Postal Services (Pathway Scheme)

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if he will make a statement on the implications for the Post Office of the Pathway Scheme; [84051]

(2) what evaluation he has made of the role of information technology in developing postal and other services in rural areas; [84054]

(3) what evaluation he has made of the benefits of the Pathway project for the viability of sub-post offices. [84052]

Mr. Byers [holding answers 13 May 1999]: The Government today reached agreement in principle with ICL about the continuation of the Horizon project to computerise the Post Office network and automate the payment of benefits.

The changes to the Horizon project are aimed to put it on a sustainable footing for the future and allow the Post Office to move as quickly as possible to the computerisation of post office counter services.

The main elements of the agreement are:

First, we will be moving forward as planned, as quickly as possible with the automation of Post Office Counter services. For the first time ever, Post Offices will have an up to date automation platform, helping them to provide a better service to their customers, and representing a major investment in the future of the nationwide network of Post Offices.

We have agreed with ICL to remove the magnetic strip benefit payment card from the project. Given the delays, this is now an outdated concept and the Banks, among others, are already moving away from magnetic strip in favour of the next generation technology—the smart card. For the future, we intend to move from the traditional paper-based methods of payment to a more modern and efficient way of paying benefits through the Post Office network, building on banking technology. POCL and DSS/BA will be working together on plans to introduce the new arrangements in 2003. The Government can give an assurance that those benefit recipients who wish to collect their benefits in cash at Post Offices will continue to be able to do so.

In the interim, we will be using bar-coding on order books to tackle benefit fraud. This will provide savings of around £100 million a year, a saving originally promised by the last administration but not yet delivered.

We and ICL believe the target of achieving the computerisation of the network of 18,000 Post Offices by the end of 2001 is more realistic. This will give customers a better service and help to secure a viable future for the network of Post Offices.

Parental Leave

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bolton West, (Ms Kelly) of 12 May 1999, Official Report, columns 145–46, on parental leave, what estimate he has made of the average length of leave which will be taken by (a) mothers and (b) fathers. [85090]

Mr. Ian McCartney: For the purposes of the Regulatory Impact Assessment for the Employment Relations Bill, it was assumed that the average length of leave for those taking parental leave would be ten weeks for mothers and for fathers. A copy of the Regulatory Impact Assessment was placed in the Library of the House.

EU Structural Funds (Scotland)

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what protocols have been agreed between his Department and the Scottish Office in relation to the expenditure of European Structural Funds in Scotland and compliance with rules and conditions imposed by the European Union; and how he intends to apply such protocols to the funding of the proposed funicular railway on the Cairngorm. [85263]

Mr. Wills: There are no protocols agreed between my Department and the Scottish Office relating to European Structural Funds; the two Departments are working closely together to consider the impact of devolution. Administration of the Structural Funds in Scotland and funding of individual projects there are a matter for the Scottish Office.

Fuel Costs

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will request the Director General of Electricity Supply and Gas Supply to produce figures for the average annual cost of fuel used by (a) pensioners and (b) other domestic users. [84786]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 20 May 1999]: Energy consumption varies from household to household across the whole population. It is dependent on many factors, such as energy efficiency of the home, time spent in the property, size of property etc. Accurate and timely data on energy consumption by pensioners are not available.

Annual fuel bills for typical and low-volume household consumers are presented in the table. Bills are based on latest 1999 prices and include VAT.

£

	Electricity	Gas
Typical consumption[1]	263.70	302.59
Low volume consumption[2]	187.68	218.78

[1] Annual consumption 3,300 kWh for electricity, 18,000 kWh for gas

[2] Annual consumption 2,200 kWh for electricity, 12,000 kWh for gas

Partnership Fund

Mr. Coleman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will give further details about the proposed Partnership Fund. [85474]

Mr. Byers: The Government intend to make available up to £5 million over the next four years through the Partnership Fund. The fund will help develop partnerships at work by supporting partnership projects in the workplace and encouraging the spread of information about best practice.

Statutory authority for funding in this area is being sought through Clause 26 of the Employment Relations Bill. Support will be available for up to 50 per cent. of total eligible costs of individual projects, up to a limit of £50,000 support per project. It will be a requirement of support that projects should have matching funding of at least 50 per cent. from non-public sector sources.

The Fund will be launched and a first call for proposals announced once the Employment Relations Bill has received Royal Assent.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

National Lottery (Scotland)

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will provide a breakdown of National Lottery Funds distributed by Scottish local authority area for each year since the National Lottery was set up. [84366]

Mr. Banks: To date 6,164 awards worth a total of £615,445,091 have been made in Scotland. This total includes Scotland-wide projects and projects which cannot be allocated to a particular local authority. A breakdown by Scottish local authorities for each distributing body has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Awards information is also available on the Lottery website at www.lottery.culture.gov.uk.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

General Affairs Council

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what was the outcome of the General Affairs Council held in Brussels on 17 and 18 May; and if he will make a statement. [85240]

Ms Quin: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I attended the General Affairs Council and the EU/Russia Co-operation Council on 17 May. There was a meeting of the European Economic Area Council on the 18 May. The Council adopted the A points listed in document 8136/99 and noted the resolutions, decisions and opinions adopted by the European Parliament in its sessions of 12–16 April, listed in document 7187/99. Copies of the documents listing the A points and resolutions will be placed in the House Libraries as soon as they become available.

Western Balkans

The Council adopted conclusions regretting President Milosevic's failure to accept the international community's conditions; reiterating its support for the elected government of Montenegro; welcoming President Ahtisaari's mission; stressing the need for a UN Security Council Resolution; highlighting the need for EU assistance to reach Albania, Macedonia and Montenegro quickly; and agreeing to begin work on an EU Common Strategy on the Western Balkans. The Council also agreed that a Stability Pact for South East Europe should be established, and endorsed a draft text as the basis for further talks between the EU and other parties to the Pact.

EU/Charter of Rights

The Council had a preliminary discussion of Presidency proposals for an EU Charter of Rights. There will be further discussion at the 31 May GAC.

Institutional reform

The Council discussed the timing, scope and preparation of an inter-governmental conference, as envisaged by the Protocol on reform of the Institutions annexed to the Amsterdam Treaty. Final decisions will be taken by the Cologne European Council.

Common European Policy on Security and Defence

Ministers also discussed a draft Presidency report which will be submitted to the Cologne European Council. The report sets out principles to be observed when considering possible new defence arrangements allowing the European Union to take on crisis management, peace-keeping and conflict prevention tasks.

EU/US Relations

The Commission reported on the latest developments in the beef hormones dispute. The Council stressed the importance of handling the dispute in a constructive and positive manner and invited the Commission to intensify contacts with the US and Canada. The Council encouraged further efforts to secure agreement on compensation should the US and Canada pursue WTO authorisation for retaliatory measures. The Council welcomed the Commission's intention to evaluate, with Member States, possible next steps and to keep the Council fully informed.

EU Assistance to Central America

Council agreed the general outline of a Commission Action Plan to provide assistance to Central America in the aftermath of Hurricane Mitch. Ministers welcomed the opportunity to discuss the plan with the beneficiary countries at the EU/Central America Ministerial in Bonn on 20 May. The Council agreed that the indicative amount of 250 meuro in the Commission plan was without prejudice to the overall spending allocations under Category 4 (external expenditure) of the EC budget. The Council invited the Commission to bring forward an assessment of external spending priorities for the period 2000–2006.

EU/Egypt

The Council reviewed the progress made in the latest negotiating round with Egypt. The relevant Council bodies will examine the current package further with a view to conclusion at the 31 May GAC if at all possible.

Russia Common Strategy

Ministers agreed a Common Strategy on Russia, which will be submitted for adoption to the Cologne European Council. It sets clear objectives for the EU's relations with Russia with the aim of supporting democratic and economic reforms, and enhancing co-operation with Russia on international affairs and on matters of common concern such as organised crime and environmental problems.

East Timor

Ministers agreed the need for a substantial EU contribution to the UN Trust Fund for East Timor and asked the Commission to look urgently at options for funding.

Belarus

The Council adopted a declaration calling on the Government of Belarus to enter into political dialogue with the opposition.

Nigeria

In view of the progress made towards the transition to democracy and the impending installation of civilian Government the Council decided to repeal the EU Common Position on Nigeria (98/614/CFSP) containing the remaining sanctions with effect from 1 June 1999.

EU/Russia Co-operation Council

The EU Common Strategy on Russia, and Kosovo, were the main topics discussed at the EU/Russia Co-operation Council on 17 May. Detailed points implementation of the Partnership and Co-operation Agreement will be dealt with at the next meeting of the Co-operation Committee.

European Economic Area Council

The 11th EEA Council assessed the functioning of the EEA Agreement, reviewed developments in regional issues and European integration, and discussed political issues.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the nature of the social security provision agreed at the Luxembourg General Affairs Council of 26 and 27 April. [83930]

Ms Quin: From time to time it is necessary to amend the EC Regulations, which co-ordinate the operation of Member States' social security schemes, to take account of changes in legislation of the Member States or to effect improvements in the provisions where a deficiency in the existing arrangements comes to light. The social security provisions agreed at the Luxembourg General Affairs Council on 26 and 27 April related to amendments of this type. The only amendment of direct concern to the UK was to an Annex of the co-ordinating Regulations. This was to clarify which is the competent State for payment of UK Family Credit and Irish Family Income Supplement for workers who are resident in Ireland and work in the UK, or vice versa.

Mr. Mohammed Fayed

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the authorities investigating the unauthorised publication of the identities of British security agents plan to take evidence from Mr. Mohammed Fayed. [84738]

Mr. Robin Cook: The Metropolitan Police are conducting investigations into possible breaches of the Official Secrets Act 1989, but these investigations are an operational matter for the police and it would not be right for me to comment on any inquiries they may be undertaking.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Greek Cypriot (a) men, (b) women and (c) children up to the age of 16 years are living in the Karpas area of occupied northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [84951]

Ms Quin: According to UNFICYP figures there are 450 Greek Cypriots living in the Karpas. We do not have figures showing the proportion of men and women. In addition to the 30 children who attend the Greek school in Rizokarpasso, there are a number of pre-school children in the Karpas.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action his Department has taken in conjunction with the British High Commission in Cyprus to support projects to encourage contacts between Greek and Turkish Cypriots living in Cyprus; and if he will list the projects that have been supported in each of the last three years. [84963]

Ms Quin: Until December 1997 bi-communal contact was possible but difficult. The High Commission worked hard in the period May 1996 to December 1997 to bring members of the Greek Cypriot and Turkish Cypriot communities together. They created the Westminster group to promote the principles of democracy through bi-communal contacts with members of all professions and organised its meetings, arranged meetings of Chevening scholars, and brought members of both communities together through other events such as the Queen's birthday party and the Education fair. In addition, members of the High Commission have assisted with and participated in many other events sponsored by the UN and other bodies to bring members of the two communities together.

Since December 1997 most bi-communal contacts have been banned by the Turkish Cypriot side. We have therefore found it effectively impossible to arrange bi-communal contacts on-island. But we arranged a meeting on 24 March in London of Cypriot Chevening scholars in co-operation with the Friends of Cyprus. We also continue to support the work of other in this field, notably the Trade Unions.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when an official of the British High Commission in Cyprus last visited the Karpas area in occupied northern Cyprus; and what report of that visit has been produced. [84964]

Ms Quin: A member of the British High Commission last visited the Greek Cypriot community in the Karpas on 7 May as part of a regular series of visits to that area. The High Commission reports no significant changes in living conditions since the previous visit in October 1998.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what surveys have been carried out to establish the number of Turkish Cypriots who were born in Cyprus, and still live in northern Cyprus; and if he will make a statement. [84939]

Ms Quin: In November 1997 the Turkish Cypriot authorities published the results of a census carried out the previous year which found that, of 200,587 people resident in the northern part of the island, 137,398 had been born in Cyprus.

These figures are accepted among Turkish Cypriots as generally accurate, but we have no means of independent corroboration.

Overseas Posts (E-mail and Internet Links)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many (a) Embassies and High Commissions and (b) Consulates have e-mail and internet links available to hon. Members. [84941]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The FCO has provided 112 of its Embassies and High Commissions and 43 of its Consulates with facilities to send and receive internet e-mail.

UN Security Council

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his policy is on changes to the membership of the permanent members of the UN Security Council; and if he will make a statement. [84895]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Government support early enlargement of the Security Council in both permanent and non-permanent categories. It supports the addition of five permanent seats: one each for Germany and Japan, and three for developing countries in Africa, Asia and Latin America and the Caribbean. It also supports the addition of up to four non-permanent seats, making an expanded Council of 24.

Kosovo

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision he has made to provide advice and guidance to UK-based relatives of persons involved in the Kosovo crisis who wish to bring their families to the United Kingdom. [84852]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Advice and guidance for United Kingdom-based relatives of persons involved in the Kosovo crisis has been drawn up by the Home Office in consultation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the British Red Cross and the Refugee Council. This has been distributed to all Government Departments and non-governmental organisations concerned including any ethnic Albanian organisation that requested it.

The Kosovo Unit of the Home Office has dealt with in the region of 1,000 telephone calls from United Kingdom-based relatives of persons involved in the crisis and offered appropriate guidance on the steps they, and their relatives, should take. This advice is that those members of the public who wish to bring their families to the United Kingdom from the Kosovo region should contact the British Red Cross United Kingdom Family Reunion Service who are liaising with UNHCR and the Home Office in the compilation of family lists.

UNHCR have recently confirmed that they are unable to undertake this role other than in the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia. In order to help UNHCR and at their request, a Home Office team went out to the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia on 9 May to assist with the process of registering refugees. We are considering how this initiative might be widened to assist with family reunion applications in the wider region. These will be considered in accordance with our family reunion concession. This provides for close family members (spouse and minor children and in exceptional circumstances, a family member who formed part of the family unit before fleeing to seek asylum) to join any persons who are settled or granted asylum in the United Kingdom. This concession is being extended to families in the United Kingdom who have been granted exceptional leave to enter as part of UNHCR's Humanitarian Evacuation Programme.

Revised guidance is being prepared to reflect these new arrangements, also in consultation with UNHCR, the British Red Cross and the Refugee Council. The initial advice to family members to register details of relatives in the region with the offices of the British Red Cross in the United Kingdom remains valid.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons (Education)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the (a) total hours of education study and (b) total teaching hours bought in the Prison Service in 1998; and what was the percentage change for each on the previous year. [84748]

Mr. George Howarth: The total number of taught student hours for 1998 was 9,483,889, an increase of 6.19 per cent. on the 1997 figure.

The total number of teaching hours purchased by the Prison Service in 1998 was 1,254,040, an increase of 7.69 per cent. on the 1997 figure.

In addition to this, just over £10 million per annum for the three years from 1 April 1999 has been allocated to enhance education provision. It will be used to deliver an additional 2,000,000 hours of basic and key skills education which will produce 17,000 accreditations.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to encourage liaison between the Prison Education Service and the University for Industry. [85267]

Mr. George Howarth: There are very positive discussions currently taking place between the Prison Education Service and the University for Industry. It is the intention of the Prison Service to respond to the University for Industry's call for partners and apply to become a learning centre hub with local learning centres being developed in individual prisons in partnership with education providers.

Prison Violence

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) self-inflicted deaths, (b) incidents of self harm, (c) reported assaults of prisoners on other prisoners and (d) reported assaults of prisoners on members of staff took place in each young offenders institution and in total in (i) 1997–98 and (ii) 1998–99; and if he will make a statement. [84747]

Mr. George Howarth: The information requested is given in the tables.

1997–98

Young offender institutions	Self-inflicted deaths	Incidents of self-harm	Assaults (prisoner on prisoner)	Assaults (prisoner on staff)
Aylesbury	1	32	54	45
Castington	0	13	40	8
Deerbolt	0	87	65	11
Dover	0	10	16	9
Feltham	2	292	11	5
Glen Parva	0	136	78	16
Guys Marsh	0	28	11	2
Hatfield	0	1	10	0
Huntercombe	0	18	20	7
Onley	0	75	102	25
Portland	0	16	10	1
Reading	1	72	18	8
Stoke Heath	0	61	21	6
Swinfen Hall	0	13	13	8
Thorn Cross	0	1	17	3
Wetherby	0	24	34	5
Totals	4	879	520	159

1998–99

Young offender institutions	Self-inflicted deaths	Incidents of self-harm [1]	Assaults (prisoner on prisoner)	Assaults (prisoner on staff)
Aylesbury	0	71	39	78
Castington	0	22	70	32
Deerbolt	0	75	44	13
Dover	0	7	20	8
Feltham	0	275	17	5
Glen Parva	2	107	152	39
Guys Marsh	0	23	7	4
Hatfield	0	2	10	0
Huntercombe	0	9	27	8
Onley	0	71	119	40
Portland	0	34	12	5
Reading	1	31	4	1
Stoke Heath	0	102	22	9
Swinfen Hall	0	8	19	11
Thorn Cross	0	0	31	0
Wetherby	0	40	48	14
Totals	3	877	641	267

[1] Provisional figure based on 98 per cent. of expected Prison Service establishment returns received to date.

Note:

Incidents do not equate to numbers of prisoners since an individual prisoner may self-harm more than once.

Total number of reported incidents (all prison types)

	1997–98	1998–99
Self-inflicted deaths	74	82
Incidents of self-harm	7,023	6,603
Assaults—prisoner on prisoner	2,902	3,673
Assaults—prisoner on staff	1,387	1,640

Notes:

1. Establishments have been categorised according to their primary role. However, it should be noted that there are a number of other prisons that hold young offenders (e.g. male remand centres) which are not included.
2. Not all self-inflicted deaths conclude with a verdict of suicide.

Prisoners (Employment)

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are employed on work which involves payment from the private sector; and if he will make a statement. [84749]

Mr. George Howarth: The number of prisoners employed in public sector prisons on work which involves payment from the private sector is approximately 4,500. In addition, 3,400 prisoners in privately managed prisons undertake activities, including education, work in the prison kitchen, cleaning and employment in industries, for which they receive payment.

Young Offenders

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to improve recruitment and retention of health care staff in (a) Feltham Young Offenders Unit and (b) other young offender units. [84848]

Mr. George Howarth: Conventional recruitment and retention measures are now supplemented at Feltham by arrangements with the local NHS mental health secure unit to provide a number of qualified psychiatric nurses to assist Feltham's delivery of health care. Meetings are also being held with the local health authority to produce a specification for the provision of nursing services at Feltham.

The Prison Service's Directorate of Health Care has commissioned research to look at the current national problem of recruitment and retention of health care staff within the Service. This will produce recommendations on the best way forward.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to increase the speed of transfer of inmates sectioned under the Mental Health Acts from young offender units to other institutions. [84845]

Mr. George Howarth: The Government have accepted the recommendations in the report of the joint Prison Service/National Health Service executive working group on the future organisation of prison health care, published on 29 March 1999, aimed at providing that the National Health Service takes a greater role in the provision of health care to prisoners, especially those with mental health problems.

Implementation of the recommendations should greatly assist the assessment and transfer process. The Department of Health strategy document "Modernising Mental Health Services—Safe, Sound and Supportive", published last December, indicated that, among other measures, steps were being taken to expand the number of secure psychiatric places within the NHS.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a specific profession of prison officer for young offender institutions and for young offenders in prison. [84850]

Mr. George Howarth: The Government have no plans to introduce a separate profession for prison officers working with young offenders. However, the Prison Service is developing accredited training specifically for staff who work with young offenders. It is also revising its selection criteria to enable establishments with offenders under 18 to recruit the most suitable staff.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to seek funding from local education authorities for the education of young offenders who are in custody. [84851]

Mr. George Howarth: There are no plans to seek funding from Local Education Authorities for the education of young offenders who are in custody.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what funding is available for the Sex Offender Treatment Programme for juveniles and young offenders in Feltham Young Offenders Unit; [84837]

(2) what plans he has to ensure that the Sex Offender Treatment Programme continues to be provided at Feltham Young Offenders Unit. [84838]

Mr. George Howarth: Feltham has until now been able to provide the Sex Offenders Treatment Programme without specific funding.

However, the current review of the secure juvenile estate will bring about changes to Feltham's accommodation and regime that may make it difficult for the establishment to continue to provide the Programme without extra funding. Its continuation will, therefore, depend on the outcome of the reviews which are currently taking place of the juvenile estate and regimes for young offender institutions, and the outcome of a bid for capital funding.

Feltham will, in any event, endeavour to provide one further Sex Offender Treatment Programme this year.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has (a) to provide education and (b) to improve the provision of education to young people on remand other than those under school leaving age in (i) Feltham Young Offenders Unit and (ii) other young offenders units; [84834]

(2) what plans he has to increase the provision of education to convicted inmates over school leaving age in Feltham Young Offenders Unit. [84836]

Mr. George Howarth: There are no plans to increase the provision of education to either convicted or remand prisoners over school leaving age at Feltham.

Governors of Prison Service establishments have delegated budgets from which they purchase teaching and induction hours against a national contract for educational services which is managed at a local level. Prison Education for all prisoners focuses on the core curriculum of basic educational skills (literacy and numeracy), life and social skills and computers. The Young Offender Institution Rules 1988 (as amended) require education arrangements appropriate to his or her needs to be made for any prisoner aged 17 or over who has special educational needs, if necessary within the normal working week. Otherwise, education for prisoners over school leaving age is entirely voluntary. Prisoners aged between 17 and 21 should be offered at least two hours a week of physical education.

Other important developments to enhance education for young offenders generally include:

A broader model educational curriculum for juveniles to include an action plan and timetable for each juvenile based on an in depth assessment;

Work with the Basic Skills Agency to develop ways of delivering basic skills training to prisoners in the workplace, to support the Service's Welfare to Work pilots and to develop family literacy projects and prisoner literacy mentoring; and

Work with specialist educational consultants on how best to screen prisoners for dyslexia and then how best to support prisoners with this learning need.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what funding is available to young offender units for the young offenders training programme; and how it is allocated. [84839]

Mr. George Howarth: The Young Offender Treatment Programme is a new offending behaviour programme being developed under the Prison Service programme accreditation scheme. Finance has been earmarked to enable a number of young offender establishments, including Feltham, to pilot the programme. The Prison Service is currently considering how this work should be taken forward and no decisions have yet been taken on allocation of earmarked finance.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the recommended ratio of probationary and qualified prison officer staff to juveniles in young offender units; and what plans he has to change this. [84840]

Mr. George Howarth: There is no recommended ratio for the number of probationary and qualified prison officers to under 18 year olds in young offender institutions, and we do not have plans to introduce one. The proportion of newly appointed to experienced staff varies from one establishment to another because the turnover of staff varies. The Prison Service is preparing to introduce selection and training arrangements tailored to the needs of establishments in the new under-18 estate which should help address some of the recruitment and retention difficulties some establishments experience.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recommendations and guidelines are issued on the education of (a) juveniles and (b) young offenders other than those under school leaving age who are in young offender units. [84833]

Mr. George Howarth: The Young Offender Institution Rules 1988 (as amended) require the provision of 15 hours academic education per week for sentenced prisoners under the age of 17 years. The education provided includes English, Mathematics, life skills relevant to their age, and Information Technology and a minimum of five hours of physical education per week. In the case of sentenced prisoners aged 17 years with learning difficulties, there is a requirement to provide education appropriate to their needs.

The core curriculum is set out in a Prison Service Order called the Prison Service education national curriculum framework, a copy of which is in the Library.

The Prison Service is currently developing new regime standards for young people under the age of 18. They will include the development of a broader education curriculum for young people under school leaving age which will take into account their particular learning difficulties, especially dyslexia, attention deficits and hyper-activity disorder and any statement of educational needs. The Comprehensive Spending Review has made additional funds available for achieving these new standards.

The Prison Service is also planning to introduce an individual programme for each young person. It will be based on a thorough assessment and will include an action plan and programme suited to individual needs, ability and aptitude.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) recommendations and (b) guidelines he has issued on convicted juveniles sharing cells with remand juveniles in young offenders institutions. [84849]

Mr. George Howarth: Prison Service policy on the separation of different classes of prisoner is set out in the Instruction to Governors 48/1995 which was issued on 11 May 1995, a copy of which is in the Library.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many hours of education were provided at Feltham Young Offenders Unit in each of the last three years; and how many hours are planned for the current year. [84835]

Mr. George Howarth: The number of teaching hours purchased at Feltham Young Offenders Institution in each of the last three years was:

	Teaching hours
1998	17,605
1997	13,131
1996	[1]12,000

[1] This is an approximate figure

As part of the new education contract which was awarded to North East Surrey College of Technology to commence on 1 January 1999 the number of teaching hours ordered for the 12 month period to 31 December 1999 is 17,500.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many inmates at the Feltham Young Offenders' Unit Health Centre who have been assessed as having mental health problems are currently waiting transfers to (a) hospitals and (b) other secure institutions. [84841]

Mr. George Howarth: On 18 May 1999 eight prisoners at Feltham Young Offenders Institution for whom mental health assessments had been completed were awaiting admission to hospitals under provisions of Part III of the Mental Health Act 1983. Prisoners who require in-patient treatment for mental disorders are only transferred to psychiatric hospitals.

Prison Boards of Visitors

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines are issued to prison boards of visitors about the publication of their reports. [84847]

Mr. George Howarth: The Boards of Visitors Secretariat issues detailed guidance to Boards of Visitors about the publication of their annual reports. Since September 1987, Ministers have urged Boards to publish annual reports. Boards of Visitors are independent, and it is up to each Board to decide whether it will publish its annual report or not. Boards are urged not to publish information which would risk compromising the security of the prison. They are also urged not to identify individual members of staff or prisoners by name.

Guidance is issued on the preparation of press releases, and how to deal with the media. Boards of Visitors also have access to advice from the Boards of Visitors Press and Public Relations Officer.

Case Allocation Unit

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 13 May 1999, Official Report, column 189, how many files were received by the Case Allocation Unit; and what were the locations, apart from Case Management units, to which files were sent in the week ended 8 May. [84886]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: During the week ending 8 May, the Case Allocation Unit received a total of 10,032 files. 1,251 files were sent to the Work in Progress Store and 22 files were sent to lay by. A further 272 files were sent to other locations, but information about the locations to which they were sent is not collected.

Rape Charges

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women were charged with rape in courts in England and Wales during each of the last three years; and how many were convicted. [84759]

Mr. Boateng: Available data, taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database, showing the number of defendants proceeded against the convicted are given in the table.

Number of persons proceeded against at magistrates' courts and convicted at all courts for rape offences, England and Wales, 1995–1997

	1995		1996		1997
Offence	Males	Females	Males	Females	Males	Females
Rape of a female
Proceeded against	1,585	19	1,691	5	1,868	12
Convicted	547	13	551	1	576	—
Rape of a male
Proceeded against	37	—	60	1	80	1
Convicted	9	—	24	—	42	—

Note:
Generally, attempting, conspiring, inciting, aiding, abetting, causing or permitting a crime is classified under the heading of the crime itself.

Drug Treatment Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug treatment orders have been (a) made and (b) breached in the three pilot areas for the orders; and in how many of the cases where an order has been breached the offender attended the breach hearing. [84891]

Mr. George Howarth: As at 20 May 1999, courts in the pilot areas had made 67 drug treatment and testing orders; and 10 orders had been revoked. A breach hearing cannot be held in the absence of the offender.

Fire Service College

Mr. Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the future of the Fire Service Training College in Moreton-in-Marsh. [84935]

Mr. Straw: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, East (Ms Corston), on 3 March 1999, Official Report, column 757.

Justice and Home Affairs Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the latest version of the agenda for the Justice and Home Affairs Council of 27 and 28 May, prior to the meeting. [85081]

Mr. Straw: Draft agendas for Justice and Home Affairs Councils are provided to Parliament as early as possible before each Council. The current draft agenda for the Council on 27–28 May was sent on 19 May to the European Scrutiny Committee and the Home Affairs Committee, as well as to the European Communities Committee in the House of Lords. I have placed a copy in the Library.

Daniel Morgan

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on developments in the investigation of the case of murdered private investigator Daniel Morgan. [85052]

Kate Hoey: The investigation of this case is an operational matter for the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. He tells me that the case remains open, and that inquiries are continuing.

Immigration Act 1971

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) of 22 April 1999, Official Report, column 666, on the Immigration Act 1971, if the answer included applications made by people who did not have current leave to remain at the time of application; what was the average time taken to decide a non-asylum application made out of time; and how many applications were made (a) in time and (b) out of time in each year since 1994. [85039]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information given in my reply to the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Clappison) on 22 April 1999, Official Report, column 666, related to all decisions. It is not possible to identify how many of the applications were made by people who did not have current leave to remain at the time of application.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 25 March 1999, Official Report, column 383, which tenders for the computerisation of IND reached the final stage of consideration; and if he will make a statement. [84373]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Two companies were invited to submit Best and Final Offers for this contract. They were Andersen Consulting and Siemens Business Services.

The National Audit Office report on the Immigration and Nationality Directorate Casework Programme concluded that the Directorate's handling of negotiations and the evaluation of bids was thorough. The Directorate became aware at a late stage in the competition that Andersen Consulting's NIRS2 project for the Contributions Agency was running into difficulty, but after consideration concluded that although the NIRS2 situation might have presented a handling problem, it was not so significant as to undermine Andersen Consulting's bid for the Casework Programme.

Of the seven companies listed in the reply I gave to my hon. Friend on 25 March 1999, Official Report, column 383, one did not pre-qualify, three were eliminated at the short-listing stage and one more withdrew by agreement before contract negotiations began.

Stephen Lawrence Inquiry Report

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Efford) of 13 May 1999, Official Report, columns 187–88, on the Macpherson report, if he will publish the report of the leak inquiry with the names of the officials and advisers who had access to the relevant papers omitted. [85054]

Mr. Straw: No. As I informed the House in my reply to the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) on 8 March 1999, Official Report, column 32, it is not the practice to publish leak inquiry reports.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Human Rights

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the most recent communications she has (a) sent to and (b) received from the UN special rapporteur with responsibility for human rights and states of emergency. [84782]

Marjorie Mowlam [holding answer 20 May 1999]: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to him on 20 May 1999, Official Report columns 413–14, by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

Security Incidents

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if she will list for the week ended Saturday 15 May the number of (a) punishment beatings and (b) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland, indicating how many in each category were committed by (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups; [85049]

(2) if she will list for the week ended Saturday 15 May the number of violent incidents involving paramilitary groups which took place in Northern Ireland, indicating how many involved (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups. [85048]

Mr. Ingram: The number of security incidents during the period 9–15 May 1999 are as shown.

Security incidents	Number
Deaths	0
Shootings	1
Bombings	1

The number of casualties as a result of paramilitary-style attacks during the period are as follows.

	Loyalist	Republican
Assaults	4	0
Shootings	0	0
Total	4	0

Note:
Figures may be subject to minor amendment.
The shooting incident cannot as yet be firmly attributed to a grouping.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Schools (Hendon)

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the schools in Hendon which have received funding from New Deal for Schools, indicating the work concerned and the amount awarded. [84931]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is shown in the following table.

New deals for schools funds allocated to schools in Hendon

School name	New Deal for Schools Phase 1 allocation (£)	New Deal for Schools Phase 2 allocation (£)	New Deal for Schools Phase 3 allocation (£)	Project details
Broadfields Junior School	3,000	—	—	Improve information and communication technology access
St. Joseph's	20,200	—	—	Refurbish toilets
Broadfields Junior; St. Mary's Junior St. John's Infants	—	—	—	Package to renew boiler systems at 4 schools including Our Lady of Lourdes School which is not situated within the Hendon constituency: the allocation cannot be disaggregated. The total package amounted to £197,581 and was allocated in the second phase of New Deal for Schools
Colindale Junior Mixed and Infant	—	50,000	—	Replacement of 3 structurally unsound timber demountable classrooms
Copthall School	—	642,000	—	Structural repairs to, and rewiring of, 1930s school
Deansbrook Junior School	—	—	1,388,500	New extension and replacement of demountable units

Parliamentary Democracy

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the documents produced by his Department for distribution to schools in England and Wales, which detail the workings of the British parliamentary system. [84739]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department has produced no such documents. The Department's role in the area of educational materials and resources is one of advice and guidance. It remains the responsibility of school governing bodies to decide on the materials and resources they wish to use. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment published proposals on 13 May for consultation as part of the review of the National Curriculum on a framework for citizenship education in schools. This includes knowledge about the working of parliamentary democracy.

NVQs

Mr. Nicholls: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many NVQ Level 3 have been de-accredited since 1 September 1998; what is his estimate of the number of small and medium-sized businesses which no longer have their preferred NVQ available to them for modern apprenticeships; and if he will make a statement. [85125]

Mr. Mudie: Since 1 September 1998, 99 level 3 NVQs have exhausted their agreed accreditation spans, and 101 re-accreditation or new accreditations have taken place. Since 1 September 1998, four new Modern Apprenticeship frameworks have been agreed, and ten have been revised. There is no statistical information on the NVQ preferences of each small or medium-sized business, so I cannot give the information requested.

If the hon. Member has particular cases in mind, I would be very happy to investigate them.

Hospitality Sector (Training)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what plans he has to co-ordinate further Government support for training programmes in the hospitality sector. [85294]

Mr. Mudie: Government recognise the Hospitality Training Foundation as the National Training Organisation (NTO) for the hospitality sector. NTOs are independent employer-led sector organisations working strategically with their sectors and with Government on education and training matters.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Political and Human Rights

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what funding has been given by her Department to develop political and human rights parliamentary discussion groups in Commonwealth countries in each of the last three years. [84745]

Clare Short: We support the strengthening of parliamentary institutions in order to develop political and human rights. In 1997–98 we allocated £280,000 to the Commonwealth Secretariat to develop the awareness of parliamentarians in political and human rights. In 1998–99 so far, we have provided £600,000 in South Africa and £312,000 in Uganda in support of open accountable government and improvement in parliamentary administration.

We are not able to identify what portion of these grants was spent specifically on discussion groups.

CABINET OFFICE

Scottish Parliament

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what changes he proposes in the modus operandi of the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee following the establishment of joint working between Labour and the Liberal Democrats in the Scottish Parliament. [84680]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: None.

Joint Consultative Committee

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to his answer of 28 January 1999, Official Report, column 316, on the Joint Consultative Committee, if he will publish the unclassified minutes of the JCC. [84679]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: None of the minutes of the Joint Consultative Committee are unclassified.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the membership of the Joint Cabinet Consultative Committee. [84982]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Clarke) on 21 October 1998, Official Report, columns 1123–35.

Biotechnology Presentation Group

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) if he will set out the terms of reference of the Biotechnology Presentation Group; [85284]

(2) if he will set out the objects of the central co-ordinated rebuttals strategy in respect of genetic modification; [85279]

(3) on what date he decided to establish the Biotechnology Presentation Group; [85282]

(4) on what dates the Biotechnology Presentation Group has met; and who was present on each occasion. [85283]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government agree with the Science and Technology Select Committee that we need an informed, balanced debate on biotechnology. As Ministers, we meet regularly to discuss how we can promote such a debate.

Genetic Modification

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he has contacted the National Consumer Council to seek its endorsement of the Government's approach to genetic modification; and if he will make a statement. [85280]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I have spoken to the National Consumers Council and to other interested organisations to explain to them the measures which I announced to the House on 21 May 1999.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office for what purposes he proposes to make alterations prior to publication to the report of the Chief Medical Officer and Chief Scientific Adviser on genetic modification. [85281]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The joint paper by the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser on genetically modified foods and public health was published on Friday 21 May 1999. The authors revised the paper to ensure that it was intelligible to the lay reader and included recommendations for action.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriculture Council

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 17 to 18 May; and if he will make a statement. [85239]

Mr. Nick Brown: I represented the United Kingdom at a meeting of the EU Agriculture Council in Brussels on 17 May 1999.

The Council formally adopted all the legal instruments giving effect to the Agenda 2000 reforms of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP) as agreed by EU Heads of Government in Berlin in late March. Now that this important stage has been reached, work can begin on the detailed texts which will put the CAP reform measures into operation with effect from next year.

The Council discussed the present state of the EU pigmeat market. The Council requested experts to examine the issues affecting the market further at the level of the management committee, a position I supported on behalf of the United Kingdom.

Agriculture Commissioner Fischler informed the Council of the current position with regard to WTO rulings on bananas and growth hormones in beef. On the former, I stressed the need for a WTO-compatible outcome which also had regard for the interests of the vulnerable Caribbean ACP producers. On the latter, I urged the Commission to take a measured approach with the US authorities, and to conduct a full exchange of information between the two sides on the underlying science.

On veterinary medicines, the Council supported a resolution calling for action on the problems of antibiotic resistance in veterinary and human medicine. The resolution will be taken forward to the EU Health Council in June for adoption. The Council adopted a resolution setting out measures designed to avoid the loss of veterinary medicinal products when the deadline for setting maximum residue limits in foodstuffs of animal origin expires at the end of December 1999.

Bovine Somatotropin

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent discussions he has had with EU partners on the subject of bovine somatotropin in milk. [85058]

Mr. Rooker: There have as yet been no bilateral discussions but the issue was raised by Germany at the May meeting of the Agriculture Council. The Commission will submit a proposal before the expiry of the moratorium at the end of the year for discussion by the Agriculture Council. Meanwhile, we have asked the Veterinary Products Committee to report on the latest scientific evidence on human and animal safety in order to inform the Government's position on the future of the moratorium.

Food Advisory Groups

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans the Government have to change the membership of food advisory groups; and when they expect these changes to take effect from. [85059]

Mr. Rooker: The Government have no plans at the present time to change the membership structure of its food advisory groups.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans the Government have to ensure that consumer interests are represented on food advisory groups. [85060]

Mr. Rooker: All food advisory groups reporting to the Government include members with consumer interest backgrounds. These members also regularly meet together with others with consumer interests in the Consumer Panel which I chair.

Upland Grazing Areas (Radioactive Contamination)

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of when all upland grazing areas in the United Kingdom will be free of contamination from the fall-out from Chernobyl. [84894]

Mr. Rooker: Regular assessments are made of radiocaesium levels in sheep in affected areas to determine the prospects for removing controls and further reducing the areas subject to restrictions.

Whilst generally declining, radiocaesium from the Chernobyl accident is still present in some upland areas in the United Kingdom. The rate of decline is dependent on the complex interaction between such factors as soil type, vegetation, weather, drainage and grazing preference. Consequently it is not possible to specify a time at which all these areas will be free of Chernobyl contamination.

Foot and Mouth Disease

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many reported cases of foot and mouth disease there have been in the UK in each of the last five years. [84760]

Mr. Rooker: There have been no cases of foot and mouth disease in the UK in the last five years. The number of suspected cases of foot and mouth disease in farm livestock investigated in each of the last five years is as follows:

Year	Number of suspected cases
1994	26
1995	18
1996	13
1997	12
1998	8
1999 (to date)	Nil
Total	77

On each occasion the possibility of foot and mouth disease was ruled out.

Media Relations

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers involved in media relations were employed within his Department at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [84197]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 18 May 1999]: Detailed information on the numbers of permanent civil servants employed in Departmental Press Offices during the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99 was provided in a memorandum dated 16 June 1998 to the Select Committee on Public Administration and published in its report on The Government Information and Communication Service (HC 770) in July 1998. A copy is in the Library of the House.

There were 7 Civil Servants in my Department involved in Media relations as at 1 May 1999. Special Advisers in my Department have ad hoc contact with the media but none are specifically employed in media relations.

Quarantine

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to bring into force the new legislation concerning the control of quarantine of pets. [84571]

Mr. Rooker: On 26 March 1999, my right hon. Friend announced that the Government's objective is to bring new arrangements into operation throughout the United Kingdom by April 2001. We also plan to launch a pilot scheme or pilot schemes by April 2000.

CAP Reform

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the Berlin Summit agreement for reform of the Common Agricultural Policy relating to beet and cereals. [84552]

Mr. Rooker: A range of representations have been received concerning the recent CAP reform in the cereals sector. Consultations will be held shortly on implementation of the discretionary elements of the arable reform. The Berlin Summit agreement made no reference to sugar beet, as the arrangements in this sector will be reviewed next year. Representations on sugar are already being made. The Government believe that this sector too requires reform and we will be consulting shortly on what shape that reform should take.

Farming (Women)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the role of women in farming. [84554]

Mr. Rooker: Since May 1997 we have had some inquiries about the role of women in farming. These dealt with a wide variety of issues including sources of EU funding to help women enter agriculture, levels of remuneration, taxation and succession. Women in farming are treated strictly in accordance with the principles of equal treatment which are firmly established in UK law.

Slaughtering Industry

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on what basis he decided to set five working days as the consultation period on the impact of proposed charges on the slaughtering industry. [84076]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 14 May 1999]: I recognise that we have allowed only a short period for responses to the consultation document issued by my Department. However, as my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 21 April 1999, Official Report, columns 982–88, we are anxious that the review be completed quickly. We can then make decisions on the outstanding charging issues, and remove some of the current uncertainty from the industry by providing a framework in which businesses can make commercial decisions about their future development. We will, of course, accept late responses but cannot guarantee that detailed points received after the deadline will be able to be fully taken into account.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what criteria have been used to select organisations consulted by his Ministry in studying the impact of proposed charges on the slaughtering industry. [84075]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 14 May 1999]: As my right hon. Friend announced to the House on 21 April 1999, Official Report, columns 982–88, this study involves a close examination of the dynamics of the slaughtering sector and of the impact of charges on abattoirs and on producers. Selection of the organisations to be consulted therefore reflected this specific remit and concentrated on organisations, such as those represented on the MHS Industry Forum, who would be able to comment on the direct economic impact of charges on individual businesses. A second mailing to those who had responded to our earlier consultation on charges for specified risk material enforcement, was carried out on 10 May.

To provide an opportunity to any others who may wish to comment, the consultation letter has been placed on the Ministry's Internet site, and its availability announced by MAFF News Release. As a result, more copies have been issued to organisations and individuals who were not on the original lists.

Fishing Industry

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the impact on employment of the policy of ensuring an economic link between quota hoppers and populations dependent on fisheries and related industries. [84529]

Mr. Morley: It is too early to make such an assessment, as under the arrangements announced in July 1998 vessel owners will have until July 2000 to let us know which of the available options they intend to use to demonstrate an economic link. One of those options requires 50 per cent. of the crew to be normally resident in a UK coastal area and would, if used, have a direct impact upon employment opportunities for British fishermen. Other options include either the landing of fish at UK ports or the purchase of goods and services here, either of which may impact indirectly upon onshore employment opportunities. Some early indications suggest an increase in landings at UK fishing ports and the offer of fish quota for the use of the inshore sector. These measures should have beneficial effects on employment in fisheries related sectors.

Environmental Disputes

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what evaluation his Department has undertaken of methods of resolving disputes relating to environmental matters. [83317]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 5 May 1999]: None.

Environmentally Sensitive Areas

Mr. Todd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he plans to publish the performance indicators for the environmentally sensitive areas in England. [83481]

Mr. Morley: I am today publishing for consultation objectives, indicators and targets for the 16 Stage I-III Environmentally Sensitive Areas in England. A copy of the papers has been placed in the Library of the House. The Ministry's policy is to focus uptake under the scheme on the biodiversity, landscape and historical and archaeological priorities in each ESA. In future, where applications do not offer value for public money, the Ministry will exercise its discretion not to accept them into the scheme.

Ministerial Meetings (US)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many times Ministers in his Department met their counterparts in the US administration between 1 January 1998 and 1 June 1998, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting, the Ministers involved and the name of the US counterpart. [81083]

Mr. Nick Brown: Ministers in my Department met their counterparts in the US Administration twice between 1 January and 1 June 1998. My noble Friend the Parliamentary Secretary met Mr. Gus Schumacher, the US Under-Secretary for Trade, in London on 25 February 1998 and my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) met Mr. Dan Glickman the US Agriculture Secretary and Gus Schumacher the US Under-Secretary for Trade in Paris on 6 March 1998.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Living Allowance

5. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what training will be provided for those people reviewing disability living allowance awards under the new periodic review process. [83995]

Mr. Bayley: We are committed to ensuring that the new periodic inquiry process is delivered sensitively and fairly. In consultation with disability organisations, we have developed a comprehensive training package for all staff involved in the new process. The training covers impairment awareness and the particular needs of individual groups and is being delivered with the assistance of Pauline Thompson of the Disablement Income Group.

22. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent representations she has received on disability living allowance. [84012]

Mr. Bayley: We routinely receive, and welcome, representations about benefits for disabled people, including disability living allowance.

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is the backlog at the Disability Living Allowance Unit concerning cases where the Disability Appeal Tribunal has upheld an appeal against (a) refusal of disability living allowance, (b) the rate of mobility component and (c) the rate of care component; what the figures were (i) six and (ii) 12 months ago; and what steps are being taken to deliver a more efficient service to claimants; [84880]

(2) when he expects to pay Mr. Edward Turner (Ref. ZM897757D) the disability living allowance with lower rate mobility component and middle rate care component he was awarded by the Disability Appeal Tribunal on 26 February; and if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay in payment. [84879]

Mr. Bayley: The administration of Disability Living Allowance is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Alexis Cleveland to Mr. Robin Corbett, dated 20 May 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked Peter Mathison to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions asking about the backlog of cases at the Disability Living Allowance Unit requiring action following an appeal, what steps are being taken to deliver a more efficient service, and when Mr. Edward Turner is expected to receive payment following the decision of the appeal tribunal hearing of 26th February 1999. As Mr. Mathison is away on leave, I am replying.

At 30th November 1998 there were 706 Disability Appeal Tribunal decisions outstanding and 695 at 31st April 1999. These figures encompass all decisions reached, including award decisions, disallowance decisions, and decisions where existing entitlement remains unchanged. It has not been possible to break down the figures into the type of decision made or the specific Disability Living Allowance component. Figures from an earlier date are not available.

Under the Government's programme of welfare reform, a range of measures is being introduced to improve all aspects of claiming Disability Living Allowance. These include the Decision Making and Appeals initiative which will introduce new adjudication procedures to enable disputed decisions to be reconsidered without having to go to appeal. It is anticipated that this will result in fewer numbers of appeal cases.

I can confirm that instructions were issued on 18th May 1999 for all arrears of benefit, and future monthly payments, to be made to Mr. Turner's bank account.

Implementation of a Disability Appeal Tribunal decision may be suspended if there is reason to believe that the decision has been made in error of law and that an appeal to the Commissioner may be appropriate. I regret that implementation of the Appeal Tribunal's decision was suspended incorrectly in this case and I apologise for the delay that has occurred.

I hope you find this reply helpful.

Prescription Charges

16. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what recent discussions he has had with Ministers from the Department of Health on the documentation required by claimants seeking exemption or partial exemption from prescription charges. [84006]

Angela Eagle: None. Discussions between officials from both Departments took place in February.

All Work Test

17. Mr. Bill O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to change the all work test application forms; and if he will make a statement. [84007]

Mr. Bayley: The Benefits Agency regularly reviews the content of forms and leaflets to ensure they meet their purpose and that they are user friendly for customers. There are currently no plans to revise the questionnaire, which claimants complete for the all work test. Some improvements to the form were made in 1997 to make it easier for claimants to complete and to help them provide full information about the effects of their medical condition.

36. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on plans to change the all work test. [84029]

Mr. Bayley: The Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill contains provisions to replace the all work test with the Personal Capability Assessment. The Personal Capability Assessment will continue to determine, in the same way as now, whether the person meets the threshold of incapacity for entitlement to incapacity benefits. That threshold will not change but the Personal Capability Assessment will also be able to provide additional constructive information about what a person can do, despite their medical condition or disability. This additional information will help personal advisers give their clients the support they need to move back to work.

Housing Benefit

18. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on the reform of housing benefit. [84008]

Angela Eagle: We set up the Housing Benefit Simplification and Improvement Project with local authority representatives last autumn to review the existing rules; administration; and service delivery of Housing Benefit. We have received written and oral representations from a number of professional, voluntary and charitable organisations with an interest in Housing Benefit.

31. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made on the review of housing benefit. [84023]

Angela Eagle: We have worked with local authorities to consider ways of simplifying and improving the current system of Housing Benefit. Details of the proposals are being considered and will be announced in due course.

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of local authorities have agreements in place with the Post Office to prevent redirection of housing benefit girocheques. [85227]

Angela Eagle: The national agreement with the Post Office not to redirect Social Security related local authority post came into operation on 1 February 1999. To date 56 local authorities are operating the do not redirect service.

Appeals Procedures

19. Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps his Department is taking to improve social security appeals procedures. [84009]

Mr. Darling: We have made clear our intentions to modernise the welfare state. As part of our plans for improving the Social Security system we are introducing important changes to the decision making and appeals processes. On 22 March this House debated and approved the necessary regulations. The changes will be implemented during the latter half of this year, starting with Child Support on 1 June. The changes aim to help get decisions right first time, resolve disputes at an early stage and deal with appeals more efficiently and quickly.

European Social Model

20. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on his plans for reforming the European Social Model. [84010]

Angela Eagle: There is no single European Social Model, since member states have developed social provision in different ways, reflecting their own circumstances and traditions. But we want to see social protection systems across Europe modernised by national governments in line with changing needs and circumstances.

Retirement

23. Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps his Department is taking to improve the quality of information available to individuals on making adequate provision for retirement. [84013]

Mr. Timms: The Pensions Green Paper published last December set out our proposals for improving the quality of information on pensions for individuals, both in general and in the information people are given about their own pension position. We are taking action in co-operation with employers and the pensions industry to provide both integrated pension forecasts and fuller and better information on projected state and private pension rights.

Occupational Pensions

24. Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what steps he is taking to increase members' confidence in their occupational pensions. [84015]

Mr. Timms: The Pensions Green Paper we published last December proposed measures to strengthen occupational pension schemes and to increase members' confidence in them. The general direction of the reforms has been widely welcomed. We are working closely with the pensions industry and others in taking the detailed proposals forward.

Stakeholder Pensions

25. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the potential cost benefits to those working in industries with high labour turnover rates of using the new stakeholder pension. [84016]

Mr. Timms: Our proposals for stakeholder pension schemes establish a framework which will ensure that schemes reflect the needs of those who change jobs frequently. Members will be able to ensure that members can stop and restart contributions and, if necessary, transfer their funds to another scheme, without penalty.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what rules will govern the use of funds which have been transferred into a stakeholder pension from a personal pension, with particular reference to (i) the use of the fund for a tax-free lump sum and (ii) the nature of the annuity which may be bought with the fund. [84548]

Mr. Timms: The rules applying to transfers into stakeholder pension schemes are currently being considered in the light of responses to the Green Paper "Partnership in Pensions".

Benefit Payment Delays

26. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what remedies are available to people whose (a) social security benefit and (b) child support payments are delayed through no fault of the claimant or applicant. [84017]

Angela Eagle: Under the Department's standing compensation scheme, the terms of which have been agreed between the Department and the Ombudsman, compensation may be considered where official error or unreasonable delay have led to an actual financial loss.

Where benefit or child support payments are unreasonably delayed (delay must exceed a set period which depends on the benefit concerned) due to official error a special payment can be considered, in recognition of the fact that the customer has lost the use of the sum owed. In such cases the compensatory payment is calculated in the form of interest on the arrears of benefit when they are paid. A copy of the Department's guide to special payments, known as the "Financial Redress for Maladministration", is held in the House of Commons Library.

In addition, if a parent with care of a child is receiving Income Support or income based Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA), and the non-resident parent does not pay the child support to the parent with care, Income Support or JSA can be paid in its place pending the recovery of the money from the non-resident parent.

As a last resort, if a customer is without funds to cover the period between a claim for benefit and the first payment that is due, crisis loans are available to prevent risk to the health or safety of the applicant and his family.

Benefit Fraud

27. Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what targets he has set for reducing fraud in the benefits system. [84018]

Mr. Timms: For the first time we have set a measurable target for reducing fraud and error. Our target is to reduce the level of fraud and error in Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance, two of the most vulnerable benefits, by 30 per cent., by 2007, with at least a 10 per cent. reduction by March 2002.

Lone Parents

28. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set targets for the numbers of lone parents who leave income support as a consequence of the New Deal for Lone Parents. [84020]

Angela Eagle: In addition to the 12,500 lone parents who have already found jobs as a result of the New Deal for Lone Parents, we have set the Employment Service a target for 1999–2000—to place a further 15,000 lone parents into work.

Child Support Agency

29. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what the publication date is for the draft legislation for the reform of the Child Support Agency. [84021]

Angela Eagle: Final decisions on the shape of the reformed scheme and the associated legislative process will be announced shortly.

32. Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has had in response to the Green Paper on the Child Support Agency. [84024]

Angela Eagle: We have received 1,564 written responses to the Green Paper. My noble Friend the Baroness Hollis of Heigham has also held meetings with more than 40 organisations, academics and other groups with an interest in child support.

Motability Cars

30. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement about the value for money provided by Motability cars. [84022]

Mr. Bayley: The Motability contract hire scheme, which covers about 95 per cent. of the vehicles provided, represents substantial value for money for disabled people. Lease costs cover maintenance, comprehensive insurance and roadside assistance. Over 25 per cent. of the over 300 model variants supplied under the scheme by 23 manufacturers are available for less than the weekly higher rate mobility component of Disability Living Allowance of £37 week, and the cheapest vehicle available under the scheme can now be had for less than £24 per week.

Pensions Green Paper

33. Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the responses to the pensions Green Paper. [84025]

Mr. Timms: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Harwich (Mr. Henderson) on 17 May 1999, Official Report, column 252.

Means-tested Benefits

34. Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what studies his Department has carried out into the disincentives to save created by means-tested benefits. [84026]

Angela Eagle: All those who can save, particularly for their retirement, have a responsibility to do so. In our Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill, we are taking steps to ensure that people of working age are encouraged to save so that they can retire on incomes above anything benefits could ever be expected to provide.

New Technology

35. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on improvements proposed through the introduction of new technology in his Department. [84027]

Angela Eagle: As part of our commitment to modernise the Welfare Service the Department is seeking to transform the way Social Security is delivered. We aim to provide a system which is focused on work for those who can and security for those who cannot, providing a customer focused and integrated service which operates across organisational boundaries to improve quality and integrity.

New Information Technology (IT) is at the core of these modernisation plans. The key elements of our strategy for IT are a corporate data set that holds the necessary information on citizens and a set of front-line systems which allow staff to access that information to deliver the full range of welfare services.

Through this IT strategy the Department will meet the longer term objectives of designing services around people; achieving leverage against fraud and abuse; integrating and improving the accuracy and efficiency of operations and of accounting across the Department; and creating a more joined-up welfare service for the public spanning other Government Departments, local authorities and the voluntary sector.

Carers

37. Mr. Goggins: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress he is making on the introduction of a citizenship pension for carers. [84030]

Mr. Timms: In December 1998, the Government published a Green Paper, "A new contract for welfare: Partnership in Pensions". This included proposals to give carers the opportunity to build up a second pension, by awarding them flat rate credits to the new State Second Pension scheme. The proposals cover recipients of Invalid Care Allowance, carers of people receiving Attendance Allowance or Disability Living Allowance who qualify for Home Responsibilities Protection and Child Benefit recipients where the youngest child is aged five or under.

The consultation period for the Green Paper ended on 31 March 1999. Since then we have been considering the responses received and will provide further details in due course.

Disabled People (Incomes)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the intended minimum weekly income for (a) a single adult who is disabled and unable to work and (b) a single adult who is considered partially disabled but who is unable to find work. [83999]

Mr. Bayley: Income Support (and income based Jobseeker's Allowance) is available to assist disabled adults who have a low income. The overall weekly amount of benefit payable will depend on the individual's circumstances, such as their age, their savings, income, the severity of their disability and so on. Our proposals for a new Disability Income Guarantee together with measures in the Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill will provide more help for disabled adults and children who need help most.

Widows (SERPS)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the amount which widows are due to receive under SERPS from 2000. [84019]

Mr. Timms: Legislation introduced by the previous Government in 1986 provides for widows to receive 50 per cent. of their late husbands' SERPS entitlement from April 2000. We will make an announcement in due course.

Customer Service

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what procedures are followed to ensure the delivery of a high-quality service in his Department's offices in Essex. [85252]

Angela Eagle: Working with the Employment Services, Child Support Agency, Local Authorities and other customer representative groups, is a key element of the Benefit Agency's (BA) current modernisation programme. The standards of customer service the BA sets out to achieve is published in the BA Customer Charter. This, together with other internal agency targets, provide the clear measurable standards that BA offices in Essex are expected to provide in delivering a timely, effective and informative service to customers.

The Child Support Agency has many improvements underway, planned specifically at improving customer service and efficiency. Greater use of the telephone is being made to improve the way information is collected. Opening hours have been extended to offer a more accessible service at evenings and weekends—this further improves service by being able to contact parents at times which suit them. Dedicated staff offer face-to-face interviews and this service is being extended during 1999–2000. The Agency is convinced that this will mean the more effective progression of cases and a better service.

Payment Books

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of his Department's payment books issued in Essex in the last 12 months were produced (a) manually and (b) by computer. [85253]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available shows that during 1998–99 a total of 2,790,657 computer order books were issued in the East London and Anglia Area. In 1998–99 3,282 manual order books were issued in Essex.

Complaints

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many complaints were received in the last 12 months by his Department's offices in Essex relating to (a) delays in payment book issue and (b) breaches of confidentiality. [85256]

Angela Eagle: In the period 1 April 1998 to 21 May 1999, a total of 23 written complaints were received about the late issue of payment books. A further 3 complaints related to breaches of confidentiality.

Demographic Charges

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the ratio of persons working and paying income tax to persons in receipt of state Retirement Pension in (i) 1978–79, (ii) 1988–89 and (iii) 1998–99. [85286]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

Estimates of the ratio of the numbers of persons working and paying tax income to the number of persons in receipt of Retirement Pension

Year	Number of taxpayers	Recipients of Retirement Pension	Ratio
1978–79	25,900	8,600	3:1
1988–89	25,200	9,300	2.7:1
1998–99	26,100	10,000	2.6:1

Notes:

1. All figures are rounded to the nearest hundred and are in thousands. Estimates for the numbers of taxpayers are from "Inland Revenue Statistics" 1998. Figures for Retirement Pension are for those resident in Great Britain.

2. The ratios of numbers of taxpayers to recipients of retirement pension are rounded to the nearest 0.1.

3. For Retirement Pension, the figures for 1978–79 and 1988–89 do not include those who are in receipt of graduated retirement benefit. The numbers of taxpayers counts husbands and wives separately.

Information Technology

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what action he is taking to improve IT provision in his Department's offices in Essex; [85255]

(2) what assessment he has made of the reliability of IT systems in his Department's offices in Essex; [85257]

(3) if the computer system in his Department's office in Chelmsford is compatible with that in his Department's office in Southend; [85254]

(4) if his Department's offices in Essex are linked via a Wide Area computer network. [85258]

Angela Eagle: The Department has an agreed strategy for improving its Information Technology (IT) services throughout the Department in support of its modernisation programme. This includes providing improved quality and consistent data from mainframe systems as well as improved IT tools in the office and on the desktop.

The agreement of reliability is contained within a number of Service Level Agreements (SLAs) between the Benefits Agency and Information Technology Services Agency. These SLAs also form the basis of contractual agreements between the Department and its private sector service providers.

The Department also maintains and supports a common infrastructure providing a system of computerised benefits across all Benefit Agency offices including Chelmsford and Southend and these items are compatible. Local Districts have some freedom to implement local desktop solutions, typically work management and administrative systems, to complement their main IT systems for benefit delivery.

The Department's offices in Essex are linked via a Wide Area computer network.

Minimum Income Guarantee

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the minimum pension guarantee. [84028]

Mr. Timms: The Minimum Income Guarantee, delivered through Income Support, provides an income threshold below which most pensioners with no savings, or only a small amount saved, should not fall.

The increase in the Income Support rates for pensioners this April represents an increase above the normal prices-linked uprating, of £160 over the year for a single pensioner. Our undertaking to increase the Minimum Income Guarantee in line with earnings next April further underlines our intention that the least well-off pensioners should share in rising national prosperity.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate how many pensioners in Shrewsbury and Atcham will benefit from the introduction of the Minimum Income Guarantee; and if he will make a statement. [84866]

Mr. Timms: We estimate that around 2,500 pensioners were in receipt of Income Support in the constituency of Shrewsbury and Atcham in November 1998, the latest date for which this data are available. We are unable to forecast with any reliability how many will be in receipt from April this year in the same area, because the sample size on which the estimates are based is too small. However, we estimate that nationally, an additional 65,000 pensioners will become eligible for the Minimum Income Guarantee, through Income Support, as a result of the above-inflation increases this year, and a further 20,000 next year as a result of uprating the Guarantee in line with earnings.

Notes:

1. "Pensioners" refers to pensioner benefit units, which are single people aged 60 or over or couples where one or partners is 60 or over.

2. Figures exclude cases in residential care and nursing homes.

3. The estimate of 2,500 cases is rounded to the nearest 100 cases, and is subject to a degree of sampling error due to the small numbers involved.

4. The Parliamentary constituency data are based on constituency boundaries as of 1 May 1999.

Source:

1. Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry November 1998.

2. Family Resources Survey 1996–97.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the proportion of single pensioners aged 80 years or above who are currently in receipt of income support; and if he will provide corresponding estimates for (a) 1994, (b) 1989, (c) 1984, (d) 1979, (e) 1974 and (f) 1969. [84758]

Mr. Timms: Information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Single supplementary benefit/income support pensioners aged 80 and over 1974 to 1998

Year	Total claimants	Proportion of population Percentage
1974	335,000	25.4
1979	351,000	24.4
1984	434,000	25.4
1989	407,000	20.1
1994	531,000	23.4
1998	617,000	26.7

Notes:

1. Pensioner refers to single claimants only, aged 80 and over.

2. Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand cases, percentages to one decimal place and are subject to a degree of sampling error.

3. Income Support replaced Supplementary Benefit in April 1988.

4. Numbers are given at a point in time. For 1974 and 1979 the month was November. For 1984 the month was December, and from 1989–1998 the month was May.

5. Population figures are based on total population (regardless of marital status) aged 80 years and over.

6. Proportion of population percentages have been calculated using the relevant year of mid-term population estimates, apart from 1998 when mid-term 1997 population estimates were used.

7. Sample sizes: 1974: Supplementary Pension cases 1 in 160; 1979: Supplementary Pension cases 1 in 200; 1984: Supplementary Pension cases 1 in 200 ; 1989: 1 in 100; 1994 to date: 1 in 20.

Sources:

1. Supplementary Benefit/Income Support Annual Statistical Enquiries, 1974 -1994.

2. Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry, November 1998.

3. Office National Statistics population estimates mid-1974 to mid-1997.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals received an age addition to the basic state pension (a) in the year in which it was introduced, (b) at five year intervals thereafter and (c) in the latest year for which figures are available. [84757]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

Number of people in receipt of the basic state retirement pension and an age addition payment (for those aged 80 and over) as at the end of each month

Million

Inquiry date	Number of people
December 1971	1.2
November 1976	1.4
November 1981	1.6
September 1986	1.9
September 1991	2.2
September 1996	2.4
January 1999	2.4

Note:

Figures have been rounded to the nearest hundred thousand.

Sources:

1. December 1971 and November 1976: Figures from Social Security Statistics based on a 10 per cent. sample excluding clerical cases.
2. November 1981-September 1991: 10 per cent. sample of Central Pensions Branch system.
3. September 1996 and January 1999: 5 per cent. sample of Pensions Strategy Computer System.

Sheltered Housing

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations his Department has received from social landlords and independent care providers on the Government's proposals for funding sheltered housing under new housing benefit arrangements. [84832]

Angela Eagle: In response to the publication of the consultation document "Supporting People: A new policy and funding framework for support services" on 10 December, we received a total of 128 representations about our proposal for including sheltered housing in the new Supporting People funding arrangements. Sixty-five of those representations were from Registered Social Landlords and independent care providers, and 31 from local authorities.

Responses from providers of sheltered housing welcomed the integration of support services for older people, as well as the fact that access to support funding would no longer be tied to type of tenure. The main concern expressed related to the practicalities of implementing the new funding regime.

We decided to include sheltered housing in the long-term proposals because our aim is to improve the integration of supported and sheltered housing within local strategies for housing and community care. Working alongside existing Government programmes, the new Supporting People funding regime will give the provision of support services, such as those provided by wardens in sheltered accommodation, the priority it deserves. Supporting People will bring long-term stability to the sector by placing for the first time the funding of support services on a secure, sustainable and legal footing.

We recognise the importance of getting the practical details right. That is why we are committed to working with interested parties to ensure that the new system delivers on its objectives and becomes an effective and workable reality.

We hope to publish the analysis of responses to the consultation paper shortly.

TREASURY

Anti-smuggling Equipment

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on current guidance for the use of bulk X-ray equipment by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise to combat smuggling. [85107]

Dawn Primarolo: Her Majesty's Customs and Excise do not presently use bulk X-ray equipment.

If such equipment becomes available for Customs, guidance for its use will be drawn up by operational managers in consultation with the Department's technical and Radiation Protection advisers.

Tobacco Sales

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy on the marking of tobacco products for sale in the United Kingdom. [85106]

Dawn Primarolo: The marking of tobacco products for fiscal purposes is not currently required in the United Kingdom. The report of the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review, published in July 1998, recommended that marking should be considered. While the form of marking proposed by that Review has proved impractical for legal reasons, Customs and Excise is currently reviewing other marking options.

Taxation

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 16 April 1999, Official Report, columns 387–90, on taxation, if he will publish the figures on the basis of the assumptions for household spending and council tax payment which were used in the answer to the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) of 11 December 1996, Official Report, columns 190–202. [81712]

Dawn Primarolo: Estimating the impact of indirect taxes on the basis of average assumptions about household spending is imprecise as spending patterns vary widely between households with the same composition and income, with the consumption of the majority of goods and services far from universal. For example, only around one third of adults are smokers. This can be contrasted with direct taxes and benefits where at specified earnings and for particular household types there is a known benefit entitlement or tax liability.

VAT

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state the reasons for not applying the VAT (Sport, Sports Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1999 from 1 April; and when he expects to bring it into force. [85110]

Dawn Primarolo: Following discussion of the proposed legislation with sports representative bodies, HM Customs and Excise are making changes to the draft Order. A further announcement will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received regarding the Online VAT Return. [85099]

Dawn Primarolo: This year's Finance Bill allows Customs and Excise to provide new electronic services including VAT returns on the internet.

In response to an announcement in the VAT Notes, issued to all VAT registered businesses, over 300 representations have been received, 99 per cent. of which not only welcomed this initiative but also stated a preference for an internet-based service.

No formal consultation exercise is planned. Some businesses and individual taxpayers will wish to send tax information on paper and we will continue to offer this option.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the implications for the VAT (Input Tax) Order 1992 of the judgment of the European Court against the Republic of Italy (Case C-45/95). [85098]

Dawn Primarolo: This European Court judgment does not directly affect the VAT (Input Tax) Order 1992, as the effect of the judgment is to introduce new exemptions from VAT. However, implementing these exemptions will involve some consequential changes to the Order. Details of these, and of other proposed related changes, are set out in a Technical Note issued by HM Customs and Excise on 21 April 1999, a copy of which has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what external legal advice he has received regarding the VAT treatment of the supply of an interest in land and buildings following the judgment of the European Court against the Republic of Italy (Case C-45/95); and if he will make a statement. [85097]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs have met with Treasury Counsel over this issue and they are awaiting his written opinion. Most property transactions are, however, already exempt from VAT.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the VAT liability in respect of (a) room hire, (b) crèche facilities and (c) catering franchises contracted out by local authorities. [85109]

Dawn Primarolo: The VAT liability of supplies made by local authorities is no different from that applying to other suppliers. VAT charged on supplies made to local authorities can normally be reclaimed from Customs and Excise.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to continue reviewing the VAT registration threshold; and if he will make a statement. [85108]

Dawn Primarolo: Following the recent Budget, I asked Customs to work further with business to explore whether it is possible to cushion the impact of VAT registration on growing businesses. This further work, together with representations received during the 1998 consultation exercise on the VAT registration threshold, will inform future Budget decisions on this issue.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his policy is on VAT exemptions for trade unions following the European Court ruling in the Institute of the Motor Industry case (No C-149/97). [85111]

Dawn Primarolo: Subscriptions to trade unions remain exempt from VAT.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer from what dates he expects the VAT (Goods Used for Exempt Supplies) Order 1999 to apply; and if he will make a statement. [85117]

Dawn Primarolo: In their technical note which asked businesses for comments on the changes covered by this Order, Customs expected that the Order would take effect from 1 September 1999, but this will depend on the comments received from businesses and on the process of parliamentary drafting.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue implications for the Exchequer following the judgment of the European Court against the Republic of Italy (Case C-45/95). [85113]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs and Excise expect there to be a revenue gain of around £15 million per year, because some businesses will be unable to recover input VAT on expenses associated with the newly exempt sales of business cars. They expect this to be offset in the first year by a revenue loss of £10 million, arising from repayments made to certain non-profit making bodies, under a related change that will permit them to recover VAT on publications supplied to members.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the definition of a car for VAT purposes following the judgment of the European Court against the Republic of Italy (Case C-45/95). [85112]

Dawn Primarolo: This European Court judgment does not directly affect the definition of a car for VAT purposes, though the proposed legislation to implement the new exemption will make certain minor—and unrelated—technical changes to the definition. Details of these, and of other proposed related changes, are set out in a Technical Note issued by HM Customs and Excise on 21 April 1999, a copy of which has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Alcohol and Tobacco Smuggling

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to amend the Beer Orders as a result of the report of the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review. [85105]

Dawn Primarolo: Amending the Beer Orders is not a straightforward matter. Customs are still considering the costs and benefits and will be reporting their conclusions to me in due course.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what consultations he has had with the Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions about the effects on traffic and road safety of cross-channel smuggling and section 1.5.3 of the report of the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review; [85102]

(2) what assessment he has made of section 1.5.3 of the report of the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review and the effects on traffic and road safety of cross-channel smuggling. [85103]

Dawn Primarolo: Customs work closely with the Traffic Commissioners, the Police and other agencies who tackle a range of enforcement issues through their joint exercises. The issues raised by section 1.5.3 of the report are among those addressed by such exercises.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the methodology used by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise for estimating the total volume of fraud and smuggling of alcohol and tobacco products. [85104]

Dawn Primarolo: HM Customs and Excise estimates of alcohol and tobacco smuggling by cross-channel and air passengers are based on data from Customs' own surveys of international passengers. The methodologies are detailed in a technical report placed by HM Customs and Excise in the House of Commons Library on 19 November 1998.

Republic of Ireland GDP

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the per capita gross domestic product in the Republic of Ireland as a percentage of the EU average, for the most recent year available. [84956]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, dated 24 May 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question asking about the per capita gross domestic product of the Republic of Ireland.

The latest figures published by Eurostat (the Statistical Office of the European Community) are the preliminary results for 1997. These show the Republic of Ireland with a per capita gross domestic product of 102 per cent of the EU average. These estimates are subject to revision and definitive results will be published later this year.

Parental Leave

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to make available replacement income through working families tax credit or benefit to persons normally in receipt of working families tax credit who take unpaid parental leave under the provision of the Employment Relations Bill. [83610]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 10 May 1999]: There are currently no plans to provide replacement income through the Working Families Tax Credit for families where a person takes up their right to unpaid parental leave. But we continue to consider whether help should be given to people taking unpaid parental leave and how such help might be delivered.

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of how families (a) in receipt of and (b) not in receipt of the working families tax credit will make up for wages lost due to unpaid parental leave being taken under the provisions of the Employment Relations Bill. [83611]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 10 May 1999]: Families may make up for wages lost due to unpaid parental leave in a variety of ways independent of whether they are in receipt of the working families tax credit. Consequently it would not be possible to make the assessment that is envisaged.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Beith: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the total annual expenditure on legal aid in each of the last five years and the annual real terms change; what is the expected total annual expenditure on legal aid in each of the next three years and the expected real terms change; and if he will make a statement. [84750]

Mr. Vaz: Net expenditure on legal aid in each of the last five years was as follows:

	£ million
1994–95	1,299
1995–96	1,391
1996–97	1,476
1997–98	1,526
1998–99[1]	1,600

[1] Estimated

The annual upward percentage change, in real terms, was as follows:

	Per cent.
1994–95	5.5
1995–96	4.5
1996–97	3.5
1997–98	0.7
1998–99[1]	3.3

[1] Estimated

Over the next three years the Government expect to spend on average £1,600 million each year. That is £248 million more than the previous Government planned.

The measures contained in the Access to Justice Bill will ensure that available funds are targeted on priority cases. Conditional fees will increase access to justice for everyone. This will release legal aid moneys which otherwise would be expended on cases that will now go forward under conditional fee agreements, to support cases of greater priority, for example, cases which should in the public interest be supported.

Community Legal Service

Jacqui Smith: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the consultation paper setting out the proposals for the community legal service will be published. [85442]

Mr. Vaz: Copies of the Consultation Paper will be placed later today—Monday 24 May—in the Libraries of both Houses. It will also be available on the Lord Chancellor's Department website at www.open.gov.uk/lcd.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 25 May 1999

WALES

Ministerial Meetings (US)

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many times ministers in his Department held meetings with members and officials in the US Administration between 1 May 1997 and 1 June 1998, indicating the dates and locations of each meeting, the ministers involved and the name of the US departments involved in each meeting. [84316]

Mr. Michael: The previous Secretary of State received a courtesy call from the American Ambassador on 8 October 1997 in Cathays Park, Cardiff.

HIV/AIDS

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were newly diagnosed HIV positive (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales for each year from 1981 to 1998 and for 1999 to date. [84808]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following table.

Newly diagnosed HIV positive cases by probable means of transmission [1]

Year	Sex between men	Sex between men and women	Injecting drug use	Injecting drug use and sex between men	Blood factor	Blood/tissue transfer	Mother to infant	Not known	Total
1981	1	—	—	—	1	1	—	—	2
1982	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—	—
1983	—	—	—	—	1	1	—	—	1
1984	3	—	—	—	30	30	—	—	33
1985	8	—	—	1	19	19	—	—	28
1986	21	3	1	1	2	2	—	—	28
1987	21	6	1	—	—	—	1	—	29
1988	20	10	1	1	—	—	—	2	34
1989	18	9	2	1	—	—	—	2	32
1990	17	10	1	—	—	—	—	4	32
1991	17	11	4	1	—	—	—	—	34
1992	35	12	1	—	—	—	—	—	49
1993	19	11	2	1	—	—	1	—	35
1994	23	14	4	—	—	—	—	1	42
1995	29	9	3	1	—	—	2	—	44
1996	20	9	1	—	—	—	—	4	35
1997	20	14	—	—	—	—	—	3	37
1998	14	12	3	—	—	—	—	—	29
1999[2]	1	—	—	—	—	—	—	2	3

[1] Cases reported by region/Health Authority of reporting officer. Therefore data do not necessarily equate to area of residence and may exclude Welsh residents diagnosed outside Wales but resident in Wales.
[2] To 31 March.
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Newly diagnosed HIV positive cases by Health Authority of diagnosis [1]

Year	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	2	—	2
1982	—	—	—	—	—	—
1983	—	—	—	1	—	1
1984	—	—	2	31	—	33
1985	6	—	5	17	—	28
1986	3	1	2	18	4	28
1987	4	2	6	15	2	29
1988	5	1	5	17	6	34
1989	10	3	4	15	—	32
1990	3	5	6	17	1	32
1991	4	—	2	27	1	34
1992	9	4	10	21	5	49
1993	10	2	10	11	2	35
1994	9	3	1	23	6	42
1995	10	4	14	12	4	44

Newly diagnosed HIV positive cases by Health Authority of diagnosis [1]

Year	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1996	5	1	6	21	2	35
1997	7	1	5	21	3	37
1998	5	3	4	17	—	29
1999[2]	2	—	1	—	—	3

[1] Cases reported by region/Health Authority of reporting officer. Therefore data does not necessarily equate to area of residence and may exclude Welsh residents diagnosed outside Wales but resident in Wales.
[2] To 31 March.
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the cumulative numbers of people with AIDS who died in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales in each year from 1981 to 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84806]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following table.

Cumulative numbers of people with AIDS known to have died

Year	North Wales [1]	Dyfed Powys [1]	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	—	—	—
1982	—	—	—	—	—	—
1983	—	—	—	—	—	—
1984	—	—	—	2	—	2
1985	—	—	—	3	—	3
1986	2	—	—	7	2	11
1987	3	—	1	8	3	15
1988	4	1	1	14	3	23
1989	6	2	3	22	4	37
1990	9	3	6	26	4	48
1991	14	4	10	32	6	66
1992	15	5	14	38	8	80
1993	20	7	18	51	10	106
1994	24	10	23	59	13	129
1995	29	10	31	67	15	152
1996	31	10	34	75	18	168
1997	32	10	35	79	19	175
1998	32	10	35	81	19	177
1999 [2]	34	10	35	81	19	179

[1] Total excludes 1 case where year of death is not known
[2] To 31 March
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people with AIDS died in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales in each year from 1981 to 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84805]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following table.

People with AIDS known to have died

Year	North Wales [1]	Dyfed Powys [1]	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	—	—	—
1982	—	—	—	—	—	—
1983	—	—	—	—	—	—
1984	—	—	—	2	—	2
1985	—	—	—	1	—	1
1986	2	—	—	4	2	8
1987	1	—	1	1	1	4
1988	1	1	—	6	—	8
1989	2	1	2	8	1	14
1990	3	1	3	4	—	11
1991	5	1	4	6	2	18
1992	1	1	4	6	2	14
1993	5	2	4	13	2	26
1994	4	3	5	8	3	23
1995	5	—	8	8	2	23
1996	2	—	3	8	3	16
1997	1	—	1	4	1	7
1998	—	—	—	2	—	2
1999 [2]	2	—	—	—	—	2

[1] Total excludes 1 case where year of death is not known
[2] To 31 March
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people diagnosed with AIDS and not known to have died there were in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales in each year from 1981 to 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84804]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following table.

People diagnosed with AIDS not known to have died

Year	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	—	—	—
1982	—	—	—	—	—	—
1983	—	—	—	—	—	—
1984	—	—	—	—	—	—
1985	—	—	—	—	—	—
1986	—	—	—	—	—	—
1987	—	—	—	—	—	—
1988	—	—	1	—	—	1
1989	—	—	—	—	—	—
1990	—	—	—	—	—	—
1991	1	—	—	—	—	1
1992	—	—	—	1	—	1
1993	—	—	2	1	—	3
1994	—	1	—	4	—	5
1995	3	—	7	1	—	11
1996	1	—	3	4	2	10
1997	1	—	6	3	—	10
1998	—	—	1	6	—	7
1999 [1]	—	—	—	—	—	—

[1] To 31 March
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the cumulative number of people diagnosed with AIDS in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales in each year from 1981 to 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84807]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following table.

Cumulative number of people diagnosed with AIDS by Health Authority of diagnosis [1]

Year ending	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf [2]	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	—	—	—
1982	—	—	—	1	—	1
1983	—	—	—	2	—	2
1984	—	—	—	4	—	4
1985	—	—	—	7	—	7
1986	4	—	—	10	2	16
1987	5	1	1	12	3	22
1988	9	3	4	24	4	44
1989	11	6	7	32	5	61
1990	15	7	10	38	8	78
1991	16	7	15	45	11	94
1992	17	9	21	48	14	109
1993	26	10	26	59	14	135
1994	33	12	30	74	15	164
1995	37	12	44	82	17	192
1996	39	12	48	90	21	210

Cumulative number of people diagnosed with AIDS by Health Authority of diagnosis [1]

Year ending	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf [2]	Gwent	Total
1997	40	12	54	94	21	221
1998	40	12	55	100	21	228
1999 [3]	41	12	55	100	21	229

[1] Cases reported by region/Health Authority of reporting officer. Therefore data do not necessarily equate to area of residence and may exclude Welsh residents diagnosed outside Wales but resident in Wales. Data do not equate to prevalent cases due to the mobility/mortality of cases.
[2] Total excludes 1 case where year of diagnosis is not known.
[3] To 31 March
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the cumulative number of people who had been diagnosed HIV positive and not known to have died (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales for each year from 1981 to 1998 and for 1999 to date. [84810]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following table.

Cumulative numbers of newly diagnosed HIV positive cases, in people not known to have died, by probable means of transmission [1]

Year ending	Sex between men	Sex between men and women	Injecting drug use	Injecting drug use and sex between men	Blood factor	Blood/tissue transfer	Mother to infant	Not known	Total
1981	—	—	—	—	1	—	—	—	1
1982	—	—	—	—	1	—	—	—	1
1983	—	—	—	—	2	—	—	—	2
1984	—	—	—	—	15	—	—	—	15
1985	2	—	—	—	21	—	—	—	23
1986	14	2	—	—	22	—	—	—	38
1987	24	6	1	—	22	—	—	—	53
1988	37	13	1	—	22	—	—	1	74
1989	47	20	2	—	22	—	—	1	92
1990	57	27	3	—	22	—	—	4	113
1991	69	34	6	—	22	—	1	4	136
1992	90	43	7	—	22	—	1	4	167
1993	101	51	9	1	22	—	2	4	190
1994	114	62	13	1	22	—	2	4	218
1995	136	69	16	2	22	1	2	4	252
1996	155	77	16	2	22	1	3	7	283
1997	175	90	16	2	22	1	3	10	319
1998	189	101	19	2	22	1	3	10	347
1999 [2]	190	101	19	2	22	1	3	12	350

[1] Cases reported by region/Health Authority of reporting officer. Therefore data do not necessarily equate to area of residence and may exclude Welsh residents diagnosed outside Wales but resident in Wales. Data do not equate to prevalent cases in Wales due to the mobility of people
[2] To 31 March.
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Cumulative numbers of newly diagnosed HIV positive cases, in people not know to have died, by Health Authority of diagnosed [1]

Year ending	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	1	—	1
1982	—	—	—	1	—	1
1983	—	—	—	2	—	2
1984	—	—	1	14	—	15
1985	3	—	3	17	—	23
1986	5	1	3	27	2	38
1987	7	1	5	37	3	53
1988	8	2	9	49	6	74
1989	13	4	12	57	6	92
1990	14	9	16	68	6	113
1991	16	9	16	89	6	136
1992	22	11	20	105	9	167
1993	30	12	26	112	10	190
1994	35	14	27	129	13	218
1995	44	17	34	141	16	252
1996	48	18	39	160	18	283
1997	55	19	44	180	21	319

Cumulative numbers of newly diagnosed HIV positive cases, in people not know to have died, by Health Authority of diagnosed [1]

Year ending	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1998	59	22	48	197	21	347
1999 [2]	61	22	49	197	21	350

[1] Cases reported by region/Health Authority of reporting officer. Therefore data do not necessarily equate to area of residence and may exclude Welsh residents diagnosed outside Wales but resident in Wales. Data do not equate to prevalent cases in Wales due to the mobility of people
[2] To 31 March.
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the cumulative number of people who had been diagnosed HIV positive (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Wales and (b) each health authority area of Wales for each year from 1981 to 1998 and for 1999 to date. [84809]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: Information provided by the Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre is given in the following tables.

Cumulative numbers of newly diagnosed HIV positive cases by probable means of transmission [1]

Year ending	Sex between men	Sex between men and women	Injecting drug use	Injecting drug use and sex between men
1981	1	—	—	—
1982	1	—	—	—
1983	1	—	—	—
1984	4	—	—	—
1985	12	—	—	1
1986	33	3	1	2
1987	54	9	2	2
1988	74	19	3	3
1989	92	28	5	4
1990	109	38	6	4
1991	126	49	10	5
1992	161	61	11	5
1993	180	72	13	6
1994	203	86	17	6
1995	232	95	20	7
1996	252	104	21	7
1997	272	118	21	7
1998	286	130	24	7
1999[1]	287	130	24	7

Year ending	Blood factor	Blood/ tissue transfer	Mother to infant	Not known	Total
1981	1	—	—	—	2
1982	1	—	—	—	2
1983	2	—	—	—	3
1984	32	—	—	—	36
1985	51	—	—	—	64
1986	53	—	—	—	92
1987	53	1	—	—	121
1988	53	1	—	2	155
1989	53	1	—	4	187
1990	53	1	—	8	219
1991	53	1	1	8	253
1992	53	1	2	8	302
1993	53	2	3	8	337
1994	53	2	3	9	379
1995	53	4	3	9	423
1996	53	4	4	13	458
1997	53	4	4	16	495
1998	53	4	4	16	524
1999[2]	53	4	4	18	527

Cumulative numbers of newly diagnosed HIV positive cases by Health Authority of diagnosis [1]

Year ending	North Wales	Dyfed Powys	Morgannwg	Bro Taf	Gwent	Total
1981	—	—	—	2	—	2
1982	—	—	—	2	—	2
1983	—	—	—	3	—	3
1984	—	—	2	34	—	36
1985	6	—	7	51	—	64
1986	9	1	9	69	4	92
1987	13	3	15	84	6	121
1988	18	4	20	101	12	155
1989	28	7	24	116	12	187
1990	31	12	30	133	13	219
1991	35	12	32	160	14	253
1992	44	16	42	181	19	302
1993	54	18	52	192	21	337
1994	63	21	53	215	27	379
1995	73	25	67	227	31	423
1996	78	26	73	248	33	458
1997	85	27	78	269	36	495
1998	90	30	82	286	36	524
1999[2]	92	30	83	286	36	527

[1] Cases reported by region/Health Authority of reporting officer. Therefore data does not necessarily equate to area of residence and may exclude Welsh residents diagnosed outside Wales but resident in Wales. Data does not equate to prevalent cases due to the mobility/mortality of cases.
[2] To 31 March
Source:
Communicable Disease Surveillance Centre

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Young Offenders

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the full complement of health care offenders and nurses at (a) Feltham Young Offenders Unit and (b) other young offender units. [84846]

Mr. George Howarth: The figures requested are given in the table.

Complements of healthcare staff at young offender institutions

Location	Principal officers (healthcare)	Senior lofficers (healthcare)	Prison officers (healthcare)	Nurses—all grades	Total
Feltham	2	3	8	17	30
Aylesbury	1	1	2	6	10
Brinsford	1	0	0	20	21
Castington	0	1	0	10	11
Hollesley Bay	0	1	2	3	6
Huntercombe	0	1	1	2	4
Lancaster Farms	0	0	0	22	22
Onley	0	0	1	7	8
Portland	0	1	3	1	5
Stoke Heath	0	0	0	12	12

Complements of healthcare staff at young offender institutions

Location	Principal officers (healthcare)	Senior officers (healthcare)	Prison officers (healthcare)	Nurses—all grades	Total
Thorn Cross	0	0	2	0	2
Werrington	0	1	1	1	3
Wetherby	0	1	0	3	4

Macpherson Report

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on police (a) progress in implementing and (b) plans to implement recommendations of the Macpherson report. [85063]

Mr. Straw: On 24 March I published, an Action Plan which sets out how the report's recommendations will be taken forward. Progress has been made on implementing the recommendations in line with the published plan. Specifically in April:

New police discipline procedures and code of conduct came into effect.

Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary inspection of the Metropolitan Police is under way.

Targets for the recruitment, retention and career progression of minority ethnic officers were set and published.

New guidance to the police on pre-inquest disclosure in relation to deaths in police custody was issued.

I wrote to all local crime and disorder reduction partnerships about tackling racist crime.

A new internal inspection and review framework was introduced within the Metropolitan Police.

A draft manual of police operations in relation to race and hate crime was issued for consultation.

The Steering Group, chaired by me, which has responsibility for overseeing implementation of the report, met for the first time on 18 May.

Community Supervision

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unacceptable absences are allowed before an offender on community supervision becomes the subject of breach proceedings. [84889]

Mr. George Howarth: The current National Standards for the Supervision of Offenders in the Community require breach proceedings to be taken on, or before, a third unacceptable absence. The Government are keen to improve the enforcement of community penalties and are at present reviewing the National Standards with a view to introducing revised Standards next April.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were on the Probation Service's community supervision case load for (i) 1996, (ii) 1997 and (iii) 1998; and what the probation budget was for England and Wales for each of those years. [84888]

Mr. George Howarth: The case load figures are given in the table. The budget figures are shown in the Government's Expenditure Plans 1999–2000 to 2001–02 for the Home Office and Charity Commission (Volume Two).

Persons supervised by the probation service
England and Wales 31 December

Number of persons (thousand)

	All persons supervised [1]
1996	171
1997	185
1998[2]	191

[1] Includes those supervised under criminal court orders, those supervised pre and post-release from custody, and those under Family Court supervision.
[2] Estimated figure at 30 September 1998.

Probation Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders were made subject to (i) a Probation Order and (ii) a Combination Order in (a) 1997 and (b) 1998; and how many in each case have been breached for failure to comply with the terms of the order. [84890]

Mr. George Howarth: The available figures are given in the tables.

Persons starting supervision by the probation service
England and Wales 31 December

Number of persons (thousand)

	Probation Order	Combination Order
1997	50.9	18.9
1997 (first 9 months)	38.2	14.3
1998 (first 9 months)[1]	40.6	15.2

[1] Estimated

Termination of orders supervised by the probation service
England and Wales 1997

Number of persons (thousand)

	All terminations	Failed to comply with the terms of the order [1]
Probation order	51.4	2.3
Combination order	16.8	1.5

[1] Does not include terminated early for conviction of an offence.

Asylum Seekers

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people applied for asylum in the UK during 1998; how many of these applied (i) at a port of entry and (ii) within the country; how many decisions were made; and of those how many were (a) recognition as a refugee, (b) exceptional leave to enter or remain and (c) refusal of asylum; and of the refusals, how many were (x) on safe third country grounds, (y) on non-compliance grounds and (z) refused after full consideration of the case; how many applications were withdrawn; and how many asylum applications were outstanding at the end of the year. [85045]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information requested will be published on 27 May in the annual Home Office Statistical Bulletin, "Asylum Statistics United Kingdom 1998", a copy of which will be placed in the Library of the House on that day.

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people applied for asylum in the UK in (a) March and (b) April; how many people were (i) recognised as refugees, (ii) granted exceptional leave and (iii) refused asylum in each of those months; and how many decisions on the asylum backlog were taken in each of those months. [85043]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information requested will be made available on the Home Office Internet site at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/index.htm, as part of the monthly reporting of asylum figures, on 25 May 1999.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the pilot of the Casework Programme in the Immigration and Nationality Directorate to begin. [84975]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Piloting involves using the system on real cases for the first time and will not begin until the system has been thoroughly tested by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate. It is not possible at this stage to give a firm date, since testing has not yet begun.

Prisoners (Voting Rights)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many working days elapsed between the issuing of guidance to prisons in regard to arrangements for unconvicted prisoners wishing to take part in the local government elections and elections for the Welsh Assembly and Scottish Parliament and the date by which applications to vote by post or proxy had to be received by electoral registration officers. [84949]

Mr. George Howarth: Five working days elapsed between the date that guidance was issued to prisons by electronic mail, and the closing date for receipt by electoral registration officers for applications to vote by post or proxy.

Incentives and Earned Privileges Scheme

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list, by prison, the number of prisoners on each level of the Incentives and Earned Privileges Scheme. [84948]

Mr. George Howarth: The provisional figures for 30 April 1999, which are subject to final validation, are given in the table.

Prisoners on basic, standard and enhanced regimes

Prison name	Basic	Standard	Enhanced
Acklington	13	240	375
Albany	7	91	335
Aldington	1	67	63
Altcourse	19	481	229
Ashwell	40	243	202
Askham Grange	0	36	70
Aylesbury	0	288	76
Bedford	3	314	57
Belmarsh	6	607	102
Birmingham	18	954	94
Blakenhurst	191	586	53
Blantyre House	36	17	61
Blundeston	12	272	72
Brinsford	120	251	118
Bristol	8	447	100
Brixton	1	409	299
Brockhill	17	100	21
Buckley Hall	9	197	175
Bullingdon	18	719	106
Bullwood Hall	7	76	50
Camp Hill	15	360	81
Canterbury	4	275	2
Cardiff	24	417	217
Castington	19	315	41
Channings Wood	8	277	174
Chelmsford	3	358	28
Coldingley	10	184	90
Cookham Wood	0	82	67
Dartmoor	15	556	63
Deerbolt	28	305	90
Doncaster	21	873	168
Dorchester	0	166	19
Dover	11	218	21
Downview	1	102	236
Drake Hall	2	140	68
Durham	12	196	674
East Sutton Park	0	64	26
Eastwood Park	1	186	55
Elmley	10	645	228
Erlestoke	1	132	157
Everthorpe	9	318	130
Exeter	3	337	98
Featherstone	15	535	45
Feltham	37	672	131
Ford	0	136	195
Foston Hall	5	90	61
Frankland	0	0	0
Full Sutton	16	214	254
Garth	9	500	132
Gartree	2	64	296
Glen Parva	65	554	218
Gloucester	14	220	48
Grendon	4	4	82
Guys Marsh	21	345	129
Haslar	0	122	26
Hatfield	3	112	14
Haverigg	4	162	181
Hewell Grange	0	105	63
Highdown	6	600	65
Highpoint	27	410	243
Hindley	10	385	74
Hollesley Bay	21	21	197
Holloway	21	393	93
Holme House	18	825	105
Hull	14	328	150
Huntercombe	8	142	128
Kingston	1	1	174
Kirkham	15	298	101
Kirklevington	0	49	131
Lancaster	3	188	24
Lancaster Farms	45	272	140
Latchmere House	0	82	93
Leeds	30	919	218
Leicester	11	300	36
Lewes	5	392	49
Leyhill	7	148	228
Lincoln	1	313	133
Lindholme	20	558	88
Littlehey	17	491	122
Liverpool	11	1,015	290
Long Lartin	40	131	170

Prisoners on basic, standard and enhanced regimes

Prison name	Basic	Standard	Enhanced
Low Newton	1	62	37
Lowdham Grange	12	58	414
Maidstone	11	256	263
Manchester	35	274	808
Moorland	28	581	160
Morton Hall	8	67	84
Mount	0	472	147
New Hall	4	249	67
North Sea Camp	0	111	59
Northallerton	6	280	4
Norwich	6	539	127
Nottingham	4	295	123
Onley	51	462	75
Parc	28	534	190
Parkhurst	26	226	211
Pentonville	8	833	270
Portland	5	406	98
Preston	8	578	81
Ranby	49	562	118
Reading	2	98	101
Risley	10	403	261
Rochester	5	326	27
Send	0	17	56
Shepton Mallet	7	169	24
Shrewsbury	32	200	79
Stafford	33	469	110
Standford Hill	0	114	127
Stocken	5	466	102
Stoke Heath	133	366	116
Styal	0	343	107
Sudbury	0	232	259
Swaleside	4	308	290
Swansea	1	254	71
Swinfen Hall	18	114	141
Thorn Cross	1	189	89
Usk	5	5	89
Verne	5	293	270
Wakefield	35	475	382
Wandsworth	81	930	210
Wayland	3	389	236
Wealstun	3	3	275
Weare	2	222	72
Wellingborough	7	254	60
Werrington	29	36	39
Wetherby	17	177	122
Whatton	0	110	160
Whitemoor	35	213	201
Winchester	4	351	140
Wolds	21	191	183
Woodhill	18	623	40
Wormwood Scrubs	1	474	315
Wymott	3	556	224

Female Prisoners (Prescription-only Drugs)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many doses of prescription-only (a) psychotropic, (b) hypnotic, (c) other drugs acting on the central nervous system and (d) other drugs were prescribed in each prison holding female prisoners in the most recent year for which figures are available. [84946]

Mr. George Howarth: The information requested is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Pharmaceuticals are generally purchased locally and managed using a number of systems. Also, prescription records are kept within individual prisoner medical files, making it difficult to aggregate information about total usage of individual drugs, or families of drugs, in a meaningful way.

The Prison Service, in deciding on the range of management information about health care activity that is collected from prisons, tries to strike a balance between the costs involved, including the administrative burden on prison staff, and the possible benefits. However, increasing use of Information Technology offers the opportunity to broaden the range of statistics that can be readily available and this matter is kept under review.

Prisoners (Voting Rights)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many unconvicted prisoners in England and Wales exercised their right to vote in the recent local government elections and elections for the Welsh Assembly and Scottish Parliament. [84947]

Mr. George Howarth: The figures for the number of unconvicted prisoners who exercised their right to vote in the recent local government elections and elections for the Welsh Assembly and Scottish Parliament are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Home Detention Curfew

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by prison the number of prisoners (a) assessed for release on home detention curfew, (b) released and (c) recalled. [84942]

Mr. George Howarth: The table gives the information requested up to the end of April according to the Prison Service's inmate information system. The number of prisoners assessed for home detention curfew at each establishment is estimated from the population extracts for the end of each month for prisoners who had a calculated home detention curfew eligibility date within the relevant period. The number actually assessed may be more or less due to the transfer or reception of prisoners during the month.

Home detention curfew—numbers eligible, placed on curfew and recalled—28 January to 30 April 1999

	Eligible (estimated)	Curfewed	Revoked
Acklington	96	30	3
Albany	2	0	0
Aldington	73	28	2
Altcourse	139	21	0
Ashwell	80	12	1
Askham Grange	41	40	0
Aylesbury	6	3	1
Bedford	118	19	1
Belmarsh	121	20	3
Birmingham	289	164	9
Blakenhurst	236	62	1
Blantyre House	0	0	0
Blundeston	18	6	0
Brinsford	88	13	0
Bristol	100	16	2
Brixton	141	47	3
Brockhill	39	9	0
Buckley Hall	31	5	0
Bullingdon	210	58	4
Bullwood Hall	19	7	0

Home detention curfew—numbers eligible, placed on curfew and recalled—28 January to 30 April 1999

	Eligible (estimated)	Curfewed	Revoked
Camp Hill	113	12	0
Canterbury	65	17	0
Cardiff	217	55	4
Castington	47	5	0
Channings Wood	106	21	1
Chelmsford	78	15	1
Colchester	0	0	0
Coldingley	8	0	0
Cookham Wood	26	5	1
Dartmoor	66	12	1
Deerbolt	134	15	0
Doncaster	216	49	3
Dorchester	59	4	0
Dover	82	19	3
Downview	20	12	1
Drake Hall	160	72	3
Durham	225	42	2
Earlstoke	40	14	0
East Sutton Park	37	30	0
Eastwood Park	99	32	0
Elmley	156	32	4
Everthorpe	103	50	4
Exeter	157	53	5
Featherstone	68	26	3
Feltham	103	24	1
Ford	144	119	2
Foston Hall	35	9	1
Frankland	0	0	0
Full Sutton	0	0	0
Garth	0	0	0
Gartree	0	0	0
Glen Parva	173	37	2
Gloucester	53	13	0
Grendon	72	69	1
Guys Marsh	196	61	4
Haslar	2	2	0
Hatfield	87	60	2
Haverigg	112	18	0
Hewell Grange	100	102	1
Highdown	167	69	2
Highpoint	154	43	2
Hindley	116	13	0
Hollesley Bay	82	48	5
Holloway	75	28	1
Holme House	323	69	3
Hull	181	31	0
Huntercombe	95	61	4
Kingston	0	0	0
Kirkham	330	203	8
Kirklevington	44	38	0
Lancaster	152	6	0
Lancaster Farms	79	19	0
Latchmere House	0	0	0
Leeds	238	51	5
Leicester	36	1	0
Lewes	133	38	4
Leyhill	44	34	0
Lincoln	110	20	1
Lindholme	144	63	3
Littlehey	76	12	0
Liverpool	498	60	3
Long Lartin	0	0	0
Low Newton	37	19	1
Lowdham Grange	0	0	0
Maidstone	7	3	0
Manchester	99	15	0
Moorland	86	43	2
Morton Hall	135	97	3

Home detention curfew—numbers eligible, placed on curfew and recalled—28 January to 30 April 1999

	Eligible (estimated)	Curfewed	Revoked
New Hall	103	30	0
North Sea Camp	108	80	0
Northallerton	87	30	3
Norwich	264	128	6
Nottingham	44	2	1
Onley	161	65	3
Parc	155	7	0
Parkhurst	10	1	0
Pentonville	278	65	5
Portland	114	24	0
Preston	155	19	3
Pucklechurch	0	0	0
Ranby	217	33	0
Reading	62	12	0
Risley	257	33	0
Rochester	17	9	0
Send	11	6	0
Shepton Mallet	34	12	0
Shrewsbury	86	46	6
Stafford	116	27	2
Stanford Hill	93	97	2
Stocken	75	26	1
Stoke Heath	193	17	0
Styal	64	38	3
Sudbury	82	69	2
Swaleside	4	3	0
Swansea	92	18	2
Swinfen Hall	6	2	0
The Mount	93	34	2
The Verne	43	8	0
The Wolds	38	7	1
Thorn Cross	88	61	9
Usk	71	54	0
Wakefield	0	0	0
Wandsworth	244	58	1
Wayland	78	33	2
Wealstun	81	63	1
Weare	173	54	2
Wellingborough	49	25	1
Werrington	0	0	0
Wetherby	41	20	2
Whatton	20	0	0
Whitemoor	0	0	0
Winchester	133	55	5
Woodhill	182	53	1
Wormwood Scrubs	203	70	3
Wymott	80	11	0

Bookmakers

Mr. Cunliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what decision he has taken on the composition of the Bookmakers Committee. [85651]

Mr. George Howarth: On 3 December 1998, we sought the views of interested bodies on proposals for reconstituting the Bookmakers' Committee. Having taken careful account of the views expressed we have decided to make those changes. We believe that this will improve the Committee's ability to represent bookmakers' interests in a balanced way in carrying out its task of recommending to the Horserace Betting Levy Board the levy rates to be paid by bookmakers for the benefit of horseracing.

Therefore, I have today made regulations to establish the following membership:

	Seats
Betting Office Licensees Association Ltd	2
National Association of Bookmakers Ltd	2
British Betting Office Association Ltd	2
Ladbroke Racing Ltd	2
Willian Hill Organisation Ltd	2
Coral Racing Ltd	2
Total	12

In providing for the three companies which in 1998–99 contributed nearly 80 per cent. of the total levy yield to have half of the seats on the Committee, we are redressing their previous under-representation while at the same time recognising the extent to which there are many smaller firms whose ability to pay needs to be properly represented. In reaching this decision, we have sought to achieve a reasonable balance between the different bookmaking interests and organisations. The factors taken into account were the size of organisations' membership, the number of off-course shops, the leviable turnover and the levy paid. We do not believe that the new structure will give any companies double representation on the Committee. Nor do we believe that continuing representation of the Scottish Independent Bookmakers Association is justified, given the small number of members, some of whom also belong to other trade associations. We believe that the new constitution will still take proper account of the interests of small independent bookmakers, whether in Scotland or South of the Border.

It will be for the Committee itself to decide who will chair it and how it will manage its business. We very much hope that the Committee will make every effort to reach agreement on the next levy scheme with the Levy Board. Co-operation between bookmaking and racing interests is important in this as in other areas.

We will keep the new arrangements under review, with the help of the independent members of the Levy Board, whose brief it is to have regard to the interests of racing, bookmakers in all categories and the punter.

Monkeys

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he has taken to ensure that (a) the importation of monkeys to Shamrock Farm, Henfield and (b) the treatment of monkeys at Shamrock Farm, Henfield is conducted in accordance with approved procedures and legislation. [85362]

Mr. George Howarth: The transportation and importation of animals is primarily a matter for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In 1996, the Home Office introduced new measures relating to the acquisition of non-human primates from overseas sources for use in procedures under the terms of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. These are summarised in Appendix A to the 'Statistics of Scientific Procedures on Living Animals, Great Britain, 1997'. In support of these new measures, the Home Office set administrative requirements including that > additional records be kept of the breeding and conditions of housing and husbandry at the centre from which the animals were obtained; and > after each delivery of primates from an overseas source, the Home Office be sent:

>
>
> confirmation that the animals were shipped according to the agreed plan and arrived safely;
>
> lifetime records for each animal;
>
> a report of the veterinary inspection that must be carried out on arrival; and
>
> within six weeks, details of any morbidity and mortality arising during the first four weeks following arrival in the United Kingdom.

These are in addition to the records on the source, use (where appropriate) and disposal of animals that all designated establishments are required to keep and make available to the Home Office on request.

All designated establishments must meet the terms and conditions of the certificate of designation and, unless otherwise authorised, are expected to comply with the requirements of the relevant code of practice for the housing and care of animals.

Responsibility for abiding by the laws rests primarily with the individuals concerned and all establishments are now required to have local ethical review processes which, amongst other things, will provide advice about the care and welfare of animals.

All designated establishments are, however, regularly visited by Home Office inspectors, often without notice, to monitor compliance with all the relevant controls including those relating to the acquisition and care of animals.

Prisoner Accommodation (Offences against Children)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to provide accommodation at prison sites for offenders convicted of offences against children on the completion of their sentence; if he will list the prisons to be used for such accommodation; and if he will make a statement. [85344]

Mr. Boateng: There are plans to transform office accommodation within the secure perimeter of Nottingham Prison into bedsits to house two or three offenders previously convicted of offences against children. They will live under close supervision. We have no such plans for any other prison.

Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many claims were lodged outside the limitation period in each year of operation of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme 1996; and of these, how many were allowed to proceed. [85365]

Mr. Boateng: The Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority has provided the following information:

Year	Claims outside time limit	Number allowed to proceed
1996–97	5,507	5,426
1997–98	5,972	5,465
1998–99	5,948	5,067

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many awards at the maximum level 25 rate were (a) made and (b) remain outstanding for each year of operation of the Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme 1996. [85366]

Mr. Boateng: The Criminal Injuries Compensation Authority advises that the following level 25 awards have been made:

Year
1996–97	0
1997–98	1 (interim)
1998–99	3

One further award at level 25 is currently on offer.

It is not possible to say how many of the thousands of applications presently in the system, and where further inquiries are being made, for example, of the police and medical authorities, will result in an offer of award at level 25.

Criminal Matters (Newspaper Reports)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received from the Newspaper Society about their members' ability to report on criminal matters and trials where young people under the age of 18 years are involved; and if he will make a statement. [85274]

Mr. Boateng: The Youth Justice and Criminal Evidence Bill introduced in the House of Lords on 3 December 1998 proposes changes to reporting restrictions in respect of under 18's. A number of media organisations, including the Newspaper Society, have written to Ministers and met with my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams and officials to argue for a wider right to report identities. The Government are carefully considering the points made.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Goods Vehicles

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the cost per mile of running a 40 tonne goods vehicle in (a) the UK, (b) Belgium, (c) France, (d) Holland, (e) Germany, (f) Italy, (g) Luxembourg, (h) Portugal, (i) Spain and (j) Austria. [81459]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested by the hon. Member is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mobile Refrigeration Units (Solar Energy)

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what examination his Department has made of the feasibility of installing photo-voltaic cells on the roofs of large refrigerated articulated trucks in order to power mobile refrigeration units by renewable means. [84317]

Ms Glenda Jackson: My Department is aware of the development work that has been carried out by J. Sainsburys plc in partnership with Southampton University and a consortium of manufacturers. An articulated HGV using photo-voltaic cells to power the refrigeration unit of the trailer has been in daily use for the past two years. Although such a vehicle requires expensive initial capital investment and the additional weight of the power unit results in a loss of vehicle payload, the technology has proved reliable and has the potential to be cost effective. The Department of Trade and Industry is supporting a project under its new and renewable energy programme looking at the further development of Sainsbury's photo-voltaic powered refrigeration unit.

The main benefit derived from use of this power source has been reduced noise, since an internal combustion engine is no longer required to power the refrigeration unit. Additional benefits are zero emissions from the refrigeration itself and low maintenance costs. As the technology can only be used to operate chill units, designed to operate at temperatures down to +3°C there is some loss of trailer flexibility.

Local Safety Schemes

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to allocate funding to highway authorities for the provision of safety measures at sites with an accident record of less than three years; [84633]

(2) what plans he has to review the criteria for allocating funding to highway authorities under the Local Safety Scheme Programme; [84634]

(3) what assessment he has made of the policy to restrict funding allocations under the Local Safety Scheme Programme to sites with a three-year accident record; [84631]

(4) what plans he has to review the current guidelines for highway authorities on the provision of accident reduction and traffic calming measures; [84632]

(5) what assessment he has made of the impact on road accident reduction of the Local Safety Scheme Programme. [84643]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Under the Transport Policies and Programme (TPP) regime for local capital transport expenditure, funding for Local Safety Schemes was restricted to sites which had a three year record of accidents. A consistent pattern of accidents suggested a problem with the road layout which was likely to be alleviated by engineering measures, rather than randomly occurring accidents arising from other causes, such as driver behaviour.

In terms of assessment, the 1996 Transport Research Laboratory study "Accident Reductions from Local Authority Safety Schemes using Transport Supplementary Grant" outlined the success of the general approach to these schemes. An overall 29 per cent. reduction in accidents followed the implementation of the schemes and an overall first year rate of return of 190 per cent. was achieved. Most of the schemes produced a reduction in the severity of accidents; there was a 29 per cent. drop in slight casualties, a 46 per cent. drop in serious casualties and an 88 per cent. drop in fatalities. A new research project is currently looking in more depth at the effectiveness of recent local safety schemes and is expected to be completed later in 1999.

The Government's Transport White Paper "A New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone" announced the replacement of the TPP system with Local Transport Plans (LTPs). These plans will place much greater emphasis on targets and the strategy to achieve those targets rather than individual projects. There will be a greater emphasis on local authorities getting results, but greater flexibility in how they achieve them.

In April this year we published guidance to local authorities on producing the provisional Local Transport Plans for 2000–01, due to be submitted in July 1999. Consistent with the new approach, it does not prescribe that expenditure be on sites with a three year accident record. Local authorities will, however, need to continue to examine where accidents and accident casualties are occurring and to plan cost effective remedial engineering measures as one element of an overall safety strategy. The LTP guidance will be reviewed following receipt of the provisional plans in July and we expect to produce further guidance in time for the full LTPs, due in July 2000.

We will continue to issue advice on the technical aspects of traffic calming to local highway authorities through Traffic Advisory Leaflets.

Genetically Modified Foods

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, if he has responded to the Local Government Association statement on genetically modified foods. [75496]

Mr. Meacher: Yes, I have responded to the Local Government Association statement on genetically modified foods and a copy has been placed in the Library.

Media Relations

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers involved in media relations were employed within his Department at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [84201]

Mr. Meale [holding answer 18 May 1999]: Detailed information on the numbers of permanent civil servants employed in Departmental Press Offices during the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99 were provided in a memorandum dated 16 June 1998 to the Select Committee on Public Administration and published in its report on the Government Information and Communication Service (HC 770) in July 1998. A copy is in the Library of the House. The number of GICS Press Officers in post in DETR(C) on 1 May 1999 was 37.

Special Advisers in this Department have ad hoc contact with the media but none are specifically employed in media relations.

Global Warming

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the report published in the New Scientist on 1 May on the speeding-up of the cooling of the mesosphere and its likely impact on global warming. [84909]

Mr. Meale: Cooling of the upper atmosphere is an expected consequence of increasing greenhouse gas concentrations, and although the reported study is yet to be completed, and the size of the cooling confirmed, cooling of the mesosphere is not expected to impact significantly predictions of climate change.

Canals

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what provision exists to facilitate the reinstatement of canals obstructed by road construction and improvement. [84905]

Mr. Meale: There is a duty for a highway authority wishing to promote a road scheme which would cross a waterway where there are extant navigation rights to provide a suitable crossing. The Department is reviewing the issues of managing the different interests involved in canal restoration and highway schemes. This should be covered in the daughter document on inland waterways which will be published in the next few months.

British Rail Employees (Asbestos)

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 1999, Official Report, column 245, if he will list (a) the dates on which claims were made, (b) the dates on which compensation was received, (c) the value of the compensation claimed and (d) the region in which the employee was working, for all claims since 1991 by former employees of British Rail who are diagnosed as having mesothelioma, asbestosis or primary carcinoma of the lung, related to exposure to asbestos. [84985]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from the British Railways Board that information requested is not available in a form which can be analysed in the manner requested without disproportionate cost.

Water Companies

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers his Department retains to ensure that the plans of the water companies for asset replacement are consistent with public safety. [84892]

Mr. Meale: The Government require water companies to operate in ways which are consistent with public safety through a variety of regulatory requirements, such as those concerned with health and safety at work and the quality of drinking water, rather than through control of their asset replacement policies.

The Director General of Water Services is required to exercise his powers and duties in the manner that he considers is best calculated to secure that the functions of water and sewerage undertakers are properly carried out as respects every area of England and Wales, and that undertakers are able to finance the proper carrying out of their functions.

The Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Wales have published "Raising the Quality", giving guidance to the Director General of Water Services on the environmental and quality obligations to be achieved by the water industry in England and Wales 2000–05. That guidance covered such public health matters as tackling deteriorating raw water quality and reducing the risk from cryptosporidium. Ministerial guidance has also been given in "Maintaining Public Water Supplies" on issues arising in the preparation of water resources plans by the water companies in England and Wales. The Director General will take this guidance into account in determining water company price limits in the current Periodic Review of water prices.

Ministers also have power, under Section 208 of the Water Industry Act 1991 to give directions to water undertakers covering emergencies and in the interests of national security.

Westminster City Council

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 287, concerning reviews by the Audit Commission of the District Auditor's investigation of Westminster City Council's designated sales, if he will list the reviews carried out. [85061]

Ms Armstrong: The Audit Commission considered reviews concerning the auditor's investigation into Westminster City Council's designated sales on two occasions in 1994, two occasions in 1995 and most recently in April 1996.

Birmingham Northern Relief Road

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to use his powers to regulate relative tolling levels in respect of the Birmingham Northern Relief Road. [85037]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There are no plans to do so. A statutory decision has been reached to change the basis on which the Birmingham Northern Relief Road (BNRR) has been promoted and authorised. The Decision Letter of 23 July 1997 followed a lengthy statutory process. In it the Secretary of State decided against modifying the BNRR toll order to prescribe a relationship between the tolling levels of different classes of vehicle. The Court of Appeal judgment of 23 March concluded that there was no requirement for the Secretary of State to impose restrictions on the relative level of tolls and, although he did have a power to do so, his statutory decision was perfectly valid.

Eyesight Standards

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the (a) benefits and (b) disadvantages of exempting lorry and bus drivers from European Union eyesight standards. [85261]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 24 May 1999]: Drivers of lorries and buses (group 2) who obtained their licence since the implementation of the Second EC Driving Licence Directive on 1 January 1997, are subject to the Directive eyesight requirements.

Drivers of group 2 vehicles who obtained their licence before 1 January 1997, who are unable to meet the Directive eyesight requirements for such vehicles, but who can continue to meet the pre-Directive requirements, may renew their licence.

Drivers of group 2 vehicles who obtained their licence before 1 January 1997, who are unable to meet the pre-Directive requirements for such vehicles, but who can continue to meet the requirements applicable when they obtained their entitlement, may renew their licence provided that they have not been involved in a road accident in the preceding 10 years where defective eyesight was a contributory factor and that they have adequate recent experience of driving these vehicles. This has allowed drivers with a safe driving record over many years to retain their employment.

We have no evidence that preserved rights for these drivers have had an adverse effect on road safety.

Road Safety Strategy

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Road Safety Strategy will be published; and what representations he has received on the inclusion of casualty reduction targets. [85262]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 24 May 1999]: It is intended to publish the road safety strategy and targets in Autumn 1999 in order to reflect the findings of the review of speed policy announced in chapter 3 of the Government's Transport White Paper "A New Deal for Transport: Better for Everyone".

We consulted widely in 1997 on options for possible casualty reduction targets. There was an overwhelming response in favour of such targets. The road safety strategy will include targets for casualty reduction for 2010.

Road Fatalities

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many road fatalities there were among (a) cyclists and (b) pedestrians in (i) Coventry, (ii) the United Kingdom and (iii) each EU member state in the last year for which figures are available. [85259]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The information requested is shown in the following table.

	Pedal cyclists killed 1997	Pedestrians killed 1997
Coventry	1	5
United Kingdom	187	1,010
Austria	66	156
Belgium	122	142
Denmark	65	87
Finland	61	69
France	348	982
Germany	679	1,147
Greece	n/a	n/a
Irish Republic	24	130
Italy	429	894
Luxembourg[1]	2	7
Netherlands	240	119

	Pedal cyclists killed 1997	Pedestrians killed 1997
Portugal	75	624
Spain	116	960
Sweden	42	74

[1] 1996 figures

Sources:

OECD—International Road traffic Accident Database for EU data.
DETR, DOE (NI)—for UK data.

Peat Working Group

Caroline Flint: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will report on the work of the Peat Working Group. [85436]

Mr. Raynsford: The Peat Working Group was convened in 1997 to review existing planning policies for the provision of peat and alternative materials, and to advise the Government of the need, or otherwise, for change. It will report shortly, and we will consider arrangements for the publication of its findings.

Shipping Services Directive

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's support for full implementation of EU Directive 94/57 on the freedom to provide classification and other shipping services; and what progress has been made by EU member states in implementing this Directive. [85307]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The UK supports full implementation of Council Directive 94/57/EC and expects other Member States to do likewise. I understand that all Member States have transposed the Directive into their national legislation.

Energy Efficiency Schemes

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the average change in the proportion of income spent on heating by households who receive home improvements under the (a) new home energy efficiency schemes and (b) new home energy efficiency Plus schemes; [85469]

(2) what estimate he has made of the percentage of households receiving assistance under the (a) new home energy efficiency schemes and (b) new home energy efficiency Plus schemes which will be removed from his Department's definition of fuel poverty. [85470]

Mr. Meale: The definition of a fuel poor household applied by academics and organisations active in the sector is one which needs to spend in excess of 10 per cent. of household income in order to achieve a satisfactory indoor heating regime (21°C in the living room and 18°C in the other occupied rooms).

We estimate that the assistance provided under the proposed new home energy efficiency scheme (HEES) and new HEES Plus will reduce the cost of heating an average 3 bedroom semi-detached house to the required standard by between £600 and £1,000 depending on the energy efficiency of the property prior to improvement. Due to the vast large variety of combinations of dwelling type, size, heating and level of insulation, we are not at this stage able to estimate what would be the average improvement under either new HEES or new HEES Plus. For the same reason we are not able to estimate what would be the average improvement in terms of the standard assessment procedure.

The intention of new HEES and new HEES Plus will be to move households out of fuel poverty and we expect to substantially achieve that. The main exception will be those few households (1 per cent. or less) who are eligible for new HEES and live in properties that are both semi-detached/detached and use on-peak electricity or smokeless solid fuel. The size and type of these properties combined with the cost of the fuel used make it difficult to move these households entirely out of fuel poverty. Our consultation paper seeks comments on the best package to assist these households.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of (i) the number of homes to be improved, (ii) what the average new grant will be and (iii) the average improvement in terms of the standard assessment procedure rating of homes under the (a) new home energy efficiency schemes and (b) new home energy efficiency plus schemes. [85468]

Mr. Meale: We estimate that in the first two years, 2000–01 and 2001–02, the new home energy efficiency scheme (HEES) will assist some 200,000 households, with the average value of grant assisted work being £400 per household.

Over the same period, we estimate that new HEES Plus will assist a further 300,000 low income over-60's households, with the average value of grant assisted work being £700 per household. We are carrying out further work in order to refine these estimates.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what proportion of the expenditure announced in "Fuel Poverty: The New Home Energy Efficiency Schemes" to alleviate fuel poverty will be allocated to (a) England, (b) Scotland and (c) Wales; [85471]

(2) how many of the households included in the (a) new home energy efficiency plus schemes and (b) new home energy efficiency schemes will be in (i) England, (ii) Scotland and (iii) Wales; [85472]

(3) how much money is available to be spent on new home energy efficiency schemes and new home energy efficiency plus schemes in the next two years; and what proportion of this will be spent on (a) grants to households and (b) administration and other costs. [85467]

Mr. Meale: Over 2000–01 and 2001–02, we have allocated a total of £300 million to tackling fuel poverty through energy efficiency improvements. Since this will be a devolved function, we shall shortly consider the most appropriate method of dividing the moneys between the proposed new home energy efficiency scheme (HEES) in England and the separate programmes in Scotland and Wales, taking account of the extent of fuel poverty in each.

We estimate that some 7.7 million households in England will be eligible for assistance under either new HEES or new HEES Plus. In 1996 we estimated that there were between 4.3 million and 5.4 million fuel poor households in England. Our proposed criteria for eligibility therefore go wider than the definition of the fuel poor in order to reach all those households for whom the health risks from cold homes are the greatest.

Administrative costs will be kept as low as possible consistent with ensuring that the most vulnerable households are identified quickly and with ensuring the quality of the service provided. Costs will be determined ultimately by competitive tender. Under the existing scheme some administrative costs are included in installer charges and there is no obligation to target the most vulnerable households.

Advisory Group on Motorcycling

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what issues were discussed at the first meeting of the Advisory Group on Motorcycling; when its next meeting will be held; and what procedures exist for members of the public to make representations to the Group. [85338]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The first meeting of the Advisory Group on Motorcycling identified key areas of concern to motorcyclists and other interested parties. These included the issues of training and licensing, safety and the environment. The Group will consider these and other issues to assist the Government in developing their policy on motorcycling.

The next meeting will take place on 21 July. It is open to members of the public to make representations to member organisations or, of course, direct to the Government, should they wish.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the membership of the Advisory Group on Motorcycling. [85337]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The membership of the Advisory Group on Motorcycling is:

National Motorcycle Council
British Motorcyclists Federation
Motorcycle Industry Association
Despatch Association
Motorcycle Retailers Association
Motorcycle Action Group
Motorcycle Rider Training Association
Automobile Association
Royal Automobile Club
Local Authority Road Safety Officers' Association
Association of London Borough Road Safety Officers
Association of Chief Police Officers
Local Government Association.

Safety Regulations (Riverside Sites)

Mr. John Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the nature and basis of the statutory regulations relating to safety in connection with repair or construction work on bridges and other structures over tidal water on the River Thames upstream of Gravesend, with particular reference to those applying to the specification of safety boats and the qualifications of their crews. [Transferred] [85306]

Mr. Meale: The safety of construction and repair workers at riverside sites, is covered by the Construction (Health, Safety and Welfare) Regulations 1996. They include measures to prevent falls, minimise the risk of drowning and to provide rescue equipment (but do not specify what type). The Regulations require the safe transport of workers by water, any vessel used shall be suitably constructed and properly maintained, under the control of competent person and not be overloaded. An inspector would take these factors into account when visiting a site.

The Maritime and Coastguard Agency can advise on appropriate standards for rescue and work boats which are used only on inland waters, but there are no specific merchant shipping regulations laying down standards for such boats or qualifications of those manning them.

The Port of London Authority (PLA) require boats carrying goods or up to 12 passengers to be licensed and operated by licensed watermen. The PLA is not empowered to insist on this for boats used solely as rescue boats, but can only advise. The most suitable craft for individual circumstances is best determined through a properly conducted risk assessment.

Local Government Reform

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if local authorities that opt for area-based committees will be permitted to delegate executive functions to them under his proposals for local government reform. [85381]

Ms Armstrong: Having regard to the responses received to our Paper "Local leadership, local choice" (Command Paper 4298), we are considering how any legislation for new forms of local governance can allow decisions to be devolved to local areas whilst ensuring there will be clear corporate executive accountability in each council.

Concessionary Fares (London)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 290, concerning the London concessionary fares scheme, if he will table amendments in the House of Lords to extend the reserve scheme to include surface rail services. [85445]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Greater London Authority Bill will provide adequate powers for London local authorities to deal satisfactorily with the provision of concessions on London rail services. We have always made clear that our general aim for the Greater London Authority Bill is to transfer existing responsibilities to the Mayor, rather than attempt major revisions of legislation affecting London going beyond the policies outlined in the White Paper. The creation of a new statutory reserve scheme including surface rail would not be compatible with that aim.

Canary Wharf

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps his Department is taking to ensure that Canary Wharf Developments restores the bridge between Canary Wharf and South Keys. [85458]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State understands that the British Waterways Board is currently liaising with Canary Wharf Developments and various groups on the South Quay with the aim of putting in place a temporary footbridge while the existing bridge between Canary Wharf and South Quay is not in use.

Brownfield Land

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what estimate he has made of the amount of available brownfield land suitable for housing development; [85449]

(2) what estimate he has made of the amount of available brownfield land suitable for industrial development; [85450]

(3) what is his current estimate of the amount of available brownfield land suitable for retail development. [85457]

Mr. Raynsford: Provisional results from the National Land Use Database were published on 20 May. These show an estimate of 33,000 hectares of previously developed vacant and derelict land across England. Some 4,800 hectares of this land was allocated in local plans or had planning permission for housing, about 4,500 hectares for mixed use and around 13,400 for other uses. In total, just over 12,000 hectares of vacant and derelict land either had planning permission or were allocated in the local plan for housing or were judged suitable for housing. Suitability was not assessed for retail or industrial development.

The National Land Use Database also included sites currently in use but allocated in local plans for redevelopment or with planning permission for housing; other sites expected to become available for redevelopment; and sites occupied by vacant commercial buildings. Such sites accounted for an estimated 23,000 hectares, of which over 5,000 hectares were allocated for redevelopment in plans or had planning permission for housing and a total of over 14,000 hectares were judged suitable for housing.

A copy of the DETR/Government Statistical Service Bulletin has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Urban Task Force Report

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to receive the report from the Urban Task Force. [85455]

Mr. Caborn: The Deputy Prime Minister hopes to receive the final draft of the Task Force's report in the next few days. It will then be prepared for publication, which will be by the end of June.

Car Insurance

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to strengthen the rules in relation to car insurance and the abuse of cover notes. [85309]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Increasing use of electronic delivery of services in the insurance industry is making abuse of cover notes more difficult. As the Government move to electronic direct relicensing of vehicles, including use of the Association of British Insurers planned motor insurance database, such abuse should be virtually eliminated because enforcement authorities will be able to have access to insurance information on-line in real time.

Anybody who had the misfortune to be the victim in an accident involving a driver abusing a cover note should be reassured that compensation would be paid by the Motor Insurers Bureau under the terms of the Uninsured Drivers Agreement.

Road Tax

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to eliminate fraud through the abuse of road tax discs. [85308]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Vehicle excise duty (VED) fraud can take a number of forms. The display of fraudulent tax discs is a serious matter which is dealt with solely by the police. There is no evidence to suggest that the practice is widespread. Where vehicles are used or kept unlicensed on the public road, the detection role is carried out by the police, who pass offence reports to the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency for enforcement action.

My Department has introduced a number of new initiatives aimed at reducing the level of vehicle excise duty evasion. These include measures to improve the quality of the vehicle register and to make it more difficult for motorists to drop out of the licensing system. The national scheme to wheelclamp and impound unlicensed vehicles continues to be successful in encouraging motorists to relicense their vehicles. A pilot scheme to use camera technology for automating the detection process is to begin shortly.

Best Value in Housing Framework

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement about the recently completed consultation exercise on the best value in housing framework. [85628]

Ms Armstrong: On 21 January 1999 we published the consultation paper "Best Value in Housing Framework". This explained the framework within which local housing authorities will need to operate in obtaining best value in housing taking into account key housing aspects such as the relationship between best value and the Housing Investment Programme; the important role of tenants and residents; and the operation and establishment of the Housing Inspectorate.

The consultation paper flowed from the work of the Best Value in Housing Steering Group which brings together representatives from my Department; the Local Government Association; the Chartered Institute of Housing; the Audit Commission; the Housing Corporation; the National Housing Federation; and TAROE—the Tenants and Residents Organisations of England. Consultation ended on 16 April 1999. We received 268 responses from across a wide range of local authorities, tenants organisations and housing professional bodies which will help inform the content of the final guidance.

I am pleased to announce that the consultation shows that there is strong support for the principles of best value in housing as set out in the consultation paper and, in particular, for the involvement of tenants and residents. There is also strong support for a protocol setting out the working relationships between the key organisations involved in assessing housing performance at the local level and compliance with the duty of best value. The consultation paper has been instrumental in raising awareness of best value among local authorities and others. Many local authority respondents indicated that they have found it a useful guide in helping them to prepare for best value.

In supporting the principles, a number of respondents raised resource, staffing and budgetary concerns relating to the implementation of best value. We accept that there are likely to be some compliance costs in areas such as best value reviews and performance plans. However, the intended purpose of the best value provisions is to secure continuous improvements in the way in which local government exercises its functions. The improved efficiency and effectiveness in the use of resources which result is expected to deliver cost savings as well as improvements in service delivery. To ensure efficiency, best value will be underpinned by rigorous audit, inspection and enforcement provisions. These will include the audit of the local authority performance plans as well as their accounts, which will include the costs of conducting reviews and preparing plans. The clear signal from the consultation is that we should proceed to work up a final set of guidance on the application of best value to housing. We aim to publish this towards the end of the year. The timing reflects the need to take account of the statutory arrangements to be put in place for best value.

In taking this work forward, through the Best Value in Housing Steering Group and others, we shall also want to take account of the detailed comments of respondents to the consultation exercise; further emerging lessons from the best value pilots; the read across to the work of the Housing Corporation in applying best value to registered social landlords; and the arrangements being developed by the Audit Commission for the operation and establishment of the Housing Inspectorate. Meanwhile, it is important that all local authorities, if they have not already done so, start planning ahead for best value. The new duty of best value, as laid down in Part I of the Local Government Bill, is expected to apply as from 1 April 2000.

I am placing a list of the respondents, excluding any who requested confidentiality, in the House Library together with a report providing an analysis of the responses. The list and specific responses are available in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions Library, Ashdown House, 123 Victoria Street, London SW1E 6DE, telephone 0171 890 3039.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Fair Trade Products

Ms Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to introduce fair trade products at (a) meetings, (b) events and (c) catering facilities within his Department. [82869]

Janet Anderson: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary on 5 May 1999, Official Report, column 410.

Concessionary Television Licences

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations he has received regarding proposals by the BBC to withdraw concessionary TV licences from sheltered accommodation. [84904]

Janet Anderson: We have received no such representations. The BBC has no power to amend the concessionary television licence scheme, nor has the Corporation submitted proposals for change to the Government or the BBC funding review panel. The Government have, however, received representations from Members of Parliament, local authorities and members of the public about the withdrawal of concessionary licences from sheltered accommodation which no longer meets the qualifying criteria for entitlement to the concession.

Radio Authority

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport who are (a) the auditors responsible for ensuring the financial propriety of the Radio Authority and (b) the authors of the report on allegations of impropriety in the award of radio licences by the Radio Authority. [85096]

Janet Anderson: The Radio Authority's internal auditors are PricewaterhouseCoopers. Its external auditors are Grant Thornton, whose Crawley office is responsible for the audit.

The authors of the independent report of the Inquiry into allegations concerning the award of the East of England regional licence were the Forensic Services Group of the London office of Grant Thornton.

Royal Opera House

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what estimate he has made of the deficit at the Royal Opera House in (i) 1999–2000 and (ii) 2000–01. [85287]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: If the Royal Opera House development appeal is successful in reaching its fund raising target, then the deficit at the Royal Opera House will have been eliminated by the end of the current financial year.

RADA

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Arts Council regarding the finances of the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art; and if he will make a statement. [85288]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: I have regular discussions with the Arts Council on a wide range of issues.

English Tourism Council

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the aims and objectives of the English Tourism Council. [85293]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: On 14 December 1998 we announced in "A New Cultural Framework" that we would establish a new streamlined, more strategic body to support tourism in England. "Tomorrow's Tourism", the strategy we published in February gave further information on the role of the new body. On 27 April 1999, Official Report, columns 114–15, I announced to the House that the body would be known as the English Tourism Council (ETC) and provide a further indication of the ETC's functions. We are working with the English Tourist Board on the detailed remit of the ETC and will be publishing aims and objectives as part of the launch of the ETC, which we expect to take place in July.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps his Department is taking to support the development of the English Tourism Council. [85295]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: Officials in my Department are working very closely with staff at the English Tourist Board as work on the development of the English Tourism Council continues. As well as advice, we are providing funds of £2.8 million over two years to support the transition.

Broadcasting Standards Commission

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when he last had discussions with the Broadcasting Standards Commission; and if he will make a statement about its future role in the regulation of taste, decency and impartiality. [85290]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: I last met the members of the Broadcasting Standards Commission on 23 March. The Government completed their consultation on the future regulation of broadcasting and telecommunications earlier this year. We will report on the outcome, and set out our plans for developing regulation and the role of the BSC, in the near future.

Accommodation Rating Scheme

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what funds have been allocated by his Department for the consumer marketing of the harmonised accommodation rating scheme. [85296]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The funding of £11.8 million allocated to the English Tourist Board last December represents an increase of £2.1 million from the previous year. The increase is to be used for transforming the ETB into the English Tourism Council and also recognises our desire for a successful consumer launch of the new harmonised accommodation rating schemes. In accordance with our funding agreement with the ETB and the recent "Report and Action Plan for Establishing a New National Body for Tourism in England", the ETB has budgeted £300,000 of its total Government allocation for the consumer launch, which it is planning in partnership with the AA and the RAC for this September.

Arts Council

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the organisations which have received Arts Council stabilisation grants indicating the sums involved in each case; and what criteria the Council used in making its decisions on the allocation of the grants. [85298]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The Pilot Stabilisation Programme, launched by the Arts Council of England in September 1997, made financial awards to 14 organisations, including two consortiums and one interim award (to the English National Opera). The aim of the programme is to strengthen arts organisations creatively, managerially and financially by providing them with expert advice and financial resources, giving them the opportunity to put themselves on a more secure financial footing.

	£
Birmingham Repertory Theatre	5,773,000
Blackheath Concert Halls	1,150,000
Bournemouth Orchestras	3,182,000
Cinema City, Norwich	385,272
Embroiderers' Guild	485,301
English National Opera	[1]9,200,000
Hampshire Arts Centres Consortium	394,000
Inner City Music	530,260
The Junction, Cambridge	474,013
London Symphony Orchestra	868,000
Northern Sinfonia	1,691,781
Sheffield Museums and Galleries Consortium	1,098,377
Tara Arts Group	605,534
West Yorkshire Playhouse	2,645,000

[1] Two awards: October 1997 £4.5m and September 1998 £4.7m

The criteria used by the Arts Council were published at the time the scheme was originally announced.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much of the Arts Council of England's grant in aid for the current year remains unallocated. [85289]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The Arts Council has allocated its budget in full, including making provision for flexible funding for new initiatives. Plans for these initiatives will be announced over coming weeks.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions he has had with the Arts Council on improving the performance of their building monitors. [85291]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The National Audit Office published on 14 May its report on the Arts Council's monitoring of major capital projects, funded by the National Lottery, which covered the performance of building monitors. My officials have, of course, discussed with the Arts Council the content of the report and ways of maintaining improvements in the performance of building monitors, and will continue to do so.

National Museums and Galleries

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to change the legal status of national museums and galleries; and if he will make a statement. [85292]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: During the DCMS Comprehensive Spending Review, the National Museums Directors Conference expressed the wish for a more strategic relationship with Government through greater operational independence and flexibility.

Subsequently, DCMS Ministers have been considering various ways in which institutions might be given greater financial and managerial autonomy. Options might include improved public sector management, public/private partnerships or a change of legal status.

No decision has yet been reached in this matter.

Wembley Stadium

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when site work on the redevelopment of Wembley Stadium will commence; and if he will make a statement. [85300]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: Work on demolishing the existing stadium at Wembley is scheduled to begin in September 2000. Following acquisition of the stadium in March, my hon. Friend the Minister for Sport and I establish a committee with the key parties to monitor progress against the agreed programme.

World Cup (2006)

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money he has spent to date in support of England's bid to host the 2006 World Cup. [84990]

Mr. Banks [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The Football Association advise that, up to the end of 1998, they have spent £3,053,522 on the 2006 World Cup bid, from a budget of some £9.4 million.

Youth Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the latest version of the agenda for the Youth Council of 27 May, prior to the meeting. [85082]

Mr. Mudie: I have been asked to reply

The latest version of the Agenda Youth Council of 27 May is as follows:

1. Adoption of the agenda.
2. Approval of list of A items.
3. Decision of the European Parliament and of the Council establishing a community single programme on Youth.
4. Presidential Memorandum "Youth and Europe-Our future".
5. Possible Community Communication concerning a proposal for a Decision on the implementation of measures aimed at combating sex tourism involving children.
6. Decision on community action on measure to prevent violence against children, young persons and women (the DAPHNE PROGRAMME).
7. Any other business.

PRIME MINISTER

Scottish Parliament

Dr. Fox: To ask the Prime Minister what guidance has been given to Ministers in replying to letters from Members of the Scottish Parliament on matters reserved under the Scotland Act 1998. [84910]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 21 May 1999]: Guidance on handling correspondence from Members of the Scottish Parliament—and from Members of the National Assembly for Wales and the Northern Ireland Assembly—will be issued to all Government Departments. Copies of the guidance will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Cabinet Meetings

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his oral answer of 19 May 1999, Official Report, column 1060, if he will list the Cabinet meetings he has not attended; and for what reasons he did not rearrange those Cabinet meetings. [85438]

The Prime Minister: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan) on 30 April 1999, Official Report, column 281.

Scottish Office Ministers

Dr. Fox: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the responsibilities of each Scottish Office Minister after 1 July. [85434]

The Prime Minister: At 1 July Scottish Office Ministers will represent Scottish interests in reserved matters within the UK government, exercise certain specific responsibilities under the Scotland Act 1998, and be expected to promote good communications and relationships between the UK Parliament and Government and the Scottish Parliament and Executive.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Firearms Training

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the types of (i) public and (ii) private institution falling within his area of responsibility in which individuals aged under 18 years may be trained in the use of firearms; and if he will estimate the numbers of individuals receiving such training in each type of institution in each of the last five years. [81137]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 21 April 1999]:

Schools

The only circumstances in which schools would have access to firearms training is through the Combined Cadet Forces and in a small number of schools with Home Office approved target-shooting clubs.

Further Education Colleges

Firearms training takes place in only five colleges of agriculture and horticulture. Students undertaking these courses would be doing so as part of courses in conservation or game keeping. In 1997–98, 63 students aged under 18 undertook this training.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many extra Scottish resident students at United Kingdom universities would be exempted from paying university tuition fees if the income level below which tuition fees are not levied were raised by (a) £2,000 and (b) £4,000 per annum; [84059]

(2) how many extra United Kingdom students would be exempted from paying university tuition fees if the income level below which tuition fees are not levied were raised by (a) £2,000 and (b) £4,000 per annum. [84060]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 13 May 1999]: It is estimated that an additional 5 per cent. of United Kingdom students would be exempted from paying tuition fees if the income level below which tuition fees are not levied were raised by £2,000; this figure would be 10 per cent. if the income level were raised by £4,000. The equivalent figures for Scottish domiciled students at United Kingdom universities are estimated to be 5 per cent. and 9 per cent.

Commonwealth Students

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many students currently studying in the UK from Commonwealth countries have received financial assistance from his Department towards the cost of their education studies in the UK in each of the last three years. [84742]

Mr. Mudie: The majority of scholarships for Commonwealth students are funded by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and Department for International Development. While the Department of Education and Employment does not offer direct financial support to these students, the Overseas Research Students Awards Scheme (ORSAS), funded by the Higher Education Funding Council for England supported 822 students in the 1996–97 academic year at the cost of £3.792 million, 721 students in 1997–98 at £3.507 million and 709 students in 1998–99 at £3.713 million. In addition, the Montserrat Emergency Award Scheme, funded through the British Council, supported 6 students in 1997–98 and 92 students in 1998–99 academic year, with maintenance awards of £3,500 each per year.

Post-16 Education

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the review of post-16 education. [84855]

Mr. Mudie: We are currently considering a range of options for delivering post-16 education and training, and will be presenting our proposals to Parliament in the summer.

Newly Qualified Teachers

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on the rules governing employment in sixth form colleges of newly qualified teachers. [84853]

Mr. Mudie: Newly qualified school teachers are free to take up employment in sixth form colleges. Such teachers do not have to serve a period of statutory induction until they wish to teach in a maintained school or a non-maintained special school.

A-Levels (Funding)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much on average (a) a sixth form college and (b) an equivalent local education authority school receives annually for a student studying three A-levels annually. [84854]

Mr. Mudie: The Department has published the costs of a successful three A-level package, typically lasting two years, in "The Public Funding Costs of Education and Training for 16–19 year olds in England 1996–97". These costs were £7,380 and £5,910 for local education authority maintained school sixth forms and sixth form colleges respectively.

Jobseekers

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much time is allowed to claimants in receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance who are parents to make child care arrangements in the event of them receiving the offer of a job. [85093]

Mr. Andrew Smith: A claimant in receipt of Jobseeker's Allowance (JSA) who has caring responsibilities is required to be able to take up employment within 48 hours. For JSA purposes, caring responsibilities include caring for a child who is either a close relative of the jobseeker or who is living in the same household as the jobseeker.

New Deal (Advisers)

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what training is available for Employment Service Personal Advisers to New Deal trainees; and if he will make a statement. [84926]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 21 May 1999]: ES New Deal Personal Advisers receive up to 46 days training, specifically designed to help them deliver the New Deal. The type and duration of training varies depending on which particular New Deal individual Personal Advisers are delivering.

It includes training in interviewing, in work benefits and allowance payments, how to deal with special client groups and how to manage a case load of New Deal participants.

New Deal Personal Advisers are also given in depth information on how New Deal operates, what options are available to participants and what local provision is available to help prepare them for work.

Swimming Lessons

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what studies his Department has made on the effect on small schools of the new funding arrangements for swimming lessons; and if he will make a statement; [85141]

(2) what representations he has received from within the County of Lancashire about the effect on small schools of his Departments' new proposals for the funding of swimming lessons. [85142]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Under the Financing of Maintained Schools Regulations 1999, the cost of providing swimming lessons must be met from schools' delegated budgets. The Regulations allow local education authorities to include factors in their funding formulae to compensate schools for the cost of hiring "off-site" facilities (including swimming pools); formulae may also take account of the need for transport to and from such facilities. LEAs may also compensate small schools more generally for their diseconomies of scale. Within this framework, LEAs can enable small schools to maintain the provision of swimming lessons, at least on a scale sufficient to meet the needs of the National Curriculum.

Representations on the funding of swimming were made by Lancashire LEA in its response to the May 1998 consultation paper, "Fair Funding" and, subsequently, in the course of consultation on the Financing of Maintained Schools Regulations. The Department has been unable to trace any more recent representations on the subject from within Lancashire, with the exception of a letter from the hon. Member, a letter from my hon. Friend the Member for Morecambe and Lunesdale (Miss Smith) about the future of certain specific swimming pools in her constituency, and a letter on the same subject from a member of the public in Heysham.

Appraisals Handbook

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he expects the Appraisals Handbook to be completed; and what action the Department will take to distribute it. [85373]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Consultation on the Green Paper proposals ended on 31 March. We plan to publish a Performance Management Framework later this year.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will set out the tender specification for the contract to prepare the Appraisals Handbook, and the criteria used to determine the winning bid. [85374]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The tender specification for the contract to prepare the Appraisal Handbook was detailed in an advertisement in the Times Education Supplement on 6 February 1998. I am placing a copy of the advertisement and the tender specifications in Library.

Bids were assessed on the following criteria:

Contractors' capacity:

- to demonstrate an understanding of the policy context;
- to ensure outputs which would meet the Secretary of State's specification;
- to demonstrate that the scope of their organisation could ensure a credible outcome;
- to demonstrate that they had made suitable plans within the timescale to produce results;
- recent relevant experience in term of policy and project management.

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the contract for the Appraisals Handbook was set; who were the bidders for the contract; who won the contract; and what is the cost of the contract. [85375]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The tender specification for the contract to prepare the Appraisal Handbook was set out in an advertisement in the Times Education Supplement on 6 February 1998. There were nine bidders, whom we are not able to name under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

No bid was deemed to fully meet the tender specifications. Following further examination it was agreed to combine the best aspects of two bids. The resulting consortium consisted of Coopers and Lybrand/ Salter Baker & Associates (Education) Ltd. and Nottinghamshire LEA.

The information on the cost of the contract is commercial in confidence.

SOCIAL SECURITY

National Insurance Fund

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the balance in the National Insurance Fund at the end of each of the next 10 years assuming (a) unchanged policies, (b) an increase in the basic state pension to £75 per week, (c) the implementation of his proposed reforms to SERPS, the state second pension and the stakeholder pension and (d) both (b) and (c) above. [84635]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

Responsibility for the National Insurance Fund was transferred to the Treasury from 1 April 1999. In each tax year the Treasury is required to carry out a review of the general level of the National Insurance Fund with a view to determining whether a Treasury Grant is required or whether an order should be made varying the contribution rates for the following tax year. The aim is to ensure that a reasonable working balance is maintained in the Fund at the end of the year. The Government Actuary recommends that the minimum level of the National Insurance Fund at the end of the year should be equivalent to one-sixth of annual benefit payments for the year. The future balances in the National Insurance Fund will be subject to these annual reviews and the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the proportion of pensioner households headed by a person aged (a) 65 to 69, (b) 70 to 74, (c) 75 to 79 and (d) 80 years or more who are (i) in receipt of income support and (ii) in receipt of any means-tested benefit, on a basis consistent with his estimate that one in four of all pensioner households are in receipt of income support. [84756]

Mr. Timms: The information is not available in the format requested. Such information as is available is in the table.

Pensioners in receipt of income-related benefits

Percentage

Age	Proportion of pensioners receipt of Income Support	Proportion of pensioners in receipt of any means-tested benefit
65–69	12	26
70–74	12	31
75–79	16	39
80 and over	25	42

Notes:

1. 'Pensioners' refers to pensioner benefit units, which represents a single person, or a couple where one or both partners is in the age group specified.
2. The figures are consistent with the estimate that one in five of all pensioner benefit units are in receipt of Income Support.
3. The estimates of benefit caseloads group pensioner couples according to the age of the oldest member of the couple. Population estimates by benefit unit classify couples according to the age of the male member of the couple. The estimated proportions are therefore based on the assumption that the male partner is the oldest.
4. Figures exclude cases in residential care and nursing homes.
5. Percentages are rounded to the nearest 1 per cent.
6. Means-tested benefits refer to Income Support, Family Credit, Disability Working Allowance, Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit.
7. Overlaps between recipients of more than one of these benefits have been removed.

Sources:

1. Income Support Quarterly Statistical Enquiry May 1998.
2. Disability Working Allowance 100 per cent. count of claims.
3. Family Credit 5 per cent. sample of awards.
4. Housing Benefit Management Information Systems, annual 1 per cent. sample inquiries, May 1998.
5. GAD 1996 population projections by marital status.

Social Security Act 1998

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the decision making and appeals provisions of the Social Security Act 1998 will come into effect; and if he will make a statement. [85653]

Angela Eagle: In March I laid the main Regulations relating to the new system for handling decisions and appeals in benefits and child support being established under last year's Social Security Act. In addition this week I am making the Social Security Act 1998 (Commencement No 7 and Consequential and Transitional Provisions) Order 1999 which commences the relevant parts of the Act for introducing the new system for child support from 1 June. The Order also makes associated transitional and consequential provisions. Further Commencement Orders relating to benefits will be made in due course.

The new arrangements are a significant further step to modernise the delivery of Social Security and child support as part of the reform of welfare. The current system has to change. It is confusing for claimants and staff. Correcting mistakes is complicated and frequently claimants have to appeal. Even where they have no reasonable prospect of success, appeals currently take an average of seven months to be cleared.

The new system will enable the Benefits Agency, Child Support Agency and Employment Service to give a more helpful and accessible service. It will also help to tackle delays in the handling of appeals. Decisions will, as now, be based on the facts and the law, with the right of appeal to an independent tribunal. Decisions will be clearer and communications to the public are being simplified. There will be new arrangements for handling disputes, so mistakes can be corrected without the need for an appeal. Appeal tribunals will comprise one, two or three members according to the issues raised by the appeal, and there will be new arrangements for handling appeals which have no reasonable prospect of success.

To ensure service to the public is maintained during the transition period, the new system will come into operation in stages as follows:

Date
1 June 1999	Child Support
5 July 1999	Child Benefit Guardians Allowance Industrial Injury Scheme Benefits
6 September 1999	Retirement Pension Widows Benefit Incapacity Benefit Severe Disablement Allowance Maternity Allowance
5 October 1999	Working Families Tax Credit Disabled Persons Tax Credit
18 October 1999	Jobseeker's Allowance Disability Living Allowance Attendance Allowance Invalid Care Allowance Vaccine Damage Payments
29 November 1999	Income Support Social Fund

The Chief Executives of the Agencies will be fully accountable to Parliament for the quality of decision making in their Agencies.

In addition, while appeal tribunals will continue to be independent, in April 2000 a new Appeals Service Agency will be established in this Department to be responsible for appeals administration. From 1 June, in a period of shadow working before the agency is launched, responsibility for the administration of appeals will be transferred from the President, Judge Harris, to the Chief Executive designate of the Appeals Service, Neil Ward. Benefit claimants and child support clients will receive information about the new arrangements in notifications and other letters from the Agencies as their cases are handled.

Income Support

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if an employed lone mother in receipt of working families tax credit whose pay is stopped when taking parental leave under the provisions of the Employment Relations Bill, will be eligible to claim income support. [84983]

Angela Eagle: A lone mother who is on parental leave will be able to claim Income Support if she meets the entitlement conditions. This applies whether or not she is in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if an employed individual in a two-parent couple in receipt of working families tax credit, whose pay is stopped when taking parental leave under the provisions of the Employment Relations Bill, will be able to claim income support. [84984]

Angela Eagle: Either member of the couple will be able to claim Income Support for the family when on unpaid parental leave if they meet the entitlement conditions. This applies whether or not the family is in receipt of Working Families Tax Credit.

Lone Parents (Benefits)

Mr. Hope: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he has taken to correct the benefit position whereby a number of lone parents receiving incapacity benefit or severe disability allowance have not received the full increase in their benefits from April. [85652]

Mr. Darling: A small number of lone parents in receipt of these benefits have, through an error in the regulations, failed to receive the full increase in benefit rates this year. We took swift action and introduced amendments to the regulations which became effective on 17 May. Those affected will have their payments corrected automatically, including any arrears from April.

DEFENCE

UK Ambassador (NATO)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will set out the responsibilities of the United Kingdom Ambassador's to NATO in respect of miliary operations conducted by NATO. [84762]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

The United Kingdom Permanent Representative on the North Atlantic Council, established by Article 9 of the North Atlantic Treaty, represents the United Kingdom in the Council on all matters including military operations.

Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies he has carried out into the use of nuclear steam-generating plant on future aircraft carriers; which organisations were consulted; and what conclusions were reached. [78778]

Mr. Spellar: Concept studies involving the MOD and UK industry have investigated a number of propulsion options for the future aircraft carriers, including nuclear power. Nuclear propulsion for the two ships has been discounted on cost-effectiveness grounds.

Mine Countermeasures Vessels

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the ships which were originally in the Mine Countermeasures vessels upgrade programme will remain in Royal Naval service for their projected service life. [84520]

Mr. Spellar: As we announced in the Strategic Defence Review, we have concluded that the number of Mine Countermeasures vessels should be limited to 22, rather than 25 as previously planned. No decisions have yet been taken as to which vessels will be disposed of. A decision is expected later this year. On current plans the remaining vessels, including those upgraded with Sonar 2193, will remain in service for their projected service lives.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what was the planned cost over what period of time of the upgrade programme for all Mine Countermeasure Vessels; [84519]

(2) when the decision to delay the upgrade of Royal Navy Mine Countermeasure Vessels was taken; and for what reasons; [84517]

(3) when those companies which had been invited to tender for the upgrade programme for Mine Countermeasure Vessels were informed of the delay in the programme; how this was done; and by whom. [84569]

Mr. Spellar: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Sir Robert Walmsley to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 25 May 1999:

I am replying to your questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about the programme to upgrade the Royal Navy's Mine Countermeasure Vessels. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The decision to delay the upgrade of the Royal Navy Countermeasure Vessels was made in the context of the Department's annual budget setting process which was completed in March 1999. The process takes account of cost, operational and industrial factors, and priorities are assessed on the basis of the Defence Missions and Tasks defined in the Strategic Defence Review (Cm 3999) published in July 1998. I can confirm that competing companies (Lockheed Martin and Thomson Marconi Sonar) were formally notified of the delay to the programme by letter on 24 March 1999.

I am afraid that I am unable to disclose the information you request on the cost of the programme as its disclosure could prejudice the competitive position of the Department in negotiations with contractors. I am therefore withholding this information under exemption 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Sonar 2193 Programme

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision about the Sonar 2193 programme; and what plans he has for its role in Royal Naval service. [84518]

Mr. Spellar: On current plans, we expect to place a contract for the Sonar 2193 upgrade programme by mid-2001. The sonar upgrade will be introduced into service in 2003, and will improve the minehunting performance of the HUNT Class mine countermeasures vessels. In particular it will enhance their effectiveness against modern, stealthy mines.

Royal Fleet Auxiliary

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what is the (a) target in service date for the replacements for (i) RFA Sir Geraint and (ii) RFA Sir Percivale and (b) the planned capacity of the replacements; [84510]

(2) what is the target date for completion of the replacements for RFA (a) Sir Geraint and (b) Sir Percivale; [84509]

(3) when RFA Sir Geraint and RFA Sir Percivale will be taken out of service; and what is the target date for the contract to be let for their replacement. [84522]

Mr. Spellar: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Sir Robert Walmsley to Mr. Mike Hancock, dated 25 May 1999:

I am replying to your questions to the Secretary of State for Defence about the Alternative Landing Ships Logistic (ALSL) programme to replace RFAs SIR GERAINT and SIR PERCIVALE. This matter falls within my area of responsibility as Chief Executive of the Defence Procurement Agency.

The ALSLs will be required to transport and deliver troops, vehicles and stores as integral elements of an amphibious task force off-loaded at sea to landing craft. Options for the capacity of these new vessels will be dependent on the designs offered by industry in their bids, but we expect each vessel to embark between 350 and 500 military personnel and to have between 500 and 1000 lane metres of capacity.

We plan to place the contract for the ALSLs in mid 2000 with a target date for completion of the two vessels (defined as the Contract Acceptance Date) of Summer 2003 and early 2004 respectively. The planned in service dates are early 2004 and Autumn 2004. Full passenger certification for RFAs SIR GERAINT and SIR PERCIVALE will expire in 2003 and 2004, but they will continue to operate as logistic support ships until they are replaced by the new ALSLs.

Open Government

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) of 10 May 1999, Official Report, column 21, if he will make a statement on the nature of those applications made to his Department for disclosure of information under the open Government Code of Practice on Access to Government Information which were not granted for 1998. [84859]

Mr. Spellar: For central monitoring purposes, the total number of applications made under the Code and the number of requests which were refused are collected, but not details of the reasons for non-disclosure of information. This information could be provided only at disproportionate cost. Each request for information under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information is considered on a case-by-case basis. Departmental instructions made it clear that decisions to withhold information must be approved by a member of the Senior Civil Service or equivalent military rank, and that reasons for non-disclosure must be made in terms of the Code's exemptions.

Royal Air Force Signals Engineering Establishment Agency

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Royal Air Force Signals Engineering Establishment Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [85604]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Royal Air Force Signals Engineering Establishment Agency's key targets for the financial year 1999–2000 are:

Operational Strategy

Key Target 1—Deliver 100 per cent. of Operational Tasks to time.

Key Target 2—Deliver at least 92 per cent. of Operational Support Tasks to time.

Performance Strategy

Key Target 3—Achieve a quality failure rate for completed tasks of less than 1.5 per cent.

Financial Strategy

Key Target 4—Reduce the full cost per task hour to below 85 per cent. of the FY96–97 figure in real terms.

Kosovo

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to use the TA to replace regular army units currently stationed in Germany but warned to deploy to Kosovo. [85378]

Mr. George Robertson: There are no current plans to use the TA to replace regular Army units currently stationed in Germany but warned to deploy to Kosovo.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Export Licences

Mr. Reed: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those Governments who received a licence to export UK surplus military equipment in (i) 1997 and (ii) 1998. [83007]

Mr. Spellar: I have been asked to reply.

The major capital surplus exports on a Government to Government basis were as follows:

Year
1996–97
Brazil	Type 22 frigates
Uruguay	Wessex helicopters and spare equipment
Australia	Sea King helicopters
Malta	Vehicles
Austria	MS78 light armoured vehicles and spares
1997–98
Brazil	Type 22 frigates
Uruguay	Wessex helicopters
Philippines	Peacock Class Hong Kong patrol craft

Gas-fired Power Stations

Mr. Redwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is the total capacity of the new gas-fired power stations approved since May 1997; and if he will estimate the amount of coal-use they will displace. [84360]

Mr. Byers: Some 4 GW of new gas-fired capacity has been cleared since May 1997. This compares to some 23 GW of new gas-fired capacity cleared by the previous Government. In broad terms each extra 1 GW of new gas-fired capacity could displace coal burn by about 2.5 million tonnes a year. The precise impact, however, is not so simple since displacement in a particular case depends on the mode of operation, the competitive position of other plant (which may be coal or non-coal plant) and the level of demand that is required to be met.

Photo-voltaic Generation

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what discussions he has conducted with (a) the Electricity Regulator and (b) the electricity supply industry concerning the practice of requiring separate meters to record the supply and consumption of electricity by domestic premises where photo-voltaic generating capacity has been installed; [84319]

(2) what discussions he has conducted with (a) the Electricity Regulator and (b) the electricity supply industry concerning the current pricing arrangements for purchasing electricity generated by photo-voltaic installations in domestic premises. [84320]

Mr. Battle: Renewable sources, including photo-voltaic (PV) installations, have an important contribution to make to the development of sustainable energy supplies in the UK. It is important that renewables and other forms of embedded generation can compete on a level playing field. My Department's New and Renewable Energy Programme has supported a number of studies, involving both renewable generating companies and the electricity supply industry, with the aim of encouraging the development of commercial and technical frameworks that will assist them to compete on an equal footing.

In addition, "New and Renewable Energy: Prospects for the 21st Century", the consultation paper which I published on 30 March, invited comments on issues surrounding the connection of embedded renewable generators to the electricity system. I will consider what further action may be required in the light of that consultation.

Metering is of course an essential component of a competitive market. It is important however, that metering arrangements do not discriminate between alternative sources or impose excessive costs. I understand that, while all generators are required to measure their exports and imports separately, for the very smallest sources (those below 100kW), such as domestic PV systems, a simpler system of metering is required.

I would encourage those who wish to see changes in the existing arrangements for metering or trade in PV or other types of embedded generation to take this up with the Director General of Electricity Supply at their earliest opportunity, and I will take a close interest in the outcome of those discussions.

UKAEAC

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish the results of the recent inspection of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority Constabulary by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary. [85606]

Mr. Battle: I understand that the full text of the report by Her Majesty's Inspector of Constabulary, Mr. Colin Smith, is being published today by the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Constabulary's Policy Authority. This is the first time that an inspection report on the UKAEAC has been published, and I welcome this commitment to increased openness. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House.

I am pleased to note that the Inspector formed a good opinion of the professionalism of the men and women who police our nuclear installations. His report acknowledges the considerable modernisation in the force's management and general effectiveness brought about in recent years by the former and current Chief Constables.

The report makes 14 recommendations for improvements primarily on a range of management, training, communications and personnel issues, all of which the Chief Constable and Police Authority are committed to implementing.

Post Office

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the commercial acquisitions made by the Post Office since 1 November 1998, giving the approximate value of each acquisition and the date in which approval was given. [85345]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The commercial acquisitions made by the Post Office since 1 November 1998 are as follows:

Germany:

German Parcel—acquisition cost around £300 million

Der Kurier—acquisition cost less than £10 million

Austria:

Delacher—acquisition cost less than £3 million.

Government approval for the German Parcel acquisition was given to the Post Office on 19 December 1998. The other deals fell within permitted borrowing limits for smaller development investments which are notified to Government but do not require specific approval. Fuller details of the arrangements will be set out in the forthcoming White Paper.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

BSE Inquiry

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the progress of the BSE Inquiry. [85506]

Mr. Nick Brown: The BSE Inquiry was originally intended to report on 31 December 1998. At the request of the Inquiry, my right hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham), the previous Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, announced on 9 March 1998, Official Report, column 3, that the original terms of reference would be revised to allow the Inquiry until 30 June 1999 to report. The Inquiry has now requested a further extension and, following discussions with the Committee about the time needed to complete their task, the Government have agreed that the Report shall be delivered by 31 March 2000.

Meat Hygiene Service (Charges)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many complaints he has received over meat hygiene service charges since April 1998. [85131]

Mr. Rooker: Since April 1998, my Department has received over 500 representations about hygiene inspection charges and the proposal to introduce charges for Specified Risk Material controls. In the same period, the Meat Hygiene Service has also received in excess of 100 representations about the level of its charges.

Date-based Export Scheme

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals he has made to improve participation within the Date-Based Export Scheme. [85132]

Mr. Rooker: I expect uptake of the Date-based Export Scheme (DBES) to be low initially. The condition under which exports may resume are very strict: we can only change them in further negotiations and it is the Government's view that we must first show that we can operate the scheme as it stands. There are a few slaughterhouses which want to participate. My officials have been discussing with these slaughterhouses how the scheme might work for them, and will talk with any others which are interested. After we have seen and considered the report of Commission's April inspection of our DBES procedures, we will be writing to the slaughterhouses with details of the Scheme and an invitation to apply for participation or further information.

Hormone-treated Beef

Mr. Drew: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress is being made through the WTO to end the dispute with the USA and Canada over hormones in beef. [85134]

Mr. Rooker: On 17 May the General Affairs Council called on the European Commission to intensify its contacts with the USA and Canada on all aspects of the dispute concerning hormonal growth promoters and, in particular, to enter into detailed and transparent discussions on the basis of the scientific evidence available.

HEALTH

NHS Direct and Walk-in Clinics

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent clinical governance guidelines will apply to (a) walk-in clinics and (b) NHS Direct. [84371]

Mr. Denham: We will ensure that walk-in centres will be subject to appropriate clinical governance guidelines. The responsibility for ensuring this is achieved will depend on the nature of the organisation which takes responsibility for running the centre. NHS Direct will be subject to current clinical governance guidelines.

Cancer Treatments

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each health authority the capital spend for projects relating to cancer treatment in the last 12 months. [84418]

Mr. Hutton: National Health Service Regional Offices do monitor large capital projects, but the information they have on capital spend is not disease specific. In many cases, a building or a piece of equipment will not be used solely for cancer patients and it is therefore not possible to provide the information requested.

Private Medical Insurance

Mr. Forth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the effect of abolition of private medical insurance tax relief on demand for public healthcare. [84659]

Mr. Denham: It was anticipated that there would be no significant cost to the National Health Service of people withdrawing from private medical insurance schemes and seeking NHS treatment through changes to tax relief.

Guild Community Trust

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what (a) discussions and (b) correspondence he has had with the non-executive directors of the Guild Community Trust, Preston; [84704]

(2) what discussions he has had with (a) the authors of and (b) others about the Galbraith/Campbell report relating to the Guild Community Trust, Preston; [84705]

(3) what steps he is taking to ensure that more (a) openness and (b) accountability is introduced into the governance of NHS trusts; [84708]

(4) what steps he is taking to encourage non-executive directors of NHS trusts to bring to his attention any mismanagement within the trust; [84709]

(5) when he expects to appoint a permanent Chairman of the Guild Community Trust, Preston; [84706]

(6) what (a) discussions and (b) correspondence he has had concerning the appointments of the non-executive directors of the Guild Community Trust, Preston; [84707]

(7) when he read the Galbraith/Campbell report relating to the Guild Community Trust, Preston; and what assessment he has made of its findings; [84711]

(8) what (a) discussions he has had and (b) advice he has received from the North West Regional Office concerning the appointments of the current non-executive directors of the Guild Community Trust, Preston. [84710]

Mr. Dobson [holding answer 18 May 1999]: After considering the independent reports into the management of the Guild Community National Health Service Trust and discussions with National Health Service Executive Regional Office officials, I concluded that relations between non-executive directors of the Trust had reached a state of irretrievable breakdown and that it would not be in the best interests of the NHS or the Trust and, most of all, the community it is supposed to serve, for them to continue in office. I therefore asked all five remaining non-executive directors to resign . Two agreed to do so and I exercised my powers under Regulation 9(3) of the National Health Service Trust (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990 to terminate the membership of the remaining three who refused to resign.

I have appointed Mrs. Christine Kirk to chair the trust until 30 November 1999. Mrs. Kirk was appointed by the previous Government to chair the Calderstones NHS Trust. I have appointed five new non-executive directors for a four year period. They are:

Mr. P. Farrer

Mrs. A. Knowles

Mrs. G. Pashley

Mr. P. Passi

Mrs. H. Anslow.

None of these have any declared party political affiliations. The selection panels which chose them had some members with declared party political activity. Of these all were Conservative. These appointments were carried out in accordance with the guidelines of the Commissioner for Public Appointments and she has been kept informed at all stages of the problems at the Guild Community NHS Trust, the resignations, dismissals and appointments.

The openness and accountability of NHS trusts has been extended by the present Government, for example by requiring the trust boards to meet in public.

Organophosphates

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to inform GPs of the outcome of the Edinburgh study into organophosphates. [84906]

Ms Jowell: The report of this study has not yet been completed. We understand that the report is likely to be finalised over the next few weeks and will then be published. The report will be submitted for urgent consideration by the Government's expert advisory committees.

Children's Wards

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which hospitals covering the Greater London area have children's wards. [85083]

Mr. Hutton: 40 National Health Service trusts within the London Regional Office area have children's wards. These can be broken down into the following sectors:

37 NHS trusts have acute children's wards;

6 NHS trusts have mental illness children's wards;

1 NHS trust has a learning disability children ward.

Note:

(1997–98 figures). Some NHS Trusts have more than one type of children's ward, hence the sector breakdown is higher than the total.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those NHS trusts which did not pay the increased pay award to nurses in their pay packets for April 1999. [85372]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is not available centrally.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 321.

Care Guidance

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he plans to take to ensure that his Department's work on devising fair access to care guidance is integrated with work on charging policies. [85382]

Mr. Hutton: As promised in the Social Services White Paper we are drafting guidance to help authorities apply eligibility criteria more consistently, thus ensuring fairer access to care services around the country. We will be involving local authorities and other agencies as well as users and carers in working up this guidance, and will ensure that it properly takes account of other relevant policy development including any changes to the charging system.

Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of (a) the current financial position of the Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust and (b) the Trust's year end figures for 1999–2000; and if he will make a statement. [85383]

Mr. Denham: The financial plans of health authorities and NHS trusts for financial year 1999–2000 have not yet been finalised.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the responsibilities of non-executive directors of NHS trusts. [85143]

Mr. Denham: The responsibilities are set out in the information pack sent to all potential candidates for appointment to National Health Service boards. Copies of the information pack have been placed in the Library.

Renal Services

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 1999, Official Report, column 352, on renal services, what extra capital and revenue resources have been made available to the four health authorities in Lancashire and South Cumbria to fund the 15 new dialysis stations. [85225]

Mr. Hutton: The £1.1 million capital investment comprises £300,000 from the North West regional capital programme and £800,000 from the capital programme of Preston Acute Hospitals National Health Services Trust. The health authorities will be responsible for meeting the revenue costs from their general allocations, beginning in 2000–01; these are estimated to be in the region of £1 million.

Dismissal (NHS Trusts)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the grounds on which a non-executive director of an NHS trust can be dismissed from his post. [85144]

Mr. Denham: The grounds are listed in regulations 9(3) to 9(7) of the National Health Service Trusts (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990, as amended. Copies of the relevant Regulations are available in the Library.

Listening to Women

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Listening to Women reply-paid cards have been printed; how many have been issued to (a) individual women and (b) women's organisations; and at what cost to date. [85376]

Ms Jowell: 1,250,000 reply-paid postcards were printed. 1,200,000 have so far been distributed to a range of sources to reach individual women and women's organisations. This includes Marks and Spencer; British Home Stores; Superdrug as well as the Women's National Commission; the Commission for Racial Equality; general practitioners surgeries; citizens advice bureaux; public libraries; post offices; bingo halls/cinemas, advice centres. In addition there have been personal requests from individuals and organisations.

The costs to date are £59,000 excluding Value Added Tax. The deadline for returning postcards ends on 30 June 1999.

Correspondence

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the 13 letters beginning 20 August 1997 and ending 21 February 1999, sent to him by Mrs. Blee, a constituent of the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey, will receive an answer. [85343]

Mr. Denham: Five letters have been received from Mrs. Blee since January 1998, the period when records are held. Of these, one was addressed direct to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and a response was sent on 20 August 1998.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the six letters from Mrs. Blee, a constituent of the hon. Member for Sittingbourne and Sheppey, sent between 29 October 1998 and 19 April 1999, addressed to the SE Regional Chairman, NHS Executive and the Chairman of West Kent Health Authority, will be answered. [85342]

Mr. Denham: There is no trace of any correspondence from Mrs. Blee.

The Regional Chairman of the South East Office of the NHS Executive and the Chairman of West Kent Health Authority have responded to all correspondence received from Mr. Alan Blee between 29 October 1998 and 19 April 1999.

Officials have confirmed that there is no trace of any correspondence received from Mrs. Blee.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Servants (New Deal)

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many people have been employed in the Civil Service under the New Deal for the young and unemployed. [85556]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: As at 1 April 1999, the information on Civil Service Departments (including their Agencies) participating as employers in the New Deal is as follows:

Main department name (including their agencies)	New Deal 'starts' since programmes began Age 18–24	25 and over	Total
Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	5	0	5
Cabinet Office	6	0	6
Culture, Media and Sport	0	1	1
Defence	5	2	7
Education and Employment	345	10	355
Environment, Transport and the Regions	5	1	6
Foreign and Commonwealth Office	3	0	3
Health	4	4	8
Home Office	1	0	1
International Development	0	0	0
Lord Chancellors	0	0	0
Northern Ireland Office	0	0	0
Scottish Office	13	0	13
Social Security[1]	18	0	18
Trade and Industry	21	1	22
HM Treasury	5	1	6
Welsh Office	4	1	5
Other:
Charity Commission	5	0	5
Export Credits Guarantee Department	4	0	4
Government Offices for the Regions	3	0	3
Intervention Board	2	0	2
Totals	449	21	470

[1] Includes the Contributions Agency which transferred to the Inland Revenue on 1 April 1999

Public Appointments

Charlotte Atkins: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what action he is taking to increase the representation of women, members of ethnic minority groups and disabled people on the boards of public bodies. [85607]

Mr. Kilfoyle: In June 1998, the Government launched a new initiative to increase the participation of under-represented groups in public life. Details of the Government's plan of action, including individual departmental plans, were published in "Quangos: Opening Up Public Appointments", copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

The action plan has now been updated. This requires all Departments to continue their work towards the equal representation of women and men in public appointments, a pro-rata representation of members of ethnic minority groups, and the increased participation of disabled people in public life.

Individual departmental plans have also been updated and contain specific goals and objectives for the period 1999–2002. The revised plans are published today, and copies will be sent to all hon. and right hon. Members as well as being placed in the Libraries of the House. The plans will also be made available electronically on the Internet.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Aricept

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the (a) number and (b) percentage of Alzheimer patients being treated with Aricept in Northern Ireland. [84878]

Mr. McFall: Information in the form requested is not available. The Central Services Agency, Northern Ireland, holds information on the drug Aricept in relation to prescriptions dispensed in Northern Ireland and this is as outlined:

January 1998–December 1998

Item	Number/cost
Number of prescriptions dispensed	5,042
Quantity (total number of tablets)	184,701
Ingredient cost (cost of drugs before discount)	£538,144

Terrorist Prisoners

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list (a) the number and (b) the affiliation of terrorist prisoners who have been released under the terms of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. [84989]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 21 May 1999]: The information in respect of (a) and (b) is shown in the table. To date there have been 267 prisoners released under the terms of the Northern Ireland (Sentences) Act 1998. Information is held in relation to the perceived paramilitary association of prisoners, where applicable, for management purposes. It should be noted, however, that with the exception of HMP Maze where links are more clearly defined, this information is based on a combination of factors including the offence, sympathies and associates. This information is taken from statistics which are current at 24 May 1999.

Perceived affiliation of prisoners released on licence under the 1998 Sentences Act	Total (as at 24 May 1999)
UDA	63
No Trace	8
UFF	5
PIRA	123
UVF	47
Former INLA	7
Loyalist	4
Republican Sympathisers	2
[illegible]C	2
Criminal	1
LVF	4
Republican	1
Total	267

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Portcullis House

Mr. Stunell: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what steps were taken (a) to carry out an environmental impact assessment of Portcullis House and (b) to ensure that it sets a high standard for energy efficiency. [85055]

Sir Sydney Chapman: An environmental impact assessment was not carried out during the design period.

The House determined that the building should be energy efficient. The Measures to achieve this, which are included in the design of the building, are:

The use of cold ground water taken via a borehole to provide the chilling for the air conditioning system;

heat recovery from exhaust air and the use of the thermal mass of the building to even out the heating and cooling requirements between night and day.

As a result, the building is expected to consume only one third of the energy of a conventionally air conditioned building.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Sierra Leone

Mr. Howard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the reference by the Minister of State, the hon. Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd), to the scope of UN Security Council resolutions 1132 on 12 March 1998, Official Report, column 841, was first brought to his attention. [76064]

Mr. Robin Cook [holding answer 11 May 1999]: I refer to my statement in the House on 2 March 1999, Official Report, columns 894–901. Statements to Parliament by other FCO Ministers are brought to my attention as appropriate, not as a matter of course.

International Conventions and Charters

Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many international (a) conventions and (b) charters have been (i) signed and (ii) ratified by the United Kingdom since 1972. [85278]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Treaties (agreements binding in international law) are known by a variety of names, such as; Convention, Charter, Treaty, Protocol, Agreement, Final Act. etc. The term "charter" is also used to describe non-legally binding instruments.

The United Kingdom has signed a total of 587 multilateral treaties since 1972, and has ratified 387 in the same period. Of the multilateral treaties signed, 274 are conventions and 3 are charters. Of those ratified, 244 are conventions and 2 are charters. (The above figures for conventions include amending protocols to conventions, which are treaties in their own right and require separate signature and ratification). Corresponding information for bilateral conventions and charters can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Falkland Islands

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent incident in the South Atlantic involving a Falkland Islands fishery protection vessel opening fire on a Taiwanese fishing boat. [85219]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: With Her Majesty's Government's approval, the Falkland Islands Government recently armed one of its Fisheries Protection Vessels (FPVs) with a 20mm Oerlikon cannon. On 15 May the armed FPV challenged an unlicensed Taiwanese fishing vessel which was 19 miles inside the Falkland Islands Outer Conservation Zone and appeared to be fishing. Messages and signals were passed by the FPV to the vessel which failed to respond. Warning shots were fired. After all warnings and warning shots had been ignored by the illegal vessel, the FPV sought and received permission from the Director of Fisheries of the Falkland Islands Government to fire directly at its bows. Another warning shot was fired followed by five single, aimed shots at the bow of the vessel. The illegal vessel was pursued out of Falkland Islands waters by the FPV, which acted in accordance with strict guidelines throughout the incident.

Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what export restrictions currently apply to FYROM; for what reasons; and what proposals the Government have to lift them. [85211]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Export controls in general apply to all destinations.

The only country specific export control currently in place on the Republic of Macedonia is Group 3, Part 1, Schedule 1 of the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994, which prohibits the export without an export licence of certain all-wheel drive utility vehicles capable of off road use, heavy duty recovery vehicles and drop sided trucks.

This control was introduced to address concerns that such vehicles might be used by para-military groups against British troops deployed on peace-keeping duties in the former Yugoslavia.

We are currently taking steps to remove this control in respect of the Republic of Macedonia.

European Union Events

Mr. Stringer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the forthcoming business in the Council of the European Union for June; and if he will list the major European Union events for the next six months. [85608]

Ms Quin: The list is as follows:

European Calendar: June-November 1999

This calendar is primarily concerned with European Union matters, but certain other relevant events are also included. Events and dates quoted are based on the information available on the date of issue.

Date	Venue	Event
June 1999
1	Dresden	Agriculture Ministers (Informal)
3–4	Cologne	European Council
7	Luxembourg	Education Council
8	Luxembourg	Health Council
10	Luxembourg	Fisheries Council
10–13		European Parliament Elections
14	Luxembourg	ECOFIN (possible)
14–15	Luxembourg	Agriculture Council
17–18	Luxembourg	Transport Council
21	Luxembourg	Internal Market Council
21–22	Luxembourg	General Affairs Council
22	Luxembourg	Labour and Social Affairs Council (possible)
24–25	Luxembourg	Environment Council
28	Luxembourg	Culture and Audiovisual Council
28–29	Rio de Janeiro	EU-Latin America/Caribbean Summit
July 1999
2–3	Oulu	Industry and Research Ministers (Informal)
9–10	Oulu	Labour/Social Affairs Ministers (Informal)
12	Brussels	ECOFIN
16	Brussels	Budget Council
18–20	Savonlinna	Culture and Audiovisual Ministers (Informal)
19–20	Brussels	General Affairs Council
19–20	Brussels	Agriculture Council
20–23	Strasbourg	European Parliament Plenary
23–25	Helsinki	Environment Ministers (Informal)
28–30	Brussels	EU-ACP Ministerial Meeting
August 1999
No Council Business
September 1999
4–5	Saariselka	Foreign Ministers (Informal)
10–11	Turku	ECOFIN (Informal)
12–14	Tampere	Agriculture Ministers (Informal)
13–14	Brussels	General Affairs Council
13–17	Strasbourg	European Parliament Plenary

Date	Venue	Event
16–17	Turku	Justice and Home Affairs Ministers (Informal)
24–25	Tampere	Education Ministers (Informal)
27–28	Kuopio	Ministers of Housing
27–28	Brussels	Agriculture Council
30 September-1 October	Helsinki	Ministerial Conference on Equality between Women and Men
October 1999
4–5	Luxembourg	Justice and Home Affairs Council
4–5	Tampere	Regional Policy Ministers
4–8	Strasbourg	European Parliament Plenary
6	Luxembourg	Transport Council
8	Luxembourg	ECOFIN
11–12	Luxembourg	General Affairs Council
11–12	Luxembourg	Environment Council
15–16	Luxembourg	Special European Council
18–19	Luxembourg	Agriculture Council
22	Luxembourg	Labour/Social Affairs Council
24–25	Helsinki	Energy Ministers Task Force Meeting
25–29	Strasbourg	European Parliament Plenary
26	Luxembourg	Fisheries Council
28	Luxembourg	Research Council
29	Luxembourg	Justice and Home Affairs Council
November 1999
3–4	Brussels	European Parliament Plenary
8	Brussels	ECOFIN
8	Brussels	Consumer Affairs Council
9	Brussels	Industry Council
11	Brussels	Development Council
12	Brussels	Labour and Social Affairs Council (possible)
12–13	Helsinki	Ministerial Conference on the Northern Dimension
15–16	Brussels	Agriculture Council
15–16	Brussels	General Affairs Council
15–19	Strasbourg	European Parliament Plenary
18	Brussels	Health Council
19	Brussels	Youth Council
22	Brussels	Fisheries Council (possible)
22–23	Brussels	EU-ACP Ministerial Meeting (possible)
23	Brussels	Culture and Audiovisual Council
26	Brussels	Budget Council
26	Brussels	Education Council
29	Brussels	ECOFIN
29	Brussels	Labour and Social Affairs Council
30	Brussels	Telecommunications Council

Monthly Forecast of Business: June 1999

The following subjects are likely to be discussed:

1 June 1999—Dresden—Agriculture Ministers (Informal)

No formal agenda

3–4 June 1999—Cologne—European Council

No formal agenda

7 June 1999—Luxembourg—Education Council

Adoption of provisional agenda

Adoption of list of "A" points

New generation of programmes

Leonardo II decision and negotiations on Socrates II (information from Presidency)

Commission report on Socrates I (information from the Commission and exchange of views)

Implementation of Leonardo II and Socrates II (information from the Commission)

Implementation of Europass (information from the Commission)

Contribution of Education to European Employment Pact (Presidency discussion paper)

Forward planning in the field of education (Presidency discussion paper)

(poss.) Conference of European Education Ministers in Budapest on 24–26 June 1999 (information from Presidency)

Any other business

8 June 1999—Luxembourg—Health Council

Morning

Adoption of the agenda

(poss.) Approval of the list of "A" items

Future Community action in the field of public health

Draft Council Resolution

Exchange of views

Antibiotic resistance—a strategy against the microbial threat

Draft Council Resolution

Communicable diseases

Commission report on the 4th meeting of the EU-United States task force on communicable diseases 8159/99 SAN 52

Commission briefing on development in Europe

Report on the State of Health in the Community (Migrants)

Commission progress briefing

Health issues in connection with the future enlargement of the community

(A) Presentation of Commission working paper on "Health and Enlargement"

(B) Preparation of informal Meeting with the Ministers of the countries applying for accession

Approval of the annotated agenda

Informal meeting with the Ministers of the applicant countries

Afternoon

Proposal for a Council recommendation on the limitation of exposure of the general public to electromagnetic fields 0 HZ-3000 GHZ (0)

(Legal basis: Article 152(4), second sub-paragraph)
Adoption 9620/98 SAN 107 ECO 230

Integration of health protection requirements in Community policies
Draft Council conclusions

Transmissible spongiform encephalopathies (TSES)
Exchange of views

Other business

(A) WHO tobacco free initiative

(Request by the Netherlands delegation)

(B) Non-conventional medicine

(Request by the Belgian Delegation)

(0) Item on which a vote may be taken

10 June 1999—Luxembourg—Fisheries Council

Adoption of the agenda

Approval of the list of "A" items

Proposal for a Council regulation laying down the details rules and arrangements regarding Community structural assistance in the fisheries sector (X)

Legal basis: Article 37 of the Treaty
Final adoption
DOC. 13605/98 PECHE 413

Proposal for a Council regulation establishing a list of types of behaviour which seriously infringe the rules of the Common Fisheries Policy (X)

Legal basis: Article 37 of the Treaty
Final Adoption
DOC. 6030/99 PECHE 31

(poss.) Proposal for a Council regulation allocating the fishing possibilities for certain fish stocks and modifying regulation no. 48/99 (in particular the allocation of tacs for blue whiting and for new tacs for spurdog and northern shrimps) (X) (Commission proposal awaited)
Final adoption

Fisheries agreements with third countries: cost/benefit analysis
State of play (oral report by the Commission)

Fisheries relations with Morocco

North Sea Conference—Intermediate Ministerial Meeting (IMM) 13–14 March 1997 Bergen, Norway—follow-up
Report by the Commission
(poss.) Presentation of Commission communication to Council and Parliament

Conservation of sandeels
Oral report on state of play by the Commission (at the request of the UK delegation)

Other business
Situation in the Adriatic as a consequence of the events in Kosovo (at the request of the Italian delegation)
Organisation of future work

(X) Item on which a vote may be requested.

10–13 June 1999—European Parliament Elections

14 June 1999—Luxembourg—ECOFIN (possible)

No agenda yet available

14–15 June 1999—Luxembourg—Agriculture Council

No agenda yet available

17–18 June 1999—Luxembourg—Transport Council

No agenda yet available

21 June 1999—Luxembourg—Internal Market Council

No agenda yet available

21–22 June 1999—Luxembourg—General Affairs Council

No agenda yet available

22 June 1999—Luxembourg—Labour and Social Affairs Council (possible)

No agenda yet available

24–25 June 1999—Luxembourg—Environment Council

No agenda yet available

28 June 1999—Luxembourg—Culture and Audiovisual Council

No agenda yet available

28–29 June 1999—Rio de Janeiro—EU-Latin America/Caribbean Summit

No agenda yet available.

Sudan

Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 1999, Official Report, column 241, if the United States has informed him that it remains its position that chemical weapons materials related to international terrorism were being produced at the pharmaceutical factory in Khartoum in Sudan; and if he will make a statement. [85460]

Mr. Hoon: The US Government have not informed us of a change in their position on this issue.

Balkan Conflict (Legality)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the charges made against the British Government by the Government of Yugoslavia in the International Court of Justice at the Hague in respect of the conflict in Yugoslavia; what has been his response; and if he will make a statement. [85341]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The application instituting proceedings and the request for interim measures in the case brought by the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia against the United Kingdom at the International Court of Justice will be placed in the Library of the House, together with the oral statements made on behalf of the FRY and the UK at the hearing on the request for interim measures which was held from 10 to 12 May.

SCOTLAND

Tuition Fees

9. Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of the National Union of Students in Scotland to discuss tuition fees. [84135]

Dr. Reid: Scottish Office Ministers meet representatives of the higher education sector, including the National Union of Students in Scotland, from time to time. A range of issues are discussed.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

14. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the vice-chancellors of Scottish universities to discuss tuition fees. [84140]

Dr. Reid: Scottish Office Ministers meet representatives of the higher education sector, including the Vice Chancellors of Scottish Universities, from time to time to discuss a range of issues.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

17. Mrs. Laing: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met representatives of students attending Scottish universities to discuss tuition fees. [84144]

Mr. Macdonald: Scottish Office Ministers meet representatives from the higher education sector, including students, from time to time. A wide range of issues are discussed.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Pathfinder Report

10. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he is taking in response to the pathfinder report published in late March. [84136]

Mr. Macdonald: The Pathfinders to the Parliament report has been widely disseminated. The report has allowed business to generate ideas for early consideration by the Scottish Parliament and it is now for the Parliament and Scottish Executive, in partnership with business and industry, to consider and, if appropriate, to take forward the recommendations in the report.

Clydeside Industries

11. Mr. Sarwar: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the prospects for shipbuilding and related industries on Clydeside. [84137]

Dr. Reid: Three of the four shipyards on the Clyde have healthy order books. A Task Force has been appointed by the Under-Secretary, my noble Friend Lord Macdonald to help identify potential purchasers for the fourth yard, Kvaerner Govan, and has achieved real progress towards this end.

From 1 July 1999, economic development will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Social Inclusion Strategy

13. Mr. Savidge: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Government's social inclusion strategy. [84139]

Mr. Macdonald: The Government are taking forward a wide-ranging and well resourced programme of action to promote social inclusion in Scotland. Our social inclusion strategy was published on 1 March this year. The work taken forward under the strategy will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Elections (Scottish Parliament)

15. Mr. David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to review the system for elections to the Scottish Parliament. [84141]

Dr. Reid: I have no plans to review the system of elections to the Scottish Parliament.

Regional Selective Assistance

16. Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to provide RSA funding for the development of clusters of industrial and biotechnology institutions. [84143]

Mr. Macdonald: Regional Selective Assistance is available for qualifying investment projects carried out in the Assisted Areas, including projects in the biotechnology sector.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Hospital Beds

18. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress is being made in reducing the number of beds which are blocked in Scottish hospitals. [84145]

Mr. Macdonald: Health Boards in Scotland continue to work with their local authority partners in addressing all avenues to reduce delays in discharge from NHS care.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

European Union Funding

19. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on progress being made to determine the boundaries for Objective 2 status funding by the European Union. [84146]

Mr. Macdonald: We are currently consulting on this and will submit to the European Commission proposals for eligible areas for Objective 2.

Anti-drugs Strategy

20. Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the Government's anti-drug abuse strategy. [84147]

Mr. Macdonald: The Government recently enhanced the approach to tackling drug misuse in Scotland with the publication of "Tackling Drugs in Scotland: Action in Partnership". This document establishes a new framework of co-operation across agencies and communities in the implementation of a programme of comprehensive action throughout Scotland.

From 1 July 1999, it will be for the Scottish Parliament to consider the strategy set out in "Tackling Drugs in Scotland: Action in Partnership" and continue the task of reducing drug misuse in Scotland.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator to discuss the implementation of Her Majesty Government's anti-drugs strategy in Scotland. [84131]

Mr. Macdonald: The Secretary of State has not met formally with the United Kingdom Anti-Drugs Co-ordinator, but the former Minister for health and the arts in Scotland, my hon. Friend the Member for Strathkelvin and Bearsden (Mr. Galbraith), has discussed Scotland's contribution to the UK Government's drugs strategy with Mr. Hellawell. This is set out in "Tackling Drugs in Scotland: Action in Partnership", which was launched in March 1999.

From 1 July 1999, it will be for the Scottish Parliament to consider the strategy set out in this document.

Gartcosh

21. Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next expects to meet Lanarkshire Development Agency to discuss the industrial and jobs potential at Gartcosh. [84148]

Mr. Macdonald: I have no immediate plans to meet with Lanarkshire Development Agency to discuss the industrial and jobs potential at Gartcosh. The previous Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (Mr. Dewar), and the Prime Minister met with Lanarkshire Development Agency on 8 April to discuss inward investment and the opening of a new call centre at Cumbernauld. North Lanarkshire Council and Lanarkshire Development Agency have formed a Partnership to promote the regeneration of the Gartcosh site as a strategic industrial location capable of being marketed throughout the UK and internationally. The partnership is investing £11.6 million to transform the site into a fully-serviced 200 acre industrial park, which will be capable of accommodating up to 5,000 jobs and attracting substantial new investment into Lanarkshire.

Oil Industry Task Force

22. Mr. Doran: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the work of the oil industry task force. [84149]

Mr. Macdonald: The Oil and Gas Industry Task Force is examining a number of key areas vital to the long term future of the UK oil and gas industry. The priorities for action are Competitiveness, Skills and Training, Innovation and Technology, Fiscal Administration, Regulation and Licensing, Sustainable Development, and Long Term Vision. As a result of the work undertaken in the Task Force so far, a number of measures to boost oil and gas exploration and development were announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Energy and Industry on 31 March.

The Task Force is expected to make final recommendations by the summer.

Ministerial Responsibilities

23. Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the extent of his responsibilities following the creation of the Scottish Executive. [84150]

Dr. Reid: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given earlier today to the hon. Members for Rochford and Southend, East (Sir T. Taylor) and for Bromsgrove (Miss Kirkbride).

Funding (Health and Education)

24. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations he has received this year on (a) higher and further education funding and (b) NHS funding. [84151]

Mr. Macdonald: Scottish Office Ministers and officials have had regular contact with a wide range of institutions and interests in further and higher education. Issues arising have included matters relating to funding and I have been particularly pleased by the warm response from both sectors to our commitment to invest significantly in further and higher education throughout the three year Comprehensive Spending Review period.

Representations on NHS funding have been received from a variety of bodies. Following the Comprehensive Spending Review an additional investment of £1.8 billion is being made available in the NHS in Scotland over the next three years. A further £37.1 million over the next three years was provided in the March budget for Capital Modernisation.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Infant Deaths

25. Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to introduce a confidential case inquiry into each incident of sudden unexpected infant death in Scotland. [84152]

Mr. Macdonald: I have no plans to do so. There is already a significant body of evidence relating to the epidemiology of sudden unexpected infant death. This is consistent with Health Departments' guidance and advice on reducing the risk of cot death. The Government will continue to support biomedical and health service research into this important topic, alongside the valuable work of voluntary agencies, such as the Scottish Cot Death Trust, to help find out how sudden unexpected infant death might be reduced further.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Food Standards Agency

26. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what assessment he has made of the impact on small businesses of the flat rate levy to fund the new Food Standards Agency. [84153]

Mr. Macdonald: The possible impact of the levy has been discussed with representatives from small business organisations at a series of consultation seminars across Scotland. We have also received a large number of responses to the public consultation on the charging proposals. We are considering these responses—including suggestions for alternative proposals—before deciding how to proceed.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

NHS Reform

27. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has for the reform of the NHS. [84154]

Mr. Macdonald: Our broad plans to modernise the NHS in Scotland were set out in the White Paper "Designed to Care", which we published in December 1997. That programme is now being implemented in detail, and the primary legislation required is currently before Parliament. Our intention now is to consolidate the modernisation process.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

EU Structural Funds

28. Mrs. McKenna: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in deciding the future of European structural funds in Scotland. [84155]

Mr. Macdonald: We have made good progress. At the Berlin Summit in March, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister secured a special aid package for the Highlands and Islands, and we are now consulting on Objectives 2 and 3.

Millennium Bug

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the degree of preparedness for the Year 2000 and the millennium bug of the pharmacy practice division of the Common Services Agency of the Scottish Health Service. [84867]

Mr. Macdonald: The Common Services Agency has an extensive programme for Year 2000 preparedness. In the case of the Pharmacy Practice Division, the decision was taken to replace the existing old and largely manual system with a completely new system which incorporates high speed Intelligent Character Recognition. I am advised by the General Manager of the CSA that best current estimates from the suppliers indicate that the new system will complete testing and come into operation before the end of this calendar year, and that robust contingency plans are being developed to ensure continuity of payments to pharmacy contractors.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

HIV/AIDS

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will list the cumulative number of people who had been diagnosed HIV positive (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland, for each year from 1981 to 1988, in 1998 and for 1999 to date; [84823]

(2) how many people were newly diagnosed HIV positive (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland, for each year from 1981 to 1988, in 1998 and for 1999 to date. [84822]

(3) if he will list the cumulative number of people who had been diagnosed HIV positive and not known to have died (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland, for each year from 1981 to 1988, in 1998 and for 1999 to date. [84824]

Mr. Macdonald: I shall write to my right hon. Friend in view of the extent of the information requested. I shall arrange for a copy of my letter to be placed in the Library of the House.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people diagnosed with AIDS and not known to have died there were in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland in each year from 1981 to 1988, in 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84818]

Mr. Macdonald: The information is set out in the following table:

AIDS cases not known to be dead as at 31 December of selected years by health board of AIDS registration, and for Scotland, as at 31 March 1999

Health Board	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1998	1999
Argyll & Clyde	0	0	0	0	0	0	2	2	3	3
Ayrshire & Arran	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	2	2
Borders	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Dumfries & Galloway	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Fife	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	1	15	15
Forth Valley	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Grampian	0	0	0	0	0	1	1	1	7	7
Greater Glasgow	0	0	0	1	3	1	10	13	77	78
Highland	0	0	0	0	1	0	0	0	2	2
Lanarkshire	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	5	5
Lothian	0	0	0	2	3	6	15	25	106	110
Orkney	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Shetland	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Tayside	0	0	0	0	0	1	0	4	26	24
Western Isles	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Scotland	0	0	0	3	7	9	29	46	243	246

Note:

This table is based on year of AIDS diagnosis.

Source:

The Scottish Centre for Infection and Environmental Health AIDS/HIV Register

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people with AIDS died in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland in each year from 1981 to 1988, in 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84819]

Mr. Macdonald: The information is set out in the following table.

AIDS deaths by health board of AIDS registration, and for Scotland, by year of death, as at 31 March 1999

Health board	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	1998	1999
Argyll and Clyde	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Ayrshire and Arran	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Borders	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Dumfries and Galloway	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Fife	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	0	0	0
Forth Valley	0	0	0	0	1	0	0	0	0	0
Grampian	0	0	0	0	0	0	2	1	1	0
Greater Glasgow	0	1	0	1	0	6	3	8	6	0
Highland	0	0	0	0	0	1	0	0	1	0
Lanarkshire	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	0	0	0
Lothian	0	0	0	0	0	2	4	8	6	0
Orkney	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Shetland	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Tayside	0	0	0	0	0	1	1	0	8	2
Western Isles	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Scotland	0	1	0	1	1	10	12	17	22	2

Source:
The Scottish Centre for Infection and Environmental Health AIDS/HIV Register.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the cumulative number of people diagnosed with AIDS in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland in each year from 1981 to 1998, and in 1999 to date. [84821]

Mr. Macdonald: The information is set out in the table:

Cumulative AIDS cases diagnosed as at 31 December of selected year, by health board of AIDS registration, and for Scotland, as at 31 March 1999

Health board	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1987	1988	198
Argyll and Clyde	0	0	0	0	0	0	2	2	3
Ayrshire and Arran	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	4
Borders	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Dumfries and Galloway	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Fife	0	0	0	0	0	0	2	2	2
Forth Valley	0	0	0	0	1	1	1	1	2
Grampian	0	0	0	0	0	1	3	4	6
Greater Glasgow	0	1	1	3	5	9	21	32	51
Highland	0	0	0	0	1	1	1	1	2
Lanarkshire	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	1	1
Lothian	0	0	0	2	3	8	21	39	81
Orkney	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Shetland	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Tayside	0	0	0	0	0	2	2	6	13
Western Isles	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Scotland	0	1	1	5	10	22	54	88	165

Cumulative AIDS cases diagnosed as at 31 December of selected year, by health board of AIDS registration, and for Scotland, as at 31 March 1999

Health board	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997	1998	1999
Argyll and Clyde	4	4	4	5	5	5	5	5	7	7
Ayrshire and Arran	4	4	5	6	8	10	10	11	11	11
Borders	0	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1	1
Dumfries and Galloway	2	2	2	2	3	3	3	3	3	3
Fife	3	4	4	8	11	16	22	26	27	27
Forth Valley	2	2	2	3	3	4	4	4	4	4
Grampian	9	14	19	20	28	33	36	36	37	37
Greater Glasgow	74	107	130	161	188	213	227	249	257	258

Cumulative AIDS cases diagnosed as at 31 December of selected year, by health board of AIDS registration, and for Scotland, as at 31 March 1999

Health board	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997	1998	1999
Highland	2	3	3	3	4	4	5	6	7	7
Lanarkshire	2	7	8	9	10	11	11	12	15	15
Lothian	121	160	198	266	310	367	404	428	441	445
Orkney	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Shetland	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Tayside	18	37	50	68	96	121	140	147	154	154
Western Isles	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Scotland	241	345	426	552	667	788	868	928	964	969

Source:
The Scottish Centre for Infection and Environmental Health AIDS/HIV Register

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Further and Higher Education

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the distribution figures across (i) higher and further education institutions in Scotland and (ii) higher and further education courses in Scotland for the Government's target of (a) 750,000 higher and further education places in Scotland, (b) increasing the number of higher and further education places in Scotland by 42,000 and (c) 40,000 full time equivalent places in Scotland by 2001–02. [84876]

Dr. Reid [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The information is not available in the form requested. The table indicates the numbers of students in further and higher education institutions in Scotland, and the distribution across further and higher education courses for 1997–98, the last year for which statistics are available. 42,000 additional student places will be funded over the Comprehensive Spending Review period from 1999–2000 to 2001–02 (40,000 in FE colleges and 2,000 in HE institutions). The distribution of these places between level and mode of delivery will be a matter for the Scottish Further and Scottish Higher Education Funding Councils. We have indicated that institutions should make it a priority to draw additional students from under-represented groups.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

	HE institutions	FE institutions [1]	Total
1997–98
FE courses[2]	72,923	341,941	414,864
HE courses	178,575	69,124	247,699
Total	251,498	411,065	662,563

[1] Provisional
[2] It is possible for a student to be enrolled on more than one course in one year. This is particularly relevant to the part time FE sector. Students are counted for each course on which they enrol.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to improve energy efficiency and eradicate dampness in housing. [R] [84142]

Mr. Macdonald: A new Warm Deal will be introduced on 1 July providing a £500 grant to improve energy efficiency for low income households. This year's budget will be £12 million and the scheme will also create up to 400 places under the New Deal. This will be the best measure yet to provide affordable warmth and tackle damp houses in Scotland.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Office for the Supervision of Solicitors

33. Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has received about the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors. [84162]

Mr. Vaz: The Lord Chancellor's Department receives many representations about the handling of complaints of inadequate professional service by the Office for the Supervision of Solicitors.

The Government have increasing concern about the Office and are therefore bringing forward proposals to amend the Access to Justice Bill, which are aimed at improving its performance.

Freedom of Information

36. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what discussions he has had with the Home Secretary on the implications of the Government's proposals for freedom of information for the work of his Department. [84165]

Mr. Vaz: Neither I nor my predecessor, my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Hoon) have had any discussions. The Lord Chancellor was actively involved in the collective ministerial discussions which led to the publication of a draft Bill for consultation on 24 May.

Access to Justice

37. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations he has received on the impact of his proposals to increase access to justice on poorer people. [84166]

Mr. Vaz: The Lord Chancellor's Department has received representations from a wide range of individuals and interested organisations on all aspects of access to justice.

39. Mr. Luff: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what steps he is taking to maintain access to justice for rural communities. [84168]

Mr. Vaz: Once the Regional Legal Service Committees have established the legal needs of their particular communities, the Legal Service Commission will purchase, as far as possible within the financial resources available, the most appropriate quality assured legal service to meet those needs. Provision and need will then continue to be monitored by the Regional Legal Service Committees for both level and standards of service and adjusted appropriately. Additionally, if necessary, special provision can be made, such as solicitors having to travel to their clients, and the use of telephone advice and outreach services is also being developed to improve access to justice for all.

Community Legal Service

38. Helen Jones: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the impact of the proposed community legal service on representation at tribunals. [84167]

Mr. Vaz: It would generally be premature to decide what changes to make in respect of help with tribunal cases until the Government have completed their review of whether tribunal arrangements, including representation, meet our ECHR and EU obligations. Meanwhile, advice and assistance short of representation is, and will remain, available for tribunal cases.

Magistrates

40. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department since May 1997 how many (a) male, (b) female, (c) white, (d) black and Asian, (e) over 60-year-old and (f) under 30-year-old magistrates have been appointed. [84169]

Mr. Vaz: The information requested is only available from 1 January 1997 to 31 March 1999 and is as follows:

(a) 1,591 male magistrates appointed

(b) 1,635 female magistrates appointed

(c) 3,021 white magistrates appointed

(d) 95 black and 110 Asian magistrates appointed

(e) 56 magistrates over the age of 60 appointed

(f) 42 magistrates under the age of 30 appointed.

Ogden Tables Working Party

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will implement the recommendations of the Ogden tables working party to set a rate of return of two per cent.; and if he will make a statement. [84932]

Mr. Vaz: The discount rate to be applied in the calculation of damages for personal injuries and fatal accidents cases affects the interests of both plaintiffs and defendants. The Lord Chancellor will be issuing a consultation paper next month canvassing views on how the rate should be set, and reviewed, before deciding whether and how to exercise the power to set the rate conferred on him by Section 1 of the Damages Act 1996.

Magistrates (Doncaster)

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates sit on the Doncaster Magistrates Bench; and how many of those magistrates reside in the Barnsley East and Mexborough constituency. [84986]

Mr. Vaz: There are currently 184 magistrates on the Doncaster Bench and of those, 16 reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency.

Magistrates (Barnsley)

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Minister of State, Lord Chancellor's Department how many magistrates sit on the Barnsley Magistrates' Bench; and how many of those magistrates reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency. [84987]

Mr. Vaz: There are currently 129 magistrates on the Barnsley Bench and of those, 11 reside in the Barnsley, East and Mexborough constituency.

Unified Civil Rules

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the court service's performance in introducing the new, unified civil rules and related procedural reforms. [84159]

Mr. Vaz: Implementation of the Civil Procedure rules took place only four weeks ago, on Monday 26 April. It is therefore a little early to assess the Court Service's performance in detail. However, that the first stage of implementation of the reforms is going well is thanks to the efforts of everyone who worked so hard to achieve implementation on time.

TREASURY

Domestic Fuel Bills

Mr. Forth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate the Government have made of the effects in percentage terms on average domestic fuel bills of (a) the introduction of competition into the domestic gas market, (b) the reduction in VAT on domestic fuel and (c) the windfall tax, over the period since each measure was introduced. [84660]

Ms Hewitt: According to latest DTI figures, the combined impact of competition and regulation has reduced the average domestic gas bill by around 16.5 per cent. in real terms since competition was first introduced into the domestic gas market in 1996.

Assuming no demand effects, the reduction in the VAT rate on domestic fuel from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent. in September 1997 reduced the average domestic fuel bill by just under 3 per cent.

In his Budget speech in July 1997, the Chancellor said that the windfall tax could be paid without any impact on prices. It is the Government's view that domestic fuel bills have not been affected by the windfall tax. The energy regulators have publicly supported this view.

Community Psychiatric Nurses

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has to review the classification of community psychiatric nurses as essential users of cars; [84577]

(2) if he will publish the studies commissioned by him into the essential use of cars by community psychiatric nurses. [84578]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 18 May 1999]: The Chancellor has not commissioned any studies into the use of cars by community psychiatric nurses and he has no plans to do so. Community psychiatric nurses provided with small cars with low carbon dioxide emissions, in which they drive low business mileage, stand to benefit from the fundamental reform of company car tax to be implemented from April 2002.

Euro

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the euro will be adopted as the currency in French overseas territories. [84901]

Ms Hewitt: The euro is the currency of the French overseas Departments and of Saint-Pierre-et-Miquelon and Mayotte. The euro has not been adopted as the currency of the French overseas territories.

UK Payments (EU)

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in what currency the UK's contribution to the EU is made. [84902]

Ms Hewitt: United Kingdom gross contributions to the EC Budget are made in pounds sterling.

Millennium Gift Aid

Mr. Gill: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons (a) Jordan, (b) Syria, (c) Lebanon and (d) the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are excluded from the list of countries eligible for Millennium Gift Aid; and if he will make a statement. [84903]

Ms Hewitt: The Millennium Gift Aid scheme (MGA) was introduced in 1998 as part of the Government's initiative to relieve the debt burden in developing countries. MGA provides tax relief for donations to UK charities for educational and anti-poverty projects in the world's poorest countries. The relief applies to the 80 countries that are eligible for lending either by the International Development Association (IDA), or jointly by the IDA and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, both organisations of the World Bank. Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip are not on the World Bank list.

On 6 April 1999 the Chancellor announced that MGA is to be extended to cover donations to UK charities to help the Kosovan refugees. This is in response to the urgent humanitarian crisis in Kosovo and to assist charities with their emergency fund-raising appeals. There are no plans to add further to the causes that are eligible for MGA.

There is a range of tax reliefs for giving to charity, apart from MGA, which apply to all charitable causes. In addition, the Review of Charity Taxation has proposed extending the advantages of MGA to all charitable causes after 31 December 2000.

Overseas Debt

Ms Drown: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's policy on reductions in debt service payments after a country has emerged from the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative; and if he will make a statement. [84961]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for International Development have called for an enhanced HIPC initiative which will provide debt relief faster, deeper and wider than is currently delivered. The UK has stressed the importance of early debt service reductions, and thereby of releasing funds for programmes that reduce poverty.

Superannuation Schemes

Ms Stuart: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) current and (b) deferred members there are in (A) the (i) police, (ii) fire service, (iii) principal Civil Service, (iv) National Health Service, (v) armed forces and (vi) local government pension schemes and (B) the teachers' superannuation scheme. [85271]

Mr. Milburn: The administration of public service pension schemes is the responsibility of various other Government Departments or local authorities, not Her Majesty's Treasury. The latest information held centrally, which has been supplied by the responsible Departments, is as follows.

Responsible department	Pension schemes	Current members	As at	Deferred members	As at
Home Office[1]	Police (E, W & Sc)[2]	140,000	31 March 1999	—[4]	—
Home Office[1]	Firefighters (E, W & Sc)[2]	38,000	31 March 1998	—[4]	—
Cabinet Office	Principal Civil Service Pension Scheme	510,000	30 September 1997	237,000	30 September 1998
Department of Health	National Health Service (England & Wales)	892,000	31 March 1999	240,000	31 March 1999
Scottish Office[1]	NHS (Scotland)	108,000	31 March 1999	60,000	31 March 1999
Ministry of Defence	Armed Forces	212,000	1 April 1997	238,000	1 April 1997
Department of the Environment Transport and the Regions	Local Government (England and Wales)[2]	1,328,000	31 March 1998	386,000	31 March 1998
Scottish Office[1]	Local Government (Scotland)[2]	157,000[3]	31 March 1998	36,000[3]	31 March 1998
Department for Education and Employment	Teachers (England and Wales)	558,000	31 March 1997	151,000	31 March 1997
Scottish Office[1]	Teachers (Scotland)	66,000	31 March 1999	41,000	31 March 1999

[1] From 1 July 1999 responsibility for police, fire, NHS, local government and teachers' pensions in Scotland will pass to the Scottish Executive.
[2] These schemes are administered by local authorities, which provide any data.
[3] Provisional figures.
[4] Not available centrally.

VAT

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the proposed new VAT exemption categories available to VAT-registered bodies where VAT is incurred and not recovered on importation, intra-EC acquisition, or production of goods following the judgment of the European Court against the Republic of Italy (Case C-45/95); and if he will make a statement. [85114]

Dawn Primarolo: The proposed changes were explained in a technical note, issued on 21 April, which invited comments by 21 May 1999.

Electronic Transactions

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what progress he has made in achieving the Government's target on electronic transactions with Government; and if he will make a statement. [85100]

Mr. Milburn: Good progress is being made by Departments in achieving the overall target of undertaking 90 per cent. of Government low value transactions electronically by 2001. The volume of low value transactions undertaken through the Government Procurement Card continues to double each quarter and currently stands at 58,000 transactions worth £6.5 million.

The Minister for the Cabinet Office is responsible for the Information Age targets which were set out in the Modernising Government White Paper that 25 per cent. of dealings with the Government should be capable of being done by the public electronically by 2002, 50 per cent. by 2005, and 100 per cent. by 2008. My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office will be reporting progress shortly.

Funding (Advertising)

Mr. Horam: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the Financial Services and Markets Bill is planned to relax existing rules on advertising for funding. [85276]

Ms Hewitt: The Financial Services and Markets Bill will introduce an updated and improved regime for the regulation of financial promotions. I announced on 17 March 1999, Official Report, columns 661–62, the publication of a consultation paper. This includes consideration of ways to facilitate informal capital raising to assist small and medium sized firms gain access to investment funding. A number of responses have been received and are being considered.

London Stock Exchange

Dr. Desmond Turner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will discuss with the Director General of Fair Trading the operation of the rules of the London Stock Exchange as they relate to the publication of information affecting employees of listed companies. [85318]

Ms Hewitt: We are in contact as the need arises with the Director General of Fair Trading on competition aspects of the rules of the London Stock Exchange. However, the rules of the Exchange do allow a company at its discretion to undertake confidential consultation with employee representatives before making a public announcement.

Securities Commissions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has held with the International Organisation of Securities Commissions on the relocation of its headquarters to the United Kingdom. [85126]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The application procedure involved cities rather than Governments applying to host the IOSCO headquarters. The Corporation of London's bid was supported by the Prime Minister and by Treasury Ministers.

International Organisation of Securities Commissions

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the policy of Her Majesty's Government on the relocation of the headquarters or other offices of the International Organisation of Securities Commissions to the United Kingdom. [85127]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: HM Government have supported the Corporation of London's bid for the IOSCO secretariat to relocate to London.

Endowment Policies

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 1999, Official Report, columns 348–49, on endowment policies, what estimate he has made of the size of the traded endowment market. [85123]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The traded endowment market has an estimated value of £250 million per year. In contrast the value of with-profit bonds issued by life offices is £6 billion per year.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 1999, Official Report, column 348, on endowment policies, on the basis of what evidence he stated that the prices offered for second-hand endowment policies are tending to converge with surrender values. [85122]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The Financial Services Authority (FSA) monitors prices in the industry. FSA reports that some life offices have increased the surrender values of endowment policies, bringing them closer to the typical prices offered on the second hand endowment market.

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 4 May 1999, Official Report, column 348, on endowment policies, what estimate he has made of the cost of extending the scope of the Financial Services Act 1986 to include all dealings in traded endowment policies. [85121]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The important issue is not absolute cost but the need to avoid disproportionate cost. Given the small size of the traded endowment market and the convergence between surrender values and traded endowment prices, the cost of including all dealings within the scope of the Financial Services Act 1986 is likely to exceed any benefits. The Treasury is keeping the situation under review.

Comparative Earnings

Mr. Moore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will list the average weekly earnings (a) including and (b) excluding overtime for part-time workers in (i) Scotland, (ii) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (iii) Great Britain, broken down for men and women in manual employment and non-manual employment and for all workers; [85051]

(2) if he will list the percentage of workers on adult rates of pay in part-time employment whose hourly earnings (a) including and (b) excluding overtime pay are less than (i) £4.79, (ii) £6.38, (iii) £6.90 and (iv) £3.60 in (1) Scotland, (2) each of the unitary local authority areas in Scotland and (3) Great Britain, broken down by (A) male manual, (B) male non-manual, (C) female manual, (D) female non-manual, (E) all manual, (F) all non-manual and (G) all workers. [85050]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Michael Moore, dated 25 May 1999:

As the Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent questions regarding earnings for part-time workers in Scotland, the Scottish local authorities and Great Britain.

The New Earnings Survey (NES) can provide earnings data for small geographical areas. However, the release of NES data is restricted to figures which are derived from a sufficiently large sample of employees, and have an acceptable level of accuracy. I have provided the available data for Scotland, the Scottish local authorities and Great Britain in the attached tables. These are based on the 1998 NES, the latest survey for which data are available.

The NES is based on a one per cent. sample of employees in the PAYE system and is therefore likely to under-represent relatively low paid staff earning below the tax threshold and in particular those who work part-time.

I will arrange for a copy of this letter to be placed in the Library.

Green-field and Brown-field Development

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will introduce a taxation system that will (a) discourage the development of green-field sites and (b) encourage the development of brown-field land. [85459]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's policy is to discourage green-field development and to raise the proportion of new homes built on brown-field land. But this is an extremely complicated issue and needs careful analysis. Tax is just one factor in meeting housing policy objectives and it may not be the most effective. Land use planning clearly has a key role.

Manufacturing

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the economic situation in the manufacturing sector (a) in the West Midlands region and (b) in the United Kingdom; and what steps he is taking to encourage growth in the sector. [85135]

Ms Hewitt: Recent surveys have shown an improvement in confidence among manufacturers across the country and there is a widespread consensus that manufacturing output will strengthen into 2000. The Government believe that the best way they can support all sectors of business is by delivering long-term stability—based on low inflation and sound public finances—and by working with business to help improve Britain's productivity performance.

BBC

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if the commercial operations of the BBC are subject to Treasury approval. [85347]

Mr. Milburn: The commercial operations of the BBC are subject to the approval of the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 26 May 1999

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Magistrates

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many (a) women and (b) disabled magistrates sit on the (i) Barnsley and (ii) Doncaster bench. [85246]

Mr. Vaz: There are currently 56 women on the Barnsley bench and 90 women on the Doncaster bench. No formal records are kept of those who are registered disabled on either the Barnsley or the Doncaster bench.

Mr. Ennis: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the average age of the magistrates who sit on the (a) Barnsley and (b) Doncaster bench. [85245]

Mr. Vaz: The average age of the magistrates who sit on the Barnsley and Doncaster benches is 56.

DEFENCE

Commission for Racial Equality

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress being made by the Armed Forces to implement the partnership agreement between his Department and the Commission for Racial Equality. [85666]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Chief of Defence Staff signed a five year Partnership Agreement with the CRE in March 1998. It provides an unambiguous foundation for Service racial equality policies, committing the Armed Forces to reflecting more closely the rich ethnic balance of our society, and developing a culture which positively welcomes diversity. It also calls for clear lines of accountability in tackling discrimination and racist behaviour and in ensuring that all personnel embrace a personal responsibility to implement the spirit of the Agreement.

The Armed Forces have made considerable efforts to implement the Agreement's principles and I am pleased to report excellent progress over its first year of operation.

All the Services continue to attach the highest priority to recruiting and retaining more ethnic minority personnel. Recruitment advertising campaigns targeting ethnic minorities have proved attractive, with career applications doubling over the last two years. All three Services now have specialist recruiting teams dedicated to increasing awareness of Service careers amongst ethnic communities, and a new long-term "Community Partnerships" campaign has been launched to build bridges between the Services and black, Asian and other non-white communities across the nation. The proportion of intake to the Services in 1998–99 which was from ethnic minorities was 1.8 per cent., about a 40 per cent. increase on 1997–98.

Significant emphasis has also been attached to equal opportunities and cultural awareness training. The Tri-Service Equal Opportunities Training Centre at Shrivenham was launched in September 1998 and has already trained over 1,000 Service Equal Opportunity Advisers to provide specialist advice and training to their units. Similar training is now mandatory for senior military officers, and over 300 have already passed TSEOTC courses.

The Services are continuing to develop a culture which not only holds zero tolerance to any form of racist behaviour, but which also positively welcomes racial diversity. Individual Service efforts in the field of equal opportunities are now co-ordinated through the Corporate Framework announced in March 1999, which encourages a sharing of best practice across the Armed Forces. Service recruitment, promotion and management procedures are objectively reviewed to ensure that they do not unwittingly discriminate against ethnic minority personnel.

All personnel are regularly reminded of their own personal responsibility not just in combating racism, but in ensuring a harassment-free serving environment. The Chief of Defence Staff has formally declared "war on racism", and the Service Chiefs have reminded their Commanders, as recently as March this year, that any form of racist behaviour is incompatible with military service. Any incidents or accusations of racism or harassment are taken very seriously and will be promptly and thoroughly investigated—guilty parties face the severest penalties up to and including dismissal.

Progress is regularly reviewed, with representatives from all three Services meeting with the CRE Commissioners on a regular basis. I also met with Sir Herman Ouseley, the CRE Chairman earlier this year, and will be doing so again in the future. The Chief of Defence Staff, who has overall responsibility for implementation of the Partnership Agreement, will be reviewing our progress with the CRE shortly.

In the year ahead, the Services will consolidate their successes to date and continue to drive forward equal opportunity initiatives. Complacency is not an option; this is a long-term process and the Armed Forces remain committed to implementing the spirit and letter of the Partnership Agreement.

Logistic Information Systems Agency

Laura Moffatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the Logistic Information Systems Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [85667]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Chief Executive of the Logistic Information Systems Agency has been set the following Key Targets for 1999–2000:

Key Target 1—To deliver Customer Supplier Agreements (CSAs) with increasing efficiency. Target 3 per cent.

Key Target 2—Maintain or improve cost ratio of Information Systems delivery staff to Administrative staff of 1:0.59.

Key Target 3—Maintain or improve ratio of value of fixed assets to value of work delivered of 1:14.

Key Target 4—To improve delivery performance to customer requirements such that:

95 per cent. of Requests for Change are assessed within 7 days.

98 per cent. of Requests For Change are assessed within 21 days.

The average period required for Request For Change Authorisation is reduced by 20 per cent. from 105 days to 85 days.

90 per cent of Requests For Change are moved from the Tasking Phase to the Implementation Phase within 42 days.

NATO Forces (Yugoslavia)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the (a) weapons and (b) military forces deployed by NATO in the conflict with Yugoslavia. [83288]

Mr. George Robertson: The following UK units, or elements thereof, together with their associated weapons systems, are currently committed to NATO operations in the Balkans:

Royal Navy

HMS Norfolk
HMS Iron Duke
HMS Grafton
HMS Splendid
HMS Bulldog
HMS Sandown
RFA Fort Austin
3 Lynx Helicopters

Army

Elements of Headquarters Allied Rapid Reaction Corps
1st Signals Brigade
16th Signals Regiment
2 Signals Regiment
7 Signals Regiment
3rd Armoured Division Signals Regiment
30 Signals Regiment
14th Topographical Squadron Royal Engineers
659 Squadron Army Air Corps
Headquarters 4th Armoured Brigade
Kings Royal Hussars
4th Regiment Royal Artillery
21st Regiment Royal Engineers
1st Battalion Irish Guards
2nd Armoured Field Ambulance
D Squadron Household Cavalry Regiment
A Company the Green Howards
Burma Company King's Own Royal Border Regiment
Headquarters (UK) Combat Service Support Group
28th Regiment Royal Engineers
17 Port and Maritime Regiment
29th Regiment Royal Logistics Corps
27th Regiment Royal Logistics Corps
Royal Military Police

Royal Air Force

16 Harrier GR7s
8 Tornado GR1s
3 E-3D Sentry AWACS
4 Tristar tankers
3 VC 10 tankers
1 Nimrod R
2 Puma helicopters.

It is for other individual member countries to provide information on their contribution of weapons and forces to NATO operations.

WALES

Schools

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many (a) primary schools and (b) high schools he has visited; and if he will make a statement. [84359]

Mr. Michael: Since taking up office, I have visited 11 primary schools and 6 secondary schools in Wales. These are:

Primary:

Evenlode County Primary, Penarth;
Grangetown Junior and Infant, Cardiff;
Cornist County Primary, Flint;
Saron County Primary, Ammanford;
Rumney Junior, Cardiff;
Emmanuel Primary, Rhyl;
Blackwood Infants, Blackwood;
Dinas Powys Primary, Vale of Glamorgan;
Narberth County Primary, Pembrokeshire;
Ysgol Tegryn Primary, Pembrokeshire;
Ysgol Gynradd Talybont Primary, Ceredigion;

Secondary:

Croesyceiliog Comprehensive, Cwmbran;
Alun High, Mold;
Ysgol Friars, Bangor.
Duffryn High, Newport;
Cathays High, Cardiff;
Bryn Gwyn Comprehensive, Llanelli.

Careers Service

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the future structure and objectives of the Careers Service in Wales. [85089]

Mr. Hain: The recently published Education and Training Action Group report proposes the establishment of an all-Wales all-age careers information, advice and guidance service by April 2001. Under this proposal, the existing Careers Service companies would be branded together as 'Careers Wales' and would take on responsibility for providing careers information and guidance to adults as well as to young people. The ETAG report also suggests that there may be advantage in reducing the number of Careers Service companies and re-aligning their boundaries to match those of the four economic regions of Wales. These proposals will be for the National Assembly of Wales to consider.

The objectives for the Careers Service in Wales were set out in 'Requirements and Guidance for Providers' (March 1995), a copy of which is available in the Library of the House. These objectives covered the initial five year contracts of the Careers Service companies in Wales. Objectives for future years will be for the National Assembly to determine.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Russian Government (Arms Supplies)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Russia about the supply of weapons to countries in the Middle East. [85333]

Ms Quin: During my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary's visit to Russia from 3–5 March, he discussed with Foreign Minister Ivanov the dangers of arms exports and assistance to countries of concern, including in the Middle East. Officials also discuss weapons exports with the Russians during regular contacts on export control and strategic stability issues.

Pakistan and India

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Governments of Pakistan and India concerning their signing of the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. [85331]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We continue to urge both Pakistan and India to sign and ratify the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister raised this issue with senior members of the Indian Government during his visit to India in March.

My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will have a further opportunity to discuss this when he meets the Pakistani Foreign Minister, Sartaj Aziz, in London on 2 June.

Crowd Recognition Devices

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received that devices, used to recognise individuals in crowds, have been used by states subject to export restrictions by the UK, where those devices have been exported by the UK. [85212]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave him on 21 April 1999, Official Report, column 566. The Government do not control the export of crowd recognition devices for identifying individuals at rallies or other such events. We are therefore unaware of any exports of such equipment from the UK.

Applications to export controlled goods and technology to all destinations are treated on a case by case basis against our national criteria and the EU Code of Conduct on Arms Exports. The list of countries subject to specific export restrictions, including arms embargoes, is contained in the Summary of Government Commitments regarding the application of Strategic Export Controls, copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Coroners Offices

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the coroners offices in England and Wales, together with their addresses and the local authority areas covered by each. [85476]

Mr. George Howarth: I shall write to my hon. Friend with details, but information about coroners and their offices is available from standard published police and court directories.

Mr. Eric Mann

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what communications there were between his Department and the Prison Service on 18 and 19 May concerning the proposed visit to Westminster by Mr. Eric Mann. [85456]

Mr. George Howarth [holding answer 25 May 1999]: Mr. Eric Mann is serving two consecutive six-month prison sentences (one for cultivating and possessing cannabis for personal use, the other for breach of a suspended prison sentence imposed for similar offences) at Prescoed prison.

The Prison Service communicated with the office of my right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams of Mostyn, the prisons and probation Minister, on 19 May. This was to alert the Minister to Mr. Mann's temporary release from prison and his intended participation in a press conference during his visit to Westminster.

Subsequently, the Prison Service made a decision to amend the conditions of Mr. Mann's release. Ministers took no part in any of the Prison Service's subsequent decision-making regarding Mr. Mann's licence. They were, however, advised of the decisions made.

Private Communications

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the effect of the Users Network/Service Providers Technical Requirements Resolution, and the Mutual Legal Assistance Convention, on access to private communications by (a) United Kingdom and (b) foreign surveillance bodies; and if prior request for a warrant will always apply; [85270]

(2) if he will estimate the cost of implementing the (a) User Network/Service Providers Technical Requirements Resolution and (b) Mutual Legal Assistance Convention; and what representations he has received on them. [85238]

Kate Hoey: The draft Convention on Mutual Legal Assistance Convention in Criminal Matters between the Member States of the European Union requires the requesting Member State to obtain authority for interception under its domestic law before making a request. The requested Member State is also required to obtain a warrant in accordance with national law where the subject of the request is on its territory. Any interception on the United Kingdom public telecommunications network will, therefore, continue to require a warrant issued by the Secretary of State in accordance with the Interception of Communications Act 1985. The cost of transmitting the intercept product in response to such a request falls to the requesting Member State.

The draft Convention also provides a legal basis for the "service provider" solution to satellite interception. It places an obligation on Member States not to prevent satellite telecommunication operators from making their facilities available for the purpose of complying with an interception warrant issued by another Member State, provided that the subject of the interception is on the territory of the Member State ordering the interception. It does not, however, impose any obligations or costs on satellite operators to make such facilities available.

The draft Convention also contains a number of non-interception provisions. These are not expected to have any significant financial implications for the United Kingdom. Indeed, simpler and quicker procedures for seeking and providing legal assistance under the draft Convention could result in some cost savings.

The draft Council Resolution on the lawful interception of communications in respect of new technologies is intended to supplement an existing 1995 Council Resolution. Its purpose is to make clear that law enforcement agencies have similar interception requirements for traditional telephony and new technologies such as the Internet and satellite communications.

The 1995 Council Resolution has not been incorporated in United Kingdom law, and, therefore, does not place obligations on telecommunications operators. Similarly, the draft Resolution is not legally binding and will not impose any obligations or costs on satellite operators or Internet Service Providers.

The draft Convention and draft Council Resolution remain under Parliamentary scrutiny in both Houses in accordance with the normal procedures. I am aware of representations from Justice and Liberty.

Home Detention Curfews

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers of 27 April 1999, Official Report, column 110 and 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 295, on home detention curfews, how many of the 14 curfewees referred to in the replies committed offences during their period of curfew (a) punishable with imprisonment and (b) punishable with four years or more imprisonment. [85247]

Mr. George Howarth: Of the 14 curfewees referred to, 13 were charged with offences which were imprisonable. It would not be appropriate to comment on the sentences likely to be imposed by the courts in any individual case. Within the broad statutory limits set by Parliament, sentences are a matter for the courts alone, taking into account all the aggravating and mitigating factors. However, in seven of the cases, the maximum penalty is more than four years' imprisonment.

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on Lancashire Police Force's progress in becoming year 2000 compliant. [85217]

Mr. Boateng: It is important that all police forces in England and Wales take every measure to ensure year 2000 compliance. The Home Office has commissioned an Independent Assessment of all forces, including Lancashire, by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary. The results of this survey will be published at the National Infrastructure Forum on 13 July.

Passports

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he is taking to reduce the current delays in processing passport applications at the UK Passport Agency. [85214]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The UK Passport Agency is taking a number of measures to ensure that its customers' needs are met. It is prioritising applications received in the post and made in person by customers' declared travel dates, and is meeting these dates for 99.99 per cent. of passports issued. The Agency is employing additional staffing resources, and optimising the efficiency of its examination processes consistent with the need to maintain the integrity and security of its issuing procedures. In order to clear quickly straightforward applications, certain existing passports are being extended for two years.

The Agency is currently experiencing very high seasonal demand for passports and its aim is to continue to meet customers' travel dates and to reduce its turnround time for straightforward applications to ten days by September.

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the current delays in processing passport applications by the UK Passport Agency. [85213]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The current delays in processing passport applications by the UK Passport Agency have arisen as a result of problems with the implementation in the Liverpool and Newport passport offices of new high technology driven passport issuing arrangements, together with high seasonal demand for passports. This has increased the processing times for straightforward non-urgent applications.

My assessment of the present operational situation is that it is extremely serious, particularly in the Liverpool passport office. I am receiving reports weekly from the Agency's Chief Executive on the operational position, and the measures being taken to improve it.

In order to satisfactorily meet its customers' needs, the Passport Agency is prioritising applications by customers' declared travel dates, and is meeting these dates for 99.99 per cent. of passports issued. The Agency's aim is to continue to meet customers' travel dates, and reduce its turnround times for straightforward passport applications to ten days by September.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to enhance the recruitment, retention and promotion of black and Asian police officers in the Metropolitan Police Force. [85334]

Kate Hoey: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Crausby) on 26 April 1999, Official Report, columns 17–18.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place in the Library copies of (a) the Statement of Service Requirements issued to the companies shortlisted to bid for the Immigration and Nationality Directorate's Casework Programme and (b) the casework business model produced by Sema following its 1994 study. [84974]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I will arrange for copies of both documents to be placed in the Library.

Passport Office, Liverpool

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the waiting time to receive a passport from the Liverpool passport office; and if he will make a statement. [85056]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Liverpool passport office's current processing time for non-urgent straightforward passport applications is 49 days. Urgent requests are being given priority and 99.99 per cent. of urgent dates are being met. In practice, 65 per cent. of the Liverpool office intake is processed in under 20 days.

Passport applications are taking longer than normal to process at the Liverpool office as a result of operational problems arising from the implementation of new high technology driven passport issuing arrangements. Also, Liverpool are dealing with very high seasonal demand for passports with intake of applications since April 1999 over 20 per cent. up on the same period in 1998.

The Agency's aim is to continue to meet customers travel dates, and to reduce its turnround time for straightforward applications to ten days by September.

Voluntary Sector Grants

Mr. Stephen Twigg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to publish the statistics on central Government department grants to the voluntary sector for the last two years. [85355]

Mr. Boateng: The collection of information relating to grants made by Government Departments to the voluntary sector over the period 1995–96 to 1997–98 is nearly complete. The figures will be published as soon as possible.

Prisons (Drug-free Units)

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug-free units there are in prisons in England and Wales; and if he will list the prisons in which they operate. [85443]

Mr. George Howarth: There are approximately 4,000 voluntary testing places covering one third of prisons in England and Wales. We have commissioned a survey of the current provision of drug-free units. I will write to the hon. Member with the results when they become available.

Prison Officers (Complaints)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many complaints of ill-treatment have been lodged against prison officers in each of the last five years. [84945]

Mr. George Howarth: I regret that information is not collected in this form.

Tote

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who owns the Tote. [85482]

Mr. George Howarth: The Horserace Totalisator Board is a non-departmental public body whose members are appointed by the Home Secretary. The Board is responsible for the assets owned by the Tote, but the Tote itself is owned by no one.

Mentally Disordered Offenders

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police forces in England and Wales which have produced guidance for their officers on dealing with mentally disordered offenders. [85389]

Mr. Boateng: National guidance on mentally disordered offenders was issued to the police and other agencies in the criminal justice system in September 1990 and a revision issued in April 1996. Chief officers were asked to ensure that all their officers were aware of the circular. Information is not held centrally on the number of chief officers who have issued other guidance on mentally disordered offenders to their officers, but some are known to have done so.

In respect of Cheshire Constabulary, detailed policy and guidance to operational officers on dealing with mentally disordered offenders was issued in 1994 and was last revised in 1998. All local policing divisions have nominated officers of inspector rank who are responsible for the implementation of those guidelines and for maintaining locally based protocols with other agencies.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what training is currently provided for police officers in England and Wales on dealing with mentally disordered offenders. [85390]

Mr. Boateng: As part of their probationer training, all recruits to the police service in England and Wales receive awareness training on persons suffering from mental disability. This training is supplemented by practical role play exercises which can be used to reinforce learning. In addition to the content of the former probationer training curriculum, forces may provide further training on the needs of mentally disordered persons, if there was a particular local need for this. Sergeants who act as custody officers receive further, more detailed, training in the Custody Officer Training Programme which, although designed centrally, is available for delivery by forces. A training video, produced by the National Schizophrenic Fellowship in collaboration with the Metropolitan Police and the Association of Chief Police Officers, and designed to help officers to identify and cope with mentally disordered persons, is also available to all police forces.

Mr. R. A. J. Coe

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects to make an offer under Option C of the Firearms Compensation Scheme to Mr. R. A. J. Coe (reference FCS 052048). [85477]

Mr. Boateng: A payment offer will be made this week.

Feltham Young Offenders Institution

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the taskforce chaired by the Director General of the Prison Service to report to him on the management of Her Majesty's Young Offenders Institution and Remand Centre, Feltham. [85485]

Mr. George Howarth: The Director General established a taskforce to take forward the recommendations made by the Chief Inspector of Prisons in his report on the inspection of Feltham. The Director General chairs a steering group to which the taskforce reports. The taskforce has submitted four reports to the steering group on various aspects of the Chief Inspector's report on Feltham. The steering group is expected to report to Ministers shortly.

CABINET OFFICE

Biotechnology

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will place in the Library a copy of the Government's central co-ordinated rebuttals strategy for use following his oral statement of 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 1371–73, on biotechnology. [85491]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government's strategy is to encourage open, rational and well informed debate. This is the best way to safeguard the public interest. On 21 May I made a series of announcements including the publication of a review of the regulatory framework, and a report from the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser on public health implications of genetically modified foods. These will provide the foundation for such a debate.

HEALTH

Cancer

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will estimate the cost of creating, reviewing and maintaining an internet directory of cancer care services; and if he will make a statement; [84240]

(2) what plans he has to introduce and maintain an internet directory of cancer care services and information; and if he will make a statement. [84239]

Mr. Hutton: The Government's Information Management and Technology strategy for the National Health Service "Information for Health", published in September last year, called for (amongst other things) the creation of a National Electronic Library for Health (NELH) of accredited healthcare information that would be made available to patients, the public and healthcare professionals.

One element of the NELH is the provision of information about cancer services. The cost of providing these is estimated at £75,000. The NELH project will be working with voluntary organisations with patient representative groups to promote and make available as widely as possible reliable and relevant information on a number of health topics, including cancer.

The NHS Information Authority is currently working in collaboration with the NHS Executive and the Centre for Health Information Quality to identify the costs and options for creating, reviewing and maintaining online healthcare information services. A business plan will be put to the NHS Information Authority with the objective of creating the NELH by the end of the year.

Myalgic Encephalomyelitis

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to commission research into the causes of ME and the development of appropriate diagnostic procedure. [84574]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 18 May 1999]: The Chronic Fatigue Syndrome/Myalgic Encephalomyelitis Working Group which has been convened by the Chief Medical Officer will specifically address the question of diagnostic criteria and will also make recommendations about the need to identify and commission further research into CFS/ME. The working group is already putting together a submission for a systematic literature review which will look at which treatments are effective and sub-groups. This will be considered by the Department's Policy Research Programme.

Pollution

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the studies his Department has funded since January 1998 to investigate the effects of pollution on health, with particular reference to pollution from (a) landfill sites, (b) factories and (c) exposure to chemicals in the home; and when these studies were or will be published. [84897]

Ms Jowell: This Department has carried out and commissioned a number of studies on the health effects of pollution since January 1998, many jointly with other Government Departments. The details of these studies have been placed in the Library. It is not the Department's policy to publish the findings separately, though researchers are encouraged to publish their findings in peer—reviewed journals and in the scientific press, on completion of the studies. The vast majority are disseminated in this way.

This Department, together with the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has co-funded an indoor air pollution research programme as well as research into the non-auditory health effects of noise and the health effects of chemicals in the environment.

Together with the DETR and the Health and Safety Executive (HSE), it has cofunded a programme of work on trends in male reproductive health and the possible influences of occupational and environmental chemicals. Also, together with DETR, HSE, the Scottish Office, the Welsh Office and the Department of Health and Social Services in Northern Ireland the Department contributes towards a contract with the Imperial College of Science, Technology and Medicine to form the Small Area Health Statistics Unit (SAHSU). SAHSU has also carried out research on the effects of air pollution on health, since January 1998.

The Department also manages the National Health Service research and development levy which is used to support research and development of relevance to the National Health Service in hospitals, general practice and other health care settings, and to fund the NHS research and development programme. In addition, the Medical Research Council—which receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—funds medical research as part of the Government's funding of the science and engineering base.

In addition to those projects listed, the Department expects to issue a major call for proposals on the effects of air pollution on health over the summer and a call for further research on the effects on health of landfill sites.

HIV/AIDS

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what consultation the regional NHS executive offices will carry out before distributing HIV/AIDS treatment and care money recently allocated to them with (a) people with HIV and (b) providers of HIV services; [85065]

(2) by what date regional NHS executive offices will distribute the £6.2 million HIV/AIDS treatment and care money recently allocated to them. [85064]

Ms Jowell: The guidance issued to regional offices for the distribution of the additional £6.2 million for HIV/AIDS treatment and care made it clear that the funds were to be used to assist with the extra costs of combination therapies for those with a clinical need. The guidance also recommended that ROs consult with others, including their constituent health authorities and their regional Specialised Commissioning Group where appropriate, before distributing the funds.

Regional Offices may also consult other groups or individuals before making their final decision. The guidance to Regional Offices does not specify a date by which the allocations totalling £6.2 million are to be made. Most Regional Offices are currently in the process of deciding, in consultation with others, the basis for the distribution to health authorities.

The forthcoming guidance to the National Health Service on the use to be made of this sum, and the balance of the HIV/AIDS treatment and care and HIV prevention funds, includes the requirement for Regional Offices to submit a separate report to Ministers at the year end on the use of the £6.2 million allocated to them.

Oral Contraceptives

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths of women have been caused by use of a combined oral contraceptive in the last 10 years; and in each case what was (a) the reaction that caused the death and (b) the product. [85038]

Mr. Denham: In the last ten years, between 20 May 1989 and 20 May 1999, there have been a total of 2,408 adverse reactions suspected to be associated with the combined oral contraceptive pill received through the United Kingdom's Yellow Card adverse drug reaction reporting scheme. A fatal outcome was reported in 104 of these reports as listed in the table. The 104 deaths reported over ten years need to be taken in the context of around three million women taking the Pill each year in the UK.

Not all deaths suspected to be related to the use of the combined oral contraceptives are reported to the Medicine Control Agency/Committee on Safety of Medicines via the Yellow Card spontaneous adverse drug reaction scheme; we therefore cannot provide the total number of deaths. It is also essential to bear in mind that a report of a suspected adverse drug reaction does not mean that the reaction/death was caused by the medicine concerned. Many other factors are likely to contribute.

The Pill is highly effective in preventing pregnancy. The risks of fatal adverse reactions associated with combined oral contraceptive Pills are very small; and are much smaller than those associated with pregnancy.

The product information on the Pill provided for doctors, as well as the patient information leaflet in each pack, give advice on the contraindications, side effects, warnings and precautions for use of the Pill which should be strictly adhered to.

Suspected reaction	Number of cases with a fatal outcome
Cardiac failure	1
Sudden death unexplained	1
Left ventricular failure	1
Myocardial infarction	5
Pulmonary embolism	84
Subarachnoidhemorrhage	1
Cerebral vein thrombosis	1
Brain stem infarction	1
Cerebral infarction	2
Cerebrovascular accident	1
Cerebral thrombosis	2
Chest pain	1
Pelvic venous thrombosis	1
Respiratory arrest	1
Ovarian Carcinoma	1

Products associated with the suspected adverse reactions include: Binovum; Brevinor; Cilest; Conova; Diane; Dianette; Eugynon; Femodene; Femodene ED; Gynovlar; Loestrin; Logynon; Logynon ED; Marvelon; Mercilon; Microgynon; Minilyn; Minulet; Norimin; Ovran; Ovran 30; Ovranette; Ovulen; Ovysmen; Synphase; Tri-minulet; Trinordiol and Trinovum.

Infertility Treatment

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people used infertility services in National Health Service hospitals in each of the last three years. [85084]

Mr. Hutton: Information about hospital episodes for patients receiving in-patient treatment for infertility for the financial years 1995–96, 1996–97 and 1997–98 is shown in the table. During a course of treatment for infertility an individual may have more than one hospital episode. Treatment under other operation codes may be related to infertility. However, the codes given correspond as closely as possible to the information requested.

Operation code	1995–96	1996–97[1]	1997–98[1]
Q13—Introduction of gamete into uterine cavity	1,996	1,593	1,716
Q38.3—Endoscopic injection into fallopian tube	227	186	116
Q41—Other operations on fallopian tube	11,138	8,327	7,558
Q56.1—Fertility investigation of female (not elsewhere classified)	4	8	4
Total	13,365	10,114	9,394

[1] Figures for 1996–97 and 1997–98 are provisional, no adjustments have been made for shortfalls in data, (ie the data are ungrossed)
Source:
Hospital Episode Statistics
Department of Health: Statistics Division SD2B

Child Protection

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions his Department has had with the Council of Europe on joint policies for the welfare and protectio of children. [85088]

Mr. Hutton: Officials from the Department contribute to the work of the Council of Europe on issues related to the welfare and protection of children, through the formal Committee structure of the Council of Europe. I am due to participate in a Council of Europe Conference of Ministers responsible for Family Affairs in Stockholm on 14–16 June, where the theme will be "Towards a Child-Friendly Society". In preparation for the Conference the United Kingdom has provided a National Report on "child-friendly" initiatives.

Alzheimer's Disease

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the incidence of Alzheimer's disease in England and Wales. [85215]

Mr. Hutton: There are no data specifically relating to the incidence of Alzheimer's disease in England and Wales. The overall incidence rate after the age of 65 across Western Europe is 18.3 cases per 1,000 person years.

It is estimated that approximately 600,000 people over 65, or 5 per cent. of that population in the United Kingdom, suffer from dementia. Alzheimer's Disease accounts for just over half.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many Enforcement Officers the Medicines Control Agency currently employs; what changes there have been in this number in the past year; and what plans there are to increase this number. [85222]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 24 May 1999]: There are 23 Enforcement Officers working within the Enforcement Group who deal solely with criminal investigations into allegations that medicines legislation has been breached.

There has been an increase of approximately 12 per cent. in the number of Enforcement Officers in the last 12 months, reflecting an increase in the work load. There are no plans further to increase the number at present but this area of the Agency's responsibilities is kept under careful review so as to ensure the protection of public health can be maintained.

National Institute for Clinical Excellence

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to publish his response to the results of his Department's consultation on the work of the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. [85444]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 May 1999]: About 160 replies were received to the consultation on "Faster access to modern treatment", a discussion paper setting out detailed proposals for appraisal by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence. Officials are following up a number of detailed points with the organisations concerned. Final decisions will be announced in due course.

Listening to Women

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the cost has been of the Listening to Women roadshows; and how many women have attended each roadshow to date. [85377]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 25 May 1999]: To date, nine Listening to Women roadshow events have taken place, attended by 1,125 women. Still to take place are the Leeds, Nottingham and Welsh events. The breakdown is:

	Attended by
Manchester	83
London	74
Norwich	67
Birmingham	58
Bristol	87
Newcastle	89
Reading	59
Glasgow	c. 500
Belfast	108
Total cost	[1]£87,918.54

[1] Including Value Added Tax

Abortion

Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidelines have been issued to GPs on the action they should take regarding their patients if they hold a conscientious objection to abortion; [84991]

(2) what plans he has, following Mr. Justice Alliott's judgment in the High Court case of Dr. Sheila Matthews, to issue new advice or guidelines to GPs about referring patients to another doctor if they have a conscientious objection to abortion. [84992]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 25 May 1999]: In 1991 the General Medical Services Council of the British Medical Association issued guidance to general practitioners through Local Medical Committees, reminding them of their obligations under their terms of service. That guidance remains extant and GPs who have a conscientious objection to abortion should refer the patient to another doctor as soon as possible.

Regional directors of the National Health Service Executive have been asked to ensure that Primary Care Groups have arrangements in place so that women considering an abortion are able to have easy access to a GP who can make a referral where appropriate.

Vaccines (Bovine Material)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the evidence given by Mrs. Edwina Currie to the BSE Inquiry in respect of the use of vaccines which in their early stage of manufacture had used bovine material prohibited for use in human food (a) in general and (b) in relation to the level of risk relating to injecting infected material. [85493]

Ms Jowell: It is for the independent bovine spongiform encephalopathy Inquiry to assess the evidence given to it, not my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The Government will respond to the Inquiry's report after it is published.

Long-term Care

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proportion of (a) those people who have been in long-term care or nursing homes for four years or more and (b) all people in long-term care or nursing homes continue to pay part or all of their fees; [85226]

(2) if he will estimate the average cost of four years' care in a nursing home. [85228]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 24 May 1999, Official Report, column 20.

High Security Hospitals (Staffing)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many posts are currently vacant in each high-security hospital for (a) nurses, (b) nursing assistants, (c) occupational therapists, (d) forensic psychologists and (e) psychiatrists. [85388]

Mr. Hutton: The number of posts currently vacant for nurses, nursing assistants, occupational therapists, forensic psychologists and psychiatrists at each of the three high security hospitals are set out in the tables.

	Posts currently vacant
Rampton Hospital
Qualified nurses	20
Nursing Assistants	0
Occupational therapists	2
Forensic psychologists	3
Psychiatrists	2
Broadmoor Hospital
Qualified nurses	36 (20 qualified nurses in the appointment process)
Nursing assistants	24 (15 unqualified nurses in the selection process)
Occupational therapists	3 (only 8 posts in the whole establishment and 3 staff on full-time secondment training at present)
Forensic psychologists	0
Psychiatrists	3
Ashworth Hospital
Qualified nurses	34
Nursing assistants	24 (current recruitment drive will enable these vacancies to be filled within the next 2–3 weeks)
Occupational therapists	3
Forensic psychologists	1
Psychiatrists
Consultant posts	7
Staff grade	1

Interstitial Cystitis

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what publicly funded research is being carried out into the causes of interstitial cystitis; and if he will make a statement. [84970]

Mr. Hutton: A body of international research evidence is published in the world-wide literature and details of work supported by the Department are on the National Research Register in the Library and on the internet at http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm. In addition, the Medical Research Council is funding basic research, including the study of molecules and cells, genetics, infections and immunity, which will inform future research in this area.

In the National Health Service research and development programme, priorities take account of widespread consultation with those using, delivering and managing services, within a framework overseen by the Central Research and Development Committee for the NHS.

We have asked those who manage the priority setting process to ensure that interstitial cystitis is included in consideration of future research priorities.

NHS Trust Mergers

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those NHS trusts that have (a) been created, (b) merged and (c) been dissolved since 1 April 1998. [85147]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is contained in the table. All of these mergers took effect from 1 April 1999.

Region	Trusts established or amended	Merged/dissolved or absorbed trusts
Eastern	Local Health Partnerships NHS Trust	Allington NHS Trust, Mid Anglia Community Health NHS Trust and East Suffolk Community NHS Trust (3 into 1)
Eastern	Bedfordshire and Luton Community NHS Trust	Bedford and Shire Health NHS Trust and South Bedfordshire NHS Trust (2 into 1)
London	Ealing Hammersmith and Fulham Mental Health NHS Trust and Brent Kensington Chelsea and Westminster Mental Health NHS Trust	West London NHS Trust, North West London Mental Health NHS Trust, and Riverside Mental Health NHS Trust (3 into 2)
London	North West London Hospitals NHS Trust	Northwick Park and St. Marks NHS Trust and Central Middlesex Hospital NHS Trust (2 into 1)
London	Parkside Health NHS Trust	Royal London Homoeopathic NHS Trust and Parkside Health NHS Trust (2 into 1—Absorption)
London	The Barnet and Chase Farm Hospitals NHS Trust	Wellhouse NHS Trust and Chase Farm Hospital NHS Trust (2 into 1)
London	South West London Community NHS Trust	Merton and Sutton Community NHS Trust, Wandsworth Community Healthcare NHS Trust and Richmond Twickenham and Roehampton Community Services NHS Trust (3 into 1)
London	South London and Maudsley Mental Health NHS Trust and Community Health South London NHS Trust	Optimum Mental Health NHS Trust, Bethlem and Maudsley Mental Health NHS Trust, Lambeth Healthcare NHS Trust and Lewisham and Guy's Mental Health NHS Trust (4 into 2)
London	The Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust	St. Helier NHS Trust and Epsom NHS Trust (2 into 1)
North West	North Sefton and West Lancashire Community NHS Trust and Southport and Ormskirk Hospital NHS Trust	Southport and Formby Health Services NHS Trust, Southport and Formby Community NHS Trust and West Lancashire NHS Trust (3 into 2)
Northern and Yorkshire	North East Ambulance Service NHS Trust	Northumbria Ambulance Service NHS Trust and Durham County Ambulance Service NHS Trust (2 into 1)
Northern and Yorkshire	Tees, East and North Yorkshire Ambulance Service NHS Trust	Cleveland Ambulance Service NHS Trust, Humberside Ambulance Service NHS Trust and North Yorkshire Ambulance Service NHS Trust (3 into 1)
Northern and Yorkshire	North Tees and Hartlepool NHS Trust and Tees and North East Yorkshire NHS Trust	Hartlepool and East Durham NHS Trust, South Tees Community and Mental Health NHS Trust and North Tees Health NHS Trust (3 into 2)
South East	Surrey Oaklands NHS Trust	Life Care NHS Trust and Surrey Oaklands NHS Trust (2 into 1—Absorption)
South East	East Kent Hospitals NHS Trust	South Kent Hospitals NHS Trust, Kent and Canterbury Hospitals NHS Trust and Thanet Healthcare NHS Trust (3 into 1)
South West	North Bristol NHS Trust	Frenchay Healthcare NHS Trust and Southmead Health Services NHS Trust (2 into 1)
South West	Cornwall Healthcare NHS Trust	Cornwall Healthcare NHS Trust and Trecare NHS Trust (2 into 1)
Trent	Leicestershire and Rutland Healthcare NHS Trust	Fosse Health NHS Trust and Leicestershire Mental Health Services NHS Trust (2 into 1)
Trent	Central Sheffield University Hospitals NHS Trust	Central Sheffield University Hospitals NHS Trust and Weston Park Hospital NHS Trust (2 into 1)
Trent	South Lincolnshire Healthcare NHS Trust	Mulberry NHS Trust and South Lincolnshire NHS Trust (2 into 1)
Trent	East Midlands Ambulance Service NHS Trust	Derbyshire Ambulance Services NHS Trust, Nottinghamshire Ambulance Services NHS Trust and Leicestershire Ambulance Services NHS Trust (3 into 1)
Trent	Lincoln District Healthcare NHS Trust	West Lindsey NHS Trust and Lincoln and District Healthcare NHS Trust (2 into 1—Absorption). Lincoln and Louth Hospitals NHS Trust has taken on some of the service provision of West Lindsey but are not part of the merger. All staff and assets have transferred to Lincoln District Healthcare

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many acres of land in the UK were cultivated as trial sites of genetically modified crops in each of the last five years; and how many acres of land will be cultivated as trial sites of GM crops in 1999. [83283]

Mr. Meacher: In 1998, the area cultivated as trial sites of genetically modified crops was approximately 300 hectares. In the current year, the total figure, including the farmscale evaluations, is expected to be about the same. These are approximate figures because consents for releases are granted on the basis of a maximum area that can be grown and companies do not necessarily sow all the area for which they have approval. Figures for earlier years are not available, but were no more than the 1998 levels.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the research commissioned by his Department into the cross-contamination between genetically modified crops and crops that are not genetically modified. [84535]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 17 May 1999]: Yes, all reports from research commissioned by the Government into the cross-pollination of genetically modified (GM) crops and non-GM crops are published. Gene transfer in oilseed rape was considered in my Department's Research Report No.12, Investigation of Feral Oilseed Rape Populations, a copy of which is in the Library. Ongoing research commissioned by MAFF on pollen transfer will be published when the work is complete.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on differences in his policy in respect of GM crops on (a) limited commercial planting and (b) farm-scale trials. [85363]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 25 May 1999]: There are no differences in policy, the growing of all GM crops must be covered by a valid consent issued in accordance with Directive 90/220/EEC on the deliberate release into the environment of genetically modified organisms. Before a consent is granted the applicant must have carried out an assessment of the risks posed to the environment and demonstrated compliance with all aspects of the directive. Those crops planted as part of the farmscale evaluations will in addition be studied for ecological effects in comparison with equivalent non-GM crops.

EC Directive 90/220/EEC

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to propose to his European partners amendments to EC Directive 90/220/EEC. [83261]

Mr. Meacher: The Government are currently negotiating the amendment of Directive 90/220/EEC. The European Commission published its proposal for the amendment of the Directive in February 1998. An orientation debate was held in June 1998 under the United Kingdom Presidency, and detailed negotiations took place in the Council Working Group under the Austrian Presidency in the second half of last year. At the December Environment Council, Ministers agreed that while substantial progress had been made, further detailed negotiations were required to resolve many of the outstanding issues. The German Presidency has indicated it will seek to reach a common position at the June Environment Council.

The position of the Government with regard to the original Commission proposal has been laid out in Explanatory Memorandum 6378/98, submitted to the House of Commons on 23 March 1998. In response to a request from the House of Commons European Scrutiny Committee, I wrote to the committee on 27 November with details of the Government's priorities in the negotiations. A Scrutiny debate was held in the House of Commons European Standing Committee A on 24 March 1999, and the Government submitted a further Explanatory Memorandum (7138/99) on 30 April following the publication of the Commission's amended proposal taking account of the publication of the European Parliament's Opinion.

The priorities of the Government are to ensure that the revised Directive meets growing public concerns regarding ethical, environmental and social issues and achieves a more transparent regulatory regime. In addition, the Government support many of the amendments proposed by the European Parliament and incorporated into the amended Commission Proposal. In particular, the Government welcome changes to clarify the requirements for the environmental risk assessment, the stronger requirements for public information and consultation, and a new Article on consultation of the Commission's ethical committee.

All of these documents are available in the House of Commons Library.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the cost per heavy goods vehicle of the fitting of an exhaust system incorporating a particulates trap in order to attract the reduction in vehicle excise duty announced in his Budget statement. [83824]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Government's assessment of the current cost of retrofitting a particulate trap to a heavy goods vehicle is between £3,000 and £4,500, compared with the maximum Vehicle Excise Duty reduction of £1,000 when vehicles meet the emissions standards required to receive a Reduced Pollution Certificate. The cost for smaller vehicles is at the lower end of this scale, increasing to the upper figure for the largest and most powerful lorries. It is expected that the cost of emissions reduction technologies will fall as the market for them grows, leading to competition between manufacturers and economies of scale in the production of devices.

Drinking and Driving Laws

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what conclusions

he has reached from his analysis of the responses received to the consultation about possible changes to the law relating to drinking and driving. [84369]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are still considering how best to take forward the matters raised in the consultation document in the light of the responses received and in the broader context of road safety policy. Our conclusions will be incorporated within the road safety strategy which we will publish later this year.

Non-genetically Modified Soya Beans

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what reports his Department has received concerning the efforts of the state Government of Rio Grande do Sul to guarantee non-genetically modified soya bean production throughout their state; and what plans his Department has to give assistance. [84500]

Mr. Meacher: I met the Secretary of Agriculture for the Brazilian State of Rio Grande do Sul on 13 May at his request to hear about the ability of his State to supply non genetically modified soya to UK customers. We shall certainly take this information into account in sourcing for the future and I have agreed to a further exchange of information at official level.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list (a) the names and current employers of the board members of each regional development agency and (b) the names and previous employers of the senior management team appointed by each regional development agency. [84714]

Mr. Meale: The information requested has been placed in the Library of the House.

Telecommunications Masts

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what assessment he has made of the official guidance on the minimum distance between mobile telephone and other communication masts and (a) residential property, (b) schools and colleges and (c) places of business in (i) other EU countries, (ii) Scandinavian countries, (iii) the United States of America and (iv) Canada; [84953]

(2) what discussions he has had with representatives of professional medical opinion on the guidance for the minimum distances between mobile telephone and other communication masts and occupied properties; and if he will make a statement. [84954]

Mr. Raynsford: The Government's statutory advisers on radiological protection matters are the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB). The Board's advice to Government is based upon a continuing review and assessment of published scientific studies covering the fields of biology and medicine, epidemiology and dosimetry.

The NRPB have issued guidelines on limiting exposure to electromagnetic fields (EMFs). This guidance specifies restrictions on the exposure of people, rather than safe distances from equipment, and is related to established health effects of EMFs, such as effects on perception, central nervous system effects and the heating of tissues.

The NRPB advise that radio waves at ground level and in regions accessible to the public tend to be many times below guideline levels and should present no health risk. Telecommunications operators have a duty under the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 and the Management of the Health and Safety at Work Regulations 1992 to ensure that their work activities, which would include the operation of their apparatus, do not present a risk to employees and the general public. The practical effect of the combination of the NRPB guidelines and health and safety legislation should be that people are kept at a safe distance from sources of EMFs.

The NRPB also advise that there is no convincing evidence of a causal effect between exposure to EMFs and other health effects, such as cancer, and that published human health studies relating to these do not provide a basis for advice on setting exposure standards.

The Government continue to monitor international work on the possible health effects of EMFs and to gather information on worldwide practice on the limitation of public exposure to EMFs. The UK has also participated actively in negotiations of the proposed EU Recommendation on this subject and in the World Health Organisation's International EMF Project. We shall continue to take international practice and research results into consideration in taking forward policy on this matter, including in developing guidance on land use planning and electromagnetic fields.

Abandoned Vehicles

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what powers are available to (a) the DVLA and (b) local authorities to remove abandoned vehicles on the public highway; [84980]

(2) what plans he has to review the powers and procedures exercised by (a) the DVLA and (b) local authorities for the removal of abandoned vehicles from the public highway; [84981]

(3) what estimate he has made of the cost of the removal of abandoned vehicles from the public highway by (i) local authorities and (ii) the DVLA in each year since 1995–96; [84978]

(4) what procedures exist within his Department for the monitoring of the number of abandoned vehicles on the public highway collected by (i) local authorities and (ii) the DVLA. [84979]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The DVLA has no powers to remove abandoned vehicles on the public highway. Local authorities have powers, under the Refuse Disposal (Amenity) Act 1978 and the Road Traffic Regulation Act 1984, to remove such vehicles. The Removal and Disposal of Vehicles Regulations 1986 prescribes the procedure that should be followed by local authorities. There are no plans at present to review these powers and procedures.

There is no requirement for local authorities to provide information on the costs of removing vehicles. My Department does not monitor the number of abandoned vehicles collected from the public highway by local authorities.

Carlisle Northern Relief Road

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assistance the Government are giving toward the Carlisle Northern Relief Road. [85042]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Should Cumbria City Council bid for support for this scheme as part of their Local Transport Plan, it would be considered along with other major schemes across the country.

Carbon Dioxide Emissions

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the level of carbon dioxide emissions in the United Kingdom in (a) 1997 and (b) 1998. [85094]

Mr. Meale: Emissions of CO_2 in the UK are estimated to have been 155 million tonnes of carbon in 1997. 1998 emissions are provisionally estimated to have been about 156 million tonnes of carbon, about 1 per cent. higher than in 1997, and 7 per cent. lower than in 1990. The increase between 1997 and 1998 was associated with delays in commissioning and starting up combined cycle gas turbine power stations, planned maintenance at nuclear plant and some reduction in imported electricity.

Petrol

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions whether the packaging of each available anti-wear additive for petrol will list the functional chemical component and the concentration of its active element when added to unleaded petrol in the recommended amount. [85251]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Information to be provided on additive packaging would be a matter for individual suppliers.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 13 April 1999, Official Report, columns 71–72, on British Standards, if he will make a statement on (a) the early problems in Sweden associated with the lead replacement petrol, (b) the reasons for sodium being dropped from the draft standard for lead replacement petrol issued in 1998 and (c) what problems were identified in Sweden with the use of sodium in lead replacement petrol and (d) whether the problems solely related to the use of sodium. [85248]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Following the introduction in Sweden of Lead Replacement Petrol (LRP) in 1994, an increase in engine component wear was identified by engine repairers. The problems focused upon engine valves and on turbochargers and appeared to have been caused by a phenomenon known as hot corrosion reportedly due to the use of sodium in the fuel. With the emergence of this information, LRP in Sweden was changed to a potassium-based product and once the changeover was complete the incidence of engine damage dropped. During the changeover of the fuels, concern over the use of both sodium and potassium existed, but I understand this mostly disappeared as the use of potassium increased. The British Standards Institution has adopted a precautionary approach by excluding sodium from its draft standard for lead replacement petrol.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions whether sodium-based additives to petrol are being marketed in the United Kingdom to the public. [85249]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are not aware that any petrol supplier is marketing petrol which includes a sodium-based additive. The Federation of British Historic Vehicles has tested and endorsed one self-dosing additive containing sodium.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the information he has published in the last 12 months on the use of sodium-based additives in petrol. [85250]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Department has published two advisory leaflets to help motorists who may have concerns about the withdrawal of leaded petrol. These include general information on additives as an alternative to lead, whether already included in lead replacement petrol or provided separately for motorist's use, but do not refer to particular types of additives. Copies of the leaflets have been placed in the House Library and may be viewed on the Internet at www.environment.detr.gov.uk/unleaded/index.htm.

Passenger Transit System

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total cost of the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station project between commissioning initial feasibility studies and abandonment of operation; and if he will make a statement. [85069]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This is a commercial matter for Birmingham International Airport Ltd.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions who owns the surviving overhead structure of the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station; and if he will make a statement. [85073]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd that it owns the surviving overhead structure.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station was formally commissioned after trials to the intended operator; who the intended operator was; and if he will make a statement. [85067]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd that the MAGLEV system was formally commissioned on 16 August 1984; and that the intended operator was the airport undertaking as part of the former West Midlands County Council.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to revive the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station; and if he will make a statement. [85071]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Birmingham International Airport Ltd. is committed to reinstating a link between the terminal building and the railway station. It is also subject to a planning obligation in a section 106 planning agreement between the airport company and Solihull Metropolitan Borough Council with reference to the outline planning approval for the extension of the passenger terminal facilities and related infrastructure granted in July 1996. The airport company is considering what form the link should take and how it can best be integrated with the multi-modal interchange which is being planned for the airport.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in whom the residual rights and liabilities of the principal design and construction contracts of the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station are now vested; and if he will make a statement. [85075]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd. that in the agreement between the former West Midlands County Council and the individual joint venture companies, the parties agreed that patents, registered designs or copyrights in the case of mechanical and electrical aspects of the transportation system were to be the property of the individual company undertaking that particular aspect of the work, and that in the case of civil engineering and building aspects of the system intellectual property rights were to be the property of the Council. The airport company is a successor in title to the former Council.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions who commissioned the initial feasibility studies for the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station and when; who let the contracts for its construction, with whom and when; and if he will make a statement. [85066]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd. that the initial feasibility studies for the MAGLEV system were commissioned in 1979 by the former West Midlands County Council, which owned Birmingham Airport at that time; and that the contracts for its construction were let by the Council in 1981, as part of the airport's development, with the People Mover Group (GEC, Balfour-Beatty, Brush Electrical Machines and Metropolitan-Cammell) and John Laing.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what was the total of passenger fares collected in the period of fare-paying operation of the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station. [85070]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd. that the MAGLEV system always formed part of the airport's essential infrastructure as the link to the railway station and that no fares were ever charged for its use.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has become of the passenger cars for the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station and who owns (a) them and (b) the proceeds of their sale; and if he will make a statement. [85074]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd. that it still owns the passenger cars and that they remain stored at the airport.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when and by whom it was ultimately decided to abandon operation of the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station; and if he will make a statement. [85068]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I understand from Birmingham International Airport Ltd. that it took and implemented this decision in July 1995.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will estimate the cost of making the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system linking Birmingham International Airport and Birmingham International Railway Station operational; and if he will make a statement. [85072]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The cost of reinstating a link between the airport and the railway station is a matter for Birmingham International Airport Ltd. It will depend in part on how it is decided to integrate it with the multi-modal interchange which is being planned for the airport. But I understand from the airport company that a study in 1995 concluded that it was not technically feasible to make the MAGLEV system itself operational.

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the occasions on which actions for damages were assessed as to liability against a party considered to have been responsible for the failure of the MAGLEV overhead passenger transit system at Birmingham International Airport; and if he will make a statement. [85277]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This is a matter for Birmingham International Airport Ltd.

Asbestos Imports

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to ban the import of all forms of asbestos; if he has received the Health and Safety Commission's recommendation on this matter; and if he will make a statement. [85473]

Mr. Meacher: The policy on asbestos is decided and is final. The import of blue and brown asbestos is already banned. Earlier this month, a draft European Directive was voted on which would tighten the restrictions on imports of white asbestos. An overwhelming majority voted in favour. I am pleased to say that the Health and Safety Commission, at its meeting yesterday, approved draft Regulations to implement a ban, and I look forward to receiving its advice.

Unfortunately, there are legal problems in formally making the Regulations before the European Commission ratifies the vote of the technical committee. The Government are now lobbying the European Commission to adopt the directive as a matter of urgency.

Memorials

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his Department's discussions with the Confederation of Burial Authorities on the sale of memorials to the public. [85526]

Mr. Meale: My Department is currently preparing a paper for discussion with the Confederation of Burial Authorities, the National Association of Memorial Masons, and other representative bodies, both public and private sector, on the existing legal basis under which local authorities charge for the provision of memorials, and the Confederation's proposals for clarifying this.

Council Housing

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on his policy on the building of new council housing in England and Wales. [85519]

Mr. Raynsford: The Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions is responsible for housing policy in England. His statement on "Housing and Regeneration Policy" on 22 July 1998 set out our policy. The need for new social housing in a local authority's area is a matter for that local authority to establish in its local housing strategy, as part of the Housing Investment Programme process. Most new social housing is provided by Registered Social Landlords supported by the Housing Corporation, either through its Approved Development Programme or through Local Authority Social Housing Grant, in areas where such developments are seen as a priority in local housing strategies.

Freight Transport

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the tonnage of freight which has transferred from road to rail in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [85520]

Mrs. Liddell: My Department has not made estimates of this type. However, the Department does provide freight grants to companies to assist with the capital costs and track access charges associated with transferring freight from road to rail and inland waterway. Since May 1997, the Department's Freight Grants Unit has awarded grants to assist in the transfer of an estimated 15,918,610 tonnes of freight.

Asbestos

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what surveys his Department has commissioned on the amount of asbestos which is present in buildings which are still in use; and if he will make a statement. [85518]

Mr. Raynsford: No such surveys have been commissioned by the Department in the last 10 years.

At the request of the Department, the Medical Research Council, Institute for Environment and Health, carried out a review of the sources and uses of asbestos in buildings, the levels of exposure in the non-workplace environment and the health effects of such exposures. The report of this work entitled "Fibrous materials in the environment" was published by the Institute on 18 November 1997. A copy is in the Library.

Local Authority Properties

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what estimate he has made of the number of local authority properties which are regarded as unfit for human habitation. [85517]

Mr. Raynsford: Local authorities are asked to provide information on all dwellings in their area which are unfit (i.e. because they fail to meet the fitness criteria in Section 83 of Schedule 9 of the Local Government and Housing Act 1989) in their annual Housing Investment Programme returns. Separate figures are requested for local authority, registered social landlord, other public sector and private sector dwellings. The figures provided are local authorities' own estimates and are not necessarily compiled on a consistent basis.

The latest available figures are for 1 April 1998 and are given in the 1998 "HIP OI All Items Print", a copy of which is in the Library. The print includes county totals where estimates have been provided by all the authorities in the county.

Belmont Stables, Mill Hill

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress of the planning appeal in relation to Belmont Stables, Mill Hill. [85619]

Mr. Caborn: The Inspector will submit his report to the Planning Inspectorate very shortly.

RAF East Camp Site, Colindale

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress in respect of the planning decision in relation to the RAF East Camp Site, Colindale. [85618]

Mr. Caborn: We will issue a decision in due course.

Civil Aviation

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from UK airlines concerning the future of US/UK civil aviation agreements. [85479]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We are in frequent communication with UK airlines, large and small.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is the Government's policy to retain responsibility for bilateral negotiations with third countries on civil aviation agreements. [85480]

Ms Glenda Jackson: We would consider transferring bilateral responsibilities to a third party only if we judged that to be in the wider interests of UK aviation.

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent discussions his Department has held with their US counterparts concerning the future of US/UK civil aviation agreements; who was present at those meetings; what were the agenda and the conclusions; and if he will make a statement. [85478]

Ms Glenda Jackson: At a meeting in Washington on 20 April, the Deputy Prime Minister and US Transportation Secretary Slater agreed that informal talks between UK and US officials about air services arrangements should take place in May. This was confirmed by my noble Friend Lord Whitty in the House of Lords on 28 April 1999, Official Report, House of Lords, columns 301–03, and the two teams of officials met on 18–20 May in London. The UK team comprised three DETR officials, two FCO officials and a representative from the Civil Aviation Authority; the US team comprised three State Department officials and three Department of Transportation officials. The discussions were broad and preliminary, with the emphasis on a phased approach to air services liberalisation.

Heathrow

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the reasons for the delay in the delivery of the recommendation from the Inspector on the Heathrow fifth terminal. [85513]

Mr. Caborn: The inquiry closed on 17 March 1999 and the Inspector told the inquiry that he expects to take up to two years to produce his report. Some 39 Applications and Orders are before the Inspector, who has taken evidence from over 750 witnesses with over 5,400 inquiry documents and 25,000 written representations. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will decide the application as soon as possible after receipt of the Inspector's report and recommendation.

Fuel Duty Rebate

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to extend fuel duty rebate to community transport schemes. [85613]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Possible changes to the scope of the bus fuel duty rebate scheme will be considered as part of the advice on all aspects of the public funding of bus services which we will be requesting from the new Commission for Integrated Transport when it begins its work next month. We will also be considering carefully all the recommendations of the review of voluntary and community transport commissioned by my Department, the report of which will be published shortly.

Minicabs (London)

Sir George Young: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to issue the consultation paper on the proposed rules for London minicab operators in accordance with the implementation of the Private Hire Vehicles (London) Act 1998. [85669]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I have today with the Public Carriage Office issued the consultation paper. The Private Hire Vehicles (London) Act 1998 was an important step in bringing the safety of the travelling public in London in line with the rest of the country. The provisions of the Act were warmly welcomed by both the industry and consumer safety groups.

This consultation paper is the first step in implementing the Act and sets out proposals for the licensing of London minicab operators. It aims to strike a balance between the need to protect consumers and the interests of small business.

There will be an eight week period for responses and following assessment of responses we intend to undertake a short consultation before announcing the regulations for the licensing of London minicab operators.

Further consultation documents on the proposed rules for London minicab drivers and vehicles will be issued later this year and early next year respectively.

New Trains

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the fleet of 44 new trains to be introduced into service by LTS Rail Ltd. comply with the provisions of the Rail Vehicle Accessibility Regulations 1998; and if he will make a statement. [85727]

Ms Glenda Jackson: As I explained in my answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, East (Mr. McNulty) on 9 March 1999, Official Report, column 167, we are expecting to receive a number of exemption applications from train operating companies whose designs for new rail vehicles were well advanced prior to the 1998 Regulations coming into force.

We have received such an application from LTS Rail Ltd. The exemptions, which have been discussed with our statutory advisors, the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee, are mostly of a very minor nature and have been requested for a relatively short time only.

The exemptions will not prevent disabled people from using the new trains. Indeed, we believe that the introduction of the new class 357 trains will make a significant contribution to improving mobility opportunities for disabled people in the area.

An Order relating to the exemption of these rail vehicles has been laid in Parliament today.

Countryside Agency (Report)

Mr. Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to publish the Government's response to the fourth report of session 1998–99 of the Environment, Transport and Regional Affairs Select Committee on the Countryside Agency (HC 6). [85728]

Mr. Meacher: I can inform the House that the Government's response was published today. It is available as Command Paper 4539.

Cleaner Vehicles

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions which cars and engines qualify for (a) the Energy Saving Trust Powershift Programme and (b) the dual-fuel option of that programme. [85475]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Powershift Register published by the Energy Saving Trust provides details of all the alternatively fuelled vehicles and engine conversions, including dual-fuel options, that meet the minimum quality and safety standards laid down by the Trust. Powershift grants are available for those vehicles listed in the Register that offer significant emissions reductions compared with their petrol or diesel equivalent, with the highest grants going to those vehicles that offer the greatest emissions benefits.

Waste Management White Paper

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he plans to issue the proposed White Paper on waste management. [85483]

Mr. Meacher: I intend to publish a draft waste strategy shortly. We will consult fully with all interested parties before publishing a final version of the new waste strategy as a Command Paper at the end of the year.

Genetically Modified Organisms

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many times officials from his Department have met officials from the US Government to discuss genetically modified organisms and the biotechnology industry since 1 June 1998; if he will list the dates and locations of each meeting; and with which US Government department his officials met. [80834]

Mr. Meacher: Ministers and officials in this department are in regular contact with representatives of all those with an interest in biotechnology—including environmental groups, consumer groups and biotechnology companies. We are also studying practice and trials in a number of countries overseas, including the United States. My officials have met with US Government officials on about a dozen occasions since June 1998, including at multinational meetings such as those held under the auspices of the OECD and UNEP. Information on dates and locations of meetings held at official level is not collected centrally.

Rail Freight Grants

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his oral answer of 13 April 1999, Official Report, column 10, if he will list the amount of money which his Department has paid in rail freight grants to Eddie Stobart Ltd, in each of the last five years. [81969]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 23 April 1999]: My right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) wrote to my hon. Friend as the then Minister for Transport. A copy of his letter has been placed in the Library.

Novel Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the Canadian regulatory system for novel crops in respect of the environmental impact of such crops in his review of the regulatory process in the United Kingdom. [82070]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 27 April 1999]: My officials are able to discuss the regulatory approach of other OECD countries through the OECD Expert Group on the Harmonisation of Regulatory Oversight in Biotechnology. The aim of this Group is to improve the harmonisation of regulatory approaches to the assessment of products in order to avoid trade barriers. The Government have asked the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) to consider the relative benefits of the process based and product based regulatory systems with respect to herbicide tolerant crops as set out in my answer of 24 May 1999, Official Report, columns 5–6.

Capital Receipts Initiative

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what is the total amount of capital receipts that have been released for Carlisle City Council in each year since 1990. [85041]

Ms Armstrong: In the three years 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000 capital allocations made through the Capital Receipts Initiative to Carlisle have been £0.373 million, £1.240 million and £1.226 million respectively. These allocations are made in the form of supplementary credit approvals and can be spent on housing and housing related regeneration projects which meet local priorities. The Capital Receipts Initiative was introduced during 1997–98.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Language Teaching

12. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the funding of language teaching in Northern Ireland. [84450]

Mr. McFall: The Government consider it important to encourage the teaching of the major European languages in Northern Ireland and so language studies are one of the 6 areas of compulsory study within the Northern Ireland curriculum. All grant aided post-primary schools must offer pupils the opportunity to study one of French, German, Spanish or Latin, but funding for such provision is not identified separately. Schools may also offer Irish and pupils taking Irish thereby fulfil the requirements of the curriculum.

Peace Process

13. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in implementing the Good Friday agreement. [84451]

18. Valerie Davey: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on developments in the Northern Ireland peace process. [84456]

19. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in implementing the Belfast agreement. [84458]

21. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of when the Northern Ireland Executive will be formed. [84460]

Marjorie Mowlam: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friends the Members for Islwyn (Mr. Touhig), for Sheffield, Heeley (Mr. Michie), and for Aberdeen, South (Miss Beggs), and to the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson).

Good Friday Agreement

14. Mr. Pound: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps are being taken to increase co-operation between Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic as set out in the Good Friday agreement. [84452]

15. Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps are being taken to increase the co-operation between Northern Ireland and the Irish Republic as set out in the Good Friday agreement. [84453]

Marjorie Mowlam: Six new implementation bodies will work on an all-island basis on inland waterways, food safety, trade and business development, special EU programmes, language and aquaculture and marine matters. Six areas where enhanced co-operation will take place through existing bodies, north and south, have also been identified. These bodies are ready to function once powers are devolved to the Northern Ireland Assembly.

25. Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of the role of an Irish-UK parliamentary body in implementing the Good Friday Agreement. [84464]

Mr. Paul Murphy: As the Good Friday Agreement is implemented, it will be important to build relationships between the UK and Irish Parliaments and the elected institutions of the devolved administrations. Strand Three of the Agreement states that

> "The elected institutions of the members (of the British-Irish Council) will be encouraged to develop interparliamentary links, perhaps building on the British-Irish Interparliamentary Body."

The Government welcome the positive contribution which the British-Irish Interparliamentary Body has made over recent years. Whilst we will encourage interparliamentary links to develop further, it will be a matter for the elected institutions themselves as to how they choose to proceed.

Decommissioning

16. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made on the decommissioning of weapons. [84454]

Mr. Ingram: I have welcomed the start to decommissioning made by the LVF on 18 December. The Decommissioning Commission continues its vital work. The Government also continue to meet with representatives of all the political parties to discuss all aspects of the Good Friday Agreement. We are determined that all aspects move forward in parallel.

Structural Funds

17. Ms Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on the impact of European structural funds on peace and reconciliation in Northern Ireland. [84455]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The European Union is funding the Special Support Programme for Peace and Reconciliation which aims to reinforce progress towards a peaceful and stable society and to promote reconciliation in Northern Ireland. Additional EU aid for the Programme for 1999 brings the total awarded to 400 million euros (approximately £285 million).

New Deal

20. Kali Mountford: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many companies are signed up to the New Deal in Northern Ireland. [84459]

Mr. McFall: At the 23 April 1999, 2,646 Northern Ireland companies had confirmed their support for New Deal by signing an Employment Agreement.

Mr. Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what arrangements are in place to ensure that employers receiving subsidies under the New Deal are complying completely with the minimum wage legislation for all their employees, including those subsidised under the New Deal. [85120]

Mr. McFall: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Ian Walters. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Ian Walters to Mr. Cecil Walker, dated 25 May 1999:

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me as Chief Executive of the Training & Employment Agency to reply to your question about the National Minimum Wage and, specifically, its implications for employees in jobs which attract a New Deal subsidy.

The role of implementing National Minimum Wage policy lies with the Department of Trade & Industry and the monitoring and enforcing functions have been assigned to the Inland Revenue. The Training & Employment Agency has no direct responsibility in these matters but the Agency's JobCentre staff are offering guidance based on DTI explanatory leaflets for both employers and employees. They are also signposting enquiries to the National Minimum Wage telephone information and enquiries lines. (Copies of the DTI leaflets are enclosed.) The Agency now requires all employers reporting vacancies, for which job applicants are sought, to confirm that at least National Minimum Wage rates will apply.

On the specific issue of New Deal employees' National Minimum Wage entitlements, Personal Advisers maintain a counselling and monitoring role during the subsidy period with employees and employers to ensure that all New Deal criteria and job recruitment agreements are being honoured.

I hope you find this reply useful.

Prison Officers (Redundancies)

22. Mr. Geraint Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will make a statement on progress with redundancy arrangements for prison officers in Northern Ireland. [84461]

Mr. Ingram: 117 staff left the Prison Service on 30 March 1999 under the voluntary early retirement/early severance scheme. A further 93 staff are expected to leave by 30 June 1999. All those leaving under the scheme receive a comprehensive programme of support services.

Paramilitary Violence

23. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what estimate she has made of the types and number of weapons in the possession of terrorist organisations which have been responsible for acts of violence in Northern Ireland. [84462]

Mr. Ingram: For obvious reasons, it is not our practice to disclose such intelligence matters. I can however say that substantial amounts of firearms, munitions and explosives are held by various groups in Northern Ireland.

Restorative Justice

24. Mr. Michael Jabez Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the objectives are of the new Government initiatives on restorative justice in Northern Ireland. [84463]

Mr. Ingram: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith).

Drumcree

26. Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the prospects for achieving a local accommodation over the disputed parade at Drumcree this year. [84465]

Mr. Ingram: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Savidge).

Child Protection

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many children in Northern Ireland who are registered with local authorities are registered on the Child Protection Register; and if he will make a statement. [85085]

Mr. McFall: There were 1,418 children in Northern Ireland on the Child Protection Register at 31 December 1998, the latest date for which such information is available.

Compensation Agency

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the future plans for the Compensation Agency will be published; and if she will make a statement. [85867]

Mr. Ingram: The Compensation Agency will publish today its Corporate Plan and Business Plan. The Plans explain the Agency's business and organisation and set out the assumptions about work loads and resources which underpin the plans and targets.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Farmers (Tibet)

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what representations she has made to the World Bank about its proposal to help fund the re-settlement of farmers from outside the region to Tibet; [85129]

(2) what representations she has made to China about the re-location of farmers from outside the region to Tibet. [85128]

Clare Short: I understand that these questions relate to the World Bank's proposed Western Poverty Reduction Project in Qinghai province of China (bordering the autonomous region of Tibet). We have requested further details of the proposal from World Bank staff in Washington. I will write to my hon. Friend when this information is available.

UNESCO

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial and other assistance her Department intends to provide to establish a UK National Commission for UNESCO. [84896]

Clare Short: We will provide a core grant not exceeding £70,000 a year towards the costs of a UK Commission for United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organisation (UNESCO). We and other Departments will also consider support for specific activities in accordance with Government priorities. It is expected that civil society groupings with an interest in UNESCO will provide additional funding for the Commission.

TREASURY

Media Relations

Mr. Baker: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers involved in media relations were employed within his Department at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [84191]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 18 May 1999]: Detailed information on the number of permanent civil servants employed in Departmental Press Offices during the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99 was provided in a memorandum to the Select Committee on Public Administration and published in its report on The Government Information and Communication Service (HC770) in July 1998. A copy is in the Library of the House. The numbers in post at 1 May 1999 are 7.

Special Advisers in this Department advise Treasury Ministers on the full range of policy issues.

Alcohol and Tobacco Smuggling

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the cost of not implementing the recommendations of the report of the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review. [85101]

Dawn Primarolo: If the recommendations of the Alcohol and Tobacco Fraud Review had not been implemented and the allocation of £35 million over 3 years had not been made to Customs to effect these recommendations, Customs would be unable to achieve by 2001–02 the target set in the Government's Comprehensive Spending Review White Paper for detecting alcohol and tobacco fraud. There would also be an even greater threat of large-scale excise crime.

Special Advisers

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) in what capacity his then special adviser addressed the Chalk Farm Branch Labour Party meeting on 9 February; and if the Government's economic policy was discussed and questions on this subject answered; [84827]

(2) how many invitations to address meetings of Labour Party branches or constituency Labour parties his special advisers have (a) received, (b) accepted and (c) declined since May 1997; [84826]

(3) what criteria he applies when advising his special advisers on the acceptance of speaking engagements; [84829]

(4) how many speaking engagements have been undertaken by his special advisers since May 1997; [84825]

(5) if he discussed in advance the content of his special adviser's speech to the Chalk Farm Labour Party on 9 February. [84828]

Ms Hewitt: Any speaking engagements undertaken by Treasury Special Advisers have been fully in line with the terms of their contracts.

Disabled People (Contributions)

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many disabled people and people with a long-term illness in work he expects to pay (i) no contributions and (ii) contributions of less than 25 times the lower earnings limit in each of the next five years; and if he will give this figure as a proportion of the total number of this group in work. [85510]

Dawn Primarolo: The only information available is based on the Family Resources Survey for 1997–98, covering Great Britain, and shows that about 550,000 people with a long-term illness, disability, or infirmity were working but not paying national insurance contributions. This represents about 12 per cent. of the total number of this group in work.

Working Families Tax Credit

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the increase in demand for childcare places as a result of the introduction of the childcare tax credit within the working families tax credit. [84958]

Dawn Primarolo: The Government have commissioned work into the demand for childcare places within the context of the National Childcare Strategy. Results from this analysis are due to be published later in the year, and follow-up work is envisaged in 2001 which should help inform our understanding of existing and future demand for childcare.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the impact on parents' ability to pay higher childcare fees of the introduction of the childcare tax credit element of the working families tax credit. [84957]

Dawn Primarolo: The ability of parents to pay childcare fees at the prevailing rates following the introduction of the childcare tax credit will depend on a range of factors. It is not practicable for the Government to estimate reliably whether, or to what extent, the introduction of the childcare tax credit component of the Working Families Tax Credit will have an effect on childcare charges.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the Inland Revenue will take account of differences in the cost of childcare during holiday periods, compared to term time, when calculating the childcare element of the working families tax credit. [84960]

Dawn Primarolo: The calculation of the childcare element within the Working Families Tax Credit will take account of differences in the cost of childcare in holiday periods, compared to term time, in the same way that Family Credit takes account of these variations currently.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what evidence parents will be required to produce to support a claim for the childcare tax credit element of the working families tax credit. [84955]

Dawn Primarolo: Parents will be required to obtain confirmation of their costs, or expected childcare costs, from their childcare provider in the same way that they would currently for Family Credit.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what information childcare providers will have to provide to the Inland Revenue to show how much those parents claiming working families tax credit are charged for childcare. [84959]

Dawn Primarolo: Childcare providers will be asked to verify parents actual or expected childcare costs for WFTC using a form similar to the one they are currently asked to complete for Family Credit.

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the working families tax credit will be assessed when the snapshot of income immediately preceding an application comes out at a time when the applicant is on parental leave without pay. [84751]

Dawn Primarolo [holding answer 20 May 1999]: The rules for the assessment of WFTC where one or both parents are on unpaid parental leave will be the same as those used currently for Family Credit where the parent, or parents, are on any other sorts of unpaid leave. The exact treatment will depend entirely on the individual circumstances of the family.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer which social security benefits will be excluded from the calculation for entitlement to working families tax credit. [84950]

Dawn Primarolo: The same social security benefits will be excluded from the calculation for entitlement of WFTC as are currently excluded from the calculation of entitlement to Family Credit. These are Child Benefit, Child Benefit (Lone Parent), Guardian's Allowance, Maternity Allowance, Housing Benefit, Council Tax Benefit, Personal Council Tax Transitional Relief or Reduction, Attendance Allowance, Disability Living Allowance, £10 Christmas Bonus, Constant Attendance Allowance, war pensioner's mobility supplement, supplementary pensions for war widows, Exceptionally Severe Disablement Allowance, any Social Fund payment, Severe Disablement Occupational Allowance, Income Support, income-based Jobseeker's Allowance. And in addition, the first £10 of the total income is disregarded (up to a maximum disregard of £20) where it comes from War Widow's or Widower's Pension, War Disablement Pensions, or equivalent payments made by foreign social security schemes.

Tax Law Rewrite Project

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if there have been further developments on the Tax Law Rewrite project. [85668]

Dawn Primarolo: I am pleased to be able to tell the House about yet another publication from the Tax Law Rewrite project. The Inland Revenue will shortly publish the project's sixth Exposure Draft, which contains draft clauses on employment income. Copies will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

This Exposure Draft is the third to be published in the last three months. The work of the project is gathering pace and we can look forward to further publications later in the year.

Air Passenger Duty

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Government were first informed of the European Commission's intention to pursue infraction proceedings against the application in the United Kingdom of the domestic flight return-leg exemption from air passenger duty. [82638]

Mrs. Roche: The European Commission issued a Reasoned Opinion on 23 June 1998 in this matter.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he expects to make an announcement on the Government's response to the European Commission's infraction proceedings against the application in the United Kingdom of the domestic return-leg exemption from air passenger duty; and if he will make a statement. [82637]

Mrs. Roche: We are still considering how to respond to the European Commission's challenge to the domestic return-leg exemption.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what supplementary revenue will be obtained from air passenger duty if the current domestic flight return-leg exemption from this duty were to be abolished. [82645]

Mrs. Roche: At current passenger numbers, and assuming no behavioural effects, it is estimated that the additional revenue from abolishing the domestic return-leg exemption would be in the order of £60 million.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received about the impact on accessibility to low-cost domestic air travel if the current domestic return-leg air passenger duty exemption were to be abolished. [82643]

Mrs. Roche: I have not received any representation on this particular issue.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the rate of air passenger duty which would have to be levied on flights within the EU, should air passenger duty be applied to both legs of domestic return flights in the UK, to ensure the income to the Treasury from air passenger duty remains as forecast in the document Budget 99. [82644]

Mrs. Roche: The precise figure will depend on the proportion of domestic flights within the UK which contain a return leg. Depending on the proportion of return journeys, a rate of between £8 and £9 would be consistent with broad revenue neutrality if Air Passenger Duty were applied to both legs of domestic return flights. This estimate assumes current passenger numbers and no behavioural effects.

Small High-tech Businesses

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he has received to the consultation document, Financial Promotion; and what steps he is considering to help eliminate the equity gap in respect of the funding of smaller high-technology new businesses. [85656]

Ms Hewitt: The consultation paper includes consideration of ways to facilitate informal capital raising to assist small and medium-sized firms, including those in the high-technology sector, gain access to investment funding. A number of responses have been received and are being considered.

Disabled Persons Tax Credit

Mr. Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the proportion of those he expects to claim the disabled persons tax credit who will be paying (a) no national insurance contributions and (b) contributions of less than 25 times the lower earnings limit in each of the next five years. [85509]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that about 25 per cent. of DPTC recipients will pay no national insurance contributions in 1999–2000. The percentage actually paying no contributions in subsequent years will be higher, because of the increase in the thresholds announced in the Budget. However, contributions on earnings between the lower earnings limit and the new threshold will be notionally paid with no loss of benefit entitlement. The proportion earning less than the lower earnings limit is expected to remain at about 25 per cent.

I regret that no information is available on the proportion of DPTC claimants paying contributions on earnings of less than 25 times the lower earnings limit in a year.

Independent Adjudicator for the Inland Revenue

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the position of Independent Adjudicator for the Inland Revenue was established; how this position is advertised and appointed; how many complaints in each year since its establishment have been referred to the Independent Adjudicator for the Inland Revenue; how many were (a) upheld and (b) dismissed; and what representations he has received concerning parliamentary scrutiny of the appointment of the Independent Adjudicator for the Inland Revenue. [85350]

Dawn Primarolo: The Office of the Revenue Adjudicator was established in May 1993 to introduce an element of impartiality into the Revenue's complaints system.

The post is advertised in the national press and appointment made through open competition.

The Adjudicator's Office received 14,322 complaints in the six year period to 31 March 1999. Of these, 11,644 were resolved without the need for full investigation.

Of the 2,434 complaints investigated, 1,106 were upheld, 1,194 not upheld and 134 withdrawn.

Bates Report (PFI)

Mr. Hopkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when he will publish the Bates report on the private finance initiative; and if he will make a statement; [84993]

(2) if he will publish the second Bates report on the private finance initiative. [84994]

Mr. Milburn: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Bognor Regis and Littlehampton (Mr. Gibb) on 27 April 1999, Official Report, column 122.

Inflation Target

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer for what reasons 2½ per cent. remains his inflation target; and if he will make a statement. [85349]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's inflation target is 2½ per cent., defined by the 12-month increase in the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments (RPIX). Low inflation is an essential precondition for achieving the Government's objectives of high and sustainable levels of growth and employment.

Mr. Jack: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes to current economic policy would be required to achieve a 2 per cent. inflation target by the end of 2000. [85348]

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to introduce legislation to change the measure of inflation used by the Bank of England to define progress towards achieving the Government's target rate of inflation; and if he will make a statement. [85384]

Ms Hewitt: In his last Budget on 9 March 1999, the Chancellor confirmed the Government's inflation target is 2½ per cent. defined by the 12-month increase in the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments (RPIX). This target was reaffirmed in a recent letter from the Chancellor to the Governor of the Bank of England, setting out the remit for the Monetary Policy Committee. A copy of this letter has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Harmonised Index of Consumer Prices

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what consultations he has had with the Governor of the Bank of England with regard to the Harmonised Index of Consumer Prices; [85385]

(2) what consultations (a) Treasury Ministers and (b) Treasury officials have had with officials of the Bank of England with regard to the use of the Harmonised Index of Consumer Prices as a measure of inflation in the past 12 months. [85386]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor and Treasury officials meet regularly with Bank of England officials to exchange views on a wide variety of issues.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the current and future use of the Harmonised Index of Consumer Prices as a measure of inflation in the United Kingdom. [85387]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's inflation target is 2½ per cent. defined by the 12-month increase in the RPI excluding mortgage interest payments (RPIX). This target was reaffirmed in a recent letter from the Chancellor to the Governor of the Bank of England, setting out the remit for the Monetary Policy Committee. A copy of this letter has been placed in the House of Commons Library.

Secondary Markets

Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the Government's policy on the functionality of secondary markets in financial services; and what plans he has to ensure that consumers are made aware of the existence of secondary markets in financial services. [85124]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The Government aim to ensure that all parts of the financial services markets operate as efficiently and fairly as possible. The Financial Services and Markets Bill will give the Financial Services Authority a statutory objective of consumer protection and public awareness.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Dry Rooms

Mr. Sanders: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will make it his policy to de-regulate dry rooms in bed and breakfast and hotel accommodation. [85115]

Janet Anderson: The Government's new tourism strategy aims to create a regulatory framework in which tourism-related businesses, including accommodation businesses, can prosper. My Department is working with other Departments to review regulatory burdens on the tourism industry, with a view to removing those which are unnecessary. I understand that the Home Office will be looking at the question of dry rooms as part of its general review of liquor licensing law.

Britain Visitor Centre

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what are the funding arrangements for the Britain Visitor Centre; and what will be its annual running costs. [85299]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 24 May 1999]: The Britain Visitor Centre is funded by the British Tourist Authority, partly through rental payments by sub-tenants and partly from grant-in-aid. The annual running costs for 1999–2000 are expected to be £975,000, of which £625,000 is covered by rental payments and £350,000 by grant-in-aid.

Comprehensive Spending Review

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will publish the funding agreements which his Department has concluded with its sponsored bodies following his Department's Comprehensive Spending Review. [85819]

Mr. Alan Howarth: I have today placed in the Libraries of the House copies of 33 agreements that the Department has concluded with its Non-Departmental Public Bodies and Next Steps Agency.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Winter Fuel Allowance

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate how many pensioner households in Shrewsbury and Atcham will receive the £100 winter fuel allowance. [84865]

Mr. Timms: From an examination of the number of eligible pensioners identified in the post code areas for Shrewsbury and Atcham for the winter of 1998–99 we estimate that around 57,000 individual pensioners in over 42,000 households will benefit from Winter Fuel Payments next winter.

Fraud

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate what the fraud savings from the automation of benefit payments at post offices would have been had the project been completed on schedule. [85229]

Mr. Timms: Fraudulent payments associated with paying benefits through giro cheques and order books were estimated to stand at around £180 million per annum when the project was initiated in 1996. The payment card, when fully in place, was estimated to cut out 90 per cent. of such fraudulent payments.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

School Funding (Cambridgeshire)

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what the additional amount of money is which Cambridgeshire County Council would have delegated to schools in 1998–99, if the proportion delegated had been at the level of the local education authority which delegated the highest proportion. [85357]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The highest proportion of the Potential Schools Budget delegated by a local education authority in 1998–99 was 95.8 per cent. If Cambridgeshire had delegated at this level, the additional amount of the Aggregated Schools Budget available to its schools would have been £11 million.

Disability Discrimination Act 1995

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what assessment he has made of the impact on business costs of the implementation of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995. [85152]

Ms Hodge: The Government's estimates of the costs and benefits of introducing the later rights in Part III of the Disability Discrimination Act 1995 and of introducing the first part of the duty of reasonable adjustment on trade organisations under Part II of the Act, are contained in separate Regulatory Impact Assessments. Copies are available in the Library. They can also be found on the disability website—www.disability.gov.uk.

Disability Rights Commission

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what measures he will take to ensure that the Disability Rights Commissioner provides technical support to employers and service providers in Coventry. [85153]

Ms Hodge: The Disability Rights Commission Bill is currently before Parliament. The commission, when established, will be an independent statutory body which will prepare and review statutory codes of practice and make arrangements for conciliation in the field of access to goods, facilities, services and premises. It will also provide a central source of information and advice to employers, service providers and disabled people.

It will be for the Commission to determine how best to provide its services to all its stakeholders when it is established and to report on its activities through its annual report to Parliament.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received regarding the introduction of the Disability Rights Commission and its impact on business competitiveness. [85151]

Ms Hodge: A public consultation on the Government White Paper, "Promoting Disabled People's Rights—Creating a Disability Rights Commission fit for the 21st Century", was held last year.

7,000 individuals and organisations were sent a copy of the White Paper or a summary of it. Out of 626 responses (of which 12 per cent. were identified as coming from businesses or organisations representing business interests) 94 per cent. supported the main proposals on the establishment and role of the Commission. An analysis of responses compiled by an independent market research organisation will be placed in the Library in the near future.

Five national consultation conferences on the White Paper held in September and October 1998 were attended by over 300 delegates from the business, public and voluntary sectors. The views of the delegates are also reflected in the report.

Disability Leave Agreements

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received concerning disability leave agreements. [85154]

Ms Hodge: We have had no specific representations about disability leave agreements, but the idea of disability leave has been discussed recently by the Disability Rights Task Force and the Advisory Committee on Disabled People in Employment and Training (ACDET) Group looking at job retention. Voluntary disability leave agreements between employers and employees can help people with disabilities play a full part in working life.

Class Sizes

Mr. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list for schools in Essex Education Authority the change in the average size of classes taught by one teacher between January 1998 and January 1999 for pupils in (a) nursery classes, (b) Key Stage Two and (c) secondary schools. [84580]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Government have pledged to reduce infant class sizes to 30 or below by September 2001 at the latest, and we are on target to meet that pledge.

The available information for Essex Local Authority is shown in the table.

Essex local education authority area
January each year
Average class size of one teacher classes

	1998	1999
Nursery classes	25.0	24.7
Key stage one	26.6	26.5
Key stage two	28.6	28.7
Overall primary	27.6	27.7
Secondary	21.7	21.6

IT (Inner-city Schools)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department is taking to develop the use of IT in schools in inner city areas. [85332]

Mr. Charles Clarke: Under Excellence in Cities we shall be developing Learning Centres in inner city areas. The first 30 will be up and running in the Excellence in Cities target areas by September 2000, with more to follow after that. This was announced as part of a major programme focused on the inner cities, and supplements the very substantial support already available through the National Grid for Learning and the New Opportunities Fund.

Further Education Funding Council

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what guidance he has given the Further Education Funding Council on the future of franchising activity by colleges; and if he will make a statement. [85466]

Mr. Mudie: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State authorised the following advice to the FEFC in December 1998—that (i) FEFC funding should not be transferred from colleges to employers other than exceptionally for the lease of equipment and premises; (ii) franchised arrangements should not operate well outside the college's area—and where a college did extend its operations in this way then it should do so after consultation with the local college or colleges concerned; and (iii) the FEFC should consult the DfEE about the implications for funding policy of its study of the costs of franchised provision.

In response, the FEFC has: required that colleges do not transfer funding to employers other than exceptionally; established a local priorities working group to advise on policy for off site delivery; and reduced the funding available for the majority of franchised activity.

Jobseekers

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if parents signing on for jobseeker's allowance are entitled to be accompanied by their children at a jobcentre interview. [85092]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Responsibility for the subject of this question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its Chief Executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Leigh Lewis to Mr. David Willetts, dated 26 May 1999:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State for Education and Employment has asked me to reply direct to your question about the presence of children accompanying their parents at Jobcentre interviews. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

We appreciate that many people looking for work have dependent children and that it is sometimes convenient for them to bring a child with them when attending interviews at the Jobcentre. In accordance with our general policy that Jobcentres should present a welcoming environment to all jobseekers, we are happy for this to be the case. Where the presence of children makes it difficult to undertake the interview effectively we will discuss re-arranging the interview for a time when alternative care arrangements can be made.

I hope this is helpful.

School Closures

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the decisions which have come before him since May 1997 on school closure; and the outcome of each of those decisions. [85356]

Mr. Charles Clarke: A list of the school closure proposals decided by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State since May 1997 is shown in a table, copies of which have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Tom Engel

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) what guidance he received from the Cabinet Office relating to the procedures for the appointment of his new special adviser, Mr. Tom Engel; [85545]

(2) what will be the responsibilities of his new special adviser, Mr. Tom Engel; [85542]

(3) if he will list those areas on which his special adviser, Mr. Tom Engel, will not receive papers or give advice, so as to avoid conflicts of interest, as specified in the model contract for special advisers. [85544]

Mr. Blunkett: Tom Engel will start work as Special Adviser to me on 1 June. He will be employed under terms and conditions set out in the model contract for Special Advisers. He was appointed following a competitive interview process and his appointment is fully in line with Cabinet Office procedures, including having been authorised by the Prime Minister.

Tom Engel will be required to sever all links with his previous employer, Westminster Strategy, and his policy responsibilities in the Department will have no relevance to the responsibilities he held at Westminster Strategy. He will work to me across the range of subjects for which the Department has responsibility.

SCOTLAND

Regional Selective Assistance

Mr. Alasdair Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many jobs have been created as a result of the additional grants available in the regional selection assistance priority pilot areas; and what proportion of the budget allocated for this purpose remains unspent. [84868]

Dr. Reid: Since the Regional Selective Assistance (RSA) Priority initiative was launched on a pilot basis on 22 May 1998, 14 projects have been offered grant assistance of £1.9 million. This will lead to the planned creation of an additional 99 jobs for the residents of the 5 particularly deprived areas chosen for the pilot phase.

Funds are available from within the overall RSA budget and are not specifically allocated for this initiative.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

HIV/AIDS

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the cumulative numbers of people with AIDS who died in (a) Scotland and (b) each health board area of Scotland in each year from 1981 to 1988, in 1998 and in 1999 to date. [84820]

Mr. Macdonald: The information is set out in the following table:

Cumulative AIDS deaths as at 31 December of selected years by health board of AIDS registration, and for Scotland, as at 31 March 1999

Health Board	1981	1982	1983	1984	1985	1986	1988	1998	1999
Argyll and Clyde	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	4	4
Ayrshire and Arran	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	9	9
Borders	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	1
Dumfries and Galloway	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	3	3
Fife	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	12	12
Forth Valley	0	0	0	0	1	1	1	4	4
Grampian	0	0	0	0	0	0	3	30	30
Greater Glasgow	0	1	1	2	2	8	19	180	180
Highland	0	0	0	0	0	1	1	5	5
Lanarkshire	0	0	0	0	0	0	1	10	10
Lothian	0	0	0	0	0	2	14	335	335
Orkney	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Shetland	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Tayside	0	0	0	0	0	1	2	128	130
Western Isles	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0	0
Scotland	0	1	1	2	3	13	42	721	723

Source:
The Scottish Centre for Infection and Environmental Health AIDS/HIV Register

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Erskine Bridge

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the final cost of the repairs and ancillary work to the Erskine Bridge following the accident involving an off-shore installation under towage; if these costs were recovered from the parties deemed responsible; and if he will make a statement. [84678]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 25 May 1999]: The final cost of the repairs and ancillary work to the Erskine Bridge is £4.25 million. The Scottish Office is committed to recovering these costs and has intimated its claim to those considered to be responsible. This claim will continue to be pursued.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

PRIME MINISTER

Media Relations

Mr. Baker: To ask the Prime Minister how many (a) civil servants and (b) special advisers involved in media relations were employed within his Department at 1 May (i) 1997, (ii) 1998 and (iii) 1999. [84199]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 18 May 1999]: Detailed information on the number of civil servants employed in Departmental Press Offices during the financial years 1997–98 and 1998–99 was provided in a memorandum to the Select Committee on Public Administration and published in its report on "The Government Information and Communication Service" (HC 770) in July 1998. A copy is in the Library of the House.

Media relations are handled by the Downing Street Press Office which consists of 8 press officers, 3 of whom are special advisers. They work under the direction of my Official Spokesman and are the only people authorised to have direct contact with the media on my behalf other than on occasions where others may be specifically directed by my Official Spokesman.

The Strategic Communications Unit was set up on 14 January 1998. Speaking on behalf of the Government is not part of the SCU's function but the civil servants and special advisers there obviously speak to the press from time to time.

Kosovo

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the (a) opinion polling and (b) focus group research carried out on the authority of the Government into the use of military force in connection with the Kosovo conflict. [85046]

The Prime Minister: None.

Concordats

Dr. Fox: To ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made in drawing up concordats between UK departments, the National Assembly for Wales and the Scottish Executive. [85435]

The Prime Minister: Work has been done within the UK Government to prepare a set of draft concordats to provide a framework of guidance on relationships to ensure smooth conduct of business with the new devolved Administrations. I expect these drafts to be passed to the devolved Administrations for their consideration in due course.

Macedonia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement about progress made in providing assistance to Macedonia and Albania as an outcome of the donors' meeting held in Paris on 5 May. [84789]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 May 1999]: At the Donors' Conference for Macedonia on 5 May, the international community, including international financial institutions, pledged $252 million in financial assistance to Macedonia. The EU has pledged 25 million euro in refugee related budgetary assistance, 10 million euro in humanitarian support and 22 million euro in developmental assistance. Details are in the EU and World Bank Chairmen's Conclusions of the Donors Conference, which will be deposited in the Library of the House. The Albanian Donors' Conference is to be held today.

Poet Laureate

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Prime Minister (1) if he will set out the established procedures for announcing the appointment of the Poet Laureate; and if he will make a statement; [85446]

(2) what procedures he has put in place to establish who informed The Times newspaper of the identity of the next Poet Laureate. [85447]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 May 1999]: Downing Street had planned to announce the name of the new Poet Laureate today, Wednesday 26 May. In view of the story appearing in The Times on Wednesday 19 May this announcement was brought forward by a week. In accordance with normal procedures, with the agreement of Buckingham Palace, Downing Street announces this appointment by way of a Press Notice. The Times has made it clear that the leak did not come from Downing Street.

NATO (Media Relations Advisers)

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Prime Minister which Government officials and special advisers are advising NATO headquarters on presentational and media relations. [85380]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 May 1999]: Last month the NATO Secretary General and SACEUR asked my Chief Press Secretary to visit NATO and advise on media relations. Since then he and a number of other Government officials have been helping NATO and SHAPE deal with the enormous media demand. They are working with NATO staff and officials from several other NATO countries.

Effective communications are important, particularly when Milosevic has a state run media and no cameras are allowed to film the atrocities being carried out in Kosovo.

Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 26 May. [85080]

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further such meetings later today.

I will also be attending the celebrations to mark the opening of the Welsh Assembly.

Mr. Tom Engel

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Prime Minister if the appointment of Mr. Tom Engel as a special adviser to the Secretary of State for Education and Employment was approved by the Prime Minister. [85543]

The Prime Minister: Yes.

European Trade Policy

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Prime Minister what arrangements he has made for Ministerial consideration of European trade policy issues. [85730]

The Prime Minister: I have established a new Committee to discuss these issues. The Sub-Committee on European Trade Issues (E)DOP(T), under the Chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary, will report to the Ministerial Sub-Committee on European Issues ((E)DOP), which also meets under the Foreign Secretary's Chairmanship. The composition and Terms of Reference of this new Committee are as follows:

Ministerial Sub-Committee on European Trade Issues ((E)DOP(T))

Composition:

Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Chairman)

Chancellor of the Exchequer

Secretary of State for International Development

Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food

Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Other Ministers will be invited to attend as the nature of the business requires.

The United Kingdom's Permanent Representative to the European Union is also in attendance.

Terms of Reference

"To consider questions relating to European Union trade policy issues and to report as necessary to the Ministerial Sub-Committee on European issues."

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Flood and Coastal Defence

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made on the review of the funding arrangements for flood and coastal defence and development of high level targets for flood and coastal defence operating authorities. [85731]

Mr. Morley: In response to last year's Agriculture Select Committee Report on Flood and Coastal Defence, the Government agreed to review the funding mechanisms for flood and coastal defence. As a first step in the review process, a consultation letter was issued to interested parties on 7 May. A copy has been placed in the Libraries.

A consultation paper seeking comments on substantive high level targets for flood and coastal defence from March 2000 will be issued to a wide range of interested organisations later this week; a copy will be placed in the Libraries. The Environment Agency will be consulting separately on further elaboration of its flood defence supervisory duty, and reporting to me in the autumn.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Encryption (Law Enforcement)

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the results of the study recently carried out on Encryption and Law Enforcement by the Performance and Innovation Unit in the Cabinet Office. [85605]

Mr. Wills: I am now able to announce the main conclusions from this important study carried out by a joint Government-industry team in the Cabinet Office's Performance and Innovation Unit.

The Team's recommendations, which have been agreed by the Government, include the establishment of a new industry/Government forum to take forward discussion on encryption matters which will be chaired by a senior DTI official; a new initiative to create an international forum to discuss encryption and law enforcement issues; and the establishment of a Technical Assistance Centre (under Home Office auspices) to assist the law enforcement agencies to make intelligible legally obtained encrypted information.

On the Electronic Commerce Bill, the PIU Team concluded that the proposed licensing (or accreditation) regime for cryptography service providers should not include any requirement for mandatory storage of encryption keys. The PIU team also welcomed the proposals in the consultation document to allow lawful access to decryption keys and/or plain text under proper authority

I believe that the recommendations outlined above, coupled with the dialogue that has already taken place with industry on this complex issue, will usher in a new era of co-operation between Government and industry; ensuring that the UK becomes both the best, and the safest, place to conduct electronic business.

Copies of the PIU report are available in the Libraries of the House.

Raw Milk

Mr. Garnier: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he proposes to respond to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report on the selling of raw milk; and if he will make a statement. [85533]

Dr. Howells: I refer the hon. and learned Member to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's oral answer on 6 May 1999, Official Report, column 1069, to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath).

Mr. Michael J. Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 28 April 1999, Official Report, column 194, on raw cows' milk, if he will list the hon. Members who wrote to him in April regarding the Monopoly and Mergers inquiry. [85360]

Dr. Howells: I am placing in the Library of the House a list of the hon. Members who wrote to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in April regarding the Monopolies and Mergers Commission's report on the supply in Great Britain of raw cows' milk.

Single Vehicle Car Imports

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he will make to ensure that single vehicle car imports are compliant with EU safety requirements. [85611]

Mr. Battle: Single vehicle imports are subject to the Single Vehicle Approval test administered by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Transport. Its purpose is to ensure that imported cars which are not manufactured in the European Union are safe on UK roads. To that end, the proposed revisions to the scheme will enhance the test standards to align broadly with EU safety standards.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what arrangements he will make to ensure that consumers are kept informed of specification differences between UK-sourced new cars and single vehicle imports. [85612]

Mr. Battle: The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions has published a booklet "The Single Vehicle Approval scheme" (SVA2) which describes the existing SVA regulations and test regime. Before the proposed revisions to the scheme are implemented, they will update and expand this information to include the main differences between European and non-European standards. The existence of specification differences between cars made for use in the European Union and sold through the manufacturers' official networks, and those made for other markets and brought into the UK by independent importers, has also been the subject of extensive coverage in the media. In deciding to remove the limits on imports of cars made for other markets progressively by 2001, the Government have been partly guided by the need to give the independent importers time to establish further their service networks in the UK.

Electricity

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on (a) the difficulties in the process of introducing full competition in the domestic electricity market two years ago, (b) the undertakings he gave on the timetable for market opening and (c) the actions he took to accelerate the process of market opening. [85609]

Mr. Battle: On coming to office, it was clear that the Government would have to give a strong lead to this work in order to see it successfully completed. I commissioned a report from the then DGES on the status of the programme soon after taking office. That report and one from his programme manager was published on 29 May 1997 and provided a sound way forward upon which the industry was prepared to commit to delivery.

Among the difficulties which have been faced have been the sheer size of the task and the level of technical complexity involved. The task of putting in place the vital IT infrastructure which is required to make the competition process work was one of the largest and most difficult in the world. I have worked hard to ensure that competition was introduced in a sensible, systematic way which ensured that customers were paramount and have conducted a series of meetings with the companies, the Regulator, the Electricity Pool and the programme managers to ensure that any difficulties were ironed out.

It was intended by the previous Government that supply competition would be introduced from April 1998. However, a realistic programme of work had not been put in place to support delivery by that date. Despite the efforts of the industry during 1998, the April date proved unachievable with fully tested systems. At a meeting I held on 22 January 1998 with the DGES, representatives from the electricity industry agreed to accept a target of rolling out competition between September 1998 and June 1999. The first areas to open to full competition did so on 14 September last year. Competition was introduced in each PES area in three planned stages over six months. A comprehensive testing programme was put in place to establish whether systems could interact effectively. The market was declared fully open on 24 May, a month ahead of schedule, by the DGES. The DGES will be monitoring for some time to come to ensure that the mechanics supporting the change of supplier process are working effectively and that the companies adopt a reasonable approach to doorstep selling. Consumers across the country should now benefit from lower prices and a better level of service.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list (a) the decisions announced in section 36 and section 14 consents for gas-fired electricity power plants during 1999 and (b) the factors determining whether such applications were approved or refused. [85610]

Mr. Battle: As promised in the Energy Sources White Paper, all decisions have been duly reported to Parliament. Members can also consult the actual decision letters, copies of which have also been placed in the Library of the House.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to review the Electricity Act 1989 with regard to access for way leaves and compensation to be paid. [85546]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend has no plans to review the wayleave provisions of the Electricity Act 1989.

Foresight Programme

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made in promoting the involvement of Government departments in the Foresight Programme. [85729]

Mr. Battle: The latest Whitehall Foresight progress report was published on 26 May. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. The report provides examples of what Departments are doing to promote Foresight and to respond to Foresight priorities and recommendations. It also outlines Departments' initial plans for participation in the new round of Foresight which started on 1 April. Overall, it reflects significant forward progress since the last report published in June 1998.

Export Credits Guarantee Department

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to review the way in which ECGD assesses risk. [85820]

Mr. Byers: My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary and I have agreed, in view of recent global economic turmoil and its adverse impact on ECGD's ability to meet its financial objective, to put in train an independent review of ECGD's Risk Management systems and processes.

The Terms of Reference for the Risk Management Review are:

To assist Her Majesty's Government in assessing the adequacy of risk management systems and processes of the Export Credits Guarantee Department, within the context of the Department's Mission and Financial objective. Specifically, the Consultants are required:

To assess the adequacy and robustness of the systems used by ECGD to assess, monitor and manage political and country risk. ECGD uses its Portfolio Management System (PMS) to assess and manage country risk exposure. In conjunction, it operates risk monitoring systems and statistical models to assess the likelihood of longer term break-even. Are there measures which could be taken to improve these systems?

To assess the adequacy and effectiveness of ECGD's operational controls in relation to its systems for assessment and management of political and country risk, having regard to best commercial practice. ECGD's activities are governed by a set of operational controls, involving delegated authorities from the Treasury as well as internal delegated authorities, coupled with checks and balances to ensure that risk assessments are kept separate from decisions on cover availability and premium for particular markets. Could these operational controls be improved?

In the light of these assessments to make recommendations for strengthening ECGD's risk management systems and operational controls.

In undertaking this assignment, the Consultant should have regard for best commercial practice in risk management in the financial services market, in particular banking and insurance practices, in the public and private sectors.

The systems, controls and procedures relating to the management of political and country risk to be reviewed will include:

Within ECGD, the market and portfolio controls represented by the Portfolio Management System and the role of the Market Committee (including the Amber Zone Budget and Amber Zone Delegated Authorities);

The allocation of roles and responsibilities for risk management and underwriting in ECGD and to consider whether the risk management function has sufficient authority;

Outside ECGD, the roles of the Export Guarantees Advisory Council, the Whitehall Economic Sub Group (ESG), the Export Guarantees Committee (EGC) and of other Departments;

The adequacy and robustness of management information available to underpin ECGD risk management decisions and actions;

Whether its systems have enabled ECGD to react quickly enough to material events affecting their risk situation—for example, whether the time frames under which country risk assessments and country cover decisions take place, are appropriate;

Whether ECGD's exposure management is robust. For example, does it enable ECGD to avoid over-concentration of risk, and monitor and control effectively the changing risk profile of ECGD's exposures?

Is accountability for risk and risk decisions within ECGD and HMG sufficiently clear and unambiguous?

Whether the internal financial and operational control regimes, ethos and culture in ECGD adequately provide the emphasis and incentives to deliver the risk-reward balance which Ministers have specified in relation to ECGD; and how these control systems compare to good risk management practice in the private sector.

Whether the internal operational control regimes, ethos and culture in the relevant parts of the Treasury adequately provide the emphasis and incentives to deliver the risk-reward balance which Ministers have specified in relation to ECGD.

ECGD and Treasury are jointly inviting bids from suitably qualified consultants to conduct the Review.

Soya Beans

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what reports his Department has received concerning the efforts of the state Government of Rio Grande do Sol to guarantee non-genetically modified soya bean production throughout their state; and what plans his Department has to give assistance. [84504]

Mr. Battle: My hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), the then Under-Secretary with responsibility for Small Firms, received a courtesy call from the Governor of Rio Grande do Sol on 25 September 1997, following a visit she made to Brazil in June 1997. The call focused on general trade relations. The issue of genetically modified soya beans was not raised during this meeting.

No reports have been received on this issue by DTI Ministers or officials.

Manufacturing

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the change in the balance of manufactured trade over the last three years. [82388]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 6 May 1999]: The manufacturing trade deficit rose between 1996 and 1998 at a time of deteriorating global economic prospects. However, the tough and decisive action this Government have taken will ensure that the UK steers a course of lasting stability, and is well positioned to take advantage of opportunities once world conditions pick-up.

Petrol Retailers

Mr. Woolas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to instruct the Office of Fair Trading to enforce fair trading practices in the operation of contracts between oil companies and petrol retailers. [8[illegible]62]

Dr. Howells: Contractual issues are a matter for the individual parties concerned rather than the Director-General of Fair Trading. Insofar as these do raise competition concerns, the Director-General has powers to investigate and take action.

Strategic Export Controls

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the nature of the aircraft engine spares temporarily exported to Yugoslavia, listed in the first Annual report on Strategic Export Controls. [85119]

Dr. Howells: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Dr. Gibson) by the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Central (Mr. Lloyd) on 21 May 1998, Official Report, column 532.

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many applications for information he received under the "Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information" in the last parliamentary session; and how many of these applications were granted. [83120]

Mr. Byers [holding answer 10 May 1999]: Statistics on the handling of applications for information under the "Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information" are compiled on an annual, calendar year (rather than parliamentary session) basis for inclusion in the annual Monitoring Report. Although all requests for information are handled in terms of the "Code", the Department of Trade and Industry (excluding Government Offices) received 30 formal, identifiable requests under the "Code" in 1998; information was refused under one or more "Code" exemptions in 15 cases.

RDX Explosives

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what export licences his Department has issued for RDX explosives since September 1998; and how many applications are pending. [84646]

Dr. Howells: The entry in the legislation under which the export of goods is controlled is known as their rating and most ratings cover a range of goods. RDX in its raw form is controlled under entry ML8 in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 as amended, commonly known as the Military List.

The Export Control Organisation's computer databases have been interrogated, and the following results obtained. As of 6 May 1999, 27 Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) are recorded as having been issued since 1 September 1998 for the export of goods with the rating ML8. The paper records of these licences have been examined; 2 SIELs covered the export of RDX in its raw form. Since 1 September 1998, no Open Individual Export Licences have been issued for the export of such goods.

Number of Standard Individual Export Licences covering the export of RDX in its raw form

Destination	Number
Belgium	1
Kuwait	1

At 6 May 1999, decisions had not yet been taken on 10 applications for SIELs to export goods rated ML8. The paper records for these applications have been examined, and seven covered RDX in its raw form: 4 covering exports to the USA, 1 covering exports to China, 1 covering exports to Japan and 1 covering exports to the Irish Republic. There are no pending applications for OIELs covering goods with the rating ML8.

This information should be considered in light of the answer given by my hon. Friend the Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Mrs. Roche), to my hon. Friend the Member for Don Valley (Caroline Flint), 30 October 1997, Official Report, columns 870–71.

All applications for licences to export goods entered in Part III of Schedule 1 to the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1994 are assessed against the criteria announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs on 28 July 1997, Official Report, columns 26–29, and the European Union Code of Conduct on Arms Exports.

CityFlyer Express—BA Merger

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what meetings he has held with CityFlyer Express to discuss the proposed merger with British Airways. [85221]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has had no meetings with CityFlyer Express.

BNFL (Millennium Compliance)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on BNFL's progress in becoming year 2000 compliant. [85216]

Mr. Battle: The nuclear industry is judged to have Action 2000 "blue" status, meaning that the assessment has not identified any risk of material disruption.

The Health and Safety Executive's Nuclear Installations Inspectorate (NII) is the body responsible for regulating the safety of civil nuclear installations. NII has been active in dealing with the year 2000 issue since 1997 and has directed all nuclear licensees, under a licence condition, to provide safety cases a minimum of six weeks in advance of critical dates. NII will allow continued operation of nuclear plant over the critical dates only if it is satisfied that the operation is safe.

NII is also carrying out a programme of inspection and assessment of licensees' work in this area as it proceeds. To date, all the licensees, including BNFL, are making satisfactory progress in their programmes of work and this assists NII's confidence that the safety cases will be adequate. Should they not be, NII will use its enforcement powers to see that effective improvements are made or, the plant taken out of operation.

Sheltered Accommodation

Mr. Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what legal rights tenants in sheltered accommodation have to have access to their individual fuel meters in cases where meters are centralised in a locked location. [85116]

Mr. Battle: Regulations made under The Gas Act provide gas customers with a statutory right of access to their meters. The Electricity does not provide the basis for such a right for electricity customers. The Government has made clear:

its intention to legislate, when Parliamentary time permits, to reform the way in which the public utilities are regulated that the regulatory process should be driven by the need to put the interests of customers first.

The aim is to bring the regulatory regimes for gas and electricity together where it is sensible to do so.

Inflatable Bouncing Devices (Injuries)

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will collect data on accident and injury figures with respect to inflatable bouncing devices. [85503]

Dr. Howells: Data on accidents with respect to inflatable bouncing devices are collected under the DTI's Home Accident Surveillance System. This records information on home and leisure accidents resulting in patients attending Accident and Emergency Departments at a representative sample of hospitals throughout the country. The most recent data for these devices are:

1997	National Estimate
	Home	Leisure
Bouncing castles	2,326	5,519
Other inflatable equipment	99	690

BNFL (KPMG Reports)

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry by what means and for what reason reports of the findings by KPMG setting out on the future structure and ownership of BNFL made their way into the public domain before Parliament was informed of them. [85145]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 25 May 1999]: I cannot comment on speculative references in the press about the KPMG report. An announcement will be made in due course.

Documentation

Mr. Chidgey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list those purposes for which his Department and its executive agencies require a birth certificate to be furnished by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment or contracts and (d) other persons. [85317]

Mr. Byers: In DTI and some of its agencies a birth certificate is one of a variety of documents which applicants for jobs may choose to offer as proof of identity and of age, for pension services, prior to or at recruitment. It is a mandatory requirement in the Radiocommunications Agency, the Patent Office and the National Weights and Measures Laboratory. In the event of the death of a Departmental employee in service, his or her children's full birth certificates are required in order to verify dates of birth for dependants' benefits under the relevant pensions arrangements. Contractors are responsible for establishing proof of the identity of their employees. Birth certificates are not required routinely for any other Departmental purposes; however, they can be offered by claimants under the Enemy Property Compensation Scheme to help establish the validity of such claims in particular lines of inheritance; and they may, in very limited circumstances, be demanded under a number of statutory powers of investigation, for example under Section 434 of the Companies Act 1985.

Clothing and Textiles

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with UK retailers concerning their sourcing policies for clothing and textiles; and if he will make a statement. [85330]

Mr. Battle: Sourcing decisions are, of course, for retailers themselves to take, based upon their own commercial judgment. However, my Department is involved in a number of initiatives designed to promote the competitiveness of UK textiles and clothing manufacturers, as well as the efficiency of the UK supply chain. For instance, in February this year I was pleased to announce that the DTI would be providing the secretariat for the Textiles and Clothing Strategy Group, a joint industry—union initiative to consider how best to ensure the sustainable development of the UK's textile and clothing industry. The retail sector is represented on that Group.

In addition, the DTI is a co-sponsor of the "Apparel and Textiles Challenge", a joint initiative with retailers and manufacturers to improve relationships in, and management of, the clothing and textile supply chain. Developments such as E-Commerce, internet and mail order selling, demand ever shorter delivery times and necessitate a quick response service from manufacturers which UK suppliers are well placed to meet.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 29 March 1999, Official Report, column 493, on special advisers, if he will give the total travel cost of each occasion when (a) departmental and (b) non-departmental advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity since 2 May 1997 and the place visited. [82416]

Mr. Byers: For the period 2 May 1997 to 31 March 1999, Special Advisers in my Department have travelled overseas in an official capacity on 12 occasions. The total cost of travel and any hotel accommodation is:

£

	Country	Total cost
1997
25–28 May	Japan	6,184.00
10–11 September	Washington DC	5,088.50
13 October	Brussels	301.50
12–13 November	Brussels	390.90
15–22 November	India and Australia	7,142.68
1998
11–18 January	China, Hong Kong	4,421.70
3–4 February	Paris	381.00
11 March	Strasbourg	542.80
6–7 May	Brussels	295.00
18–20 May	Geneva	598.67
18–20 June	Singapore	5,898.30
10–16 October	USA	7,024.44

All travel complied with the requirements of the Ministerial Code and the Civil Service Management Code.

Insolvency and Bankruptcy Law

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will announce the membership and terms of reference of the working group he has appointed to report on how insolvency and bankruptcy law can be made more enterprise-friendly. [69847]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 8 February 1999]: This work was undertaken by government officials and focused on:

- The extend to which insolvency and bankruptcy laws place undue obstacles in the way of entrepreneurs who have failed but want to try again.
- The extent to which the law reinforces the stigma attached to business failure and thereby inhibits enterprise.
- The extent to which it is or would be possible to distinguish between responsible risk-takers and others.

Officials reported to Ministers at the end of April and that report is under consideration.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 8 June 1999

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Paul Marc Hobson

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Attorney-General on what grounds he decided not to exercise his discretion under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1996 to certify that the charge of murder of Robert Hamill against Paul Marc Hobson be not treated as a scheduled offence. [85494]

The Attorney-General: In determining whether or not to certify that an offence should be treated as a non scheduled offence, I take into account the circumstances of the case on the basis of a note and recommendation furnished on behalf of the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland. In the case of Paul Marc Hobson, who faced a charge of murdering Robert Hamill, on the basis of the information available to me, I took the view that the offence was connected with the emergency and declined to issue a certificate.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL

Millennium Compliance

Mr. Coleman: To ask the President of the Council, pursuant to her answer of 20 April 1999, Official Report, columns 480–81, when the Government will issue further public information on the likely impact of the millennium bug. [86303]

Mrs. Beckett: I have today placed copies of the new public information booklet "The Millennium Bug—Facts Not Fiction" in the Libraries of the House. This has been compiled by Action 2000 on behalf of the Government for the general public and explains what the Millennium Bug is and how it could affect people in their everyday lives. It covers domestic appliances, home personal computers, shops and petrol stations, health, travel, personal finance, insurance and utilities.

The booklet will be distributed as an insert in most Sunday newspapers on 13 June and in TV listings guides the following week. It will also be available at main Post Office counters from 14 June. The booklet will be supported by TV, radio and press advertising.

DEFENCE

Vaccines

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the recent work of his Department's vaccine fact-finding team with particular reference to the findings relating to the presence of squalene in blood samples provided by US and British veterans. [83015]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The MOD's Fact Finding Team within the Gulf Veterans' Illnesses Unit (GVIU) was established in September 1997 to look into the implementation in-theatre of the 1991 immunisation programme against biological warfare agents, with particular reference to the level of coverage and uptake of vaccine across the various units of the UK Armed Forces that participated in the Gulf conflict. This review is based on oral testimony and extant documentary evidence, with a view to making public as much information as possible. The team's fieldwork was completed last autumn and a paper based on their work, and on other contemporary material that has been located, is in the course of preparation. This will be published once it is completed, which is expected to be within the next three months.

This review is aimed at providing more information about how the immunisation programme was carried out in principle, not the compositions of the vaccines used, which have already been set out in the MOD paper "Background to the Use of Medical Countermeasures to Protect British Forces during the Gulf War (Operation GRANBY)".

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which vaccines were acquired from the USA for the use of British soldiers in the Gulf War; which vaccines were used; and which contained squalene. [83014]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Details of the Ministry of Defence's programme to immunise UK troops against the potential threat posed by Iraq's biological weapons during the Gulf conflict were published in October 1997, in the MOD paper "Background to the Use of Medical Countermeasures to Protect British Forces during the Gulf War (Operation GRANBY)". This describes in detail how a vaccine against plague was purchased from the US DoD for use by UK forces. None of the other vaccines used for this programme were acquired from the US. None of the vaccines used for this programme contained squalene. In addition, UK Service personnel would have received other immunisations against disease that potentially posed a public health threat. So far as has been ascertained, none of the latter vaccines were either acquired from the US or contained squalene.

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if (a) his Department, (b) the Defence and Evaluation Research Agency and (c) the Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment produced vaccines or components of vaccines for use on Gulf War troops which contained squalene preparations. [83013]

Mr. Doug Henderson: No.

Strategic Export Controls

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those countries to which the sale of military aircraft has been stopped in each of the last five years, indicating the reasons for the decision in each case. [84524]

Mr. Spellar: On 25 March 1999, Official Report, column 343, my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office announced that the Government had published its first Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls. The Report contains, by rating, details of all licences refused or revoked by the Government between 2 May and 31 December 1997, and none of these covered military aircraft. A report covering 1998 will be issued in due course.

It would not be possible to provide validated data for previous years without significant inter-departmental effort and incurring disproportionate cost.

Gulf War Illnesses

Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what investigations have been undertaken into the physical rather than epidemiological aspects of illnesses exhibited by Gulf War veterans; [84354]

(2) what research has been undertaken into appropriate treatments for illness exhibited by Gulf war veterans. [84353]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The Government have pledged that appropriate research will be carried out into Gulf veterans' illnesses. In addition to two major epidemiological studies, the Ministry of Defence has in place a neuromuscular symptoms study. This study involves carrying out clinical tests on UK Gulf veterans. A separate study is examining the possible interactions between the various medical countermeasures used to protect UK personnel during the Gulf conflict, which includes laboratory research involving animals. These four research studies are complemented by an independent review of relevant research literature. A further study, which is being funded by the United States Government, is being undertaken by King's College, London. This study includes clinical tests on UK Gulf veterans.

Any UK Gulf veterans concerned about their health can seek a referral to the Gulf veterans' Medical Assessment Programme (MAP) for advice and a full medical. The assessment comprises various standard investigations and any further tests considered clinically appropriate by the MAP physician to provide as full a diagnosis as possible of any medical symptoms which a patient may be exhibiting. MAP physicians provide diagnostic information and recommend any appropriate treatment to the veteran's doctor. It is the veteran's doctor's responsibility to arrange any treatment and to monitor progress. A paper on the clinical findings from the first 1,000 patients seen by the MAP was published in the "British Medical Journal" on 30 January. A copy of this paper has already been placed in the Library of the House.

There is now strong scientific evidence, following the publication of a number of research papers over recent months, that Gulf veterans report more ill-health than other comparable groups. A further hypothesis, that Gulf veterans are not all suffering from a single illness, seems to be gaining support. However, there is still no medical or scientific consensus about the aetiology of the illnesses being suffered by some Gulf veterans. Nevertheless, the need for further research work in the light of emerging study findings in the UK and elsewhere (most notably from the United States), is kept under regular review by the Ministry of Defence and by the Medical Research Council (MRC), which advises the Government on its overall strategy for Gulf health issues. So far, the MRC has not recommended that the Ministry of Defence commissions research into possible treatments.

Nevertheless, the Ministry of Defence is aware that the United States Government announced in March that it would be beginning two medical treatment trials—an antibiotic treatment trial and exercise-behavioural therapy—in April to evaluate possible therapeutic approaches to improving Gulf veterans' health. The Ministry of Defence will monitor the outcome of these trials.

Military Uniforms (Overseas Manufacture)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those British military uniforms which are produced by overseas countries; and if he will list the countries that make such equipment. [84965]

Mr. Doug Henderson: This is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Defence Clothing and Textiles Agency. I have asked the Chief Executive to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Michael Roycroft to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 8 June 1999:

I am replying to your question to the Secretary of State for Defence as this matter falls within my area of responsibility. You ask that we provide a list of those British military uniforms which are produced by overseas countries and the countries that make such equipment.

Unfortunately, we are unable to provide the requested information. The Defence Clothing and Textiles Agency (DCTA) is responsible for the procurement of all clothing items for the Armed Forces. The vast majority of DCTA purchases are made-up garments, with MOD having no requirement for contractors to specify the country of origin of the textiles used to make the items, and there is no remit on DCTA to record such information.

We can, however, provide some analysis of clothing contracts. Current figures indicate that around 73% by value of DCTA clothing contracts for 1998/99 were awarded to UK firms, leaving 27% to overseas firms. As required by Government Accounting, DCTA must advertise all potential contracts valued greater than £160,670 in the European Journal, which certainly attracts overseas contractors. There can, therefore, be no "buy British" policy for Defence Textiles. The only contractual stipulation regarding the country of manufacture is that 10% of garments must be made at the main contractor's accredited facilities.

Of paramount importance is to ensure that fabrics meet the MOD's demanding specification, such as fibre content, wear quality and fire retardancy and the country of manufacture is secondary. All firms, from UK and abroad, utilise cloth manufactured overseas and whilst DCTA could certainly provide examples of countries supplying textiles, this information is considered nugatory as it would not give the comprehensive answer that you seek.

I am sorry I am unable to provide the information in the form it was requested.

Military Service

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what definition his Department uses of (a) active service and (b) conflict zone, in respect of military service. [84938]

Mr. Spellar: (a) I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by the then Minister of State for the Armed Forces to my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) on 9 March 1998, Official Report, column 46. (b) The Department has no definition of a conflict zone, as this expression has no recognised meaning.

Gulf War (Post-traumatic Stress Disorder)

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilians were seconded to the armed forces during the Gulf Crisis; and, of those, how many are known to be suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder. [84952]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Civilians, including foreign nationals, based in the UK and overseas, played a vital role in supporting British Forces during the 1990–1991 Gulf conflict, but the precise number seconded (that is attached to British Forces) has not been determined.

However, a review of Ministry of Defence (MOD) records shows that on 22 February 1991, 931 MOD civilian staff were reported as being in the Gulf theatre, but not all were working in direct support of British Forces. Of these, 785 were members of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary. In addition, there were a significant number of civilian contractors' employees working in direct support of British Forces in the Gulf theatre. My Department conservatively estimates that the number of civilian contractors' employees involved would have been in excess of 1,000 people.

MOD is aware of two civilians who claim to have post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) as a result of their time in the Gulf during the conflict. MOD has no mechanisms in place for routinely monitoring the health of its employees, ex-employees, contractors' employees or foreign nationals. However, civilians who provided direct support to British Forces in theatre during the Gulf conflict can be referred by their GP for examination at the MOD's Medical Assessment Programme (MAP). As at 26 May 1999, 14 civilians had been seen by MAP physicians.

European Defence and Security

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on his contribution to the debate at the WEU Council of 10 May on European Defence and Security after Amsterdam; what (a) matters and (b) documents were discussed; and what decisions were taken. [85523]

Mr. George Robertson: I was unable to attend the WEU Council meeting on 10 May because of Defence Questions in the House and was therefore represented by a Senior official from my Department. I was present at the session on 11 May.

One of the major points of business was continuing the process of informal reflection on European security and defence issues, initiated at the WEU meeting in Rome last November. Particular points emphasised in the discussion included: the need to rectify shortfalls in European military capability; the need to strengthen the EU's Common Foreign and Security Policy, including by giving the EU the means to decide on military matters and take political control of crisis management operations; the importance of involving the non-EU European Allies, and the Associate Partners, in future arrangements; and the continuing importance of NATO as the cornerstone of European security and defence policy. No documents were considered or decisions taken on these matters. A number of papers relating to other aspects of WEU business were noted or endorsed by Ministers at their meetings.

Armed Forces (Manning Level)

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the (a) actual manning and (b) establishment levels of the (i) Royal Navy (excluding the Royal Marines), (ii) Army, (iii) Royal Air Force and (iv) Royal Marines as at 31 March. [85910]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Personnel statistics are produced for the beginning of each month. As at 1 April 1999, the trained and untrained strengths and establishment (trained requirement) levels for each of the Services were as follows:

Service	Trained strength (a)	Untrained strength (b)	Total strength (c) = (a) + (b)	Trained requirement (d)
RN	33,204	3,743	36,947	34,556
Army[1]	96,300	13,422	109,772	[2]102,389
RAF	51,761	3,452	55,213	53,024
RM	5,867	887	6,754	6,387

[1] The Army figures are for UK Regulars; they do not include Gurkhas or Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service). If Gurkhas were included, the Army Strength would be 99,674, and Requirement would be 105,271.
[2] To implement the Post-SDR force structure, the Army's Requirement for UK Regulars will increase to 105,335 by 1 April 2005.

Battalion Parachute Regiments

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the (i) established strength and (ii) recruited strength of (a) 1, (b) 2, (c) 3, (d) 4 and (e) 10 Battalion Parachute Regiments. [85625]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The actual strength of the Battalions as at 1 April 1999, and their current and post-SDR liability, is detailed in the following table.

	Current Liability (1 April 1999)	Post SDR Liability[1]	Current Strength (1 April 1999)
1 PARA	634	624	521
2 PARA	634	646	[3]534
3 PARA	608	646	485
4 PARA (TA)	531	[2]324	224
10 PARA (TA)	530	[2]—	129

[1] These liabilities take into account new changes approved by the SDR which have yet to be implemented.
[2] On 1 July 1999, 4 and 10 PARA will merge and form a new 4 PARA with Regimental Headquarters and a Company at Pudsey with a detachment at Consett, a Company in Glasgow and a Company in London with a detachment in Croydon.
[3] The strength of 2 PARA does not include the Gurkha Reinforcement Company (GRC) that is currently attached to it.
Note:
Liability and strength figures include all capbadges except the Gurkhas referred to in footnote [3].

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency. [85648]

Mr. Spellar: I have nothing significant to add to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 5 May 1999, Official Report, columns 384–85. Our consultation with stakeholders continues and my right hon. Friend still hopes to be in a position to make an announcement on DERA's future later in the year.

Satellite Dishes

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost of supplying and fitting a gyro-stabilised satellite television dish to a frigate. [82902]

Mr. Spellar: No MOD funded gyro-stabilised satellite television dishes have been fitted to RN frigates. However, this type of dish has been fitted to two aircraft carriers, HMS Invincible and HMS Illustrious, and will be fitted to the third, HMS Ark Royal, during her current refit. The estimated cost of each dish is £36,000, excluding installation costs, which are included in the refit costs and are not separately identifiable. The majority of the RN's major warships are currently fitted with conventional domestic satellite equipment which provides reception whilst in harbour in European waters. We are planning to enhance this facility by providing reception whilst the ships are at sea. Under the revised arrangements, ships' crews would be able to see broadcasts within about 12 hours of transmission.

Training Aircraft (India)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what negotiations he has held with the Indian Government over provision of new training aircraft for the Indian Air Force. [84525]

Mr. Spellar: Although officials from the Defence Export Services Organisation are aware of the Indian Government's potential interest in the Hawk Aircraft, no formal negotiations have been held between the Ministry of Defence and the Indian Government over the provision of a new training aircraft for the Indian Air Force.

Atomic Energy (Co-operation)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent reports he has received from his United States counterpart in respect of the security of confidential nuclear weapons design information originating in the United Kingdom and shared with the United States Department of Energy under bilateral atomic energy co-operation agreements. [84726]

Mr. George Robertson: I have received no such reports.

Honours, Decorations and Medals

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the roles and responsibilities of (a) Ministers and (b) officials in the process for determining eligibility for the award of the General Service Medal for a period of military service. [84934]

Mr. Spellar: The qualifying criteria for the award of clasps to the General Service Medal and General Service Medal 1962 are laid down in the appropriate Command Paper. Ministers have no responsibilities in the process of determining eligibility for these awards. Officials in the appropriate medal office are responsible for determining individual eligibility by comparing a person's Record of Service against the criteria published for the award of the medal and the relevant clasp.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what are the terms of reference of the Committee of Honours, Decorations and Medals; [84936]

(2) what criteria the Committee on Honours, Decorations and Medals uses to determine whether a military event or service is eligible for the award of the General Service Medal; [84937]

(3) if he will list the members of the Committee on the Grant of Honours, Decorations and Medals; and who was responsible for appointing them. [84933]

Mr. Spellar: The Committee on the Award of Honours, Decorations and Medals is an official committee that reports directly to the Queen. I have therefore asked the Chairman of the Committee, Sir Richard Wilson, to write to the hon. Member with the information sought, and a copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Kosovo

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what occasions the Prime Minister's Press Secretary has attended meetings in his Department at which ministers, officials and senior officers have been formulating policy on Kosovo. [85379]

Mr. George Robertson [holding answer 25 May 1999]: The Prime Minister's Press Secretary has attended a number of meetings in my Department, as the Prime Minister or I have required.

Military Discipline

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to review military discipline for 15 to 18 year olds. [85496]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The UK does not recruit any personnel under the age of 16—and then only when an individual has completed his or her compulsory secondary schooling.

Discipline procedures in all three of the Armed Forces are kept under review at all times and amended as necessary. Major changes which require amendments to primary legislation are normally affected by the quinquennial Armed Forces Acts, which continue in force the three Service Discipline Acts (SDAs)—the Army Act 1955, the Air Force Act 1955 and the Naval Discipline Act 1957—and which include any amendments to reflect changes to civilian law over the preceding five years. Where there is a need, however, changes can be made by other legislative means. It is my Department's policy to preserve consistency as far as appropriate, practical and sensible, between civilian and military law; this applies equally to measures concerning those under the age of 18.

Pensions (Taxation)

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress made in discussions between his Department and the Inland Revenue regarding repayment of tax on pensions awarded prior to 31 March 1973 which have been reclassified. [85614]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The MOD is working closely with the Inland Revenue on the repayment of tax for the 179 Army pensioners identified as having had tax incorrectly deducted from their invalidity pension. The affected pensioners will all receive a full refund of the tax wrongly paid since their discharge, together with a repayment supplement reflecting the interest which might have been accrued on the amount of tax wrongly paid. The repayment of tax is being processed in three stages: the first stage, the repayment of the current year's tax, has been completed; the second stage covers the period 1994–95 to 1997–98 for which records are held and repayments for this period will be made shortly. The final stage, which covers the period from the individual's discharge date to 1994, is more difficult to calculate as records of pension and tax paid are not held and therefore need to be recreated. This work is under-way and repayment will be made as soon as possible.

RAF Quedgeley

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current status of the land that formerly constituted RAF Quedgeley. [85883]

Mr. Spellar: The areas formerly known as Sites 2, 4 and 6 and were sold on the open market during the latter part of 1997 and early 1998. That area of RAF Quedgeley known as Main Site was placed on the market in November 1997 and a preferred purchaser, Manor Farm Consortium, has been identified. Contract for Sale negotiations are now in hand.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with local councils and residents over the future of RAF Quedgeley during the last year. [85884]

Mr. Spellar: My Defence Estate officials have maintained close contact with both the County and Gloucester City Councils over the future of RAF Quedgeley. The City Council also jointly funded a feasibility study with MOD which made recommendations on appropriate forms of development for the re-use of the Main Site at Quedgeley.

Agents acting for my Department were also invited to make representation at the Gloucester County Structure Plan Examination in Public in September 1998. My officials also attended, and supported the City Council's aspirations for residential and employment uses on the site.

Correspondence

Mr. Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will reply to the letters dated 4 February and 4 May from the hon. Member for Rutland and Melton to the Minister for the Armed Forces in respect of the playing fields amenity at the site known as ABRO Old Dalby. [86112]

Mr. Spellar: I wrote to the hon. Member on 1 June.

Warships

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current operational life of (a) Sir Bedivere, (b) Sir Geraint and (c) Sir Percivale. [85959]

Mr. Spellar: It is planned to pay off RFA Bedivere in 2011, following an extension to her service life as a result of the recent Ship Life Extension programme. RFAs Sir Geraint and Sir Percivale have not been subject to similar life extension programmes and are expected to be withdrawn from service in 2003 and 2004 respectively, when they are due to be replaced by new vessels.

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the cost and timescale for the Service Life Extension Programme for (a) Sir Bedivere, (b) Sir Geraint and (c) Sir Percivale; and when contracts will be let. [85956]

Mr. Spellar: The Ship Life Extension Programme of RFA Sir Bedivere started in November 1994 and completed in June 1998, at a cost of £68.8 million. In the light of experience gained from this work, the decision was taken not to pursue similar life extension programmes on either RFA Sir Geraint or on RFA Sir Percivale. It is planned that these two vessels will be replaced by new ships in 2003 and 2004 respectively.

Porton Down

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, pursuant to the answer of 14 May 1999, Official Report, column 215, on Porton Down, what was the date of the Minister of Defence Procurement's visit. [85555]

Mr. Spellar: My noble Friend the Minister of State for Defence Procurement visited Porton Down during his term in office between September 1976 and May 1979. The diaries from that period do not record the exact date of the visit.

Trained Personnel

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the shortfall in numbers and percentage of trained personnel for the (i) Royal Navy, (ii) Army, (iii) Royal Air Force and (iv) Royal Marines. [85915]

Mr. Doug Henderson: The shortfall in numbers of trained personnel against the trained requirement as at 1 April 1999 (the latest figures available) is:

	Number/percentage
Royal Navy	1,352 (3.9%)
Army[1]	6,089 (5.9%)
Royal Air Force	1,263 (2.4%)
Royal Marines	520 (8.1%)

[1] The Army figure is for UK Regulars; it does not including Gurkhas or Royal Irish Regiment (Home Service). The Gurkha trained strength is 3,374, and trained requirement is 2,882, making a surplus of 492

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if his Department has applied the tests set out in the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee's September 1997 report on the Import and Export of Radioactive Waste to the reprocessing of German spent nuclear fuel at Sellafield. [82469]

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what plans he has to introduce legislation to make mandatory the tests set out by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee in its 1997 report on The Import and Export of Radioactive Waste; and if he will make a statement; [85463]

(2) what steps his Department takes to ensure that contracts for the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel are compatible with the policy set out in the 1995 White Paper Review of Radioactive Waste Management Policy on the import and export of radioactive waste; [85462]

(3) if he will order an independent inquiry to establish whether current contracts for the reprocessing of foreign spent nuclear fuel in the UK meet the tests recommended by the Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee in its 1997 report on The Import and Export of Radioactive Waste; and if he will make a statement. [85464]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 26 May 1999]: The Radioactive Waste Management Advisory Committee's September 1997 report on The Import and Export of Radioactive Waste suggests

> "specific tests which ... the Government should, subject to consultation, give to the regulators as guidance on the practical application of policy on the import and export of radioactive wastes".

As spent nuclear fuel has not traditionally been defined as radioactive waste, the tests outlined do not apply to the import of materials for reprocessing.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with (a) BNFL and (b) the United States Nuclear Authorities in respect of BNFL proposals to import irradiated spent nuclear fuel from the US-based Yankee Power utility for storage at Sellafield. [85615]

Mr. Meacher: DETR has not entered into discussions with either party on this issue, neither has it been party to any discussions BNFL might have had.

Genetically Modified Crops

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 12 May 1999, Official Report, column 151, on genetically-modified crops, how much money the Government will spend in total on (a) funding and (b) subsidising (i) farm-scale evaluations and (ii) other trial sites for genetically-modified crops in 1999; and how much money has been allocated for the same purposes in 2000. [85272]

Mr. Meacher: The total cost to Government of funding ecological studies as part of the farm scale evaluations in 1999–2000 is £233,000, this includes all the farms, not just the one near Swindon. The expected figure for 2000–01 is £702,000. There is no subsidy. The industry grouping SCIMAC is covering the whole cost of growing the crops for the farm scale evaluations. SCIMAC are providing the GM seeds for the paired comparisons of GM and non GM crops, and funding their growing and management on the farm and the disposal of the produce.

The Government are not spending any public money on the funding or subsidising of other trial sites of genetically modified crops in either year.

Road Noise Mitigation

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Chatham and Aylesford (Mr. Shaw) of 22 March 1999, Official Report, columns 50–1, on road noise mitigation if tunnel roads include motorways; over what period the 80dB(A) noise level will be measured; and whether local authorities will be provided with the noise level predictions for the design years of the roads which may qualify in their area. [85439]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Nearly all motorways are included within the trunk road network.

The noise level criterion of 80dB(A) is applied to an estimate of roadside noise based on readily available traffic information such as vehicle types, speeds and road surface. The estimate used is the average hourly L_{10} level over a typical weekday between the hours of 6am and 12 midnight.

On request, local authorities can be provided with information in this form.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the occasions since 1 May 1997 on which (a) he and (b) his ministers have had meetings concerning the implementation of the Government's transport policy with the Road Haulage Association, indicating in each case (i) the purpose and nature of the meeting, (ii) the duration of the meeting, (iii) the location of the meeting and (iv) those who attended. [85484]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Full details in answer to this question can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and his transport ministerial team since the General Election, have had many meetings both formal and informal with senior representatives of the Road Haulage Association (RHA) at which transport issues have been discussed. The inaugural meeting of the Road Haulage Forum was recently chaired by the then Minister for Transport, my right hon. Friend the Member for Hamilton, North and Bellshill (Dr. Reid) and attended by my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 8 April. My right hon. Friend, the then Minister for Transport also attended the RHA annual dinner on 11 May.

Barnet Football Club

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the progress in respect of its planning decision in relation to Barnet Football Club, Copthall Stadium. [85617]

Mr. Caborn: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State refused planning permission on 3 June. A copy of the decision letter has been sent to my hon. Friend.

Regional Development Agencies

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when regional development agencies will publish their required strategies. [86100]

Mr. Caborn: We expect RDAs to submit their initial strategies to Ministers in the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions by October 1999. The RDAs have all begun involving regional partners in drawing up their regional strategies. Draft versions of the strategies will be produced for consultation over the summer.

Thameslink

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of passenger loading on the Thameslink rail route. [85691]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Passenger counts are required by the terms of Thameslink's franchise agreement. The last counts were undertaken in the Autumn of 1998; and the results published on 29 March 1999 showed passenger loadings to be above the contractual threshold. In accordance with the contractual obligations of their franchise agreement Thameslink is producing for the Franchising Director a Feasibility Study considering options for additional capacity.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on the planned reduction in service by Thameslink, to and from Hendon. [85712]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Thameslink have made marginal changes to peak services in their Summer 1999 timetable. One morning train no longer calls at Hendon. The minimum level of service which the operator must provide is set out in the Passenger Service Requirement (PSR) which is the key part of the franchise agreement under which services are provided. PSRs are based on the services which were being operated by British Rail at the time of franchising. Thameslink's PSR specifies a weekly half hourly service between Hendon and London. In the Summer 1999 timetable Hendon continues to receive 60 services from London Kings Cross Thameslink and 63 services to London Kings Cross Thameslink.

Railway Rolling Stock

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions he has had with the Rail Regulator on the transfer of rolling stock between Train Operating Companies to reduce over-crowding. [85692]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Overcrowding is an issue addressed in franchise agreements between the Franchising Director and the Train Operating Companies (TOCs). The Franchising Director has facilitated discussions between TOCs for the transfer of rolling stock to address overcrowding. Such transfers are contractual matters between TOCs and discussions are currently taking place which if implemented would reduce overcrowding on some of the worst affected services in the South East.

Environmental Assessment

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if the environmental assessment regimes for afforestation, land drainage, salmon farming, harbours, electricity lines, pipe-lines and applications under the Transport and Works Act 1992 comply with EU Directive 97/11 on environmental assessment. [86049]

Mr. Raynsford: Responsibility for the consent regimes referred to in this question falls to five Government Departments. For convenience, I am replying on behalf of the other Departments as well as my Department.

Directive 97/11/EC amends Directive 85/337/EEC on environmental impact assessment. The amended procedures have been applied to land drainage projects which require planning permission and to fish farming in marine waters, which includes salmon farming.

Regulations to implement the amended Directive for the other consent regimes have yet to be finalised but these should come into force by the end of the year. Meanwhile extant regulations ensure that projects considered under these consent regimes are subject to environmental impact assessment before they may proceed. Pending entry into force of the amending regulations, administrative arrangements provide for the additional requirements of Directive 97/11/EC to be complied with in most cases.

Local Authority Debt

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the 10 most indebted local authorities in (a) 1997 and (b) 1998, indicating the cost (i) in total and (ii) per council tax payer of servicing the debt; and what plans he has to ensure that the debt level is reduced. [85776]

Ms Armstrong: The available information is given in the table. The cost of servicing the debt has been defined in terms of external interest paid by local authorities in the financial year 1997–98. It should be noted that authorities with high levels of debt are generally those which have undertaken capital investment and that longer term borrowing to finance capital expenditure is regulated by Government through the issue of credit approvals, for which support is provided through the Standard Spending Assessment mechanism.

It is for local authorities to determine arrangements for the prudent management and repayment of debt. We are currently examining options for encouraging earlier debt redemption.

Local authority [1]	Total external interest payments [2] (£ million)	External interest payments per adult [3] (£)
Birmingham	109.1	145
Manchester	115.9	370
Lambeth	78.4	386
Islington	88.0	640
Sheffield	77.7	187
Liverpool	75.3	214
Leeds	64.3	114

Local authority [1]	Total external interest payments [2] (£ million)	External interest payments per adult [3] (£)
Southwark	71.8	415
Hackney	59.4	421
Tower Hamlets	63.6	496

[1] 10 authorities with highest level of outstanding debt as at 31 March 1997

[2] Source: Revenue Summary (RS) outturn form for 1997/98.

[3] Data on the number of council taxpayers is not readily available. The figures are based on the number of resident adults, mid-year 1997 population estimates.

Airports (Runway Space)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans Her Majesty's Government have to secure the provision of extra runway space in the South-East of England. [85876]

Ms Glenda Jackson: On 11 March 1999, Official Report, columns 360–61, we announced our decision to undertake a study of airport issues in the South-East and East of England. That study will consider future policies for these airports within the framework of the Government's sustainable development principles. It will, among other things, consider whether new runway capacity in the region might be justified, having regard to social, environmental and economic considerations.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will ask the airport co-ordinator with responsibility for Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted to make a statement on runway constraints. [85878]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Airport Co-ordinator is not the appropriate person to make such a statement. The capacity of Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted is assessed twice a year, for the summer and winter operating seasons, by the airport operator, in consultation with airport users, air traffic control and the airport co-ordinator. Maximising use of runway capacity may be constrained by airspace availability, terminal capacity, and aircraft stand availability. The assessment is then used by the airport co-ordinator when he comes to allocate take off and landing slots for the season.

Air Traffic

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what action he plans to take to protect the slots at present allocated to Regional Air Services in the South East from re-allocation to other services. [85836]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The EC regulation that governs the slot allocation process permits Member States to reserve slots for domestic scheduled services on two grounds:

> That the slots concerned were being used for a particular route at the time of entry into force of the Regulation (1993), only one air carrier is operating on the route, and no other mode of transport can provide an adequate service.
>
> or
>
> Where public service obligations have been imposed on a route (that is, a transport link between two cities or regions rather than an airport specific route).

No slots are currently protected on either ground. The Government said in A New Deal for Transport (Cmnd 3950) that they would press for recognition in any revision of the Regulation of the case for maintaining access from regional airports into major hubs such as Heathrow and Gatwick. Proposals for revision are still awaited from the Commission.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what safeguards exist to ensure that airspace management by NATS of airports and air traffic, where NATS does not provide the services, is impartial. [85841]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Directions to the CAA under section 72 of the Civil Aviation Act 1982 state that NATS must provide air navigation services

> "without according preferential treatment to either civil or military users ... ".

If an airport or user has a complaint about the management of airspace by NATS, it could refer to, for instance, the Directorate of Airspace Policy or the Economic Regulation Group, depending on the circumstances. If they were not happy with the outcome, they would have the right to appeal to the Chairman of the CAA.

The ability of NATS to unfairly influence access to airspace from airports is limited. The allocation of slots in NATS airspace for aircraft leaving airports is beyond NATS' control—in fact it is decided by the Central Flow Management Unit in Brussels. The only legitimate circumstances under which NATS could restrict access to airspace would be for reasons of safety.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the change in air traffic movements at (a) Heathrow, (b) Gatwick, (c) Stansted, (d) Glasgow, (e) Manchester and (f) Belfast airports in each of the last 10 years. [85871]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The most recent statistics published by the Civil Aviation Authority cover the period 1987 to 1997. The information requested is set out in the table.

Aircraft movements (Thousand)

	1987	1988	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997
Heathrow	330	352	368	390	382	406	411	425	435	440	441
Gatwick	189	199	205	203	174	186	185	192	203	222	239
Stansted	47	47	51	47	53	61	63	75	84	96	105
Glasgow	102	101	108	111	106	107	104	95	92	92	98
Manchester	126	147	155	155	154	157	160	170	170	164	168
Belfast City	23	28	29	29	38	33	38	40	43	41	38
Belfast International	80	83	96	97	95	97	92	88	98	93	95

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what discussions his Department has held with the British airlines holding slots at South-East airports about their re-allocation. [85837]

Ms Glenda Jackson: None. The current regulation permits slots to be freely exchanged between carriers, or transferred by a carrier from one route or type of service to another. But British airlines should be aware of the Government's view, as set out in A New Deal for Transport, that any revision of the EC Regulation that governs the slot allocation process at congested airports should recognise the case for maintaining access from regional airports into congested hubs such as Heathrow and Gatwick.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will set out the Public Service Obligation rules to protect air services for those airports to which they apply. [85925]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The conditions under which a Public Service Obligation (PSO) can be established on an air route are set out in European Council Regulation 2408–92. The European Court of Justice found (Case T—260/94 Air Inter v The Commission) that a "route" should be defined as a transport link between two cities or regions, and is not airport specific.

A PSO on a regional service to London could therefore be fulfilled by services from any airport in the London airport system. A PSO may be imposed by a Member State in respect of scheduled air services to an airport serving a peripheral or development region in its territory, or on a thin route to any regional airport in its territory. The criterion is that the route must be vital to the economic development of the region in which the airport is situated. PSOs may be used to the extent necessary to ensure on a route the adequate provision of scheduled air services satisfying fixed standards of continuity, regularity, capacity and pricing, which standards air carriers would not assume if they were solely considering their commercial interest. There is provision for the carrier fulfilling the PSO to be reimbursed as appropriate for meeting the specified standards.

"Adequacy" is assessed with regard to: the public interest; the availability of other forms of transport; air fares and conditions; and the combined effect of all air carriers operating or intending to operate on the route.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what were the (a) estimated and (b) actual aircraft movements at the three major south east airports for (i) 1996–97 and (ii) 1997–98. [85879]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The CAA produces forecasts for air transport movements in total UK airspace and for the London Air Traffic Control Centre (LATCC) for planning purposes, but does not break the figures down on an airport by airport basis. The LATCC figures which cover all airports in the London area are as follows:

	Estimated	Actual
1996–97	1,504,000	1,507,000
1997–98	1,618,000	1,609,000

NATS keep records of the number of actual movements that they handle at each airport. The figures are as follows:

	1996–97	1997–98
Heathrow	439,000	443,000
Gatwick	224,000	244,000
Stansted	98,000	106,000

Air Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will list the occasions in the last five years where twin-engined transport aircraft have made single-engined approaches to Heathrow; [85846]

(2) if he will list the number of incidents in the last five years in which aircraft have flown over central London with one engine inoperative intending to land at Heathrow. [85886]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Civil Aviation Authority has received 24 reports relating to transport aircraft approaching Heathrow airport with one engine inoperative in the last five years. Nine of these reports related to twin engined aircraft. It is not possible to determine which, if any, of these incidents involved flights over central London as approaches are also made from the west.

The dates on which the incident involving twin engined aircraft occurred, together with the aircraft types involved, are as follows:

Date	Aircraft type
22 September 1994	B757
25 January 1995	B737
1 November 1996	B737
24 November 1996	B737
5 July 1997	A310
26 August 1997	B757
15 May 1998	A321
9 July 1998	A300
20 January 1999	A310

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of trends in the number of aircraft near-misses in the last year; and what action has been initiated to check the efficiency of the air traffic control system. [85847]

Ms Glenda Jackson: All reported airprox incidents are fully investigated by the independent UK Airprox Board (UKAB). In 1998, UKAB investigated 202 airprox incidents, a figure slightly lower than at any time in the past decade, despite significant increases in traffic over that period. Of these, only 7 were assessed as being risk-bearing and attributable to National Air Traffic Services (NATS). This is the lowest figure in the 1990s despite record traffic levels. However, there is no cause for complacency and Ministers and NATS continue to ensure that the highest priority is given to maintaining and, where practicable, improving on the UK's outstanding safety record.

Coastguard

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what provision HM Coastguard makes for the control of the operations room by experienced staff during meal breaks. [85839]

Ms Glenda Jackson: HM Coastguard Operational Instructions are clear that during a temporary absence of a watch manager, such as meal breaks, the watch manager is to ensure that a suitable officer is nominated and has assumed full responsibility for the Watch, and that an entry to this effect is made in the Operations Room Log.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list each occasion in the last 12 months on which untrained staff were substituted for trained Coastguard personnel. [85842]

Ms Glenda Jackson: On no occasions were untrained staff substituted for trained Coastguard personnel over the last 12 months.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what consultation has taken place with the Coastguard at Dover Maritime Rescue Control Centre about the implementation of the mandatory reporting regime. [85881]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Mandatory reporting has been discussed at each 3 monthly meeting of the Channel Navigation Information Service (CNIS) Technical Working Group since September 1997. Coastguard Operations Room Staff representatives are present at all these meetings. In October 1997, a special meeting took place involving Regional, District, Operations Room and the, then Coastguard Agency (TCA) Technical Staff to discuss the implications and any necessary changes to current procedures. The last two Dover District Management Board Meetings have included mandatory reporting as the main agenda item. Two circulars on the subject have been issued to all staff who also have access to the International Maritime Organization (IMO) source documentation.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions in the last six months the broadcast service for mariners in the Swansea area has been reduced. [85880]

Ms Glenda Jackson: There have been no occasions in the last six months when the broadcast service to mariners in the Swansea area has been reduced.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what extra staff will be required by HM Coastguard to fulfil their additional duties to deal with weather forecasts and meteorological reports; and what talks have taken place on this subject with staff representatives. [85840]

Ms Glenda Jackson: HM Coastguard has recruited 40 additional Coastguard Watch Assistants (Operations) nationwide to supplement existing Co-ordination Centre watchkeeping complements to assist in the broadcast of Maritime Safety Information (MSI).

The Coastguard Trade Unions were notified of HM Coastguard's future responsibilities for MSI in October 1998, and this was followed by a first meeting in November 1998. Consultation took place in February 1999 with Operations Room staff and District Management teams regarding the operational procedures, radio coverage, frequencies and scheduling required for the broadcast of Maritime Safety Information by HM Coastguard. As part of this process, the Coastguard Trade Unions were also invited to comment. The Maritime Safety Information radio broadcast instructions provided to HM Coastguard Co-ordination Centres are a direct result of this consultation.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the recommended staffing levels for the Maritime Rescue Sub Centre Co-ordinating stations at (i) Oban, (ii) Liverpool, (iii) Belfast and (iv) Stornoway for the period January to April 1999. [85843]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The recommended staffing levels at Oban, Liverpool, Belfast and Stornoway for the period January to April 1999 are as follows.

Oban—1 District Controller (DC), 1 Deputy District Controller (DDC), 4 Watch Managers (WMs), 5 Watch Officers (WOs), 7 Coastguard Watch Assistants (Operations) (CWA (O)), 1 Coastguard Watch Assistant (Admin) (CWA(A))

Liverpool—1 DC, 1 DDC, 4 WMs, 8 WOs, 8 CWA (O)s, 1CWA(A)

Belfast—1 DC, 1 DDC, 4 WMs, 9 WOs, 6 CWA (O)s, 1CWA(A)

Stornoway—1 DC, 1 DDC, 4 WMs, 5 WOs, 7 CWA(O)s, 1 CWA(A).

A full-time CWA post may be split between 2 part-time staff.

Domestic Air Routes

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) what changes there have been in the published times for arrival and departure for domestic air routes in the last 12 months; [85927]

(2) what has been the change in scheduled journey time between (a) Heathrow, (b) Gatwick and (c) Stansted and (i) Glasgow, (ii) Manchester and (iii) Belfast International airports in each of the last 10 years. [85926]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The information requested in the first question is set out in the table. The data have been gathered from the Official Airline Guide. Due to the number of airports and different permutations of routes, the information requested in the second question could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Route	Approximate scheduled journey time in 1999 (minutes)	Change over last 10 years
Heathrow-Glasgow	75	Increase of approximately 2 minutes in 1999
Gatwick-Glasgow	85	Increase of approximately 2 minutes in 1998
Stansted-Glasgow	80	No change
Heathrow-Manchester	55	Increase of approximately 5 minutes in 1999
Gatwick-Manchester	65	Increase of approximately 5 minutes in 1999

Route	Approximate scheduled journey time in 1999 (minutes)	Change over last 10 years
Stansted-Manchester	60	No change
Heathrow-Belfast	75	No change
Gatwick-Belfast	No service
Stansted-Belfast	No service

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what principles and objectives underlie the review of standard spending assessments; and if he will make a statement. [85740]

Ms Armstrong: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given to the hon. Member for Sutton and Cheam (Mr. Burstow) by the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, my hon. Friend the Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) on 24 May 1999, Official Report, column 8.

British Rail Employees (Asbestosis)

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 84, on British Rail employees, what information is available from the British Railways Board on compensation payments since 1991 to former employees of British Rail who are diagnosed as having mesothelioma, asbestosis or primary carcinoma of the lungs related to exposure to asbestos. [85935]

Ms Glenda Jackson: I refer to my answers of 17 May 1999, Official Report, column 245 and 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 84. I will ask the Secretary to the Board to write to my hon. Friend, to provide an opportunity for her to discuss any particular concerns she may have in this matter.

School Budgets

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions, pursuant to his answer of 21 May 1999, Official Report, column 471, on school budgets, if it is his objective in carrying out the present review of the formula for distributing central Government grant to local authorities to remove factors that cannot be justified by reference to actual cost and other objectively verifiable criteria. [85703]

Ms Armstrong: The objectives of the current review of revenue grant distribution are to investigate thoroughly whether there is a better way of determining the distribution of revenue support grant which is simpler, more stable, more robust and fairer than the present arrangements for SSAs. These objectives were set out in last year's White Paper, "Modern Local Government—In Touch with the People".

Environment Task Force

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when the Green Ministers' Committee (a) has discussed and (b) plans to discuss, the New Deal Environment Task Force. [86040]

Mr. Meacher: The Green Ministers Committee does consider policy areas of cross-cutting interest at its meetings, in addition to its main task of developing systems to integrate sustainable development and environmental concerns into Government policies and operations. We have not so far discussed the Task Force nor is it on the agenda for our next meeting in July. But we may wish to turn to it at a later date.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will introduce an Environment Task Force Charter Mark to be awarded to projects achieving environmental benefit to the community. [86072]

Mr. Caborn: Charter Mark is the Government's award scheme for encouraging and recognising excellence in public service. All public service organisations which serve the public direct, including public service organisations which deliver Environment Task Force placements, can apply for a Charter Mark. However, the environmental benefit of the projects is not a criteria for the award of Charter Marks.

Providers of Environment Task Force placements have also been able to apply for New Deal Awards which will soon be presented to employers and other organisations in recognition of the significant contribution they have made to the success of the New Deal.

Ex-service Personnel

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what research his Department has assessed of the number of (a) homeless people and (b) prisoners who are former members of the armed forces. [85665]

Mr. Raynsford: The Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions does not routinely collect information on the number of homeless people who are former members of the armed forces. However, research on single homeless people and rough sleepers commissioned by the Department provides some information on the proportion of these groups which have a service background. Single Homeless People (HMSO, 1993) found that a fifth of a sample of single homeless people living in hostels or bed and breakfast hotels had been in the armed forces or merchant navy (not counting national service or the territorials). From Street to Home: An Evaluation of Phase 2 of the Rough Sleepers Initiative (TSO, 1996) found that a quarter of rough sleepers had been in the armed forces or merchant navy.

As part of the Social Exclusion Unit review of Rough Sleeping (Cm 4008) the Department reviewed key research on rough sleeping. The review covered a number of studies dealing with rough sleepers with service backgrounds, including the two DETR studies described above, plus research commissioned by voluntary sector organisations including Falling Out: a research study of homeless ex-service people, Randall & Brown (Crisis, 1994), and Homeless on Civvy Street, Gunner and Knott (Ex-Service Action Group, 1997). All these studies show that between a quarter and a fifth of rough sleepers have been in the armed forces at some stage.

As for data on prisoners, the information requested is not available. No information regarding an individual's professional status, prior to reception into a Prison Service establishment, is recorded centrally.

Parish and Town Councils

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what powers he has to monitor the composition of parish and town councils; and if he will make a statement. [85547]

Ms Armstrong: The Secretary of State has no powers to monitor the composition of parish and town councils.

Concessionary Fares (Children)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has to exempt children who are in full time education from paying full fares on bus and train services; and if he will make a statement. [85548]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Transport operators may offer discounted travel for young people commercially if they wish to do so. Local authorities may also provide discounted travel for young people up to the age of 18 who are in full-time education. It is for individual local authorities to decide whether to do so, what the size of any discount should be, and whether it should apply to train as well as bus travel. In addition, it is for Local Education Authorities to decide whether a child qualifies for free or assisted travel to school.

Provision of reduced fares varies, and my Department is currently undertaking a survey of local authorities and operators. The results will be available to the School Travel Advisory Group, which comprises representatives of the relevant Government Departments and of parents, teachers, local authorities and other interested parties, so that the Group can identify and promulgate best practice.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86086]

Ms Glenda Jackson: All staff in DETR(C), its associated bodies and agencies were already paid above the national minimum wage on its introduction on 1 April 1999.

Heathrow Airport (Terminal 5)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what has been the cost to his Department of the inquiry into the Heathrow Fifth Terminal; and what is the estimated cost to his Department of the Inspector's preparation of his report. [86041]

Mr. Caborn: The cost of the Heathrow Terminal 5 Inquiry to the Department was approximately £6 million. In addition, the Department's agencies (Planning Inspectorate, Highways Agency and Royal Parks Agency) spent a further £5 million collectively on inquiry costs. It is estimated that the preparation of the Inspector's report could cost the Department and Planning Inspectorate combined up to £1 million.

Fishing Vessels (Safety Equipment)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will commission an assessment of the (i) cost and (ii) risk effectiveness of the safety equipment currently required to be carried by fishing vessels. [85855]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The Fishing Vessel (Safety Provisions) Rules 1975 specified the carriage requirements for safety equipment on all UK registered fishing vessels. Since then, changes to those requirements have been developed within the context of the Fishing Industry Safety Group (FISG), in which representatives of the fishing industry have themselves influenced the standards being required. For smaller vessels (under 12 metres in length) we hope soon to introduce a new Code of Practice. This Code will specify safety equipment which should be carried. The list of safety equipment to be carried results from consultation with the industry and the benefits of each item have already been fully considered. A special assessment of cost and risk effectiveness of safety equipment is not necessary as requirements are kept under continuous review by the Maritime and Coastguard Agency and the industry through the mechanism of the FISG.

Telecommunications Masts

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received regarding the location of telecommunication masts and the issuing of interim planning guidance pending publication of the findings of the National Radiological Protection Board into the non-thermal effects of microwave radiation; and if he will make a statement. [85931]

Mr. Raynsford: Draft guidance on land use planning and electromagnetic fields (EMFs) was issued for consultation by my Department in conjunction with the Department of Health on 8 December 1998. Copies were placed in the Library. We have received 147 responses to the consultation draft. Since issuing the draft circular, my Department has received four Parliamentary Questions and some 70 letters related to the possible health effects of telecommunications apparatus.

The draft guidance reflects the advice to Government of the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) that there is no convincing evidence of a causal link between exposure to EMFs and cancer. The Board's advice is based upon a review and assessment of published scientific studies covering the fields of epidemiology, biology and dosimetry. In continuing to review the science, the NRPB takes into account the range of reported biological effects, including those of a non-thermal nature. We shall continue to take NRPB advice into consideration in developing policy on land use planning and electromagnetic fields.

Holiday Lets

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will take steps to prevent properties bought under the right to buy legislation from being let to holidaymakers for extended periods on a commercial basis; and if he will make a statement. [85895]

Mr. Raynsford: We are not aware of a widespread problem though we shall consider any proposals that may be put to us by the local authority involved. Meanwhile it could be premature and prejudicial to comment on an issue that is likely to go back before the courts.

Walton Bridge

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on what date he was formally asked by Surrey County Council if he planned to call in their planning application for a temporary replacement for the existing Walton Bridge across the Thames; and when he expects to take a decision. [85903]

Mr. Raynsford: Surrey County Council referred the planning application to the Government Office for the South East in March 1999. We expect to issue a decision shortly.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what central Government grant will be made available for the construction of a temporary replacement to the existing Walton Bridge across the Thames; and when he expects it to be released to Surrey County Council. [85902]

Mr. Raynsford: In the local transport capital expenditure settlement announced in December last year, Surrey County Council was allocated £2,602,000 for bridge strengthening in 1999–2000. The allocation included £1,590,000 for the A244 Thames Crossing at Walton.

Half of this allocation will be paid as Transport Supplementary Grant and will be released to the County Council in four equal quarterly instalments during the financial year. The remaining resources have been allocated as Annual Capital Guideline.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Museums

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he intends to transfer responsibility for any of his Department's sponsored museums to the Greater London Authority. [80236]

Mr. Chris Smith [holding answer 13 April 1999]: The Greater London Authority Bill, currently before Parliament, does not provide for the transfer of responsibility for any of the museums and galleries which are sponsored by my Department. However, it is my intention to transfer to the Greater London Authority the responsibility for making some appointments to the Boards of museums which were previously funded by the Greater London Council. I am considering with colleagues the extent to which the Greater London Authority might be given further responsibilities in respect of museums and galleries in order to enhance the cultural role for the Authority.

Works of Art (Nazi Period)

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what plans he has (a) to put a time limit on claims in respect of works of art of dubious provenance from the Nazi period and (b) to seek amendment of the law governing de-accessioning of museum holdings; [85241]

(2) how many works of art of dubious provenance from the Nazi period have so far been identified in British museums; when further inventories of such items will be published; and what plans he has to publicise these inventories; [85244]

(3) how many museums are undertaking inventories of works of art in their possession of dubious provenance from the Nazi period; and what plans he has to increase the number of museums involved in the inventory process; [85243]

(4) what is his policy on works of art in British museums that are of dubious provenance from the Nazi period. [85242]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government have asked members of the National Museum Directors' Conference to examine their collections with a view to finding out whether any items may have been looted during World War II and the Nazi period. Any claims will need to be considered on their merits on a case-by-case basis.

Some works have been identified which have gaps in their provenance, but this does not necessarily mean that they are the result of spoliation during the Holocaust and World War II. Research is continuing and it is hoped that updated information about the progress of this research will be published later this year.

The National Museum Directors' Conference has published Action Plans for 23 national museums, galleries and libraries, and I have deposited a copy of these in the Library. The Museums and Galleries Commission has recently issued a Statement of Principles to all Registered Museums. This recommends action to be taken by non-national institutions. The Museums and Galleries Commission will also be having discussions with those non-national institutions which have major art collections about how they might approach the issue of research into provenance. I have deposited a copy of this Statement of Principles in the Library.

The possibility of a time limit on claims is an issue which will need to be discussed with museums and galleries and other interests. However, the Statement of Principles published by the National Museums Directors' Conference last November suggests that an institution which has fully publicised the details of a work which it believes might have been the result of spoliation during the Nazi period and World War II would normally expect to receive a claim within six years. I have deposited a copy of this Statement of Principles in the Library. The question of de-accessioning will be considered on a case by case basis if, and when, there are successful claims for objects to be returned.

Public Libraries (Funding)

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list the local authorities which have applied for funding from (a) the Capital Modernisation Fund for IT facilities in public libraries and (b) the National Lottery Opportunity Fund for funding for libraries, in each case since its introduction; and what sums were awarded. [85315]

Mr. Alan Howarth: The detailed criteria for these programmes have still to be finalised, so no library authorities have yet been invited to bid.

Museums, Libraries and Archives Council

Ms Perham: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when his Department will publish the report of the Museums, Libraries and Archives Council Design Group; and if he will make a statement about his plans for implementing the recommendations in the report. [86305]

Mr. Chris Smith: My Department is today placing copies of the report in the Libraries of both Houses. A copy is also being made accessible on my Department's website, www.culture.gov.uk. The Department would be pleased to receive any views from interested parties about the report, as it takes forward the process of establishing the Museums, Libraries and Archives Council by 1 April 2000. There are a number of issues arising from the report which affect the libraries, museums and archives communities and which my Department will be discussing with bodies representing those communities over the coming months. To start this process, I have written to the National Museum Directors' Conference to invite them to propose ways in which the national museums and galleries, and the British Library, can assist the new body in its work.

Detailed decisions about the role and priorities of the Museums, Libraries and Archives Council will be made by the Chair and other board members once they have been appointed later this year.

BBC

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if he will make a statement on his responsibilities in relation to the funding of the BBC's commercial activities; [85507]

(2) if he will list the arrangements under which the BBC is accountable to his Department for its commercial activities. [85346]

Janet Anderson: The BBC Charter and Agreement provide a framework for ensuring that the Corporation's commercial activities are funded, operated and accounted for separately from its public service activities. It is for the BBC's Board of Governors to ensure that the BBC meets its obligations in this area. Any commercial activities undertaken by the BBC are subject to the same UK and EU competition law as its competitors. The BBC publishes separate annual reports and accounts for its commercial subsidiaries BBC Worldwide Ltd. and BBC Resources Ltd. These are submitted to the Secretary of State and presented to Parliament.

The Secretary of State's approval is required before the BBC can provide new commercial services itself or enter into joint ventures with commercial partners to provide new services.

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 142, on the BBC, if he will place in the Library a copy of his Department's rules governing borrowing by the BBC and its commercial subsidiaries. [85892]

Janet Anderson: Article 3(w) of the BBC's Royal Charter governs borrowing. As in all other aspects of the BBC's remit, its commercial activities are subject to the Royal Charter and Agreement. This is available in the Library of the House.

Museum of London

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has for the future funding of the Museum of London. [86081]

Mr. Chris Smith: In common with all DCMS sponsored museums and galleries, the Museum has a funding agreement with my Department for the financial years up to and including 2001–02. Funding decisions beyond then have yet to be taken.

Millennium Dome

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what plans he has to make books of poetry, drama, the visual arts, architecture, history, biography and fiction available for purchase in the Dome; [86082]

(2) what plans he has to make recorded music available for purchase in the Dome; [86079]

(3) what plans he has to make copies of (a) the Bible and (b) multi-faith religious books available for purchase in the Dome. [86078]

Janet Anderson: As part of the New Millennium Experience Company's (NMEC) own retailing arrangements at the Millennium Dome, a range of books and other printed material relevant to the millennium and the Millennium Experience will be on sale. The company's general policy is not to replicate, or compete with, the retailing opportunities which people enjoy in their high streets and local town centres. The company's policy on recorded music reflects the same principles.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will list those purposes for which his Department and its executive agencies require a birth certificate to be provided by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [85686]

Mr. Chris Smith: In line with general practice elsewhere in Government, members of staff recruited by DCMS are routinely asked to provide proof of identity prior to taking up appointment with the Department. Birth certificates, passports, and a range of other documents are acceptable for this purpose. It is not mandatory for staff to provide a copy of their birth certificate. Contractors are expected to undertake satisfactory checks on proof of identity of their staff before they take up work with the Department.

Television News

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he will instruct the ITC to obtain from ITV the latest figures showing (i) the change in the numbers watching news on Channel 3 since the abolition of News at 10 and (ii) the change in the viewing numbers for the 10.00 to 10.30 pm weekday slot on Channel 3 since the abolition of News at 10. [85775]

Janet Anderson: ITV began their new evening schedule on 8 March, replacing the bulletin at 5.40 pm to 6.00 pm and News at Ten with a half hour news bulletin from 6.30 pm to 7.00 pm and an update from 11 pm to 11.15 pm. For the four weeks beginning 27 April, the latest figures available to the ITC, the average audiences who were watching news on Channel 3 and the figures for the equivalent weeks in 1999 are as follows:

(i)

	Million
1998
5.40 pm to 6.00 pm	4.1
10.00 pm to 10.30 pm	5.5
Total	9.6
1999
6.30 pm to 7.00 pm	5.4
11.00 pm to 11.15 pm	3.6
Total	9.0

(ii) During this period in 1998, 5.5 million were watching Channel 3 in the 10.00 pm to 10.30 pm slot and during the same period in 1999, since the rescheduling of News at Ten, this has changed to 6.0 million.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

World Science Congress

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has made for a British delegation to the World Science Congress in Budapest. [85305]

Mr. Battle: The exact composition of the UK delegation will be determined soon. It is likely to comprise representatives from the Office of Science and Technology, the Department for International Development, the United Kingdom's Permanent Delegation to UNESCO and the Parliamentary Office of Science and Technology. It is hoped that other non-governmental organisations will also be represented.

The Government's Chief Scientific Adviser, Sir Robert May, is giving one of the main presentations during the first, scientific, section of the Conference, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development will make a statement on behalf of the Government during the plenary debate in the final section of the Conference.

Millennium Compliance (Energy)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the proceedings of the Energy Council of 11 May relating to the millennium bug in the energy sector; what documents were discussed; and what contribution he made to the debate. [85522]

Mr. Battle: For a general report on the Energy Council, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) on 17 May 1999, Official Report, columns 253–54. For the item on the millennium bug, the Council took note of an oral presentation by the Commission. The Commission reported on the recent outcome of the Telecommunications Council in respect of the millennium bug and on progress being made in the energy sector, addressing, in particular, the supply of electricity, natural gas, oil and coal, as well as questions relating to nuclear safety. The Council asked to be kept informed of progress.

Sellafield

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he was first informed of negotiations between British Nuclear Fuels plc and Maine Yankee Atomic Power on the reprocessing of spent nuclear fuel at Sellafield; and if he will make a statement. [85461]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 26 May 1999]: I understand that BNFL was one of the nuclear fuel services companies approached by the owners of the Maine Yankee reactor in New England, USA, about options for removing spent nuclear fuel from the now closed reactor. In the course of these informal discussions which took place during 1998, it became clear that it would not be possible for BNFL and Maine Yankee to conclude a contract which would be consistent with both UK Government policy on the importation of radioactive waste and US Government policy on reprocessing. The discussions were, therefore, brought to an end and this Department was so informed.

Strategic Export Controls

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to announce the outcome of the consultation exercise on strategic export controls. [85538]

Dr. Howells: As announced in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) on 30 November 1999, Official Report, column 55, the responses to the consultation exercise on strategic export controls were, with the exception of two for which complete confidentiality was requested, placed in the Libraries of both Houses and in the Library of the Department. Copies of the responses are also available on request from the Department's Export Control Organisation. The Government are currently reviewing the proposals contained in the White Paper in the light of responses received and are committed to introducing legislation as soon as time is available in the legislative programme.

Post Office

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the criteria are for approval of capital purchases overseas by the Post Office. [86047]

Mr. Ian McCartney: As was announced by my right hon. Friend, the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, to this House in the statement on the future of the Post Office on 7 December 1998, Official Report, columns 21–24, the Government will approve normal Post Office requests for borrowing for investment cases that are commercially robust. Separate fast-track arrangements will be put in place for considering the largest strategic investments. Further details will be set out in our forthcoming White Paper on the future of the Post Office.

Electricity Trading Arrangements

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he now expects to conclude the Review of Electricity Trading Arrangements. [86045]

Mr. Battle: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mrs. Brinton) on 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 300.

Imports (Forced Labour)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice is available from his Department to individuals and companies who wish to avoid importing goods made with the use of forced labour or child labour. [85829]

Mr. Wilson: The Government strongly support a proposed new ILO Convention to eliminate the worst forms of child labour, and funding programmes such as the ILO International Programme on the Elimination of Child-Labour (IPEC). Individuals or companies are advised to seek assurances on the matter from their retailers or suppliers. The Government strongly support recent initiatives by the private and voluntary sector to develop or promote codes of conduct in this area; and an increasing number of UK companies are entering into such arrangements with their overseas suppliers.

Exports (Indonesia)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 6 May 1999, Official Report, column 450, concerning ECGD liabilities in respect of exports in Indonesia if he will list (i) the unrecovered claims, (ii) the proportion of the unrecovered claims which relates to military exports and (iii) the unrecovered claims which ECGD expects to be written off. [85848]

Mr. Wilson: (i) Details of the unrecovered claims arising in contracts involving exports to Indonesia are classified as "commercial in confidence" and cannot, therefore, be disclosed by ECGD without the consent of the individual exporters concerned.

(ii) The proportion of the unrecovered claims of £48 million which related to military exports was 52 per cent. (value £25 million).

(iii) ECGD expects that no unrecovered claims will be written off. It is expected that a full recovery will be made under the provisions of a bilateral rescheduling currently being negotiated between the UK and Indonesia. This bilateral debt agreement is intended to cover debt in relation to both civil and military contracts signed prior to 1 July 1997, and the debt to be restructured over the period to 31 March 2000 amounts to some £240 million.

Raw Milk

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he plans to respond to the report of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission on the selling of raw milk. [86025]

Dr. Howells: I refer my hon. Friend to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry's answer to the hon. Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Heath), on 6 May 1999, Official Report, column 1069.

BBC Commercial Policy

Mr. Fallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions his officials have had with the BBC on its commercial policy guidelines; and if the guidelines were subject to prior approval by (a) his Department and (b) the Office of Fair Trading. [85893]

Dr. Howells: DTI officials have not had discussions with the BBC on its commercial policy guidelines, which were not subject to prior approval either by the Department or by the Office of Fair Trading.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86088]

Mr. Ian McCartney: The lowest rate of pay for any staff in the Department increased from £7,785 to £7,900 per annum with effect from 1 April 1999. 170 staff benefited from this increase.

Arms Exports (Indonesia)

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what system has been established for the end-use monitoring of military equipment sold to the Government of Indonesia in the last five years. [85970]

Mr. Hoon: I have been asked to reply.

No formal mechanisms exist at present for systematically monitoring the use of British defence equipment once it has been exported. We have made clear to the Indonesian authorities that British-supplied equipment should not be used against civilians to prevent the exercise of their rights of free expression, assembly and association, or in violation of other international human rights standards.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Genetically Modified Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development, pursuant to her answer of 15 February 1999, Official Report, column 424, on genetically modified crops, if she will make a statement on the progress of the research on the potential impact on farmers in developing countries of the increased use of genetically modified crops. [85489]

Clare Short: Later this year we will publish a progress report on our natural resources knowledge activities, including details of those studies which address genetic modification issues of concern and interest to developing countries. The three-year research project on the potential risks of introducing transgenic plants into traditional cropping systems, referred to in my earlier answer, began in April 1999. Results are not yet available. A short, predictive study of the potential effects on the livelihoods of poor people in developing countries of so-called "terminator" gene technologies is to be commissioned shortly for completion by the end of this year.

Overseas Debt

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the sums of debt owed to the United Kingdom by each developing country. [85525]

Clare Short: The figures below show the amounts owed by governments of developing countries to the Department for International Development and to the Export Credits Guarantee Department.

We have cancelled the aid debts of the poorest countries to the value of £1.2 billion since 1978. Under the Commonwealth Debt Initiative announced in 1997, we have agreed to cancel the aid debts of the remaining Commonwealth countries which are committed to eradicating poverty and achieving the international development goals, which have transparent and accountable government, and which are bearing down on corruption.

In the Paris Club, the UK has played a full role. We have provided £1.3 billion of debt relief since 1989 on official export credit debt.

Outstanding debt to the UK

£ million

Country	Outstanding aid loans [1]	Official export credit debt [2]
Algeria	—	164.6
Angola	—	106.0
Antigua & Barbuda	1.60	1.60
Argentina	—	55.60
Belize	11.9	—
Benin	—	2.70
Bolivia	—	11.50
Bosnia	—	3.00
Brazil	1.97	523.70
Bulgaria	—	11.90
Burkina Faso	—	1.00
Cameroon	—	69.90
Cayman Islands	0.17	—
Central African Republic	—	0.30
Colombia	0.15	0.30
Congo	—	139.50
Costa Rica	0.76	—
Cote d'Ivoire	—	22.30
Croatia	—	78.00
Cuba	—	78.70
Cyprus	0.12	—
DR Congo	—	138.90
Ecuador	11.50	56.40
Egypt	—	183.70
Ethiopia	—	11.70
Gabon	—	133.10
Ghana	—	2.10
Guinea Republic	—	5.20
Guyana	—	43.90
India	2.40	—
Indonesia	—	42.10
Jamaica	29.10	2.60
Jordan	—	342.50
Kenya	—	36.70
Liberia	0.08	14.60
Macedonia	—	4.50
Madagascar	—	27.20
Malawi	—	0.70
Malaysia	2.80	—
Mali	—	4.10
Mauritania	—	6.80
Mexico	—	65.50
Morocco	—	53.10
Mozambique	—	89.90
Nicaragua	—	1.00
Niger	—	10.90
Nigeria	4.93	3,496.30
Paraguay	1.87	—
Peru	—	154.70
Philippines	2.77	23.80
Poland	—	898.90
Russia	—	631.90
Senegal	—	1.50
Seychelles	8.60	—
Sierra Leone	—	3.60
Somali Republic	—	27.40
St. Kitts	2.30	—
St. Vincent	3.28	—
Sudan	—	330.50
Swaziland	1.53	—
Tanzania	—	113.10
Togo	—	13.70
Turkey	22.70	—
Uganda	—	5.60
Vietnam	—	10.40
Yemen	—	3.10
Zambia	—	237.20
Zimbabwe	10.90	—
Total	121.43	8,499.20

[1] As of May 1999
[2] As of March 1999

Kashmir

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what aid has been provided to Kashmir by her Department since 1997. [85828]

Clare Short: Since 1997, we have provided £650,000 to the International Committee of the Red Cross for their humanitarian assistance programme in Jammu and Kashmir and £132,500 to the Save the Children Fund to support their work there. In addition, about £19,000 has been provided under the Small Grants Scheme to help equip a maternity hospital in Anantnag.

Chinese Western Poverty Reduction

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what position Her Majesty's Government have taken on the proposal that the World Bank should fund the Chinese Western Poverty Reduction Project; and if she will make a statement. [85664]

Clare Short: The World Bank's staff appraisal report on this project became available at the end of last week and has just been received in London. It is now being studied. I will write to my hon. Friend when an assessment has been made of the merits of the proposal.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86094]

Clare Short: None of the staff in my Department have been affected by the introduction of a national minimum wage. The current rates for our lowest paid staff in the UK are as follows:

Grade	Rate per hour £
C2 Grade (National rate)	3.72
C2 Grade (London rate)	4.96
Cleaner (London rate)	4.35

Technical Co-operation

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will list the 20 United Kingdom companies which have received (a) the largest number of technical co-operation consultancy contracts and (b) the highest value technical co-operation consultancy contracts with her Department in the last financial year. [85965]

Clare Short: The tables list details of contracts let in the UK by DFID for 1998–99, namely:

(a) the 20 companies which have been awarded the largest number of technical co-operation contracts.

Company	Number of contracts
The British Council	78
Natural Resources International Ltd.	48
Health and Life Sciences Partnership	46
Options Consultancy Services	43
International Family Health	34
Institute for Health Sector Development	33
International Institute for Environmental Development	25
Oxford Policy Management	25
Bannock Consulting	24
Overseas Development Institute	23
London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine	22
Centre for Development Studies	21
Crown Agents	20
Office for National Statistics	19
Empower	18
PricewaterhouseCoopers	15
Wolverhampton Polytraining Ltd.	15
Institute of Development Studies	14
KPMG	14
HR Wallingford	12

(b) the 20 highest value consultancy contracts awarded to companies.

£

Company	Value
Population Services International	11,021,782
Hunting Technical Services Ltd.	9,000,000
Joint Education Trust/Crown Agents/Independent Training and Education Centre	7,281,036
The British Council	7,281,036
The British Council	5,446,527
Arthur Anderson	4,996,560
Maxwell Stamp PLC	3,968,933
The British Council	3,385,276
Hunting Technical Services Ltd.	3,322,325
Helm Corporation	2,905,676
National Economic Research Associates	2,747,985
The British Council	2,622,497
Crown Agents	2,500,000
The British Council	2,433,080
LTS International	2,380,948
University of Birmingham	2,307,824
Institute for Health Sector Development Ltd.	2,226,330
Hunting Technical Services Ltd.	2,051,903
BBC Marshall Plan of the Mind Trust (BBC MPM Ltd.)	2,028,529
The British Council	1,946,400

Bilateral Aid

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what proportion of United Kingdom bilateral aid is provided to developing countries in the form of UK-sourced goods, services and contracts. [85966]

Clare Short: We notified the DAC of the OECD of the status (tied or untied) of all of our o.d.a., excluding technical cooperation and administrative costs. In 1997, 28 per cent. of such commitments were tied. In the same year, we awarded technical cooperation, management, and consultancy contracts in the UK totalling £241 million, mostly to UK companies. Contracts for goods totalling £14.5 million, were again mostly from the UK. awarded by our procurement agents.

Aid Programme

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what action her Department is taking to build up private sector capacities in poor countries through the aid programme. [85967]

Clare Short: As our White Paper makes clear, a thriving private sector is essential for sustainable and equitable economic growth. Since 1997, we have strengthened our collaboration with business to tackle the constraints faced by the private sector. We seek to promote a stable and attractive operating environment for business, both domestic and foreign. We seek, often through work with business intermediary organisations, to improve the capacity of local companies by improving access to sustainable financial services, training, market information and appropriate technology. And by bringing forward the Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, we seek to enable CDC to mobilise higher levels of investment, which will help create and develop viable long term businesses in the poorer countries.

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with representatives of the business community on untying British aid in the past six months. [85968]

Clare Short: I have discussed the issue informally with various representatives of the business community. We have also nominated representatives from the British Consultants Bureau, Crown Agents and Mott Macdonald to take part in the international discussions on aid untying at the Development Partners Forum, organised by the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development's Development Assistance Committee in December 1998.

PRIME MINISTER

Pupil/Teacher Ratios

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement regarding the overall pupil/teacher ratio in maintained schools in England. [86113]

The Prime Minister: The overall pupil/teacher ratio in maintained schools in England fell from 18.9 to 18.8 between January 1998 and January 1999. Over the same period, the ratio in primary schools changed from 23.7 to 23.5 and that in secondary schools from 16.9 to 17.0. As a result of our policy to reduce the size of infant classes, the number of children in large infant classes fell by some 130,000 from 485,000 in January 1998 to 356,000 in January 1999.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Genetically Modified Seeds

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list each application for national seed listing of genetically modified varieties, indicating the (i) application number, (ii) company name, (iii) approximate date of proposed decision, (iv) release consent number, (v) date consent was granted and (vi) if different from the national list applicants, the applicants' names. [85934]

Mr. Rooker: The information is given in the table.

Genetically modified plant varieties
National list applications under consideration at 4 June 1999

Application number and species	NL applicant	Earliest date of proposed decision	DETR release consent/marketing consent reference (and holder if different from NL applicant) and date granted
35/959—Spring Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	Test and Trials Complete[1]	1996–95/R15/15—Application 20/11/95 Granted 3/1/96 1997—Marketing Consent—94/M1/1 Granted 28/2/96
35/960—Spring Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	Test and Trials Complete[1]	1996–95/R15/15—Application 20/11/95 Granted 3/1/96 1997—Marketing Consent—94/M1/1 Granted 28/2/96
35/1174—Winter Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 1999[2]	1997–97/R15/20—Application 9/6/97 Granted 1/8/97 1998–98/R15/24—Application 16/2/98 Granted 10/7/98
35/1175—Winter Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 1999[2]	1997–97/R15/20—Application 9/6/97 Granted 1/8/97 1998–98/R15/24—Application 16/2/98 Granted 10/7/98
35/1184—Winter Oilseed Rape	Monsanto Crop Protection, UK	November 1999[2]	96/R22/6—Application 20/6/96 Granted 6/8/96
35/1185—Winter Oilseed Rape	Monsanto Crop Protection, UK	November 1999[2]	96/R22/6—Application 20/6/96 Granted 6/8/96
35/1210—Spring Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 1999[2]	1998–97/R15/23—Application 8/12/97 Granted 19–3-98 1999–98/R19/18—Application 4/12/98 Granted 22/3/99 (Agrevo)
35/1211—Spring Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 1999[2]	1998–97/R15–23—Application 8/12/97 Granted 19/3/98 1999–98/R19/18—Application 4/12/98 Granted 22/3/98 (Agrevo)
35/1222—Spring Oilseed Rape	Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., USA	November 1999[2]	97/R24/2—Application 5/1/98 Granted 1/4/98

Genetically modified plant varieties
National list applications under consideration at 4 June 1999

Application number and species	NL applicant	Earliest date of proposed decision	DETR release consent/marketing consent reference (and holder if different from NL applicant) and date granted
35/1316—Winter Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 2000[2]	98/R15/24—Application 16/2/98 Granted 10/7/98
35/1318—Winter Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 2000[2]	98/R15/24—Application 16/2/98 Granted 10/7/98
35/1335—Spring Oilseed Rape	Advanta Seeds UK	November 2000[2]	97/R13/7—Application 31/7/97 Granted 13/3/97
35/1336—Spring Oilseed Rape	Advanta Seeds UK	November 2000[2]	97/R13/7—Application 31/1/97 Granted 13/3/97
35/1343—Spring Oilseed Rape	Pioneer Hi-Bred International Inc., USA	November 2000[2]	97/R24/2—Application 5/1/98 Granted 1/4/98
35/1346—Spring Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetic Systems, Belgium	November 2000[2]	98/R19/18—Application 4/12/98 Granted 22/3/99 (Agrevo)
35/1347—Spring Oilseed Rape	Plant Genetics Systems Belgium	November 2000[2]	98/R19/18—Application 4/12/98 Granted 22/3/99 (Agrevo)
45/774—Sugar Beet	Novartis Seeds AB, Sweden	Test and Trials Complete[1]	96/R21/4—Application 24/12/96 Granted 5/2/97
45/798—Sugar Beet	KWS Kleinwanzlebener Saatzucht AG, Germany	April 2000[2]	97/R19/13—Application 20/1/97 Granted 17/3/97 (Agrevo)
45/813—Sugar Beet	Danisco Seeds, UK	April 2000[2]	96/R21/4—Application 24/12/96 Granted 5/2/97 (Novartis)
45/850—Sugar Beet	KWS Kleinwanzlebener Saatzucht AG, Germany	April 2001[2]	97/R19/13—Application 20/1/97 Granted 17/3/97 (Agrevo)
45/865—Sugar Beet	Novartis Seeds AB, Sweden	April 2001[2]	96/R21/4—Application 24/12/96 Granted 25/2/97
45/877—Sugar Beet	Danisco Seeds, UK	April 2001[2]	96/R21/4—Application 24/12/96 Granted 25/2/97 (Novartis)
51/833—Maize	Van Der Have, Netherlands	February 2000[3]	96/R13/6—Application 23/2/96 Granted 2/4/96 (Sharpes) Marketing Consent C/F/95/12/07 Published 5/8/98
51/886—Maize	Van Der Have, Netherlands	February 2001[3]	Marketing Consent C/F/95/12/07 Published 5/8/98
132/533—Fodder Beet	DLF Trifolium, Denmark	Test and Trials not started	No National List tests or trials will be sown in 1999

[1] Test and trials complete, awaiting promulgation of marketing consents under Directive 90/220.
[2] Subject to promulgation of marketing consents under 90/220 and satisfactory completion of tests and trials.
[3] Subject to satisfactory completion of tests and trials.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many test sites there have been in each relevant year for each of the national list applications of genetically modified seed varieties. [85946]

Mr. Rooker: The information is given in the table.

The number of national list test and trial sites planted each year for genetically modified varieties currently under consideration is as follows:

Species—Test/trial	Number of sites
Winter Oilseed Rape
VCU trial sites	7
DUS test sites	1
pathology test sites (VCU)	2
vernalisation test sites	1
Spring Oilseed Rape
VCU trial sites	2
DUS test sites	1
vernalisation test sites	1
Maize
VCU trial sites	4
Reserve VCU trial sites	[1]2
DUS test sites	[2]—
Sugar Beet
VCU/DUS sites	4
Reserve VCU/DUS sites	2

[1] 2 sites sown in 1999, none in 1998
[2] Conducted in France

Grey Squirrels

Mr. Soames: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will re-instate the bounty for grey squirrel tails. [85772]

Mr. Morley: No. We are taking several steps to help landowners protect woodland from the damage caused by grey squirrels. However, we do not consider that a bounty is an appropriate or satisfactory mechanism.

Fisheries Grant Scheme

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) of 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 451–52 on spending priorities, what has been the total grant paid through the fisheries grant scheme in each of the last five years; and what was the total grant allocation available for spending. [85853]

Mr. Morley: The grant paid, in each of the last five years, for fishing vessel safety equipment grants, harbour grants, processing and marketing grants and port facilities grants against the grant allocation held by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food for these schemes was as follows:

£

Year	Allocation	Grant paid
1994–95	5,819,000	5,060,452
1995–96	4,827,000	3,315,804
1996–97	4,572,000	1,573,884
1997–98	4,572,000	2,781,378
1998–99	4,072,000	2,176,749

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many grants and to what value have been given to the fishermen from (i) Brixham, (ii) Paignton, (iii) Kingswear, (iv) Dartmouth, (v) Salcombe and (vi) the West Country in total for harbour and fishing vessel safety equipment in each of the last five years. [85852]

Mr. Morley: No grants under the national harbour grant scheme or the EU port facilities grant scheme have been awarded to Brixham, Dartmouth, Kingswear, Paignton or Salcombe in the last five years. The numbers of projects and value of grants awarded to the West Country (Devon and Cornwall) under both schemes is as follows:

£

Year	Projects	Amounts
1994–95	4	112,000
1995–96	2	12,000
1996–97	3	66,000
1997–98	6	99,000
1998–99	2	112,000
Total	17	401,000

Information on numbers and value of grants for fishing vessel safety equipment is not held by port or region and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the total grants available from (i) his Department and (ii) the EU for each of the last 10 years for fishing safety measures. [85952]

Mr. Morley: Prior to the introduction of the Fishing Vessels (Safety Improvements) (Grants) Scheme 1993 fishing safety measures were subsumed in the wider fishing vessel modernisation schemes and separate funding figures for these elements are not available. From 1993–94 the figures for this and subsequent schemes are as follows:

£000

Year	National (UK)	EU (England)
1993–94	1,800	0
1994–95	2,500	50
1995–96	1,177	213
1996–97	965	212
1997–98	965	212
1998–99	965	212

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what grants will be available from (i) his Department and (ii) the EU for each of the next three years for fishing safety measures. [85953]

Mr. Morley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend to my hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) on 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 451–52 on spending priorities. This made clear that the fishing vessel safety equipment grants scheme was being closed to new applicants from that day. Thus, no further grants will be available for fishing safety measures from the Department. Neither will EU grants be available as these require national co-funding. However, all grant approvals in respect of applications received before 21 May will be honoured.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) of 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 451–52 on spending priorities, what was the legislative authority for the introduction of the fishing vessel safety equipment grant; and what compliance cost assessment was carried out (a) at its introduction and (b) prior to its discontinuation. [85854]

Mr. Morley: The legislative authority for nationally funded fishing vessel safety equipment grants is the Fishing Vessels (Safety Improvements) (Grants) Scheme 1995 (SI 1995 No 1609) made under section 15 of the Fisheries Act 1981. The legislative authority for EU grants and the necessary national back-up grant is the Fisheries and Aquaculture Structures (Grants) Regulations 1995 (SI 1995 No 1576).

Compliance cost assessments are not required for the introduction or discontinuation of grant schemes such as these.

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what compensation is available for farmers whose businesses are compromised through the cross-pollination of their non-genetically modified crops with genetically modified crops. [86130]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Government believe that observance of best agriculture practice, including the SCIMAC "Guidelines for growing newly developed herbicide tolerant crops" will ensure that the risk of cross pollination of non-GM crops, and hence compromise to neighbouring farmers' businesses, is minimised.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what protection from cross-pollination of genetically modified crops and non-genetically modified crops exists for (a) organic farmers and (b) conventional farmers. [86129]

Mr. Nick Brown: When evaluating applications for the release of genetically modified crops the Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment (ACRE) considers the risks associated with cross pollination and would recommend conditions on the release consent if this was believed to be necessary. Additionally, the SCIMAC "Guidelines for growing newly developed herbicide tolerant crops" include separation distances between GM and non-GM (conventional and organic) crops to ensure that the risk of cross pollination is minimised.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure that companies involved in the commercial growing of genetically modified crops segregate genetically modified crops from non-genetically modified crops. [86134]

Mr. Nick Brown: The SCIMAC stewardship programme for the introduction of genetically modified crops launched on 21 May includes the key principle of preserving the identity of GM crops up to the point that they leave the farm gate. This will enable food processors and manufacturers to distinguish between GM and non-GM products and provide consumers with a choice if that is what they want.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if the new measures he announced in his statement to the House on biotechnology on 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 1371–84, will include the extension of buffer zones between fields of genetically modified crops and fields of non-genetically modified crops. [86132]

Mr. Nick Brown: The statement by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office welcomed the SCIMAC "Guidelines for growing newly developed herbicide tolerant crops", which include separation distances between GM and non-GM crops to ensure that the risk of cross pollination is minimised. SCIMAC has indicated that it is happy to review these guidelines, including the separation distances, if new evidence shows that this is required.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the research commissioned by his Department into the cross-contamination between genetically modified crops and crops that are not genetically modified. [84533]

Mr. Nick Brown: [holding answer 17 May 1999]: Yes. The report on organic farming and gene transfer from genetically modified crops, commissioned from the John Innes Centre, is being prepared by them for publication and we expect it to be published shortly.

Bovine Somatotropin

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what trials of the synthetically genetically engineered dairy hormone bovine somatotropin were conducted in the UK prior to the imposition of an EU moratorium and between which dates; how many farms were involved; what the locations of the farms involved were; what quantity of milk containing this hormone was sold for human consumption; and if he will make a statement. [85743]

Mr. Rooker: Two Animal Test Certificates (ATCs) were issued in 1985 under the terms of the Medicines Act 1968 to Monsanto Europe SA and Lilly Industries Ltd respectively. A total of 38 farms and agricultural institutes were used in the tests at sites across the country. The timing of trials and the location of the farms and institutes concerned are confidential to the manufacturers but all trials took place before the imposition of the EU moratorium. No conditions were applied to the disposal of milk from treated cows. The normal concentration of BST in milk is not affected by the treatment of cows with BST.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will set out the terms of reference for the trials on patients in a Newcastle hospital involving genetically modified food. [85741]

Mr. Rooker: Any potential health risks that could arise as a result of the transfer of transgenes from genetically modified (GM) foods to human gut flora and gut cells are considered by the Advisory Committee on Novel Foods and Processes (ACNFP) as part of its rigorous safety assessment of such products. All the GM foods which have been approved for use in the UK to date have been assessed as safe for human consumption.

The project in question is being funded to provide further background data to quantify the very low probability of such transfer occurring, by examining some model systems. The majority of the work involves looking at in vitro systems for possible transfer of genes from GM micro-organisms to human gut flora and to isolated gut cells. It will also investigate the survival of GM material derived from plants in the human small intestine, firstly by looking at a model, in vitro, system which mimics the conditions in the small intestine. This will then be followed up by human volunteer studies to evaluate the applicability of the model to the in vivo situation.

The terms of reference of this work require the contractor to warrant that human volunteer studies carried out as part of the contract have obtained written approval from an ethics committee which has been properly constituted in accordance with all published guidelines, in particular those of the Department of Health.

Genetically Modified Pollen

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what requirements are placed on honey producers in respect of the labelling of honey which may contain genetically modified pollen. [85923]

Mr. Rooker: Any food, including honey, that contains genetically modified (GM) material must be clearly labelled in accordance with EC Regulations 258/97 and 1139/98.

Cormorants

Mr. Soames: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many licences to cull cormorants were issued by Her Majesty's Government in each of the last five years. [85773]

Mr. Morley: Licences are issued to shoot a limited number of cormorants as an aid to scaring. The number of licences issued for the last five years in England are as follows:

	Number of licences issued
1 May 1994–30 April 1995	35
1 May 1995–30 April 1996	50
1 May 1996–30 April 1997	47
1 May 1997–30 April 1998	70
1 May 1998–28 February 1999[1]	71

[1] Latest figures available

Details of licences issued in Wales and Scotland are the responsibility of the respective Secretaries of State.

Fisheries

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the annual (a) value and (b) tonnage of fish caught by British-owned fishing vessels in each of the last five years. [84907]

Mr. Morley: The value and tonnage of catches landed by UK registered fishing vessels during the last five years was as follows:

Fish landing into the UK and abroad by UK registered vessels

Year	Quantity (000 tonnes)	Value (£ million)
1993	857.6	526.0
1994	874.9	561.4
1995	911.8	590.1
1996	892.3	636.5
1997	881.9	621.9

Mr. Gill: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the number of jobs sustained (a) afloat and (b) ashore by the activities of British-owned fishing vessels. [84908]

Mr. Morley: Data from an annual survey indicate that the number of UK fishermen in 1997 was 18,604.

The annual Census of Employment carried out by the Office for National Statistics indicates that in 1997 there were 19,454 people employed in the processing and preserving of fish in Great Britain.

Special Advisers

Mr. Tyrie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 15 April 1999, Official Report, column 319, on special advisers, if he will give the total travel cost of each occasion when advisers have travelled abroad in an official capacity since 2 May 1997 and the place visited. [82409]

Mr. Nick Brown: For the period 2 May 1997 to 31 March 1999, my predecessor's Special Advisers travelled overseas in an official capacity on 4 occasions to Brussels and South Africa. The total cost of travel and any hotel accommodation was £5,978.

My Special Advisers have travelled overseas in an official capacity on nine occasions to Brussels, Luxembourg and Stockholm. The total cost of travel and any hotel accommodation was £4,790.

In addition a Special Adviser travelled with me to Latin America in an official capacity on one occasion. The total cost of travel and any hotel accommodation was £5,023. These costs were met by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office.

All travel was judged to comply with the requirements of the Ministerial Code and the Civil Service Management Code.

Cattle Passports

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle passports have been produced at the Cattle Traceability Centre in Workington in each week in the last six months. [85465]

Mr. Rooker: The number of cattle passports produced by the British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS) each week in the last six months is as follows:

Week commencing	Number of passports produced
16 November 1998	51,153
23 November 1998	54,860
30 November 1998	50,277
7 December 1998	59,383
14 December 1998	33,807
21 December 1998	36,710
28 December 1998	12,094
4 January 1999	59,595
11 January 1999	49,958
18 January 1999	52,910
25 January 1999	39,091
1 February 1999	37,935
8 February 1999	33,540
15 February 1999	47,021
22 February 1999	35,189
1 March 1999	54,290
8 March 1999	48,715
15 March 1999	52,226
22 March 1999	67,112
29 March 1999	57,496
5 April 1999	49,199
12 April 1999	115,476
19 April 1999	81,361
26 April 1999	90,455
3 May 1999	39,107
10 May 1999	129,758
17 May 1999	90,820
Total for period	1,529,538

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will account for the delay in responding to the question from the right hon. Member for Penrith and the Border of 13 May 1999 [84698]; and if he was in possession of a provisional agenda at the time of issuing a holding answer. [85632]

Mr. Nick Brown: At the time the holding reply was issued the Council had concluded. I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Harlow (Mr. Rammell) on 24 May 1999, Official Report, columns 40–41, on the outcome of the Council.

Dietary Supplements

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of health risks related to higher dose supplements and vitamins. [85268]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 26 May 1999]: The Committee on Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition Policy (COMA) has recommended that caution needs to be exercised in the use of high doses of purified supplements of micronutrients as they cannot be assumed to be without risk. It has also advised against the use of beta carotene supplements as a means of protecting against cancer.

The Government have since established the Expert Group on Vitamins and Minerals to consider the safety of vitamins and minerals in supplements sold under food law. It is expected to complete its task around the end of 2000.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what negotiations he has had with his European Union partners on policy relating to higher dose supplements and vitamins. [85269]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 26 May 1999]: The EU Commission is considering the possibility of harmonising controls on the sale of vitamin and mineral supplements but has not yet issued any proposals for legislation. There have not therefore been any negotiations on this matter.

Fisheries Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the latest agenda of the Fisheries Council of 10 June, prior to the meeting. [85633]

Mr. Morley: The agenda for the Council is expected to cover: reform of the structural funds for fisheries; a draft Council Regulation on serious infringements of the rules of the Common Fisheries Policy; the allocation of blue whiting TACs and new TACs for spurdog and Northern shrimp; an interim report from the Commission on its cost/benefit analysis of Third Country Agreements; EU fisheries relations with Morocco; follow-up to the Bergen Inter-Ministerial Meeting; and Sandeel conservation. Under Any Other Business Italy will be raising the situation in the Adriatic as a consequence of the Kosovo conflict.

Absinthe

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on his plans to introduce measures to ban the sale of absinthe. [85364]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 25 May 1999]: I have no plans to introduce such measures.

Horse Breeders

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to help the British thoroughbred horse breeders to compete internationally. [85210]

Mr. Nick Brown: The Government recognise the economic importance of the horse industry, and for that reason has welcomed the recent establishment of the British Horse Industry Confederation, an organisation set up to foster the interests of all sectors of the horse industry. In this role, the Confederation will be working constructively to promote the competitive position of the British thoroughbred horse breeding industry, as well as raising the profile of other parts of this important rural industry.

Climate Change Levy

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the effect of the proposed climate change levy on (a) the horticultural sector, (b) the poultry sector and (c) consumer food prices in these sectors. [85095]

Mr. Rooker: Lord Marshall's Report on the role of economic instruments and the business use of energy, was published in November 1998. Since the publication of that report, my department has provided further information to other Government Departments on trends in energy use in the horticulture sector. The Government will take sectoral impacts, including any potential impacts on prices and competitiveness, into account in setting the final rates of the climate change levy.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the purposes for which his Department and its agencies require a birth certificate to be provided by (a) employees, contractors and persons applying for employment and contracts and (b) others. [84326]

Mr. Nick Brown: A birth certificate, or similar documentary evidence, may be required for one or more of the following purposes:

(i) proof of identity;

(ii) proof of eligibility under the Civil Service Nationality Rules;

(iii) proof of age;

(iv) any legal requirements.

Agencies, other than the Pesticides Safety Directorate (PSD), the Central Science Laboratory (CSL), the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science (CEFAS), and the Veterinary Laboratories Agency (VLA) will reply direct.

Letter from Johnston McNeill to Mr. Charles Kennedy, dated 8 June 1999:

As Chief Executive of the Meat Hygiene Service (MHS) your question to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food requesting information on the purposes for which a birth certificate is required to be provided by (a) employees and contractors, and persons applying for employment and contract and (b) others has been passed to me for reply as regards this Executive Agency.

The main purpose in the MHS requiring sight of a birth certificate for directly employed staff is to verify identity and to confirm eligibility of the individual for employment under Civil Service nationality provisions.

The MHS also makes extensive use of veterinary surgeons supplied on contract obtained following a national competitive tendering exercise. The MHS does not require sight of birth certificates for these individuals.

Letter from Sarah Nason to Mr. Charles Kennedy, dated 8 June 1999:

The Minister has asked me to respond, in respect of the Farming and Rural Conservation Agency (FRCA), to your question about the purposes for which his Department and its agencies require a birth certificate to be provided by (a) employees and contractors, and persons applying for employment and contracts and (b) others.

FRCA requests birth certificates during recruitment for identification purposes.

Letter from John Fitzgerald to Mr. Charles Kennedy, dated 8 June 1999:

In my Chief Executive's absence the Minister has asked me to reply on behalf of the Veterinary Medicines Directorate (VMD) to your question about the purposes for which the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and its agencies require a birth certificate to be provided by their employees and contractors, persons applying for employment or contracts, and others.

The only such time that the VMD would ask for birth certificates to be provided would be as part of a recruitment exercise. These would be used to confirm identify and age of candidates and to verify their eligibility for employment under the Civil Service nationality rules.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the agenda for the Agriculture Council of 17 to 18 May. [84698]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 18 May 1999]: The agenda for the 17 May Agriculture Council covered the following items:

Approval of the list of 'A' items

State of the Pigmeat Market

Progress Reports:

Bananas

Hormones

(Information from the Commission)

Proposal for a Council Regulation amending Regulation (EEC) No.2377/90 laying down a Community Procedure for the establishment of maximum residue limits of veterinary medicinal products in foodstuffs of animal origin.

(Draft Council Conclusions)

Discussion on a Draft Council Resolution on Antibiotic Resistance.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum and Immigration Cases (Costs)

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the agreed baseline costs for (a) asylum and (b) immigration cases agreed between the Immigration and Nationality Directorate and Siemens Business Services in November 1997; what are the current baseline costs for each type of case; and what changes in the contract have been made since November 1997. [85040]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In order to calculate the productivity charges payable to Siemens Business Services under the terms of the Casework Contract, the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) calculated the cost of a range of types of case over the baseline period October 1995 to September 1996. For this baseline period, costs, which exclude some overheads, were calculated for individual types of immigration casework, including an asylum case and a general or settlement immigration case, and for a standard unit of IND casework. IND no longer calculates the unit cost for individual types of cases. The available unit costs of IND casework for the baseline period, November 1997, November 1998 and April 1999 are shown in the table:

£

	Cost of asylum case	Cost of a general or settlement immigration case	Unit cost of range of IND casework
Baseline (October 1995–September 1996)	358.58	54.04	42.89
November 1997	n/a	n/a	45.69
November 1998	n/a	n/a	41.72
April 1999	n/a	n/a	43.66

Formal changes have been made to Schedule 11 (Programme Plan) to alter the project timetable, to Schedule 15 (Service Change Procedure) to include additional training, and to Schedule 26 (Programme and Contract Management) to reflect changes to the personnel of the contractor and the authority.

Asylum Seekers

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are working on clearing the backlog of asylum applications made before 31 December 1995; how many decisions on these applications have been made in each month since July 1998; how many of these decisions have been (a) indefinite leave, (b) exceptional leave, (c) refusals and (d) other; how many applications are outstanding from (i) before July 1993 and (ii) between July 1993 and December 1995; and when he expects this backlog to be cleared. [85044]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There are a total of 51 Home Office staff of all grades working to clear the remaining unresolved asylum applications lodged before 1 January 1996. As at the end of April 1999, it is estimated that there remained 4,465 applications outstanding made before July 1993 and 16,730 made between July 1993 and December 1995.

Between 1 December 1998 and 31 April 1999 a total of 2,910 decisions on pre-1 January 1996 applications were made by the teams established to deal with the backlog. Of these, 2,130 were pre-July 1993 applications granted indefinite leave while 610 were grants of exceptional leave in July 1993 to December 1995 applications. 160 applications of the latter group were recognised as refugees and granted asylum. A total of 10 applications have been refused.

It is intended that the applications made before July 1993 be cleared by September 1999 and those lodged between July 1993 and December 1995 by April 2000.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 1999, Official Report, column 369, on asylum seekers, when he plans to write. [85944]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A written reply was sent on 28 May 1999.

Electoral Malpractice (Hackney)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money has been spent to date by (a) the Crown Prosecution Service, (b) the police and (c) his Department on investigations into electoral malpractice in Hackney Borough; and if he will make a statement. [85361]

Mr. George Howarth: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis estimates the cost of the investigation into complaints of electoral malpractice at London borough elections in 1998 as approximately £85,000 to date. No Home Office money has been spent. The inquiry is still ongoing and is, therefore, an operational matter for the Metropolitan police.

Correspondence

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answers of 22 February 1999, Official Report, column 103, on young offenders and 2 March 1999, Official Report, column 636, on persistent offenders, when he plans to write to the right hon. Member for Penrith and the Border. [85433]

Mr. Straw: I expect to write to the right hon. Gentleman within the next ten days.

Diarmuid O'Neill

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will request the Police Complaints Authority to report to him on the circumstances of the death of Diarmuid O'Neill under section 97(1) of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984; and if he will lay the report before Parliament. [85340]

Mr. Straw: It is for the Police Complaints Authority (PCA) to decide, under section 79(2) of the Police Act 1996 (previously section 97(2) of the 1984 Act), whether to make a report on any matters which they consider should be brought to my attention by reason of their gravity or other exceptional circumstances. I am not aware of any plans to make such a report on the case of Diarmuid O'Neill.

I can only call for a report on such matters relating generally to the PCA's functions. It does not allow me to call for a report on a specific investigation.

The circumstances of Mr. O'Neill's death will be the subject of a coroner's inquest currently being scheduled.

Children's Passports

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been implemented at airports to check children's passports. [85327]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: All arriving passengers, including children, are liable to be examined by an immigration officer in order to determine identity and nationality. No particular distinction is made between the examination of adults' and children's passports.

The previous Administration had already removed, in 1994, embarkation controls for passengers travelling from ferry ports and small airports to destinations within the European Union/European Economic Area, with the consequence that some 40 per cent. of all departing passengers were not seen by an immigration officer. There has never been an embarkation control for channel tunnel services. What was left of the control was, therefore, ineffective in providing a reliable record of a person's departure, and we have since introduced new arrangements following my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Wythenshawe and Sale, East (Mr. Goggins), Official Report, columns 506–07 on 16 March 1998.

The new system involves a close partnership between the control authorities and port operators based on intelligence and target led embarkation checks, including the increased use of closed circuit television. There are no plans to reinstate routine embarkation controls, although immigration officers will continue to retain their powers to examine the passports of departing passengers if circumstances require.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children's passports have been issued within the last 12 months. [85326]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In the period 1 May 1998 to 30 April 1999, 889,180 passports were issued to applicants who were children under the age of 16.

Mr. Olner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken in respect of the endorsement of children's passports with relevant court orders. [85328]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: No steps have yet been taken in respect of the endorsement of children's passports. This important issue will be looked at by the Parent/Carer Child Abduction Co-ordinating Group of officials in the light of the arrangements for embarkation controls introduced in March 1998.

However, there are a number of measures in place to ensure compliance with court orders in relation to the issuing of children's passports. Where it is known that a child is a ward of court, or subject to a prohibited steps order requiring the leave of the court before removal from the United Kingdom, passport facilities are not granted unless the court's permission is obtained.

The Passport Agency also operates a scheme whereby a parent or other objector, where there is a court order in their favour, can ask the Agency not to issue a passport for a child. The Passport Agency ensures that the terms of the court order, about removal of the child from the jurisdiction, are met before issuing a passport. Where a child is already in possession of a valid passport, the court is able to order its surrender where there is in force an order prohibiting or otherwise restricting the removal of the child from the United Kingdom.

A requirement for children to hold separate passports was introduced in October 1998, one of the main aims of this policy being to make child abduction more difficult.

Gloucestershire Fire Brigade

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many call-outs were responded to by the Gloucestershire fire brigade in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 to date. [85440]

Mr. George Howarth: The information in the table shows the total number of fires and false alarms attended by Gloucestershire Fire Brigade, for 1997 and 1998. Information for 1999 is not yet available centrally.

Gloucestershire Fire Brigade	1997[1]	1998[1]
Total fires	2,864	2,649
False alarms	3,023	2,773
Total fires and false alarms	5,887	5,422

[1] Provisional data. Figures include late call, heat and smoke incidents.

Special service incidents are recorded on a financial year basis. Gloucestershire fire brigade recorded 1,492 special service incidents for the financial year 1997–98. Data for 1998–99 are not yet available.

Mrs. Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many deaths caused by fire occurred in Gloucestershire in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 to date. [85441]

Mr. George Howarth: Provisional figures show that Gloucestershire fire brigade recorded eight fire-related deaths in 1997 and three in 1998. Data for 1999 are not yet available, centrally.

These figures may be subject to change; there are circumstances in which further information becomes available (from death certificates, inquests etc.) where the cause of death is not actually the fire, or where perhaps persons may die sometime after the fire due to injuries sustained.

Prison Officers (Complaints)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what disciplinary sanctions have been imposed on prison officers following complaints of ill-treatment in each of the last five years. [84944]

Mr. George Howarth: The table shows, from those records which are available, the penalties awarded to prison officer grades under the Prison Service code of conduct and discipline, for misconduct involving ill-treatment of prisoners, for the last five financial years.

Penalties awarded to prison officer grades for misconduct involving ill-treatment of prisoners

Year/offence	Penalty
1994–95
Assault	Final written warning and loss of increment
Assault	Dismissed (but Civil Service Appeal Board upheld appeal)
Incorrect Control and Restraint Procedures	Written Warning
Questioned prisoner in unprofessional manner	Warning
1995–96
Assault	Final written warning and loss of increment
Theft of Prisoner's monies	Dismissed
1996–97
Assault	Final written warning. Removal from field of promotion
Physical abuse of prisoners	Final written warning
Use of unnecessary force	Final written warning. Removal from field of promotion
Inappropriate behaviour	Final written warning
Excessive use of force	Final written warning
1997–98
Assault	Final written warning
Assault	Dismissed
Excessive force	Final written warning
Unnecessary application of handcuff restraints	Oral warning
Forced strip search (3 officers)	Dismissed
1998–99
Assault	Final warning. Removal from field of promotion
Assault	Dismissed
Assault	Written warning
Unnecessary force	Oral warning
Failure to obtain authorisation for search and to report use of force	Written warning
Verbal abuse	Written warning
Offensive language to prisoner in dangerous situation	Final written warning
Indecent behaviour	Dismissed (appeal pending)

Passports

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many applicants made complaints to the Immigration and Nationality Directorate concerning lost passports in each quarter since the second quarter of 1996; and in how many cases the passports were subsequently found. [85486]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Complaints received by the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) are not recorded centrally on the basis of subject matter. Information kept centrally is in respect of the number of compensation claims dealt with as a result of maladministration, the majority of which will have arisen as a result of lost documents. This is a lagging indicator as there is often a considerable gap between an incident and the claim for compensation arising from it. The figures for each quarter since the third quarter of 1996 are set out in the table:

	1996	1997	1998	1999
First Quarter	7	10	6	22
Second Quarter	2	7	17	n/a
Third Quarter	6	5	18	n/a
Fourth Quarter	18	18	23	n/a

Information on how many passports were subsequently found is not held centrally. Passports which are found once a compensation claim has been paid are, where appropriate, returned to the issuing authority.

Stephen Lawrence

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received on the disappearance of a criminal file from police records relating to Stephen Lawrence; and if he will make a statement. [85630]

Mr. Straw: I have received no such representations, nor is the Metropolitan Police Service or the Secretariat of the Stephen Lawrence inquiry aware of any such missing file. If the right hon. Member would write to me with further details I should be happy to make inquiries on his behalf.

K4 Committee

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 20 May 1999, Official Report, column 445, on the K4 Committee, if he (a) sent details of the agenda items to the Home Affairs Committee and (b) had consultations with United Kingdom bodies concerning mutual recognition of criminal court decisions. [85563]

Mr. Straw: It was not the general practice of the Government to report to Parliament on the business of the K4 Committee, in view of that Committee's role as an interim, problem-solving body whose members were responsible to their respective Ministers. Details of the agenda for the meeting on 29–30 April were not, therefore, sent to the Home Affairs Committee.

I outlined the concept of mutual recognition in a speech at the Avignon Seminar on the European Judicial Space on 16 October last year, which was made available to the press. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), the Under-Secretary of State, gave further details of these proposals in oral evidence to the House of Lords European Communities Committee on 24 March, after which a United Kingdom discussion paper on mutual recognition was tabled in the Article K4 Committee on 29 March, and submitted for United Kingdom Parliamentary Scrutiny on 31 March. The Government intend to carry out further consultations with United Kingdom bodies depending on the progress of discussions in the Council of European Union on the basis of the United Kingdom paper.

Supporting Families

Angela Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the results of the consultation on Supporting Families. [86302]

Mr. Straw: This morning, I placed a summary of the responses to 'Supporting Families' in the Library. Copies of the document are also available from the Vote Office.

Birth Certificates

Mr. Cann: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those purposes for which his Department and its executive agencies require a birth certificate to be provided by (a) employees, (b) contractors, (c) those applying for employment and contracts and (d) other persons. [85685]

Mr. Straw: Birth certificates are routinely requested as an optional form of identification for recruitment and pension purposes. They are normally required for the issue of passports and for applications to remain in the United Kingdom on the basis of marriage to a British Citizen. My Department does not normally require existing employees or contractors to provide birth certificates.

Speed Limits

Mr. Casale: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that the Metropolitan Police have sufficient resources effectively to enforce speed limits. [86077]

Kate Hoey: Effective enforcement of the speed limit is an important police function for which the funding of the Metropolitan Police already provides. The deployment of resources to meet prioritised policing objectives in this area is a matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Drug Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of drug treatment and testing orders have been revoked since 30 September 1998. [85770]

Mr. George Howarth: As at 2 June 1999, 68 Drug Treatment and Testing Orders had been made, of which 10 had been revoked: 14.7 per cent.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders have been (a) assessed for and (b) made subject to drug treatment and testing orders in (i) Liverpool, (ii) Croydon and (iii) Gloucester since 30 September 1998. [85765]

Mr. George Howarth: The information is shown in the table.

	Number of offenders[1] assessed for drug treatment and testing orders	Number of offenders[1] subject to drug treatment and treatment orders
Liverpool	60	26
Croydon	35	11
Gloucestershire	92	32

[1] As at 2 June 1999

Drug Related Offences

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what estimate he has made of the proportion of indictable offences which fall into the category of drug related offences in the most recent period for which figures are available; [85764]

(2) what proportion of indictable offences were the result of drug related offending in the most recent period for which figures are available. [85767]

Mr. George Howarth: The information requested on the proportion of indictable offences being drug-related is not available for the country as a whole. As I stated in my reply on 27 April 1999, Official Report, column 110, a report was published last year on preliminary research carried out on behalf of the Home Office by the University of Cambridge, which shed light on the links between drugs and crime. Further work is currently being conducted within this programme. The results will be published later this year. This additional work is intended to pave the way for a larger, regular programme.

The research undertaken so far on drug testing of arrestees, based in five locations, indicates that over 60 per cent. of arrestees had recently taken at least one illegal drug prior to arrest. Cannabis was found most often (46 per cent. of cases); heroin/opiates (18 per cent.) and cocaine/crack (10 per cent.) featured quite prominently. These findings confirm the supposition that offenders tend to be heavy consumers of drugs.

Nearly half the arrestees who reported taking drugs within the last year said that their drug misuse was connected with their offending. Among various factors, they emphasised the need for the money to buy drugs. The illegal income of arrestees who said that they had taken heroin and/or crack cocaine during the last three days was particularly high—within a range of £10,000 to £20,000 annually. This compared with £4,000 for other arrestees. Illegal income mainly resulted from acquisitive crimes against property. An estimated 32 per cent. of all illegal income was spent on purchasing heroin and/or crack cocaine.

Whilst this study considerably advances knowledge of drugs-crime links, it will always be difficult to calculate a single percentage figure reflecting precisely what proportion of all crime is drug-related.

Figures on drug offences in 1997 were recently published in Home Office Statistical Bulletin No. 8/99, "Drug seizure and offender statistics, United Kingdom, 1997", copies of which are available in the Library.

Fire Service College, Moreton-in-Marsh

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the terms of reference for the Options Review Team for the Fire Service College, Moreton-in-Marsh, provide for the financial figures for 1998–99 and projected figures for 1999–2000 to be taken into consideration in forming the conclusions. [85709]

Mr. George Howarth: The terms of reference require an evaluation of the financial and management performance generally of the Fire Service College and specifically by reference to the financial targets and key performance indicators included in the Framework Document and the College's Corporate Plans. The evaluation will be based on relevant evidence including the audited financial accounts of the College and any other validated reliable financial information.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the members of the Options Review Team for the Fire Service College, Moreton-in-Marsh; how many of them are related to each other; and what resignations there have been and for what reasons. [85708]

Mr. George Howarth: The members of the Review Team are: V. Harris (Home Office); G. Meldrum (Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Fire Services); A. Hughes (West Yorkshire Fire Brigade); and G. Fredericks (London Fire Brigade). In addition, I have appointed three expert assessors all of whom are offering their services on a pro-bono basis. They are: J. G. Carr; D. A. Defty; and A. P. Harris. A. P. Harris is the spouse of V. Harris.

At an earlier stage in the review, A. Wroclawski from the Kent Fire Brigade was attached to the team but has now returned to his brigade.

Police Officers (Leeds)

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the total number of police officers in (a) 1997, (b) 1998 and (c) 1999 in the Leeds, Central constituency. [85704]

Mr. Boateng: I understand from the Chief Constable of West Yorkshire that the number of police officers in the Millgarth Division of Leeds which covers the Leeds Central constituency was as follows:

Year	Number of officers
31 March 1997	224
31 March 1998	228
31 March 1999	220

Shamrock Ltd.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how often Shamrock Ltd. of Henfield, West Sussex, (or the relevant certificate holder) is inspected by the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate; and when it was last inspected. [86110]

Mr. George Howarth: This establishment is generally visited on a monthly basis: there have been four visits so far this year, three of which were unannounced. It was last inspected in May and that visit was unannounced. I also visited the establishment myself on 15 December last year.

Imported Primates

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many primates imported into the UK for research purposes in the last five years from (a) China, (b) Mauritius, (c) Indonesia, (d) the Philippines and (e) other countries were (i) dead on arrival at the UK and (ii) suffered serious injury during transit, broken down (1) by the species of primate, (2) the place where the death or injury was discovered, (3) the cause of the death or injury and (4) in the case of injury, disposal of the primate. [86102]

Mr. George Howarth: Records made available to the Home Office show that during the last five years, 11 deaths have occurred in consignments of non-human primates arriving in the United Kingdom for use in regulated procedures in this country. One further animal is recorded as having sustained serious injury, necessitating euthanasia on arrival. The details are as follows:

China

In 1994, two cynomolgus macaques were found to be dead on arrival in Paris. There was no obvious cause of death.

In 1995, one rhesus macaque was found to be dead on arrival in the United Kingdom. The cause of death was probably associated with pneumonia.

Mauritius

In 1995, one cynomolgus macaque was found to be dead on arrival in the United Kingdom. The cause of death was believed to be enteritis.

In 1996, one cynomolgus macaque was found to be dead on arrival in the United Kingdom. The cause of death was believed to be shigellosis.

In 1997, one cynomolgus macaque was found to be traumatised on arrival in the United Kingdom, possibly as a result of being pair-housed during transport. It was humanely killed and all primates are now individually housed during transport.

Indonesia

No reports of deaths or injury in transit received.

Philippines

In 1994, one cynomolgus macaque was found to be dead on arrival in the United Kingdom. The cause of death was believed to be enteritis.

In 1997, one cynomolgus macaque was found to be dead on arrival in the United Kingdom. The cause of death was probably a trauma to the head.

In 1998, three cynomolgus macaques were found to be dead on arrival in Paris. The causes of death were not ascertained, but it is believed that they were probably due to a combination of factors:

(i) the animals concerned were larger than normal;

(ii) although International Air Transport Association minimum dimensions were not breached, the containers were not large enough to allow these particular animals to stand up and turn around freely; and

(iii) all the dead animals had been in central compartments, which were less well ventilated.

Whilst enforcement of European Union rules on the protection of animals in transport would have been for the French authorities in this case, we ensured that the containers were enlarged and redesigned to rectify these problems.

Israel

In 1998, one cynomolgus macaque was found to be dead on arrival in the United Kingdom. There was no obvious cause of death.

Correspondence

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare of 11 January concerning Avon Probation Service. [85657]

Mr. George Howarth: The letter in question was unfortunately misplaced in the Home Office. This was an unacceptable failure, and staff have been informed accordingly. A considered reply has been sent and the action promised in that reply has been completed.

Stop and Search

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many stop and search operations have been conducted by the Metropolitan Police in each month in 1999; and what was the total number of reported crimes for each month. [85560]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis has provided the following data:

1999	Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 stop and search	Total notifiable offences
January	25,715	78,212
February	18,752	74,589
March	14,005	87,444
April	14,110	85,194

Judicial and Police Co-operation

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he expects to take place in the Council of Ministers relating to judicial and police co-operation in respect of the use of joint teams of police officers to investigate fraudulent transactions within the United Kingdom arising from the receipt of funds from the European Union. [85674]

Kate Hoey: The draft Convention on mutual assistance on criminal matters between the Member States of the European Union includes a provision on joint investigation teams. This would provide for co-operation between the competent authorities of the Member States, including judicial, police and customs authorities, in the use of joint investigation teams to carry out criminal investigations in one or more Member States. The provision applies to criminal activities in general, and does not refer specifically to financial fraud affecting European Union funds. The detail of this provision is subject to further negotiation.

European Treaties

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in respect of the new Strategic Committee on Immigration, Frontiers and Asylum concerned with matters arising from Title IV of Articles 61 to 69 of the consolidated Treaty on the European Community, the policy of Her Majesty's Government concerning those matters in respect of which by virtue of Protocol 4 of the Treaty of Amsterdam the United Kingdom has no current obligation; if representatives of Her Majesty's Government may participate in consideration of those matters; and, in respect of Article 3 of Protocol 4 of the Amsterdam Treaty enabling the United Kingdom or Ireland to enter into obligations not yet made, what consultation and scrutiny procedures will be adopted prior to such notification to the President of the Council. [86227]

Kate Hoey: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) on 12 March 1999, Official Report, columns 380–82, concerning future United Kingdom participation in the new Free Movement Chapter (Title IV, Articles 61–69 of the consolidated version of the Treaty establishing the European Community).

As a member of the Council, the United Kingdom will be able to participate fully in the discussion of all measures proposed under the Free Movement Chapter, both in the new Strategic Committee on Immigration, Frontiers and Asylum and in Council working groups, but the United Kingdom will not have a vote on measures in which it is not participating.

All new proposals under the Free Movement Chapter will be deposited for Parliamentary scrutiny, according to the rules governing First Pillar business. The subsequent Explanatory Memorandum will indicate whether or not it is intended to participate in the measure in accordance with Articles 3 or 4 of the Protocol on the position of the United Kingdom and Ireland.

Sexual Offences Review

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list all those organisations which made a submission to his Department's sexual offences review; and if these submissions are publicly available. [85928]

Mr. Boateng: A full list of organisations who have made a submission to the sex offences review as at 27 May 1999 is as follows:

CROP (Coalition for the Removal of Pimping)
FFLAG (Families & Friends of Lesbians & Gays)
Lesbian & Gay Christians
APAG (Amhurst Park Action Group)
ILPS (Inner London Probation Service)
London Monday Group for Homosexual Equality
Grimsby & Scunthorpe Rape Crisis
University of Cambridge Institute of Criminology
South Essex Rape & Incest Crisis Centre
Gay & Lesbian Humanist Association
Trades Union Congress
Justice for Children
Campaign Against Censorship
Harrogate & District Women's Aid
The Maudsley Hospital
Rape Crisis (North Staffordshire & South Cheshire)
Josephine Butler Society
The Forensic Medicine Unit, St. George's Hospital Medical School
LAGER (Lesbian & Gay Employment Rights)
National Foster Care Association
National Society for Prevention of Cruelty to Children Area Children's Services, Preston
The Tizard Centre, University of Kent at Canterbury
CONTACT (National Association of Child Contact Centres)
BJFCS (British Juvenile & Family Court Society)
Sexual Freedom Coalition
NOTA (The National Organisation for the Treatment of Abusers)
The Magistrates' Association
The Raphael Centre
Jewish Care
GALOP
Naturists in Business
St. Helens & Knowsley Community Health (NHS) Trust, Learning Disability Directorate
Outrage!
UNISON
ILGA (International Lesbian & Gay Association)
Hounslow Rape & Crisis Support Group
Nottingham Rape Crisis Centre
LLGPI (London Lesbian & Gay Policing Initiative)
Stonewall
BLAGG (Bar Lesbian & Gay Group)
YWCA of Great Britain
Brighton & Hove Lesbian & Gay Community Centre
Liberty
Christians for Human Rights
School of Social Sciences, University of Teesside
Thames Valley Crime Intervention Service
London Borough of Hackney
Hull Women's Centre
National Union of Students Lesbian, Gay & Bisexual Campaign
Campaign for Homosexual Equality
Soroptomist International of Midland East
MACA (Mental After Care Association)
Metropolitan Police
Gay Men's Health Matters HIV Prevention Project
Open Door
West Yorkshire Lesbian Gay Bisexual & Transgendered Policing Initiative
Suzy Lamplugh Trust
Terrence Higgins Trust
National Aids Trust
The Royal College of Psychiatrists
The Diocese of Southwark
NSPCC
Legal Committee of the Joint Council of Her Majesty's Stipendiary Magistrates
BGWS (Boys & Girls Welfare Society)
Yorkshire MESMAC
Northern Ireland Gay Rights Association
Police Federation of England & Wales
Union of Liberal & Progressive Synagogues
MENCAP
Wyre Forest Women's Aid.

Dogs

Mr. Sutcliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the (a) current and (b) proposed legislation relating to the ownership, breeding and keeping of dogs. [85761]

Mr. George Howarth: The following list is of primary legislation readily identified as containing provisions specific to dog breeding and ownership etc. Broader legislation, concerning other types of animal as well as dogs (for example, relating more generally to animal cruelty), has not been included.

Current legislation:

Metropolitan Police Act 1839 (section 54)
Town Police Clauses Act 1847 (section 28)
Dogs Act 1871
Dogs (Protection of Livestock) Act 1953

Animal Boarding Establishment Act 1963
Animals Act 1971
Breeding of Dogs Act 1973
Guard Dogs Act 1975
Animal Health Act 1981
Dangerous Dogs Act 1989
Environmental Protection Act 1990 (sections 149 and 150)
Dangerous Dogs Act 1991
Breeding of Dogs Act 1991
Control of Dogs Order 1992
Dogs (Fouling of Land) Act 1996
Dangerous Dogs (Amendment) Act 1997

Proposed legislation:

Breeding and Sale of Dogs (Welfare) Bill.

WALES

Organic Farming

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what research he has commissioned into organic production techniques. [84358]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: None. The research budget is administered by MAFF on behalf of England and Wales. Welsh views are reflected in the programme of work commissioned by MAFF. In 1999–2000 over £2 million will be spent on organic R&D in England and Wales. Most of this is aimed at studying the economic and practical problems of converting to, and maintaining, organic systems. It thus supports the overall objective of expanding production.

Child Protection Register

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many children in Wales who are registered with local authorities are registered on the child protection register; and if he will make a statement. [85118]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: As at 31 March 1998, there were 2,473 children on child protection registers in Wales. Figures on the proportion of these which are looked after by local authorities are not held centrally. The Government are taking a number of steps to improve child protection arrangements, including revising the multi-agency guidance, "Working Together Under the Children Act 1989", which will be published later this year. In Wales, this will be subject to the agreement of the National Assembly. Child protection figures for 1999 will be available in the Autumn.

National Assembly (Elections Advertising)

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a breakdown of his Department's budget for advertising the elections to the National Assembly for Wales. [85511]

Mr. Michael: The Welsh Office budget for the National Assembly Information Campaign is £2 million. Expenditure to date breaks down as follows:

Integrated media (including press and television advertising, events and promotion): £1,196,274
Publications and internet: £333,367
Research: £134,246
Miscellaneous: £12,099.

I am pleased to say that there was cross party support for the campaign to encourage people to vote. As the turnout demonstrates, there is some way to go in persuading people that voting in an Assembly election is important for them and their families.

Agriculture Secretary

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received about the appointment of the Agriculture Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales. [85514]

Mr. Michael: Christine Gwyther and I had a meeting with representatives of farmers and the agriculture industry in Wales on 24 May. During the first part of the meeting comments were made about her appointment as Agriculture and Rural Affairs Secretary and the FUW president then left. The meeting went on to discuss numerous issues affecting farmers in Wales. Mrs. Gwyther has also received numerous letters congratulating her on her appointment and inviting her to several agricultural events over the next few months.

There has been a wide welcome for the fact that I have appointed an Assembly Secretary with specific responsibility for farming and the rural economy to reflect the importance of these issues in Wales. I am sure that farmers generally will judge the appointment on how well she does the job and will be encouraged by the appointment of someone who has direct experience of the need to promote and develop the rural economy.

Nuclear Waste

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the responsibilities of the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales over issues directly related to disposal or storage of nuclear waste in Wales when that waste does not originate in Wales. [85662]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: From 1 July, the National Assembly will assume a range of functions under both planning and environmental legislation. This will include power to call in applications for planning consent or for environmental authorisations, and the determination of appeals against decisions made by local authorities or the Environment Agency. The Assembly will also be responsible for guidance to local planning authorities and the Environment Agency, and will have power to issue directions to either. The Environment Agency will be under a statutory duty to consult the National Assembly before granting any authorisation to dispose of radioactive waste on or from a nuclear site in Wales. The Assembly's exercise of these functions will relate to waste disposal in Wales, whether or not the waste originates in Wales.

The extent to which these responsibilities are delegated to the First Secretary is a matter for the National Assembly.

NHS Budgets

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the budgeted (a) surplus and (b) deficit for each (i) NHS authority and (ii) NHS trust in Wales for the financial year 1999–2000. [86034]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: I regret the information requested is not yet available. Health authorities and trusts are still assessing their financial position in light of the recently issued cash allocation letter and the outcome of their negotiations on long term agreements. I will write to the hon. Member in July once the NHS Directorate has received details of its projected in-year financial position.

Following the transfer of functions order, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

SCOTLAND

Skye Bridge

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) if he will refer the correspondence between the Crown Office and the Procurator Fiscal in Dingwall of 6 November 1995 in respect of the Skye Bridge to the Privy Council; and if he will make a statement; [84337]

(2) when the letter of 6 November 1995 from the Crown Office to the Procurator Fiscal in Dingwall, concerning the prosecution of Skye Bridge cases, will be made publicly available; and if he will make a statement. [84338]

Dr. Reid: This is now the responsibility of the Lord Advocate, who will address the points the hon. Member has raised and will respond by letter in due course. A copy will be placed in the Library of the House.

Child Protection

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many children in Scotland who are registered with local authorities are registered on the Child Protection Register; and if he will make a statement. [85087]

Mr. Macdonald: Child Protection Registers are maintained in all local authority areas in Scotland. It is estimated that on 31 March 1998, a total of 2,236 children were recorded on these Registers.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

Student Funding

Mr. Peter Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what the level of per capita funding budgeted for students is in the current financial year in the Borders Region in (a) primary schools and (b) secondary schools. [85448]

Mr. Macdonald [holding answer 25 May 1999]: Information about budgeted school running costs is given in "Scottish Schools: Costs 1996/97 to 1998/99" published by the Audit Unit of HM Inspectors of Schools, which is available in the House of Commons Library. Information for the current financial year is not yet available.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

St. Kilda

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what response the Government have made to the World Heritage Committee's concerns regarding the environmental protection of St. Kilda. [85673]

Mr. Macdonald: I have arrange for a copy of the Government's response to the UNESCO World Heritage Committee to be placed in the Library of the House.

HEALTH

Waiting Lists

18. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities have asked trusts to increase out-patient consultation times for waiting list surgery; and if he will make a statement. [85015]

Mr. Denham: We are not aware of any health authorities asking trusts to increase waiting times for out-patient consultations. We are, however, aware that health authorities are expecting the National Health Service to see over a third of a million more new out-patients in 1999–2000 than last year.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were waiting more than 13 weeks for an out-patient consultation in the last quarter for which figures are available. [85762]

Mr. Denham: At 31 March 1999, the number of patients still waiting for a first out-patient appointment more than 13 weeks after general practitioner referral was 456,033.

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the health authorities which have asked general practitioners to reduce the number of patients they refer to hospitals for waiting list surgery. [86065]

Mr. Denham: We are not aware of any health authorities asking general practitioners to reduce the number of patients they refer to hospitals for out-patient appointments.

We do, however, expect all health authorities and primary care groups to regularly discuss with GPs arrangements for ensuring patients receive the treatment they need, as quickly as possible. This is key to improving health, reducing inequalities and modernising National Health Service services.

27. Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have been removed from central health service waiting list statistics since 2 May 1997, without having received the treatment intended. [85024]

Mr. Denham: Patients are removed from waiting lists for a number of reasons other than treatment. These are:

(i) patient admitted as an emergency for the same condition;

(ii) patient removed for other reasons, such as a patient being transferred to another trust's waiting list;

(iii) patient/doctor decides operation is no longer needed (for example—patient recovering from illness);

(iv) patient treated elsewhere (for example, at a private provider);

(v) patient died.

The number of patients removed from waiting lists in 1998–99 totalled 672,000. This is broadly in line with the proportion removed from the waiting list in recent years.

Dental Services

19. Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about trends in the number of NHS dentists providing services over the last five years. [85016]

Mr. Denham: The general trend in the number of General Dental Service (GDS) dentists in England has been upwards, with the number of GDS dentists increasing by about 400 to 500 a year since 1996.

School Medical Services

20. Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will consult with health authorities on the role of school medical services in improving the health of children and young people. [85017]

Mr. Hutton: Our agenda for improving the health of the population recognises the need to focus attention on children's mental, physical and emotional health care needs. The school medical services will have a major role to play. We are introducing many important policy initiatives which will depend on effective health service input to schools and nurseries; these include the "Healthy Schools" initiative, "Sure Start" and "Quality Protects". Health authorities and other key players will, of course, be consulted.

Camden and Islington Health Action Zone

21. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what meetings he has held with local officials on the progress of the Camden and Islington health action zone. [85018]

Mr. Denham: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not had meetings with local Health Authority officials on the progress of the Camden and Islington Health Action Zone (HAZ). However, I and my Ministerial colleagues will be visiting all the newly established second wave HAZs, including Camden and Islington, in due course.

General Practitioners (Sunderland)

23. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the number of general practitioners in Sunderland; and if he will make a statement. [85020]

Mr. Denham: The Government have introduced a number of national policy measures to improve the recruitment of general practitioners, which Sunderland Health Authority has been implementing locally. The Health Authority introduced a Career Start Scheme and has successfully recruited four salaried GPs. The Priority Healthcare Wearside NHS Trust, Sunderland Health Authority, the University of Sunderland and the City of Sunderland Council have developed proposals for a second-wave personal medical services pilot.

Nurse:Patient Ratio

24. Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the ratio of nurses to patients in the NHS. [85021]

Mr. Denham: With the additional funding announced in July last year, the NHS should be able to employ up to 15,000 more nurses by the year 2002.

Waiting Times

26. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department is undertaking into factors affecting hospital out-patients waiting times. [85023]

Mr. Denham: The Department is committed to undertaking a major research programme to improve our understanding of factors affecting both in-patient and out-patient waiting lists and times.

Research projects already agreed include an evaluation of the National Booked Admissions Programme and a review of research evidence on strategies to improve the appropriateness of general practitioner referrals.

Health Authority Funding (Rural Areas)

28. Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to revise the current funding mechanism for health authorities to take account of factors specific to rural areas. [85025]

Mr. Denham: Last November, we announced a review of the formula used to make cash allocations to health authorities and primary care groups. The review will cover a wide range of issues, including factors relating to rural areas.

Hospital Administration (Greater London)

29. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what responsibilities for hospital administration the Eastern Regional Executive of the National Health Service retains in Greater London. [85026]

Mr. Denham: The Eastern Regional Office of the National Health Service Executive has overall responsibility for Mount Vernon and Watford Hospitals NHS Trust. Mount Vernon Hospital is in Greater London and the management of its local acute services will transfer to Hillingdon Hospital NHS Trust with effect from 1 July. Hillingdon Hospital Trust comes under the London Regional Office.

Plastics surgery and burns and cancer services will continue to be managed by the Mount Vernon and Watford Hospitals NHS Trust. These are the subject of reviews on how best these services can be delivered to a wide population in the Eastern, London and South East regions.

Smoking

30. Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with broadcasters on reducing the depiction of smoking on television; and if he will make a statement. [85028]

Ms Jowell: We plan to discuss this with the broadcasters or regulators as part of a developing campaign. The regulatory codes give guidance about the depiction of smoking and drinking in programmes. They should not include smoking or drinking unless the context or dramatic veracity require it. Particular care is needed with programmes likely to be seen by children, and smoking should not be shown as an attractive or normal activity in pre-watershed programmes. Tobacco advertising is banned from television.

Osteoporosis

31. Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds his Department has allocated to services to tackle osteoporosis. [85029]

Ms Jowell: The Department does not specify what proportion of health authorities' funding allocations is to be spent on services to tackle osteoporosis. It is for health authorities, in partnership with National Health Service trusts, primary care groups, local authorities and local stakeholders, to determine how best to use their funds to meet national and local priorities for improving health and modernising services. The additional resources of at least 5.45 per cent. cash increase to all health authorities for 1999–2000 will help them in this.

HIV

32. Mr. Russell Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that health authorities use the HIV prevention special allocation in ways appropriate to the epidemiology of HIV. [85030]

Ms Jowell: The forthcoming guidance to health authorities on the use of HIV and AIDS special allocations re-emphasises the need to match funding to local epidemiology. The guidance also highlights the latest supporting epidemiological data on HIV prevalence nationally, which reinforces the target groups identified in the current HIV Health promotion strategy, which are: gay men, bisexual men, and other men who have sex with men; men and women who travel to, or have family links with, high prevalence countries where the predominant mode of transmission is sex between men and women, currently in sub-Saharan Africa, people diagnosed with HIV and AIDS and injecting drug users.

The Department is developing a new strategy on HIV/AIDS, which will also address the issue of targeting of HIV prevention activity towards the most vulnerable groups. Authorities are required to submit end-of-year reports on the use of HIV prevention funds in advance of their full annual AIDS (Control) Act Reports. The format of these reports is also due to be reviewed as part of the strategy development work.

General Practitioners

33. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to employ more salaried general practitioners in the national health service; and if he will make a statement. [85031]

Mr. Denham: The Salaried Doctors Scheme continues to have our full support. It is designed to allow health authorities to make sensible and locally appropriate prioritisation of cash-limited monies.

Dental Services (Scarborough and Whitby)

34. Mr. Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to promote and safeguard national health service dentistry in Scarborough and Whitby; and if he will make a statement. [85032]

Mr. Denham: Three Investing in Dentistry proposals from Scarborough were approved to enable 9,700 new National Health Service patients to register. North Yorkshire Health Authority also has approval to employ a salaried dentist in Scarborough. The Personal Dental Services scheme, and our forthcoming strategy for NHS dentistry, will provide the framework for future improvements in NHS dental services.

Primary Care

35. Ms Blears: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many applications for beacon status his Department has received from primary care projects. [85033]

Mr. Denham: Over 550 nominations have been put forward for Primary Care Beacon status.

Sir Sydney Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the estimated administration costs, including remuneration of members, of the primary care groups in the Greater London Area for their first year of operation; [85549]

(2) what is the total estimated cost of the primary care groups in the Greater London Area in their first year of operation; and what is the administration cost net of existing costs being transferred. [85550]

Mr. Denham: An individual primary care group's share of its overall health authority management costs budget will depend upon its population size, level of devolved responsibility and organisational structure of the individual PCGs and their HAs. The PCG will have negotiated its share of the overall HA/PCG management costs with its host health authority alongside their discussions on the delegation of function or responsibilities for 1999–2000. Information on the split of management costs funding between PCGs and HAs is currently being validated and will be available shortly.

Social Services (Children)

36. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many action plans have been approved by his Department to help local authorities improve their performance in the provision of social services for children in need. [85034]

Mr. Hutton: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Angela Smith) on 13 April 1999, Official Report, column 114.

Dental Services (Cornwall)

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to improve NHS dental services in Cornwall. [85008]

Mr. Denham: The first wave of Personal Dental Services, which started in October 1998, included a new service in Cornwall. This service enables anyone who is not registered with a National Health Service dentist to get treatment for their dental problems.

Ten Investing in Dentistry funding requests have also been approved giving over 33,000 patients the opportunity of registering with an NHS dentist.

Nurses' Pay

Mr. Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations he has received regarding the late payment of the nurses' pay award. [85019]

Mr. Denham: Authorisation to implement the pay increase was sent to National Health Service employers on 8 April, earlier than in the previous three years. We have received a small number of letters regarding this issue, 20 to date. No representations have been received from trades unions and professional organisations representing nurses and midwives.

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list those National Health Service trusts which will not pay the increased pay award to nurses in their pay packets for May 1999. [86083]

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which NHS trusts have failed to implement the nurses' pay award for 1999–2000 in time for the end of May pay arrangements. [86035]

Mr. Denham: I refer the hon. Members to the reply given to the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Mr. Brady) on 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 114.

Health Action Zone (South Yorkshire)

Ms Rosie Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress is being made in implementing the health action zone in the South Yorkshire area. [85022]

Mr. Denham: The South Yorkshire Health Action Zone is making good progress as it has moved into its second year of operation. A detailed range of outcome measures have been agreed for the three main programme areas: improving the health of children and young people: improving heart health in the general population; and enabling those with physical and sensory disabilities in later life to lead more independent lives.

Discrimination against Doctors

Mr. McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions he has had with the General Medical Council on the evidence produced by the Medical Practitioners Union on the need for safeguards to prevent racially motivated complaints against doctors reaching the Professional Conduct Committee of the General Medical Council; [84725]

(2) what action he has taken to address the concerns of the Medical Practitioners Union that the disciplinary procedures in the medical profession may discriminate against doctors from ethnic minorities. [84723]

Mr. Denham: The Government are fully committed to equality of opportunity for all Health Service staff and are concerned that the National Health Service work force should reflect the population it serves in order to deliver sensitive and appropriate services. There is no place for discrimination on any grounds within the National Health Service.

Officials work closely with the General Medical Council on the handling of complaints and to ensure that any differences in referral rates or handling of cases are considered and addressed where appropriate.

NHS Costs

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the administrative cost of the NHS by region and (b) the cost of publicity and public relations of the NHS by region in the last year for which figures are available. [84830]

Mr. Denham: The table provides information on National Health Service management costs in health authorities and NHS trusts, by region for 1996–97. Information on 1997–98 expenditure on NHS management costs will be published shortly.

	NHS management costs 1996–97
Northern and Yorkshire	210,357
Trent	158,607
Anglia and Oxford	160,475
North Thames	294,149
South Thames	265,615
South and West	193,069
West Midlands	174,397
Northern and Yorkshire	219,131
England	1,675,800

Notes:

1. Excludes expenditure on general practitioner fundholder practice fund management allowances
2. Figures in £000

Expenditure on publicity and public relations is not collected centrally as a specific item. Information about NHS expenditure on advertising is given in the following table. It includes expenditure in a number of different areas, including recruitment advertising, health promotion initiatives, and measures to improve local accountability such as the production of annual reports and information about services.

	Advertising expenditure in trusts and health authorities 1997–98
Northern and Yorkshire	4,694,683
Trent	4,212,484
Anglia and Oxford	5,302,599
North Thames	11,084,233
South Thames	8,428,801
South and West	5,739,418
West Midlands	4,789,712
Northern and Yorkshire	4,558,358

Source:

Financial Returns of Trusts and Health Authorities 1996–97 to 1997–98.

Correspondence

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to reply to the letter of 10 February from the hon. Member for Slough to the Minister of State about the funding of health care in Slough. [84976]

Mr. Denham: I replied to my hon. Friend on 25 May 1999.

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for West Derbyshire will receive a reply to his letter of 12 February and reminder of 19 March concerning his constituent, Mr. Duncan Beresford of Steeple Grange, Wirksworth, Derbyshire. [85557]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member on 3 June.

Mr. McLoughlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the hon. Member for West Derbyshire will receive a reply to his letter of 22 February concerning his constituent, Mr. Mark Cambell Lloyd, of Oak Drive, Doveridge, Derbyshire. [85558]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member on 3 June 1999.

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to answer the letter from the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire, dated 12 November 1998, regarding his constituent Mr. D. Coombes and the drug Beta Interferon. [85336]

Mr. Denham: I replied to the hon. Member on 25 May 1999.

Child Protection

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many children in England who are registered with local authorities are registered on the Child Protection Register; and if he will make a statement. [85086]

Mr. Hutton: At 31 March 1998, there were 31,600 children and young people on child protection registers in England. At 31 March 1998, 8,000 (25 per cent. of those on the register) were looked after by local authorities. The purpose of the register is to provide a record of all children in the area who are considered to be suffering from or likely to suffer significant harm and who are currently the subject of an inter-agency protection plan.

Dentistry

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the contribution that NHS dentistry will make to the Government's objective of improving public health. [85091]

Mr. Denham: The Government's dental strategy, to be published soon, will set out the valuable contribution that dentists and dentistry can make to a healthier nation and a modern and dependable National Health Service.

Prostate Cancer

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what progress is being made in the development of services for (a) the prevention and (b) the treatment of prostate cancer; [85323]

(2) what plans he has for developments in the treatment of prostate cancer; [85325]

(3) what steps are being taken to educate men about the possible early signs of prostate cancer; [85324]

(4) what assessment he has made of likely trends in the incidence of prostate cancer in men over the next five years; and if he will make a statement. [85322]

Mr. Hutton: There are about 15,000 cases and 8,000 deaths each year from prostate cancer. Over the latest five-year period for which data is available (1987–92), incidence rates for prostate cancer for men of all ages increased by 25 per cent. in England. However, past trends do not necessarily predict future changes.

The Government are committed to improving the prevention, detection and treatment of prostate cancer. There is, as yet, no consensus of medical opinion about the correct management of early localised tumours. The choice is between radical prostatectomy and radiotherapy. The Health Technology Assessment programme has already funded two systematic reviews of the diagnosis and management of prostate cancer and the National Co-ordinating Centre for the HTA programme is commissioning a £200,000 study at the University of Bristol on the feasibility of conducting a multi-centre randomised trial of treatment for localised prostate cancer.

On 20 May my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister set out a plan of action to prevent, diagnose and treat cancer. As well as £60 million invested directly into services for breast, bowel and lung cancer, the Prime Minister announced an additional £150 million of lottery money to support a new programme of cancer prevention, detection, treatment and care over the next three years.

The Department provides advice to the public, in leaflets and through health education campaigns, which advise on signs of possible cancer and encourage early reporting of these to a general practitioner or other health professionals. This includes providing funding for promotional material used within the United Kingdom for the "Europe Against Cancer" programme. A different cancer-related theme is chosen each year. The theme for 1998 was "Cancer in Men".

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress he has made in targeting resources on prostate cancer treatment. [85002]

Mr. Hutton: The Government are committed to improving the prevention, detection and treatment of prostate cancer. The Health Technology Assessment (HTA) programme has already funded two systematic reviews of the diagnosis and management of prostate cancer and the National Co-ordinating Centre for the HTA programme is commissioning a £200,000 study at the University of Bristol looking at the feasibility of conducting a multi-centre randomised trail of treatment for localised prostate cancer.

Health Inequalities

Mr. Hesford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment his Department has made of current levels of health inequalities in England; and if he will make a statement. [85316]

Ms Jowell: The Department uses the Health Survey for England, information from the Office for National Statistics and a range of other data collated in the Public Health Common Data Set produced by the National Centre for Health Outcomes Development.

The Government set up an independent inquiry, led by Sir Donald Acheson, which used information from these sources and elsewhere to look specifically at health inequalities. The report of this inquiry was published on 26 November 1998. We have welcomed Sir Donald's report and will publish shortly an action report summarising Government activity to tackle health inequalities alongside the White Paper on our health strategy.

Reducing health inequalities was a main priority in the Green Paper "Our Healthier Nation" and is also a shared priority for health and social services in National Priorities Guidance that we issued last year. Health inequalities will be a key focus of Health Improvement programmes which are being developed at local level.

Uranium Resources

Dr. Iddon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the adequacy of stocks of highly enriched uranium for the treatment of cancer patients; and if he will list those hospitals experiencing difficulty in obtaining supplies. [71679]

Mr. Hutton: The supply of highly enriched uranium is kept under review. To date no difficulties have been reported by hospitals.

Professional Statisticians

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff who have worked as professional statisticians in his Department have left on early retirement in each of the past 10 years. [81190]

Mr. Denham: Eight professional statisticians have left on early retirement in the last ten years.

GPs (Elderly Patients)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what monitoring mechanisms are in place to ensure that vulnerable older people receive services from their general practitioners; [85498]

(2) what requirement is placed upon general practitioners to contact older people who have not been in touch with their general practitioner in the past year because of mobility problems and frailty; [85504]

(3) what proportion of people aged 75 years and over have annual health checks with their general practitioner. [85487]

Mr. Denham: Under their terms of service, general practitioners are required to invite all patients who have reached the age of 75 for an annual health check in the patient's home, or in the surgery if the patient prefers. General practitioners make arrangements with health authorities to provide services and regional offices of the National Health service Executive hold health authorities to account for the services provided in their area. Information is not held centrally on the numbers of those accepting the invitation for an annual health check.

DTP Vaccine

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps have been taken to alert NHS trusts who have been issued with the batch of DTP vaccine which was recently withdrawn by Bath and West Community NHS Trust following adverse reactions. [85495]

Ms Jowell: A Public Health Link message was sent from the Chief Medical Officer's office on 14 May 1999 to all directors of public health and copied to all consultants in communicable disease control for urgent cascade to District immunisation co-ordinators, health authority pharmaceutical advisers, medical directors in national health service trusts to forward to chief pharmacists, and on to Community service pharmacists and to general practitioners who received the original message. Copies of the Public Health Link message are available in the Library.

The reports were of cases from one area and were not reflected in reports of reactions to the same batch from other parts of the country.

Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trusts

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to provide financial support to the Epsom and St. Helier NHS Trust to develop a recovery plan; and if he will make a statement. [85726]

Mr. Denham: The Epsom and St. Helier National Health Service Trust is currently in discussion with the NHS Executive regarding its financial plan for 1999–2000.

Vaccines (Bovine Material)

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications for human health of the use of vaccines which in their early stage of manufacture had used bovine material prohibited for use in human food. [85492]

Ms Jowell [holding answer 26 May 1999]: The Committee on the Safety of Medicines (established under Section 4 of the Medicines Act 1968 to advise the licensing authority on the safety, quality and efficacy of medicinal products) established a working party in 1989 to consider the implications of bovine spongiform encephalopathy for all medicines, including those which used bovine material in their early stages of manufacture. An assessment was made by the working party of all licensed medicinal products using bovine material, including vaccines. No risk to human health has been established from use of bovine material in the manufacture of medicinal products, but as a precautionary measure, manufacturers were required to switch to use of bovine material sourced from outside the United Kingdom, and to comply with guidelines on the sourcing and processing of bovine material for use in the manufacture of medicinal products.

Electro-physiological Technologists

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what review he is undertaking of the pay of electro-physiological technologists within the NHS; and to which pay review body he intends to allocate these workers for future pay reviews. [85515]

Mr. Denham: On February 15 1999, the Health Department published proposals for modernising the National Health Service pay system in "Agenda for Change". This included the possibility of moving some highly qualified health professionals into the remit of the Nurses, Midwives, Health Visitors and Professions Allied to Medicine Review Body.

Discussions have recently opened between representatives of NHS trade unions and management representatives from NHS employers and the four Health Departments on the basis of our proposals for modernising the NHS pay system. We will develop the proposed changes in a spirit of partnership.

It is too early to comment on proposals for specific staff groups.

Staffordshire Ambulance Service

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations he has received from (a) organisations, (b) hon. Members and (c) others about the response rate times achieved by Staffordshire Ambulance Service. [85535]

Mr. Hutton: We have received no representations in the last six months about Staffordshire Ambulance Service's response times.

Child Migrant Trust

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the first payment from the travel fund for the Child Migrant Trust will be made; and if he will make a statement. [85654]

Mr. Hutton: The travel Support Fund for former child migrants is administered by the International Social Service, who will purchase travel tickets on a child migrant's behalf. A daily allowance is then paid to the child migrant for up to 14 days spent in this country. The first assisted child migrant arrived in the United Kingdom in the week beginning 31 May.

The Child Migrants Trust receive a central grant towards the tracing and counselling services which they provide for former child migrants. This is paid quarterly, the first payment having been made at the beginning of May.

NICE (Work Programme)

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer of 19 May 1999, Official Report, column 376, on cancer, which new and existing technologies are being considered for the National Institute for Clinical Excellence's work programme; and if he will make a statement. [85660]

Mr. Denham: Ministers will be announcing shortly a number of new and existing technologies which will be referred to the National Institute for Clinical Excellence as part of its first year's work programme. Cancer treatments are amongst those under consideration.

Strokes

Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what actions his Department intends to take in order to assist people suffering from the after effects of strokes. [85512]

Mr. Hutton: The National Service Framework for Older People was launched in November 1998, and will focus on those parts of the National Health Service that are particularly important to older people. Stroke care is one of the key issues it will consider. This work will set national standards and define service models, put in place strategies to support implementation, and establish performance measures against which progress within an agreed time scale can be measured.

In addition, the Department is funding other initiatives on stroke, including a sentinel audit of stroke services, the development of Clinical Guidelines on stroke rehabilitation and the revision of the Effective Health Care Bulletin on stroke rehabilitation.

Children's Rights

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's progress in implementing the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child. [86123]

Mr. Hutton: The United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child provides comprehensive coverage of a wide range of children's rights for implementation by States Parties. The Convention requires that a comprehensive report on the progress of implementation is prepared at regular intervals. The second United Kingdom report covering the period 1993–1998 will be published soon.

Residential Nursing Homes

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many council-managed residential and nursing homes have been closed in the Leeds, Central constituency in the last two years; how many people were affected; and what the cost was of the closures including the relocation of the occupants. [85707]

Mr. Hutton: Details of home closures and the attached costs are not collected centrally. We understand, however, that Leeds City Council manages 25 residential care homes for older people and that over the last two years four homes were closed. These homes accommodated 163 people. For further details on location, costs and any alternative arrangements made, the hon. Member may wish to contact the local authority direct.

Trade Unions

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the dates since 1 January on which he has had official meetings with representatives of (a) UNISON, (b) MSF, (c) RCN, (d) BMA, (e) RCM, (f) professions allied to medicine and (g) other trade unions; and if he will make a statement on his policy on when (i) to meet trade unions and (ii) to speak at their annual conferences. [86022]

Mr. Denham: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met with the Royal College of Nursing on 28 January 1999, the Royal College of Midwives on 4 February 1999 and the British Medical Association on 11 May 1999. He also met with the Trades Union Congress health service unions on 16 March 1999 and attended UNISON's conference in Brighton on 28 April 1999.

Ministers regularly meet representatives from trade unions and other professional bodies in a variety of forums to discuss matters of mutual interest.

NHS Budgets

Mr. Lansley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the budgeted surplus or deficit for each (i) National Health Service authority and (ii) National Health Trust in England for the financial year 1999–2000. [86033]

Mr. Denham: The information requested will be available shortly and will be placed in the Library.

Medical Laboratory Scientific Officers

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the salary structure of state-registered medical laboratory scientific officers; and if he will make a statement. [85646]

Mr. Denham: The salary structure for medical laboratory scientific officers is negotiated in the Professional and Technical Staffs Whitley Council. The Council has been discussing MLSO pay in the light of reported recruitment and retention problems and will meet on 10 June to consider the National Health Service management side's offer to substantially improve the pay of Trainee MLSOs, MLSO1s and the starting pay of MLSO2s.

For the longer term, on 15 February 1999 the Health Departments published proposals for modernising the NHS pay system in "Agenda for Change". Discussions have opened between representatives from NHS employers, trades unions and the four Health Departments. We will develop the proposed changes in a spirit of partnership. Our aim is a pay system which gives employers effective ways of rewarding people for taking on more responsibility and developing new skills.

Royal Hospital, Haslar

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many letters he has received concerning the future of the Royal Hospital, Haslar; and of these, how many supported its closure and how many opposed it. [85552]

Mr. Denham: Since 14 December 1998, the Department has received around 1,500 letters from members of the public, councillors and local hon. Members on the future of the Royal Hospital, Haslar. All letters received have opposed the closure.

Drugs and Procedures (Rationing)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the drugs or procedures which are currently rationed in the National Health Service. [86064]

Mr. Denham: No drugs or procedures are rationed in the National Health Service. Some procedures, such as drugs on the selected list scheme introduced by the Conservative Government, are restricted through central direction.

National Institute for Clinical Excellence

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the impact which the National Institute for Clinical Excellence will have on regional variations in the delivery of health services. [85027]

Mr. Denham: The National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) will issue clear and robust guidance that will seek to address regional variations in the provision of clinical and cost-effective treatments.

We are working with the professions to produce National Service Frameworks and clinical guidelines which will give us maximum national efficiency whilst still allowing for appropriate local and individual responsiveness.

We are determined to tackle "post-code prescribing" caused by the market approach to health care. NICE will provide a single source of reliable guidance about effectiveness, which will provide a sound basis for decision-making for the whole country.

TREASURY

Health Care Expenditure

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each year from 1979 to date the percentage of GDP spent by the United Kingdom on (a) public healthcare, (b) private healthcare and (c) total healthcare; and if he will make a statement. [84858]

Mr. Milburn: The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development produces figures for public and total healthcare spending in member countries. Figures for the UK over the period requested are set out in the table. Private healthcare expenditure is taken as the difference between public and total healthcare expenditure.

Year	Total healthcare expenditure as a percentage of GDP	Public healthcare expenditure as a percentage of GDP	Private healthcare expenditure as a percentage of GDP
1979	5.3	4.7	0.6
1980	5.6	5.0	0.6
1981	5.9	5.3	0.6
1982	5.8	5.1	0.7
1983	6.0	5.2	0.8
1984	5.9	5.2	0.7
1985	5.9	5.0	0.9
1986	5.9	5.0	0.9
1987	5.9	5.0	0.9
1988	5.8	4.9	0.9
1989	5.8	4.9	0.9
1990	6.0	5.1	0.9
1991	6.5	5.4	1.1
1992	6.9	5.9	1.0
1993	6.9	5.8	1.1
1994	6.9	5.8	1.1
1995	6.9	5.8	1.1
1996	6.9	5.8	1.1
1997	6.7	5.7	1.0

Source:
OECD health databank 1998

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Initiative

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make it his policy to support Oxfam's proposal of a human development window when reviewing the working of the HIPC initiative at the G8 summit. [85539]

Ms Hewitt: The Government's policy on debt relief was set out in a recent memorandum to the Select Committee for International Development. In that memorandum the Government emphasised the need to strengthen the link between debt relief and poverty reduction.

Debt Management Office

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the UK Debt Management Office's targets for 1999–2000. [86304]

Ms Hewitt: The DMO's targets for 1999–2000 are set out as follows, together with the outturn against the equivalent targets for 1998–99. The DMO is today also publishing its Corporate Overview and Business Plan for 1999–2000. I will arrange for a copy to be placed in the Library.

Targets for the Debt Management Office 1999–2000

1. To ensure full compliance with the Government's remit for the issuance of debt to finance the Central Government Net Cash Requirement as set out in the Debt Management Report within the tolerances and subject to the review triggers notified separately to the Office. [Similar target met in 1998–99.]

2. To ensure that the maximum time taken to issue the results of gilt auctions does not exceed 40 minutes while achieving complete accuracy. [Same target met in 1998–99.]

3. To establish with a view to introduction in Q4 1999 (unless market consultation recommends Q1 2000) a system for managing the Exchequer's aggregate cash position which achieves cost-effective financing and is operationally robust, properly conducted, legally sound and subject to minimal credit risk (to the satisfaction of an external assessor). [Similar to 1998–99, but with revised deadline.]

4. To achieve complete accuracy, within agreed accounting tolerance, in the recording and reporting of transactions through the Debt Management Account and in delivering money (and reconciling payments) to the NLF. [Same target in 1998–99.]

5. To acknowledge all letters from the public within nine working days and for at least 95 per cent. to be sent a substantive reply within four weeks. [Comparable target met in 1998–99; acknowledgment target now shorter.]

6. To achieve less than 10 breaches of the operational market notice (excluding any breaches that the Treasury accept were beyond the control of the Office). [Comparable target met in 1998–99; target now reduced from 12 to 10—an operational notice covering cash management will be published in 1999.]

7. To ensure that the qualifications that the NAO have made in respect of the Gilt-Edged Official Operations Account are satisfactorily addressed in the running and presentation of the Debt Management Account. [Same target in 1998–99.]

Birth Certificates

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list those purposes for which his Department and its executive agencies require a birth certificate to be furnished by (i) employees, contractors or those applying for employment of contracts, and (ii) other persons. [85823]

Ms Hewitt: Each of the Chancellor's departments and agencies (HM Treasury, HM Customs and Excise, Inland Revenue, National Savings, Office for National Statistics, Royal Mint, Government Actuary, Debt Management Office and Valuation Office Agency) requires, as part of the Basic Check on new employees, some evidence of identity, age (for pensions purposes), and of the right to work in the UK. Such evidence depends upon whether or not the applicant is a UK or EC national but might be provided from a combination of different documents including a full British passport, P45, valid British driving licence, birth certificate, proof of residence at a given address, etc., or (where relevant) a full EC or other national passport; an identity card issued by an EC country; or other proof of immigration status and/or the right to work. Employees are also required to produce their birth certificate when undergoing Developed Vetting procedures (required when they will have constant access to Top Secret information and assets). Most departments also require contractors to make checks similar to the Basic Check on their employees. Birth certificates, as a means of identity, are not required to be furnished by other persons.

Personal Service Companies

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if information on certified agencies and other clients of personal service companies will be available through EDI to enable recruitment consultancies and others to check on a company's status; [86188]

(2) what requirements to report to the Inland Revenue will be placed on companies utilising personal service companies (a) via a certified agency and (b) independent of a certified agency; [86177]

(3) if the tax affairs of certified agencies for personal service companies will be handled through a central office; [86179]

(4) when the Inland Revenue plans to withdraw Decision 4 of February 1992 which makes it unnecessary for an agency to operate PAYE when a limited company is contracting with an agency to provide personal services; [86185]

(5) how self-certification of public service companies will apply in the case of companies with two streams of income, one within and the other outside the new rules; [86180]

(6) how the Inland Revenue will define costs which are incidental to the supply of materials and equipment in contracts for personal service companies; [86178]

(7) if non-certified agencies providing personal services will be given a tax code; [86183]

(8) how the retained profits of personal service companies will be treated by the Inland Revenue after April 2000; [86181]

(9) for what reasons Inland Revenue examples of the impact of tax changes affecting personal service companies do not include reference to agency workers; [86186]

(10) for what period directors of personal service companies who default on their certifications will be banned from self-certification; [86189]

(11) how legitimate expenses for personal service companies in respect of (i) professional indemnity and public liability insurance and (ii) training costs, will be handled for tax purposes. [86184]

Dawn Primarolo: The rules will not be finalised until consultation on the proposals is complete. The Inland Revenue will meet with representative bodies in June and are considering written representations from individuals. I have asked the Inland Revenue to publish details of the new rules in as near final form as possible, along with comprehensive guidance on the application of the rules, at the earliest possible stage.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how VAT will be applied to non-certified agencies supplying personal services when they have paid income tax and national insurance. [86182]

Dawn Primarolo: The VAT position of non-certified agencies will not be affected by the Inland Revenue proposals. VAT will continue to be due on the full value of the supplies made by the agencies, including income tax and national insurance deducted by the client.

Stability Pact Targets (Italy)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer in which forum European Finance Ministers modified stability pact targets in relation to Italy. [85894]

Ms Hewitt: The 25 May ECOFIN agreed a draft text of the Board Economic Guidelines for Italy which reflects the possibility of lower than forecast growth in 1999 impacting on Italy's deficit.

Marriage Registrars

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to make regulations to amend the duty of marriage registrars to report suspicious marriages; and if he will make a statement. [86031]

Ms Hewitt: The Immigration and Asylum Bill places a duty on registrars to report to the Home Office marriages which they reasonably suspect to be sham marriages, and for reports to be made in such form and manner, and within a time period as may be set out in regulations. The Bill provides for these regulations to be made by the Registrar General with the approval of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

BMARC

Mr. David Davis: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what were the results of the inquiry by HM Customs and Excise set up in June 1995 into the allegations that directors of BMARC had condoned or participated in the illegal export of naval cannon to Iran; and if he will make a statement. [85920]

Dawn Primarolo: As the enforcement authority for export controls, Customs investigated the allegations but found no evidence that would support a prosecution against any of the directors of BMARC.

Taxation

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the assumptions for household spending and council tax payment which were used in the answer to the right hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) of 11 December 1996, Official Report, columns 190–202. [85912]

Dawn Primarolo: The written answer of 11 December 1996 was given by the previous Government. It would be inappropriate for me to seek to explain the assumptions on which it was based, beyond what was said at the time by the Minister concerned.

Training Allowance

Mr. Healey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if a training allowance paid to a trainee, who is not receiving an unemployment-related benefit whilst on a European Social Fund course of training, is subject to (a) income tax and (b) national insurance contributions. [85749]

Dawn Primarolo: Where a training allowance funded by the European Social Fund is paid to a trainee who is not an employee the allowance will not normally be chargeable to income tax or National Insurance contributions.

Republic of Ireland GNP

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the per capita Gross National Product in the Republic of Ireland as a percentage of the EU average, for the most recent year available. [85851]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory, dated 8 June 1999:

As director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on the per capita gross national product of the Republic of Ireland.

The latest estimates available from Eurostat (the Statistical Office of the European Community) are for 1998. These show the Republic of Ireland with a per capita gross domestic product of 87.5 per cent of the EU average. These estimates are subject to revision.

National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what steps are being taken to enable the person whose National Insurance number is BT 21 74 42 B, to pay their

Class 2 National Insurance contributions, and how long it will be before these steps are completed. [86173]

Dawn Primarolo: The Director of the Inland Revenue National Insurance Contributions Office will shortly be writing to the hon. Member about the person concerned.

VAT

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the revenue implications for the Exchequer of the judgment of the European Court in the First National Bank of Chicago case (Case C-172/96); and if he will make a statement. [85684]

Ms Hewitt: HM Customs and Excise are monitoring claims from businesses applying the ruling to previous forex transactions. It is too early to estimate with any certainty the final amount to be paid out.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is his policy with regard to the VAT treatment of (a) unilateral and (b) bilateral supplies in the field of financial transactions and instruments following the judgment of the European Court in the First National Bank of Chicago case (Case C-172/96). [85683]

Dawn Primarolo: Supplies of financial services and instruments are exempt from VAT. VAT on related costs is recoverable to the extent that it relates to supplies to counter-parties outside the territory of the European Community.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals for legislation with regards to VAT on financial services have been made by the European Union VAT Committee; and if he will make a statement. [85681]

Dawn Primarolo: No such proposal has been made.

Mr. Maude: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions (i) he, (ii) Treasury Ministers and (iii) Treasury officials have had with (a) the European Commission, (b) the European Union VAT Committee and (c) the Council of Ministers with regards to VAT on financial services. [85682]

Dawn Primarolo: The European Commission has commissioned a series of studies into the feasibility of applying VAT to financial services. Customs and Excise are responsible for VAT policy, and officials have spoken to Commission officials about the progress of the studies on a number of occasions. In addition, Customs officials have attended seminars and a conference organised by the Commission. The consultants' report has yet to be considered by the Commission. No proposals have been made.

EU Budget

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is following the agreement of the Berlin Council on the European budget of the net United Kingdom contributions to the budget until 2006. [86051]

Ms Hewitt: We intend to publish estimates when the Commission has provided figures for allocations under the structural and cohesion funds. These are expected in the next few weeks.

CABINET OFFICE

Biotechnology

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Lewes of 24 May 1999, Official Report, column 39, if he will provide further details in respect of the questions asked. [85659]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: No.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what criteria were used by the Biotechnology Presentation Group in identifying an independent scientist to appear on the "Today" programme on 10 May to comment on the Christian Aid/Action Aid report on GM foods in the third world. [85929]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: In its report on 12 May, the Science and Technology Select Committee of this House called for a more informed public debate on Genetic Modification and said that the Government had a role to play in leading that debate. The Government also believe it important that the public hears the views of scientists who are experts on genetic modification.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the scientific sources of his advice on the benefits of biotechnology, indicating those he will make available to hon. Members. [85933]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government are advised by experts who sit on our advisory committees. We also pay careful attention to the views of other experts. The potential benefits of biotechnology were most recently described in the report of the Nuffield Council on Bioethics published on 27 May.

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office for what reasons the briefing notes on biodiversity, herbicide resistance and cross pollination in connection with GMOs prepared for the Government's Biotechnology Presentation Group were inadequate. [85932]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The briefing notes were not sufficiently informative.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will publish the minutes of all meetings of the Biotechnology Presentation Group. [86119]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The minutes of inter-Ministerial meetings are not normally published. Previous Governments followed the same practice.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) what amendments the Biotechnology Presentation Group made in the report he published on the Health Implications of genetically modified foods by the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser; and if he will publish a list of all the amendments stating the reasons for them; [86116]

(2) if the authors of the report he published on the Health Implications of genetically modified foods had been asked to redraft their report by the Biotechnology Presentation Group; how many drafts the report went through prior to publication; and if he will publish the original draft. [86117]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: After discussing an initial draft with Ministers, the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser revised the report in order to ensure that it was more easily comprehensible for the lay reader and to include specific recommendations for action. The only amendment to the report made by the Biotechnology Presentation Group was to suggest an expansion of the heading before paragraph 41.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what central rebuttals strategy had been established for use after his oral statement on biotechnology of 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 1371–73. [86127]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) on 26 May 1999, Official Report, column 153.

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if the new advisory committees he announced in his oral statement on biotechnology of 21 May 1999, Official Report, columns 1371–73, will sit in public. [86133]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The new advisory committees will abide by the guidelines on transparency contained in paragraph 51 of the Report of the Review of the Regulatory Framework, published on 21 May, copies of which are in the Libraries of the House.

Courts (Ministerial Visits)

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he has visited the magistrates court at Pontefract; and how many other (a) magistrates' courts and (b) Crown courts he has visited since he became Minister with responsibility for drugs policy. [85899]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I have not visited the magistrates court at Pontefract in my capacity as Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I visited Stockport magistrates court on Friday 5 February 1999.

Responsibility for Crown courts rests with my right hon. Friend the Lord Chancellor.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86096]

Mr. Kilfoyle: The Cabinet Office, along with its Agencies (including the Central Office of Information), have no staff who benefited from the National Minimum Wage (NMW). The Department's lowest rates of pay are above the threshold required by the NMW.

Cabinet Committees

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the dates on which MISC 6 has met since 21 October 1998; what was discussed; and who attended. [86068]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government does not reveal when Cabinet Committees meet or the issues which they discuss. Previous Governments followed the same practice.

Genetically Modified Food

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will place in the Library the initial draft of the paper on GM foods prepared by the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser. [85930]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The Government took the unusual step of publishing the report by the Chief Scientific Adviser and the Chief Medical Officer on GM foods. The initial draft which Ministers considered was revised by the authors to ensure that it was easily comprehensible for the lay reader and to include specific recommendations for action.

Reports (Publication)

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will make it his policy to publish all reports by the Chief Medical Officer and the Chief Scientific Adviser without amendment. [86118]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: I am not responsible for all reports of the Chief Medical Officer or the Chief Scientific Adviser. The Chief Medical Officer is accountable to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health, and the Chief Scientific Adviser to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Open Government

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications for information she received under the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information in the last parliamentary Session; and how many of these applications were granted. [83116]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 10 May 1999]: For monitoring purposes, this information is collected on a calendar year basis. Information for 1997 was published last year in the Open Government: Code of Practice on Access to Government Information 1997 Report. In 1998, my Department received 13 applications for information under the Code and granted 12 of them. The information needed to answer the remaining request is still outstanding; it is being pursued.

HIV/AIDS

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people with AIDS died in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland in each year from 1981 to 1998, and in 1999 to date. [84812]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following table. It should be noted that information broken down by Health and Social Services board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

AIDS report	Eastern board	Northern board	Total
1981	—	—	—
1982	1	—	1
1983	—	—	—
1984	—	—	—
1985	1	—	1
1986	—	—	—
1987	1	—	1
1988	1	—	1
1989	7	—	7
1990	9	—	9
1991	5	—	5
1992	4	1	5
1993	4	—	4
1994	7	—	7
1995	8	—	8
1996	6	1	7
1997	1	1	2
1998	—	—	—
1999	—	—	—
Total	55	3	58

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people diagnosed with AIDS and now known to have died there were in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland in each year from 1981 to 1998, and in 1999 to date. [84811]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following table. It should be noted that information broken down by Health and Social Services Board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

AIDS report	Eastern board	Northern board	Total
1981	—	—	—
1982	—	—	—
1983	2	—	2
1984	4	1	5
1985	9	—	9
1986	1	—	1
1987	—	—	—
1988	—	—	—
1989	—	—	—
1990	—	—	—
1991	—	—	—
1992	—	—	—
1993	—	—	—
1994	—	—	—
1995	—	—	—
1996	—	—	—
1997	—	—	—
1998	—	1	1
Total	16	2	18

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the cumulative numbers of people with AIDS who died in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland in each year from 1981 to 1998, and in 1999 to date. [84813]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following table. It should be noted that information broken down by Health and Social Service Board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

AIDS report	Eastern Board	Northern Board	Total
1981	—	—	—
1982	1	—	1
1983	1	—	1
1984	1	—	1
1985	2	—	2
1986	2	—	2
1987	3	—	3
1988	4	—	4
1989	11	—	11
1990	20	—	20
1991	25	—	25
1992	29	1	30
1993	33	1	34
1994	40	1	41
1995	48	1	49
1996	54	2	56
1997	55	3	58
1998	55	3	58
1999	55	3	58

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people were newly diagnosed HIV positive (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland, for each year from 1981 to 1998, and for 1999 to date. [84815]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following tables. The data in respect of each Health and Social Services Board area have not specifically been broken down by exposure category as this would undermine the principle of preserving the anonymity of those who come forward for examination etc. It should also be noted that information broken down by Health and Social Services Board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

(a) Northern Ireland

	Exposure category
	1 Sex between men	2 Sex between men and women	3 IDU	4 Blood factor	5 Blood/tissue transfer	6 Other/ undetermined	Total
1984	1	1	—	9	—	—	11
1985	5	1	—	7	—	—	13
1986	8	2	—	—	1	—	11
1987	4	4	1	—	—	—	9
1988	8	—	2	—	—	—	10
1989	3	5	2	—	—	—	10
1990	8	2	—	—	—	1	11
1991	15	2	—	1	—	—	18
1992	7	3	—	1	—	—	11
1993	6	5	1	—	—	—	12
1994	10	—	—	—	—	—	10

(a) Northern Ireland

	Exposure category
	1 Sex between men	2 Sex between men and women	3 IDU	4 Blood factor	5 Blood/tissue transfer	6 Other/ undetermined	Total
1995	6	5	—	—	—	—	11
1996	12	4	—	—	—	—	16
1997	6	2	—	—	—	—	8
1998	6	4	—	—	—	—	10
1999	—	3	1	—	—	—	4
Total	105	43	7	18	1	1	175

(b) Each Health and Social Services Board area

HIV report	Eastern	Northern	Southern	Western	Total
1984	11	—	—	—	11
1985	13	—	—	—	13
1986	11	—	—	—	11
1987	9	—	—	—	9
1988	9	—	—	1	10
1989	10	—	—	—	10
1990	11	—	—	—	11
1991	18	—	—	—	18
1992	11	—	—	—	11
1993	12	—	—	—	12
1994	8	—	—	2	10
1995	10	—	—	1	11
1996	16	—	—	—	16
1997	8	—	—	—	8
1998	9	—	1	—	10
1999	2	1	—	1	4
Total	168	1	1	5	175

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the cumulative number of people who had been diagnosed HIV positive (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland, for each year from 1981 to 1998, and for 1999 to date. [84816]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following tables. The data in respect of each Health and Social Services Board area have not specifically been broken down by exposure category as this would undermine the principle of preserving the anonymity of those who come forward for examination etc. It should also be noted that information broken down by health and Social Services Board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

(a) Northern Ireland

	Exposure category
	1 Sex between men	2 Sex between men and women	3 IDU	4 Blood factor	5 Blood/tissue transfer	6 Others /undetermined	Total
1984	1	1	—	9	—	—	11
1985	6	2	—	16	—	—	24
1986	14	4	—	16	1	—	35
1987	18	8	1	16	1	—	44
1988	26	8	3	16	1	—	54
1989	29	13	5	16	1	—	64
1990	37	15	5	16	1	1	75
1991	52	17	5	17	1	1	93
1992	59	20	5	18	1	1	104
1993	65	25	6	18	1	1	116
1994	75	25	6	18	1	1	126
1995	81	30	6	18	1	1	137
1996	93	34	6	18	1	1	153
1997	99	36	6	18	1	1	161
1998	105	40	6	18	1	1	171
1999	105	43	7	18	1	1	175

(b) Each Health and Social Services Board Area

HIV Report	Eastern	Northern	Southern	Western	Total
1984	11	—	—	—	11
1985	24	—	—	—	24
1986	35	—	—	—	35
1987	44	—	—	—	44
1988	53	—	—	1	54
1989	63	—	—	1	64
1990	74	—	—	1	75
1991	92	—	—	1	93
1992	103	—	—	1	104
1993	115	—	—	1	116
1994	123	—	—	3	126
1995	133	—	—	4	137
1996	149	—	—	4	153
1997	157	—	—	4	161
1998	166	—	1	4	171
1999	168	1	1	5	175

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the cumulative number of people who had been diagnosed HIV positive and not known to have died (i) broken down by probable means of transmission and (ii) in total in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland, for each year from 1981 to 1998, and for 1999 to date. [84817]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following tables. The data in respect of each Health and Social Services Board area have not specifically been broken down by exposure category as this would undermine the principle of preserving the anonymity of those who come forward for examination etc. It should also be noted that information broken down by Health and Social Services Board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

(a) Northern Ireland

	Exposure Category 1 Sex between men	2 Sex between men and women	3 IDU	4 Blood factor	Total
1984	—	—	—	6	6
1985	3	—	—	6	9
1986	5	2	—	6	13
1987	5	4	1	6	16
1988	10	4	2	6	22
1989	11	7	2	6	26
1990	14	8	2	6	30
1991	24	9	2	6	41
1992	28	11	2	6	47
1993	34	15	2	6	57
1994	42	15	2	6	65
1995	47	20	2	6	75
1996	59	24	2	6	91
1997	65	26	2	6	99
1998	71	30	2	6	109
1999	71	33	3	6	113

(b) Each Health and Social Services Board Area

HIV Report	Eastern	Northern	Southern	Western	Total
1984	6	—	—	—	6
1985	9	—	—	—	9
1986	13	—	—	—	13
1987	16	—	—	—	16
1988	21	—	—	1	22
1989	25	—	—	1	26
1990	29	—	—	1	30
1991	40	—	—	1	41
1992	46	—	—	1	47
1993	56	—	—	1	57
1994	62	—	—	3	65
1995	71	—	—	4	75
1996	87	—	—	4	91
1997	95	—	—	4	99
1998	104	—	1	4	109
1999	106	1	1	5	113

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she will list the cumulative number of people diagnosed with AIDS in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) each health authority area of Northern Ireland in each year from 1981 to 1998, and in 1999 to date. [54814]

Mr. McFall: The information is set out in the following table. It should be noted that information broken down by Health and Social Services Board area relates to the Board in which diagnosis was first made. It does not necessarily reflect the Board of residence.

AIDS report	Eastern board	Northern board	Total
1981	—	—	—
1982	1	—	1
1983	1	—	1
1984	1	—	1
1985	2	—	2
1986	3	—	3
1987	4	—	4
1988	11	—	11
1989	19	—	19
1990	25	—	25
1991	31	—	31
1992	38	1	39
1993	46	2	48
1994	57	3	60
1995	70	3	73
1996	71	3	74
1997	71	4	75
1998	71	5	76
1999	71	5	76

Sewage Disposal

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when she will update her assessment of the unit cost per household in Northern Ireland for the provision of sewage disposal facilities. [85623]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Water Service under its chief executive, Mr. Robert C. Martin. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Robert C. Martin to Mr. Roy Beggs, dated 2 June 1999:

You recently asked the Secretary of State a Parliamentary Question about when the unit cost per household in Northern Ireland for the provision of sewage disposal facilities will be updated. I have been asked to respond as Chief Executive of Water Service with operational responsibility for the provision of sewerage services.

When Water Service's Director of Finance, Mr D Carson, wrote to you on 2 March 1999 about this issue he referred to a Departmental review of the unit cost issue. The current position is that the review of this complex policy matter is being actively progressed. As soon as the outcome of the review is known I will arrange for you to be informed.

Paramilitary Violence

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) if she will list for the week ended

Saturday 22 May the number of (a) punishment beatings and (b) punishment shootings which took place in Northern Ireland indicating how many in each category were committed by (i) Loyalist and (ii) Republican groups; [85622]

(2) if she will list for the week ended Saturday 22 May the number of violent incidents involving paramilitary groups which took place in Northern Ireland, indicating how many involved (a) Loyalist and (b) Republican groups. [85621]

Mr. Ingram: The number of security incidents during the period 16–22 May 1999 are shown:

	Number
Deaths	0
Shooting incidents	3
Bombing incidents	2

The number of casualties as a result of paramilitary-style attacks during the period are as follows:

	Loyalist	Republican
Assaults	1	0
Shootings	3	1
Total	4	1

Notes:

1. Figures may be subject to minor amendment.
2. The shooting incident cannot as yet be firmly attributed to a grouping.

Over-30 Months Scheme

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment she has made of the possibility of utilising the spare capacity at the incinerator at Duncrue in Belfast for the incineration of meat and bone meal and tallow required under the Over Thirty Month Scheme arising out of the BSE crisis. [85957]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Department of the Environment Water Service incinerator at Duncrue, Belfast, has a capacity of three tonnes dry solids per hour and is currently operating at this throughput. There is therefore no spare capacity in the incinerator to accommodate the incineration of meat and bone meal and tallow from the Over Thirty Months Scheme.

Bloody Sunday Inquiry

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what are the total sums which her Department has spent on the present inquiry into the events on Sunday 30 January 1972, up to 31 May 1999; under what headings those sums were disbursed; and what are the sums under each heading. [85909]

Marjorie Mowlam: The total costs up to 31 March this year are £6,644,008.

Patient Discharges

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many hospital patients there are in each health and social services trust who require discharge to (a) a residential home (b) a nursing home and (c) domiciliary care. [85857]

Mr. McFall: This information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, a special survey was commissioned by the Department of Health and Social Services on 26 February 1999. The attached table shows the number of patients within each Trust and Board area who were ready for discharge on that date, and where lack of funding for appropriate community care services was said to be the reason for their remaining in hospital.

Trust	Number
Royal Group	7
Belfast City	4
Green Park	5
Ulster Community and Hospitals	0
Down Lisburn	10
Mater	0
Eastern HSSB Total	26
Armagh and Bungannon	5
Newry and Mourne	0
Craigavon Area Hospital Group	25
Southern HSSB Total	30
Causeway	21
Homefirst	44
Northern HSSB Total	65
Foyle	0
Sperrin Lakeland	1
Western HSSB Total	1
N. I. Grand Total	122

Coroners Inquests

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans she has to review the legislation governing coroners' inquests in Northern Ireland. [86271]

Mr. Vaz: I have been asked to reply.

Neither I nor the Lord Chancellor has any immediate plans to review the legislation governing coroners' inquests in Northern Ireland. However, this is a matter which will be kept under review in consultation with the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Ms Jenny Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what progress has been made with the plans to reform the Child Support Agency; and when he expects to announce his proposals. [85540]

Mr. John M. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Child Support Agency White Paper is due to be published. [85624]

Angela Eagle: Final proposals for reform of the child support system will be announced shortly.

Benefit-related Mail

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 24 May 1999, Official Report, column 47, on housing benefit, what charges are made by the Post Office for not redirecting benefit-related mail in a local authority's area. [86066]

Angela Eagle: Further to my written answer on 24 May 1999, Official Report, column 47, in which I stated that 56 local authorities are now operating the do not redirect service, I am pleased to confirm that this number has now increased to 64 local authorities. The Post Office does not make any charges to individual local authorities for not redirecting benefit-related post. However, the Department has agreed an annual fee with the Post Office for the national operation of this service. For the first year's operation of the do not redirect service this fee is set at £366,266.

Asylum Seekers

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families with children who applied for asylum at a port of entry to Britain in the last financial year have been in receipt of income support. [85562]

Angela Eagle: Figures for the last financial year are not yet available. However, in 1998 the number of new port asylum seeker and other urgent payment cases in receipt of Income Support who have children was 5,000.

Notes:

1. Figure relates to Great Britain.
2. Figure will include a number of non-asylum seekers which receive Urgent Case Payments for other reasons.
3. Figure has been rounded to the nearest thousand cases, and will therefore be subject to a degree of sampling error.
4. Children are defined as age 0–15 years.
5. Sample size 5 per cent.

Source:

Income Support Statistics Quarterly Enquiries, February to November 1998.

Income Support

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 25 January 1999, Official Report, column 49, regarding publication of take-up estimates, (a) when he now expects to publish such estimates and (b) for what reason there has been a further delay in publication. [85637]

Angela Eagle: The Department's statisticians expect to publish revised figures for 1996–97 and new figures for 1997–98 as a single document in the late summer, probably early September.

It has taken longer than expected to complete extensive investigation and testing of the routines used in calculating take-up to ensure the quality of take-up estimates. This phase is now complete and production of estimates is under way.

We have taken the opportunity to look again at the possibility of publishing 1996–97 estimates of take-up for Job Seekers Allowance (income based JSA). Informed judgments on this and the other benefits are assisted by considering 1996–97 and 1997–98 data in parallel. Statisticians therefore judge that the early production of quality-assured estimates is best served by publishing 1996–97 and 1997–98 statistics together.

Statisticians advise that they expect the final estimate, of the average number of pensioners entitled to but not receiving Income Support in 1996–97, to be close to the provisional revised estimate of 400,000–700,000 given in DSS Press notice 98/300 of 11 December, a copy of which is in the Library.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what interim conclusions have been reached by the Housing Benefit verification pilot projects; and if he will make a statement; [85640]

(2) what emergency provisions exist for claimants and their partners (a) who do not have a National Insurance number and (b) whose identity cannot be confirmed to replace Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit under the Housing Benefit verification pilot schemes; [85642]

(3) when he will publish (a) the statistics collected under and (b) the final results and conclusions of the Housing Benefit verification pilot projects relating to National Insurance numbers; [85639]

(4) what is the length of time currently taken to process DCI1LA forms for (a) children leaving care and (b) people from abroad; [85641]

(5) what discretionary powers Benefits Agency staff have when trying to establish the identity of individuals who are unable to supply documents in the Housing Benefit verification pilots. [85645]

Angela Eagle: Section 19 of the Social Security Administration (Fraud) Act 1997 requires individuals to provide, as a qualifying condition of benefit, a National Insurance number in respect of themselves and their partner. Since 12 April, the extension of this provision to Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit has been piloted in seven local authorities. This provides an opportunity to test procedures and information about volumes and costs to prepare for national implementation on 6 September.

Early indications from the pilot are that virtually all claimants have been able, and are willing, to produce satisfactory evidence of their identity and proof of their National Insurance number. Consequently, there has been very little call on the Benefits Agency to trace or allocate National Insurance numbers. Of the few DCI1LA forms sent some relate to people from abroad but none have so far been sent in respect of children leaving care. There are no undue delays in DCI1LA forms being processed. However, this would have no adverse effect on claimants anyway as Section 19 will have been satisfied, and benefit paid, once sufficient information or evidence has been provided to enable a National Insurance number to be traced or allocated. Any individual who does not yet have a National Insurance number will be allocated one once he has furnished this information or evidence.

The procedures used by local authorities to establish identity will apply the same standards to those currently operated by the Benefits Agency. Where an individual is unable to provide satisfactory documentary evidence of their identity every effort will be made to establish and corroborate their personal history by means of an interview.

Statistics are currently being collected on the pilot and these, together with the final results and conclusions from the pilot, will be available in late August.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in cases where there is an over payment of housing benefit which cannot be reclaimed from the recipient, from which organisation's budget the overpayment is deducted once it is detected. [85643]

Angela Eagle: The majority of Housing Benefit overpayments are recoverable, although it is for local authorities to choose whether to do so. The Department pays differing levels of direct subsidy to local authorities, from nil to 95 per cent., depending on the cause of the overpayment. If the error is due to this Department or to a Department for Education and Employment (DfEE) official error, full subsidy is paid on any unrecovered benefit. However, if the overpayment arises due to an official error by the local authority, nil subsidy is payable and the local authority has to bear the cost of any unrecovered benefit. In all other cases, including fraud, some subsidy is paid and the local authority can retain any monies recovered. With the exception of monies recovered in respect of this Department or DfEE official error, no adjustment to subsidy is made to reflect any amount recovered.

Different subsidy arrangements apply in England and Wales where Housing Benefit is paid to local authorities' own tenants, and are the responsibility of the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Secretary of State for Wales.

Widows

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assistance will be available to widows aged 45 to 60 years to help them to find a job or a training/education place during the six months for which they receive benefit. [85940]

Angela Eagle: New widows aged 45 to 60 will receive help through ONE, the single work-focused gateway service. ONE will give new claimants access to a personal adviser to guide them through their options. The focus will be on enabling people to access a wide range of help and support to ensure that they do not miss out on the opportunities that are available to them.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations he has had about the likelihood of widows aged 45 to 60 years, who are not already in full-time paid work, obtaining such work within six months of their bereavement. [85941]

Angela Eagle: Our proposal to introduce a time-limited Bereavement Allowance for widows and widowers aged 45 or over who have no dependent children was published in the public consultation document "A new contract for Welfare: Support in Bereavement". For those widows and widowers who need to find work to support themselves at the end of the six-month period, our comprehensive welfare-to-work programme offers a range of support, including advice on employment, training and benefits.

Benefit Entitlement (Students)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the cost of allowing students to claim (a) housing benefit, (b) income support during the summer and (c) income support all year round; and if he will estimate the numbers who would be newly entitled in each case. [86052]

Angela Eagle: Since the start of the 1990–91 academic year, full-time students have not been entitled to benefits as a means of supporting themselves whilst studying. Financial support provided to the vast majority of full-time students by the taxpayer now comes through one source—the education system. Nevertheless, certain students in vulnerable groups, e.g. lone parents, disabled students etc., continue to have access to Income Support, income-based Jobseeker's Allowance and Housing Benefit on the same basis as before.

We do not hold sufficient information about students' housing and income circumstances to be able to estimate the costs of allowing all students to claim Housing Benefit and Income Support.

"Support in Bereavement"

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will place in the Library a copy of all the responses made to the "Support in Bereavement" consultation document (Cmd 4104). [86042]

Angela Eagle: A list of those who have responded has been placed in the Library. Copies of this list and specific responses are available on request from The Widows' Benefit Consultation Team, 3rd Floor, The Adelphi, 1–11 John Adam Street, London, WC2N 6HT.

Temporary National Insurance Numbers

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what circumstances temporary National Insurance Numbers in the format TN(date of birth) M/F are issued. [85644]

Mr. Timms: The Department does not issue temporary National Insurance Numbers. The only circumstance in which they may be used is where an employer does not know the National Insurance Number of a new employee and is submitting end of year returns by magnetic media.

State Second Pension

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will estimate the public expenditure effects, excluding setting up costs, of passporting disabled people with broken work records onto the state second pension by 2002 and for every five-year period until 2047; [86219]

(2) if he will estimate the public expenditure effects, excluding setting up costs, of passporting recipients of invalid care allowance and carers of people receiving attendance allowance or disability living allowance who qualify for home responsibilities protection onto the state second pension by 2002 and for every five year period until 2047; [86210]

(3) if he will estimate the public expenditure effects, excluding setting up costs, of passporting child benefit recipients, where the youngest child for whom the benefit received is aged five or under, onto the state second pension by 2002 and for every five-year period until 2047. [86211]

Mr. Timms: Gross costs in 2002 would be less than £50 million in total. Figures are not available at 5 yearly intervals from 2002, but the gross costs at 10 yearly intervals thereafter are set out in the following table.

£ billion

	2010	2020	2030	2040	2050
Disabled	0.2	1.1	2.1	3.1	4.3
Carers of disabled	0.0	0.1	0.2	0.4	0.6
Carers of children aged 5 and under	0.0	0.0	0.0	0.3	1.4
Total	0.3	1.2	2.3	3.8	6.3

Notes:

1. Figures, supplied by the Government Actuary's Department, are in £ billion at 1998–99 prices. They represent gross costs (excluding income-related benefit offsets) which make no allowance for the amounts that would have been spent on Home Responsibilities Protection for SERPS under the previous Government's policy.
2. Figures are calculated to the nearest £100 million. Totals may include amounts of less than £100 million not otherwise shown in the table.
3. Real earnings growth of 1.5 per cent. per annum has been assumed.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what will be the minimum possible Income Support paid per week under the proposals for welfare reform to a single adult aged over 18 years, with no dependants, who has no savings or other income, and (a) who is not eligible for JSA because the severity of his disability makes him unable to do any work and (b) is eligible for JSA but is unable to find work; and what is the proposed minimum level of Disability Income Guarantee. [85939]

Angela Eagle: Disabled people with a low income may be eligible to claim Income Support or income based Jobseeker's Allowance. The overall weekly amount of benefit payable will depend on the individual's circumstances, such as their age, the severity of their disability and other factors. If they satisfy all the conditions for entitlement to the full IS/JSA personal allowance, a single person aged 18 to 24 would currently receive a personal allowance of £40.70. A single person aged 25 or over would receive a personal allowance of £51.40. If they qualified for the disability premium they would receive a further £21.90. The same rates of benefit apply to both Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance.

Our proposals on welfare reform for disabled people were set out in our consultation document "A new contract for welfare: SUPPORT FOR DISABLED PEOPLE" published last October. Under the proposals, a new Disability Income Guarantee will be introduced in April 2001 and will provide extra help and security for those with the highest care needs. It will provide help through the income-related benefits to severely disabled adults and families with disabled children who get the highest rate care component of Disability Living Allowance. The overall amount of benefit will depend on individual circumstances. The increase in support builds on the help that is already available because of disability. This extra support will be paid through a new higher rate of disability premium. At April 1998 rates, it will be worth an extra £5.75 for a single adult or child, and £8.30 for a couple.

Benefits Agency (Computerisation)

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security to which companies the Government have made payments for consultancy regarding the computerisation of the Benefits Agency in the last three years; how much was paid to each company; what the current status of the project is; and if he will make a statement. [85437]

Angela Eagle: The information is in the table.

Companies the Government has made payments for consultancy regarding the computerisation of the Benefits Agency in the last three years

Project	Contract dates	Contract award value	Successful company	Current status
Programme Accounting Group (PAG) Consultancy Support	12 November 1996 to 31 December 1996	£36,450	KPMG	Finished
Programme Accounting Group/Programme Accounting Computer System (PACS) Consultancy Support	21 October 1996 to 21 December 1996	£63,508	SEMA	Finished
Consultancy Support	21 October 1996 to 31 December 1996	£138,300	KPMG
Programme Design Authority (PDA). Implementation Group Support	—	£135,000	Andersens	Finished
Card Access Payment System (CAPS). Programme and Card Payment Delivery Review	11 November 1996 to 28 February 1997	£122,800	Ernst and Young	Finished
Card Access Payment System (CAPS) Migration Conformance Manager	1 April 1997	£78,000	PA Consulting	Finished
Programme Accounting Group (PAG). IT Consultant	1 April 1997 to 30 June 1997	£31,500	Pricewaterhouse Coopers	Finished
Card Access Payment System (CAPS)	9 June 1997 to 8 June 1999	£91,767,220	Andersens	Ongoing
Consultancy Support	—	£613,662	A.S.E.	Ongoing
Financial and Management Information System (FAMIS) Study of Private Sector Partnership potential	20 May 1997 to 27 June 1997	£34,900	KPMG	Finished

Companies the Government has made payments for consultancy regarding the computerisation of the Benefits Agency in the last three years

Project	Contract dates	Contract award value	Successful company	Current status
Card Access Payment System (CAPS) Migration Strategy	3 February 1997 to 31 March 1997	£263,221	Andersens	Finished
Programme Accounting Group	12 February 1997 to 28 March 1997	£29,750	KPMG	Finished
Audit Trail Analysis System (ATAS). Tool Development	17 March 1997 to 11 April 1997	£30,000	ICL	Finished
Programme Accounting Group (PAG) Consultancy Support	14 July 1997 to 31 January 1998	£63,000	KPMG	Finished
Programme Accounting Group (PAG) Technical Architect	15 September 1997 to 30 April 1998	£135,240	A.S.E.	Finished
Banking and Accountancy Branch (BAB) Implimentation Management	3 February 1998 to 31 March 1998	£76,150	SEMA	Finished
Review of BA IS/IT Strategy	11 August 1998 to 4 September 1998	£16,500	PA Consulting	Finished
Card Access Payment System (CAPS) Review of Change Management	2 February 1999 to 8 March 1999	£18,800	Admiral	Finished
Banking and Accountancy Branch (BAB) IT Consultant	15 February 1999 to 26 March 1999	£29,023	PA Consulting	Finished
BA Decision Making and Appeals Implementation Programme	8 June 1998 to 30 November 1999	£360,000	Andersen Consulting	Ongoing

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Pakistan and India

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government are taking to support an improvement in relations between India and Pakistan; and if he will make a statement. [85304]

Mr. Hoon: We welcomed the resumption of dialogue between India and Pakistan and applaud the joint commitment made by the two Prime Ministers in Lahore in February. We hope that the next Indian government will continue the trend towards improved dialogue with Pakistan.

Sudan

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Sudan. [85532]

Mr. Hoon: The Sudanese demand last August that we remove both the Ambassador and his Deputy from Khartoum made it impossible for us to sustain a fully operational Embassy. The Foreign Secretary therefore ordered the temporary withdrawal of all British staff from Khartoum on 27 August.

Since that time, we have been in regular contact with the Sudanese with the objective of normalising relations. I am hopeful that we shall soon have British staff back in Khartoum on a permanent basis so that we can pursue the important work that is to be done there.

GCHQ (Pension Rights)

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the total cost of the compensation for loss of pension rights which his Department has agreed to pay to former employees of GCHQ. [85508]

Mr. Robin Cook: GCHQ officials and the Council of Civil Service Unions are continuing to hold discussions about the detailed circumstances of the 14 individuals and the basis for calculating the amount of compensation to be paid to each of them. They are aiming to conclude the process as soon as possible, but until these facts are established I am not in a position to estimate the total cost.

Angola

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to promote trade with Angola. [85329]

Mr. Wilson: I have been asked to reply.

British Trade International is responsible for trade promotion and investment around the world. British Trade International activities in relation to Angola are focused primarily on the support for good UK projects in the off-shore oil and related support and service sectors.

Libya

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the extent of the involvement of Colonel Gadaffi in terrorist incidents since 1988. [85760]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The United Kingdom has no proof of recent Libyan government involvement in recent terrorist incidents. Recent progress in the Lockerbie (1988) and UTA (1989) cases has led to the suspension of United Nations sanctions against Libya under the relevant UN Security Council resolutions. The United Nations Secretary-General is required to report on Libya's compliance with all the requirements of those resolutions, including renunciation of terrorism, before UN sanctions can be lifted.

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to what extent he has taken into account his Department's assessment of the alleged role of Colonel Gadaffi in terrorist incidents since 1988 in deciding to seek to normalise relations between the UK and Libya. [85759]

Mr. Hoon: The United Kingdom has no evidence of recent Libyan government involvement in recent terrorist incidents.

Following the handover of the Lockerbie suspects and subsequent suspension of the UN and related EU sanctions against Libya, we have been in contact with the Libyans to discuss other outstanding bilateral issues.

We hope that these can be resolved quickly and to our satisfaction. The extent to which we can develop more normal relations with Libya depends on the progress we make.

China

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made by the United Kingdom Government in promoting dialogue between the Chinese Government and the Dalai Lama. [85850]

Mr. Hoon: We take every opportunity to encourage the Chinese Government to enter into dialogue with the Tibetans, including the Dalai Lama. My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs did so when they visited China last year. My predecessor, the late Member for Leeds, Central did so again when he visited China in April. We are not aware however of any recent discussions.

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has (a) sought and (b) obtained from the Chinese Government about the whereabouts of welfare of the Panchen Lama. [85864]

Mr. Hoon: We have taken every opportunity to seek information from the Chinese Government, both bilaterally and in conjunction with our EU partners, on the well-being of the child recognised by the Dalai Lama as the Panchen Lama. We have also sought permission to visit the child. While this has not been agreed by the Chinese authorities, they have reported that the child is living normally with his family. We shall continue to raise the case.

Middle East

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next proposes to visit the Middle East and to meet the new Israeli Government. [85711]

Mr. Hoon: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has no current plans to visit Israel. I hope to visit Israel in the near future to meet the new Israeli Government.

Ron Arad

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken over the missing Israeli service-man Ron Arad. [85715]

Mr. Hoon: We regularly raise the issue of Ron Arad and other missing Israeli service-men with those who might have knowledge of their fate. Derek Fatchett met the families of the missing service-men when he visited Israel in January 1998.

South Africa

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to make contact with the newly elected South African Government and the new President; and if he will make a statement. [86059]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The UK Government have an extremely close relationship with South Africa's President Mandela. We shall build on this when Thabo Mbeki becomes South Africa's new President.

The Prime Minister has already spoken to Thabo Mbeki to congratulate him and assure him of the UK's continuing commitment to our bilateral relationship. The Deputy Prime Minister will represent the UK Government at the Presidential inauguration in Pretoria on 16 June. We shall sustain the high level ministerial contact when the new South African Government is appointed.

Further visits are already planned: the Secretary of State will accompany Her Majesty The Queen on the State Visit to South Africa on 9–11 November and during the Commonwealth Heads of Government Meeting in Durban on 12–14 November, which the Prime Minister will also attend.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Appraisals Handbook

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, pursuant to his answers of 25 May 1999, Official Report, columns 101–02, if the Performance Management Framework due to be published later this year is the same as the Appraisals Handbook for which tenders were invited on 6 February 1998. [85945]

Ms Estelle Morris: No.

Education and Training

Mr. Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he will announce his response to the consultation on post-16 education and training. [85725]

Mr. Mudie: We will be announcing our proposals later in the summer.

New Deal (Young People)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what success the New Deal has had in reducing the number of unemployed young people. [85335]

Mr. Andrew Smith: As the following table shows, since New Deal was introduced nationally in April 1998, unemployment amongst the eligible group has fallen by 41 per cent. compared with a fall of 2.5 per cent. for all unemployed people aged over 25.

The youth labour market is very dynamic, so some people would have left the claimant count without the help provided by New Deal. Nevertheless, initial evidence comparing Pathfinder areas (where New Deal started three months earlier) with the rest of the country suggests that the New Deal increased both the flow of young people out of unemployment and the flow into jobs. The impact of New Deal is being addressed through a comprehensive evaluation programme. All final reports from the evaluation will be published and copies placed in the Library.

Unemployed claimants (UK, nsa)

	Aged 18–24				Aged 25+
	Up to 6 months	over 6 months	over 12 months	All aged 18–24	All
April 1998	226,000	119,900	50,000	345,900	1,028,000
April 1999	229,700	70,900	16,300	300,500	1,003,1001
Change	+3,700	–49,000	–33,700	–45,400	–24,900
Percentage change	+1.5	–41	–67	–13	–2.5

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will provide a breakdown by New Deal office of those who have refused to participate within the New Deal for 18 to 25-year-olds. [85130]

Mr. Andrew Smith [holding answer 25 May 1999]: If on receiving an invitation to take part in the New Deal a young unemployed person terminates their Jobseeker's Allowance claim, the Employment Service will often not know whether it is because they have got a job or because they are refusing to participate.

If sanctions for refusing to comply with New Deal requirements are taken as an indicator, the position in the last six months is as follows: over 7,000 young people had a benefit sanction imposed or were disallowed from claiming Jobseeker's Allowance as part of the New Deal. Of these, 530 were in Scotland, 800 in the Northern region, 1,200 in the North West, 1,120 in Yorkshire and the Humber, 340 in Wales, 910 in the West Midlands, 630 in the East Midlands and Eastern region, 350 in the South West and 1,310 in London and the South East. The figures for individual offices are not collected centrally.

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment of the 34 per cent. of young people who had left the New Deal by the end of February 1999 for unknown reasons, how many are (a) no longer claiming jobseeker's allowance, (b) have retained their previous jobseeker's allowance entitlement and (c) have had their jobseeker's allowance entitlement reduced. [85638]

Mr. Andrew Smith: By the end of February 1999, 35,870 young people had left New Deal for an unknown destination. By the end of March 1999, 7,410 (21 per cent.) had made a subsequent claim for Jobseeker's Allowance at least three months after leaving the New Deal. If young people make a claim for Jobseeker's Allowance within three months of leaving, they re-enter the New Deal.

Education Funding (Liverpool)

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how much new (a) capital and (b) revenue funding has been made available to schools and colleges in Liverpool since May 1997. [85497]

Ms Estelle Morris: The Education Standard Spending Assessment for Liverpool for 1999–2000 is £238,304 million. This represents an increase of £22.5 million or 10.4 per cent. on the equivalent figure for 1997–98. New specific grant and capital allocations made to Liverpool since May 1997 are shown in the following table. In addition, Liverpool Community College has been allocated £17.2 million of capital funding, of which £9.9 million has been paid to date. The college was allocated £20.1 million of revenue funding for 1998–99 academic year. There have also been £0.873 million of capital allocations made to Grant-Maintained school in Liverpool.

£ million

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
New Deal for Schools capital	1.275	4.016	12.697
Books for Schools—revenue	0.224	0.236	0.472
Other Standards Fund	—	5.853	9.087
Infant Class Size—capital	—	0.085	0.224
Infant Class Size—revenue	—	—	0.124
Energy Efficiency capital	—	0.155	—
Nursery Education Grant—revenue	—	0.497	—

Notes:

1. Standards Fund includes both the LEA and central government grant contribution.

2. New Deal for Schools allocations include total allocations made so far under stages 1 to 3, including those for future years. The total for 1999–2000 includes New Deal allocations to Grant-Maintained schools.

Class Sizes

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made towards reducing class sizes for five, six and seven year olds. [85521]

Ms Estelle Morris: The number of pupils aged 5, 6 and 7 in classes over 30 have fallen by almost 130,000, from 485,000 in January 1998 to 356,000 in January 1999. In March, £150 million of allocations were announced for 1999–2000, enabling over 4,000 extra teachers to be employed from September and over 1,000 additional classrooms to be built. As a result, fewer than 200,000 pupils will be in large infant classes from September 1999. The implementation of the class size pledge will mean that there will be a net gain of 12,000 places at popular schools, significantly enhancing parental preference.

Education Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will publish the latest agenda of the Education Council of 7 June. [85634]

Mr. Mudie: The draft provisional agenda for the Education Council is as follows:

1. Adoption of the provisional agenda
2. Adoption of the list of "A" items
3. Leonardo da Vinci and Socrates programmes; implementation of Europass
   a) Leonardo da Vinci II decision and state of negotiations on Socrates II information from the Presidency
   b) Commission report on the initial phase of the Socrates I programme and addendum information from the Commission and exchange of views
   c) State of preparations for the implementation of Leonardo da Vinci II and Socrates II
      information from the Commission and exchange of views
   d) Situation regarding the implementation of the Council decision on Europass (O.J.L 17 of 22.1.99)
      information from the Commission
4. Contribution of education to the European Employment Pact
   Presidency discussion paper
5. Forward planning in the field of education
   Presidency discussion paper
6. (Possible) Conference of European Education Ministers in Budapest on 24–26 June 1999 information from the Presidency and exchange of views
7. Other business.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will make it his policy to implement transitional arrangements to assist former grant-maintained high schools adjust their budgets under the Fair Funding regulations; [85969]

(2) what assessment he has made of the impact of the implementation of fair funding for former grant-maintained high schools. [86067]

Ms Estelle Morris: As a transitional measure, each grant-maintained school has been guaranteed a minimum level of delegated funding for the financial year 1999–2000, based on the amount per pupil which the school received in 1998–99 by way of Annual Maintenance Grant. Funding arrangements for the year 2000–2001 will be announced in due course and will take account of this year's experience.

New Deal (Leeds)

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many jobs under a long-term contract of employment have been secured by 16 to 18-year-olds who have completed the New Deal since its introduction in the Leeds, Central constituency; what was the cost of each job; and what percentage of those who entered the New Deal in Leeds, Central have failed to complete it and for what reasons. [85705]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The New Deal does not apply to young people under 18 years of age. All 16 to 18-year-olds have access to other education, training and employment programmes.

EU Social Affairs Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the outcome of the Social Affairs Council held in Brussels on 25 May 1999; and if he will make a statement. [86038]

Mr. Andrew Smith: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, myself and my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for Trade and Industry, attended this meeting of the Council.

The Council discussed the Employee Participation Directive element of the European Company Statute package; political agreement was blocked by Spain, which could not agree a key element of the proposal which requires unanimity.

The council reached political agreement on three proposals concerning Working Time (excluded sectors)—the draft horizontal amending Directive, a draft Maritime Working Time Directive and draft Enforcement Directive extending the working time provisions to seafarers. On the horizontal amending Directive, the UK was able to accept a Presidency compromise on junior doctors which would provide a transitional period of thirteen years before the 48-hour limit would apply. The UK maintained its Parliamentary scrutiny reserve on the horizontal amending Directive and lifted the scrutiny reserves on the Maritime Directives. Supplementary Explanatory Memoranda on the horizontal amending Directive and the Maritime Directives will be provided to both Houses as soon as possible.

The Council heard a progress report from the Presidency on an amended proposal for a Council Directive on Physical Agents and information concerning the draft Directive on Explosive Atmospheres.

The Council considered the Presidency's proposal for a European Employment Pact. The Presidency tabled other documents in connection with the Pact: a Presidency Report; a draft Youth Memorandum (noted by Council); a draft Resolution on equal employment opportunities for people with disabilities (political agreement reached); and a draft Directive on Fixed Term Contracts, based on agreement between the European social partners (Council took note of progress). The Presidency circulated the text of a draft Resolution on the Pact for consideration at the Cologne European Council on 3–4 June.

The Social Affairs Council was followed by a joint session of Social Affairs and Economic and Finance Ministers: this was attended by the Secretary of State, me and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The joint Council discussed the proposal for a European Employment Pact.

Environment Task Force

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how his Department is evaluating the (a) environmental and (b) educational benefits of the New Deal Environment Task Force projects. [86073]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The Department for the Environment, Transport and the Regions will shortly be appointing consultants to evaluate the environmental impact of the projects carried out by the New Deal Environment Task Force Option since January 1998.

Further evaluation is currently being carried out by the Employment Service, which will provide details of the skills and qualifications gained by participants on this option. Results of this evaluation will be published later this year.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many young people are currently mandated on to the Environment Task Force having already unsuccessfully tried other New Deal options. [86076]

Mr. Andrew Smith: This information is not collected in the form requested. I shall write to my hon. Friend when some information on this issue is available from the quantitative evaluation of New Deal due to report later in the year and will place a copy of my letter in the Library.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many young people are currently on the Environment Task Force option of New Deal. [86099]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The latest Government Statistical Service figures to the end of March 1999 showed that 6,950 young people were on the Environment Task Force option.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what range of skills training and qualifications are available in the placements on the New Deal Environment Task Force projects. [86074]

Mr. Andrew Smith: In addition to the practical skills and work experience it provides, young people on the New Deal Environment Task Force Option are able to study towards a qualification listed in Schedule 2 of the Further and Higher Education Act 1992 or by the Scottish Qualifications Authority, normally up to S/NVQ level two or equivalent. Young people may choose to study qualifications which are directly related to the Option, such as Rural Studies and Environmental Management or Environmental Management Skills, or choose to train for skills and qualifications which have a wider application in the labour market, such as Customer Service or Information Technology.

Judy Mallaber: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many different placement projects there are currently within the New Deal Environment Task Force. [86075]

Mr. Andrew Smith: This information is not currently available. I shall write to my hon. Friend when the current exercise to collect it is finished and will place a copy of my letter in the Library.

School Budgets

Mrs. May: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) if he will list for each local education authority in England the total amount of funding transferred to individual school budgets in 1999–2000 as a result of his fair funding initiative; [85947]

(2) if he will list for each local education authority in England (a) the total aggregated schools budget for 1998–99 including amounts allocated to grant-maintained schools, (b) the total individual schools budget for 1999–2000 and (c) the education standard spending assessment in 1998–99 and 1999–2000. [86070]

Ms Estelle Morris: Information for the financial year 1999–2000 is still being collected and checked by the Department. We will publish authoritative data showing the plans of the authorities, including the amounts to be held back centrally, later this month. I will write to the hon. Member when the figures she requests are available, and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library.

Bett Committee Report

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the Government are proposing to publish the Bett Committee report on pay and conditions for staff in higher education. [85868]

Mr. Mudie: The pay and conditions of staff in higher education are a matter for the employers. The Independent Review of Higher Education Pay and Conditions—the Bett Committee—was set up by the Universities and Colleges Employers Association (UCEA) to look into the framework for determining pay and conditions of service in the higher education sector. The Review Committee will report to UCEA and it will be for the employers and unions to respond to any recommendations.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what estimate he has made of the impact of student tuition fees on the recruitment of students aged (a) 18 to 21 and (b) over 21 years to university degree courses in England and Wales. [84429]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 19 May 1999]: Figures from the Higher Education Statistics Agency show that, using statistical methods comparable to those used in 1997–98, for the 1998–99 academic year the number of home domiciled entrants to undergraduate courses aged under 21 was 216,949, and the number of entrants aged 21 and over was 188,678, respectively a 0.2 per cent. increase and a 0.8 per cent. decrease on 1997–98. These figures, which exclude entrants to Open University courses, indicate that recruitment has been steady over the period when the new tuition fee arrangements were introduced.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Armed Forces Bill

Mr. Key: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on progress made with revision of the topics identified by the Law Commission in 1995 where consolidation was essential and very desirable in their memorandum to the committee on the Armed Forces Bill in 1996; what additional topics have been so identified since 1996; and if he will make a statement with regard to the recommendations of the report from the Select Committee on the Armed Forces Bill (HC 143, Session 1995–96). [85898]

Mr. Vaz: Consolidation of legislation relating to the sentencing powers of criminal courts is well advanced and should be completed early in 2000; and consolidation of legislation relating to financial services was well advanced but has been suspended in view of the Government's proposals for reform in that area. No progress has yet been made on consolidation of legislation relating to road traffic regulation or Customs and Excise, and the legislation relating to taxes management is now a matter for the Tax Law ReWrite. The following additional topics have been identified since 1996: Nurses, Midwives and Health Visitors; Audit Commission; Justices of the Peace; Petroleum; and Criminal Appeals. The consolidating legislation on the first four of these has now been passed. It remains the Government's intention to consolidate the Service Discipline Acts at the earliest opportunity.

Service Discipline Acts

Mr. Key: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many senior draftsmen have been employed on consolidation of legislation in respect of (a) the Service Discipline Acts and (b) other Acts in each year since 1991; and if he will make a statement. [85891]

Mr. Vaz: The numbers of senior Parliamentary Counsel seconded to the Law Commission employed on consolidation of legislation since 1991 are as follows:

Year	Armed Forces legislation	Other legislation
1992	1	2
1993	1	1
1994	0	1
1995	0	1
1996	1	2
1997	1	0
1998	1	0
1999	0	0

Mr. Key: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many Parliamentary Counsel are currently seconded to the Law Commission for purposes of consolidation bill drafting in connection with (a) the Army, Navy and Air Force Discipline Acts, (b) work on the next Armed Forces Bill and (c) other consolidation measures; and if he will make a statement. [85890]

Mr. Vaz: None of the Parliamentary Counsel currently seconded to the Law Commission was seconded specifically to work on consolidation; none is at present working on consolidation of legislation relating to the Armed Forces; and one is at present assigned to a consolidation of criminal appeals legislation.

Mr. Key: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when Law Commission draftsmen commenced work on the consolidation of the Army, Air Force and Naval Discipline Acts; and when they will complete the consolidation. [85889]

Mr. Vaz: Work on this consolidation began at the Law Commission in November 1996. The consolidation is substantially complete, and the timetable for the remaining work will depend on the availability of Parliamentary time.

Children Act 1989

Ms Moran: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will introduce legislation to amend the Children Act 1989 to include a no-contact clause where there is evidence of domestic violence. [85007]

Mr. Vaz: The Government have no current plans to amend the Children Act 1989. The Act gives the court sufficient discretion to decide whether contact with a non-resident parent would be in the child's best interests, where domestic violence is an issue. The Government support the provision of training and guidance to judges and other family law professionals, to ensure that the statutory framework operates effectively.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86084]

Mr. Vaz: This reply covers the Headquarters of the Lord Chancellor's Department (with Associated Offices), the Court Service, the Public Trust Office, the Land Registry, the Public Record Office, the Northern Ireland Court Service and the Legal Aid Board.

102 staff (all casuals in the Court Service working outside London) have received pay increases as a result of the introduction of the National Minimum Wage on 1 April 1999.

Personal Injury Claims

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to consult on the calculation of future pecuniary loss in personal injury claims. [85713]

Mr. Vaz: The Government plan to issue a consultation paper on what rate might be set under Section 1 of the Damages Act to guide courts' decisions on the discount rate to be applied to lump sum awards. We anticipate using this consultation to invite views on alternatives to lump sum payments of compensation. Anyone who wishes to comment on arrangements for calculating future pecuniary loss may use this opportunity to do so.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 9 June 1999

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will publish the agreement which he has negotiated for the management of the farm-scale trials of genetically modified crops in 1999. [85924]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: All crops in the farm-scale evaluations are being grown in compliance with the conditions of the consents issued under Part B or Part C of Directive 90/220/EEC and, in addition, in accordance with the SCIMAC (Supply Chain Initiative on Modified Agricultural Crops) guidelines. The SCIMAC code of practice together with the associated guidelines for growing newly developed herbicide tolerant crops was published by SCIMAC on 21 May 1999 and a copy has been placed in the Library.

National Speed Policy

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions (1) if he will make a statement on the Government's national speed policy review; [86053]

(2) when the national speed policy review is to be concluded; when the Government plan to announce the findings of the national speed policy review; and when the Government plan to announce their proposals for changes to speed limits. [86055]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The speed policy review was launched in October 1998. This is considering how best policy can reflect the aims of the integrated transport policy white paper, whilst continuing to meet our road safety objectives. In its first stage the review is examining existing research and reviewing current practice and legislation. The second stage is now underway involving people and organisations outside government that can offer an informed opinion. The final stage will draw conclusions before a report is prepared for Ministers.

The review will consider all aspects of speed management, including the role of speed limits. It is expected to be completed by the Autumn, when its findings will be published.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many and what proportion of settlements of less than 3,000 in population have (i) no signed speed restrictions and (ii) a maximum speed limit of (a) 40 mph, (b) 30 mph and (c) 20 mph. [86114]

Ms Glenda Jackson: This information is not held centrally as Local Traffic Authorities are responsible for setting speed limits on their roads.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many respondents to the consultation document, "Developing an Integrated Transport Policy: An Invitation to Contribute", recommended lower speed limits. [86054]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Of the 7,300 responses to the consultation document, "Developing an Integrated Transport Policy: An Invitation to Contribute", 827 recommended increased traffic calming measures and lower speed limits.

Mr. Peter Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations the Government have received in the course of the national speed policy review on the need to reduce speed limits in country lanes and in villages. [86056]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A wide range of views on this issue have been received, both for and against the need to reduce such speed limits.

Refrigerants

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make it his policy to change departmental refrigeration and air-conditioning systems to operate on not-in-kind refrigerants. [86164]

Ms Glenda Jackson: It is DETR policy, in accordance with the model framework for greening government operations, not to purchase substances that contain CFCs or HCFCs where suitable alternatives exist. The specifications for the build and refurbishment of Eland and Ashdown House Victoria specifically excluded the use of ozone depleting gases.

Drink-driving

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many road users were killed in drink-drive related accidents during the last year for which figures are available. [85690]

Ms Glenda Jackson: In 1997, the most recent year for which estimates of drink-drive accidents are available, there were an estimated 550 alcohol-related road deaths (or fatalities). This is a revision of the provisional estimate of 540, based on more limited data, which was published in "Road Accidents Great Britain:1997".

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list the main issues addressed in responses to his Department's consultation on "Combating Drinking and Driving: Next Steps". [85689]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Consultees made comments across the range of issues addressed in the consultation paper. Those issues most frequently raised were, in descending order, the lowering of the blood alcohol limit, police breath testing powers, penalties for a drink-drive limit and self-test breathalysers.

British Rail Land (Battersea)

Mr. Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when a decision will be made on the sale of British Rail land to the Dogs' Home, Battersea. [86241]

Ms Glenda Jackson: The British Railways Board was given permission on 20 May to dispose of its surplus land at Battersea to the Dogs' Home.

Energy Efficiency

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many homes have benefited from Government-sponsored programmes of energy efficiency in each year since their establishment. [86206]

Mr. Meacher: The Department provides grants for improving the energy efficiency of homes through the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme and also funds the grant programmes operated by the Energy Saving Trust. The number of homes helped through each are detailed.

Homes improved through the Home Energy Efficiency Scheme

Year	Number of homes improved
1991–92	167,849
1992–93	204,130
1993–94	270,148
1994–95	449,902
1995–96	623,963
1996–97	415,422
1997–98	419,935
1998–99	404,960

Homes improved through DETR funded programmes operated by the Energy Saving Trust

Programme	1996–97	1997–98	1998–99
Energy Efficiency Advice Centres	109,954	166,744	181,599
HECA Action[1]	37	31	30
Energy Service Companies[1]	2	7	20
Raising the Standard	6,000	9,000	12,110
Heating Controls	16,725	17,500	n/a
Cavity Wall Insulation	30,000	35,000	22,747
Pensioners Energy Plan	48	65	25
Total	162,766	228,347	216,531

[1] Grants to organisations rather than individual households

The energy efficiency of many homes has also been improved through earlier Government programmes; the introduction of energy efficiency requirements within building regulations; and from broader programmes to promote energy efficiency including the Market Transformation Strategy and the high profile "Are You Doing Your Bit" campaign.

At the same time, schemes developed as part of the Standards of Performance set by the Director General for Electricity have also improved the energy efficiency of homes.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans he has for introducing (a) energy efficiency and (b) renewable energy strategies at regional level. [86044]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: Our recent White Paper on sustainable development, "A better quality of life", announced that we wish to see sustainable development frameworks prepared in each English region by the end of 2000. We will be issuing guidance on the content and preparation of such frameworks. Renewable energy and energy efficiency are among the subjects which we are considering for inclusion in the frameworks. Additionally, as indicated in the consultation paper, "New and Renewable Energy: Prospects for the 21 Century", recently published by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, renewable energy is a topic we will be considering in the context of our new proposals for Regional Planning Guidance, on which we have been consulting.

Petrol

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what recent scientific evidence he has evaluated concerning the use of methyl teritary butyl ether in petrol in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement. [85870]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Use of Methyl tertiary butyl ether (MTBE) in petrol can reduce exhaust emissions of carbon monoxide by 25 per cent. and hydrocarbons by 15 per cent. and has contributed to improvements in air quality through reducing the level of these pollutants. In response to concerns about possible contamination of groundwater by MTBE the Environment Agency conducted a pilot study in the Stour catchment to inform the design of future groundwater monitoring. No MTBE was detected in that catchment but MTBE will be included in a major R&D study commissioned by the Agency into the fate, transport and natural attenuation of chemicals in the sub-surface and groundwater environment. The study, which commences this week, will take some two years to complete.

Empty Dwellings

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what changes to the council tax he intends to make to encourage owners of long-term empty dwellings to bring them back into use. [86487]

Ms Armstrong: One of the reasons why there is a hard core of unused empty dwellings is that the cost of owning them is relatively low. At present, there is no council tax at all for the owners of dwellings which require or are undergoing major repair works or structural alterations. Long-term empty properties create extra costs for councils because they can encourage vandalism, crime, accumulation of rubbish, vermin and a general nuisance. Exempt from council tax, the owners do not make a contribution towards these costs and they also benefit from other locally provided services like police and fire services.

The Government do not believe this is justified where a dwelling has been exempt for more than a year. We have, therefore, amended the council tax regulations so that from 1 April 2000, any dwelling in England and Wales requiring or undergoing major repair works or structural alterations which has been exempt for more than a year, will be subject to the standard 50 per cent. council tax attracted by other unoccupied dwellings.

Contaminated Land

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to provide financial support to English local authorities and to the Environment Agency to meet the capital costs of dealing with contaminated land. [86489]

Mr. Meale: My right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment announced on 22 July 1998 that £15 million would be available for this financial year, and each of the next two financial years. The Contaminated Land Supplementary Credit Approval programme provides support for English local authorities for the capital costs they incur in dealing with contaminated land. The programme also supports, in the form of additional grant-in-aid, the Environment Agency where it is carrying out works to deal with water pollution caused by contaminated land. This funding is in addition to the £50 million over the next three years to help local authorities with their responsibilities under Part IIA of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 (inserted by section 57 of the Environment Act 1995) and to separate funds made available through Single Regeneration Budget and the Regional Development Agencies for regeneration projects.

Authorities with on-going contractual commitments for projects funded in previous years have already received notification that support will continue to be available this year. I have agreed the programme for new projects to start this year and my Department has written today to the successful authorities and to the Environment Agency notifying them of the financial allocations which are being made.

The Department will discuss the other bids with the authorities concerned and expects to make some further allocations. It will also decide new bids when they are received.

The following table sets out the allocations which have been made so far this current financial year.

Local Authorities	Number of sites	Total allocation (£)
Ashford BC	1	36,500
Bexley LB	1	50,000
Blackburn/Darwen BC	2	40,000
Bolton MBC	1	20,000
Bristol City	1	25,697
Bury MBC	1	5,500
Calderdale MBC	1	20,000
Chorley BC	1	196,000
Crawley BC	1	355,500
Croydon LB	5	79,000
Cumbria CC	1	786,215
Darlington BC	1	31,000
Devon CC	5	775,500
Dudley MBC	4	335,070
Durham CC	3	56,500
East Sussex CC	2	282,696
Essex CC	3	140,500
Gateshead MBC	2	1,205,000
Gedling BC	1	14,000
Gravesham BC	1	11,300
Guildford BC	4	35,500
Hackney LB	1	115,000
Hampshire CC	1	35,000
Herefordshire C	1	22,600
Isle of Wight C	1	10,000
Lancashire CC	1	25,000
Lancaster City	1	71,653
Leicester City	6	119,200
Leicestershire CC	2	16,250
Lewes DC	1	10,000
Merseyside WDA	2	320,000
Middlesbrough BC	1	301,000
Newcastle City	3	319,450
Northamptonshire CC	2	408,000
North East Lincs C	1	44,000
North Lincs C	1	1,187,200
North Somerset C	1	18,000
Northumberland CC	4	46,000
Norwich City	1	24,000
Nottingham City	1	304,000
Oldham MBC	2	96,000
Oxfordshire CC	2	392,000
Plymouth City	1	265,085
Portsmouth City	1	400,000
Preston BC	1	266,250
Rotherham MBC	3	219,407
St. Helens MBC	1	165,000
Sandwell MBC	17	73,660
Sheffield City	1	150,000
Shropshire CC	1	378,814
Solihull MBC	1	179,247
South Holland DC	1	2,500
Surrey CC	2	11,100
Tameside MBC	2	42,160
Teignbridge DC	2	70,000
Trafford MBC	3	150,000
Warrington BC	1	242,806
Wokingham DC	1	208,096
Worcestershire CC	2	58,831
Environment Agency	9	1,362,000

NORTHERN IRELAND

Transport Funding

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what changes have been made by the Department of the Environment (N.I.) to the funding made available to (a) the Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and its subsidiaries and (b) the NI Roads Programme in (i) 1998 and (ii) 1999. [85958]

Mr. Paul Murphy [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The information for the financial years 1998–99 and 1999–2000 requested is as follows:

£000

	Approved allocation for 1998–99	Provisional outturn for 1998–99	Present approved allocation for 1999–2000
Northern Ireland Transport Holding Company and its subsidiaries	27.21	28.77	29.79
NI Roads Programme	145.30	147.7	155.6

Business Development Service

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what key performance targets have been set for the Business Development Service to be achieved by April 2000. [86488]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Business Development Service is an Executive Agency of the Department of Finance and Personnel. I have set a number of key performance targets for the Agency to achieve by April 2000, as follows:

- to maintain a level of at least 90 per cent. of customers to be satisfied with the services that they have received;
- to maintain a level of at least 90 per cent. of customers to be satisfied with the way in which services were provided to them;
- to achieve levels of efficiency savings in total running costs of 3 per cent. over the allocation for 1998–99;
- to demonstrate, on a notional basis and within the context of service level agreements (where these apply), that the Agency would recover the full cost of its operations from its customers; and
- to maintain systems of people development consistent with good human resource practice.

Copies of the Agency's Strategic and Business Plans for 1999 to 2002 have been placed in the Library.

Contract Compliance

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, pursuant to her answer of 26 January 1999, Official Report, column 191, what advice was received by Ministers on the legal permissibility of the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights' recommendations on contract compliance under European law; if she subsequently sought legal opinion on contract compliance; and if she will make a statement. [86137]

Mr. Ingram: My reply of 26 January indicated the input of legal advisers to consideration of the recommendations in the Standing Advisory Commission for Human Rights' report on employment equality of June 1997. Subsequent to publication of the Government's response to those recommendations in the White Paper, "Partnership for Equality" (CM 3890) in March 1998, the Secretary of State has not sought further legal opinion on contract compliance.

West Midlands Police

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many members of the West Midlands police force have spent time on secondment with the RUC in the past 10 years; what was the average length of time spent on secondment; and what was the purpose of these placements. [86143]

Mr. Ingram: In the last 10 years, two members of the West Midlands police force have been seconded to the Royal Ulster Constabulary for a period of six months each. These placements were part of a Management Exchange with RUC officers for the career development of the individuals concerned.

RUC Officers (Paramilitary Connections)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what powers are available to the Chief Constable of the RUC to take disciplinary action against officers joining or associating with paramilitary organisations; who is responsible for discipline among police officers from England and Wales serving in the RUC on secondment; and who has responsibility for informing her if a police officer on secondment to the RUC has paramilitary associations. [86144]

Mr. Ingram: The Chief Constable's powers to take disciplinary action against a member of the RUC below the rank of Assistant Chief Constable are provided for in the Royal Ulster Constabulary (Discipline and Disciplinary Appeals) Regulations 1988.

The Chief Constable, or Police Authority for senior officers, is responsible for the discipline of police officers from England and Wales on secondment with the Royal Ulster Constabulary. The Chief Constable is also responsible for the investigation of criminal matters and, except for senior officers, for police discipline.

Barry Mason

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if she has received a report of the evidence given in the course of the legal action against former chief superintendent Barry Mason of the West Midlands police that concluded on 22 April. [86145]

Mr. Ingram: Yes.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Claims Assessors

Mr. Linton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what action he intends to take to investigate the activities of non-legally qualified claims assessors. [86390]

Mr. Vaz: The Lord Chancellor intends to establish a small committee to investigate the provision of legal advice by non-legally qualified persons who act as claims assessors, whose business is to process claims, on behalf of clients, arising as a result of death or personal injury. In particular, the committee will examine the sector's cost, standard, appropriateness and customer satisfaction. The committee will report its findings and make recommendations on whether any further control of this sector is needed in the public interest.

Advisory Board on Family Law

Mr. Linton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Advisory Board on Family Law intends to publish its second annual report. [86389]

Mr. Vaz: The Advisory Board on Family Law published its second annual report on 27 May and copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

TREASURY

European Employment Pact

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library a copy of the European Presidency's draft for a European Employment Pact, as discussed at ECOFIN on 10 May. [85524]

Ms Hewitt: The European Presidency text on a European Employment Pact as agreed at the Cologne Council has been placed in the Library this afternoon.

HIPC Trust Fund

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions he has had with his counterparts in other G7 countries regarding their Governments' contributions to the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries Trust Fund; and if he will make a statement. [85719]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor has discussed the HIPC trust fund with all his G7 colleagues and will be discussing these issues further at the G7 in Frankfurt this weekend.

Debt Burden

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what agreement was reached at the last G7 Finance Ministers' Meeting on reducing the debt burden of the poorest countries; and if he will make a statement. [85718]

Ms Hewitt: G7 Finance Ministers last met on 26 April. Paragraph 11 of their statement, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House, set out the conclusions of the meeting.

The UK is continuing to argue for faster, deeper and wider debt relief.

Recognised Overseas Investment Exchange

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase the fees Her Majesty's Treasury currently charges to applicants for Recognised Overseas Investment Exchange status or Recognised Overseas Clearing House status under sections 112 and 113 of the Financial Services Act 1986. [86617]

Ms Hewitt: The application fee will be increased to £33,000 and the periodical fee will be increased to £9,000 with effect from 1 July 1999.

Diesel Fuel Prices

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by how many pence per litre the price of a litre of diesel has risen since May 1997. [84914]

Ms Hewitt [holding answer 21 May 1999]: The price of diesel in May 1997 was published in the DTI's 1998 Digest of Energy Statistics, table 8.12. The latest price, for April 1999, was published in a DTI press notice, "Statistical Press Release, Advance Energy Statistics", on 5 May 1999.

DEFENCE

Kosovo

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement regarding the pay received by British soldiers who are on duty in and around Kosovo. [85650]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 8 June 1999]: UK Service personnel deployed to the Balkans are paid in accordance with their rank, length of service and, in the case of other ranks, their trade, at rates recommended by the independent Armed Forces Pay Review Body (AFPRB). Where appropriate, personnel also receive additional pay in recognition of their specialist skills or service, ie flying pay or parachute pay, at rates also recommended by the AFPRB.

The AFPRB make their recommendations on the basic pay of all members of the Armed Forces on the basis of broad comparability with the pay of civilian occupations of similar job weight and responsibility within the UK. To this basic pay is then added an additional element called the 'X-Factor' (currently 12 per cent. of basic pay) to reflect the differences between conditions of service experienced by members of the Armed Forces over a full career and conditions in civilian life, which cannot be taken directly into account in assessing pay comparability. Part of the AFPRB's considerations in determining the X-Factor includes the liability to serve from time to time in difficult and dangerous circumstances. The 'X-Factor' is paid continuously to all Service personnel, apart from the most senior officers, throughout their careers regardless of where they are serving, and it is pensionable. This mechanism is so constructed to ensure our continuing ability to recruit and retain personnel of the right calibre and reflects the fact that the UK's Armed Forces have an expectation of world wide deployment.

RAF Quedgeley

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what planning permissions have been sought for RAF Quedgeley; and what is their current status. [85885]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The areas formerly known as Sites 2 and 4, which are located to the south of the Main Site, and Site 6, located close to the A38, have now been sold as land for storage purposes.

No planning permission has yet been sought for Main Site, Quedgeley as this will be a matter for the Purchaser. However, my Department has made representation at the recent Gloucestershire County Structure Plan Examination in Public and has consulted on a regular basis with Gloucester City Council about proposed uses for the site.

Equipment Budgets

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the overspend for the (i) land equipment budget, (ii) sea equipment budget and (iii) air equipment budget in the present financial year. [85916]

Mr. Spellar [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The Defence budget for the present financial year, 1999–2000, is not currently overspent in any main budget area.

Royal Hospital, Haslar

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many letters he has received concerning the future of Defence Medical Services; and of these, how many opposed the closure of the Royal Hospital, Haslar. [85553]

Mr. Doug Henderson [holding answer 8 June 1999]: My Department, including the Defence Secondary Care Agency, has received over 500 letters concerning the Defence Medical Services and the future of the Royal Hospital, Haslar. This figure includes letters to the Prime Minister and the Secretaries of State for Health and Transport which were passed to my Department for reply. The majority of these letters referred to the Royal Hospital, Haslar and all were opposed to its closure.

Service Children's Education

Mrs. Dean: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Chief Executive of Service Children's Education for the financial year 1999–2000. [86700]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive has been set the following Key Targets for 1999–2000:

1. To meet the following percentage of pupils achieving Level 2 at the end of Key Stage 1 in:
   Reading: 87 per cent.
   Writing: 90 per cent.
   Spelling: 73 per cent.
   Mathematics: 91 per cent.
2. To meet the following percentage of pupils achieving Level 4 at the end of Key Stage 2 in:
   English: 75 per cent.
   Mathematics: 75 per cent.
   Science: 80 per cent.
3. To meet the following percentage of pupils achieving Level 5 at the end of Key Stage 3 in:
   English: 81 per cent.
   Mathematics: 70 per cent.
   Science: 70 per cent.
4. To meet a three year rolling average percentage of Year 11 pupils in SCE achieving five or more higher (A*–C*) grades in GCSE of 46 per cent.
5. To meet a three year rolling average of subject entries achieving passes at grades A-C at A level of 57 per cent.
6. To achieve as a minimum a "satisfactory" standard in each OFSTED school inspection.
7. To respond in full to customers seeking educational advice from SCE(UK) within the following timescales:
   91 per cent. within 10 working days of receipt remainder within 20 working days of receipt
8. To develop an Agency Efficiency Index by 2000–01.
9. To achieve index of satisfaction with SCE within the Army Spouses Continuous Attitude Survey above 360 overall.

Nuclear Weapons

Ms Stuart: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to ensure the future integrity of the UK's nuclear weapon stockpile in the absence of underground weapon testing. [86701]

Mr. George Robertson: I announced in the Strategic Defence Review that for as long as the United Kingdom has nuclear forces we will ensure that we have a robust capability to underwrite the integrity of our nuclear warheads without recourse to nuclear testing. As part of that I have approved investment in the US National Ignition Facility (NIF). This will guarantee the United Kingdom access to a high-powered laser, which is a key element of our stewardship programme. Participation in the NIF will be a joint venture under the auspices of the 1958 UK/US Mutual Defence Agreement.

Defence Analytical Services Agency

Ms Kelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the Defence Analytical Services Agency for financial year 1999–2000. [86702]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the Defence Analytical Services Agency for Financial Year 1999–2000. The targets build on the progress already made by the Agency since it formed in 1992 and are as follows:

Delivery of customer service and quality

The majority of the Agency's business is covered by Service Level Agreements with customers, which set out the targets for timeliness and quality of work. For the parts of the business where Service Level Agreements are inappropriate, project agreements are in place. The Agency is committed to a continual improvement in the range and quality of the services it provides to customers. Key Targets are:

(a) To meet at least 95 per cent. of the timeliness and quality targets set in Service Level Agreement and project agreements.

(b) To have at least 90 per cent. of customers saying they are at least satisfied with the timeliness, quality of work and helpfulness of staff in the Annual Customer Satisfaction Survey covering all aspects of business.

(c) To have at least 25 per cent. of customers who received DASA services in 1998–99 and 1999–2000 report an improvement in those services in the Annual Customer Satisfaction Survey.

(d) To develop corporate information on civilian personnel and make it available to civilian personnel managers by March 2000.

Efficiency and business excellence

The Agency plans to make efficiency savings in 1999–2000 as well as meeting the additional demands placed on it by new Departmental studies and initiatives. The Agency is committed to continual improvement and is using the Business Excellence Model as a means of driving this forward. Key Targets are:

(a) To achieve a British Quality Foundation validated score of 500 points or more against the Business Excellence Model.

(b) To achieve Investors in People re-accreditation by the end of March 2000.

(c) To deliver efficiency savings with a value of 1 per cent. of the initial running cost allocation, as the first instalment of a programme to achieve 10 per cent. efficiency savings over 3 years.

AS90 Howitzer

Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what progress has been made with regard to placing a contract for the Extended Range Ordnance and Modular Charge System for the AS90 howitzer. [86703]

Mr. George Robertson: I am pleased to announce that a contract for the final development and production of extended range barrels and a new Modular Charge System for the AS90 self-propelled gun has been placed with Marconi Electronic Systems. This programme will extend the range and increase the effectiveness of AS90, and will provide a significantly enhanced artillery capability for the British Army. The contract will sustain about 50 jobs with Marconi at Barrow-in-Furness and at the Royal Ordnance factory in Nottingham, which will manufacture the extended range barrels. The Modular Charge System will be supplied by Somchem of South Africa. The total value of the contract with Marconi is around £75 million.

Learning Forces Initiative

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on progress towards establishing the Learning Forces Initiative announced in the Strategic Defence Review. [86704]

Mr. Doug Henderson: In April Standard Learning Credits were introduced which increased by 25 per cent. the financial assistance available annually for Service personnel to undertake education for personal development. Enhanced Learning Credits will be introduced next year. This major new scheme will provide a substantial source of funding for personal development both during service in the Armed Forces and for up to 10 years thereafter.

Training Group Defence Agency

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the Training Group Defence Agency for financial year 1999–2000. [86705]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the Training Group Defence Agency for the Financial Year 1999–2000 as follows:

Key Target 1—Quantity of Output (ab initio Flying Training)

The number of RAF aircrew trainees graduated as follows:

KT1a—Number of trainees graduating from ab initio flying training	Performance level
Fast-Jet Pilots	59
Multi-Engine Pilots	46
Rotary Wing Pilots	33
Fast-Jet Navigators	24
Multi-Engine Navigators	11
Rotary Wing Navigators	14
Airman Aircrew	78

The number of RAF trainees who graduate from the following courses:

KT1b—Quantity of output (ab initio ground training)	Performance level
Officer Training	282
RAF Tradesman Training	1,827
RAF Regiment Gunner Training	395

The number of training places provided on the following RN, Army, RAF refresher, CFS and Foreign and Commonwealth flying courses:

KT1c—Quantity of output flying (other customers and refresher training)	Performance level
Flying Training—RN, Army, RAF Refresher and CFS	819
Flying Training Courses—F&C	83

Number of training places provided on Ground courses:

KT1d—Quantity of output ground (pre-employment and career development training)	Performance level
RAF Pre-employment and Career Development Training	25,417

Key Target 2—Quality of Output

To achieve a rating of satisfactory in the Agency's customer satisfaction matrix for the quality of 100 per cent. of graduate trainees.

Key Target 3—Efficiency

To deliver 2.36 per cent. efficiency savings from allocated budget.

Key Target 4—Development of Output Costings and Unit cost measurement

To provide full output costings and associated unit cost and efficiency measures by April 2000.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Drug Orders

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug treatment and testing orders he has forecast to be made in his financial plans for the first full year of their operation. [85766]

Mr. George Howarth: Our current best estimate of the unit cost of a Drug Treatment and Testing Order (DTTO) is £6,400. On that basis, the funds allocated should allow probation services to fund treatment and testing of approximately 6,000 offenders sentenced to DTTOs in 2001–02. The pilot evaluation report will provide accurate information on the unit cost and, therefore, the number of DTTOs that can be made each year.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average length of a drug treatment and testing order imposed in the three pilot areas. [85769]

Mr. George Howarth: As at June 1999, the average length of a Drug Treatment and Testing Order in

(a) Croydon is 16.8 months;

(b) Gloucestershire is 12.9 months; and

(c) Liverpool is 12.9 months.

London River Police

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what will be (a) the establishment and (b) actual numbers of officers in post of the London River Police on 1 January 2000; and if he will make a statement. [86036]

Kate Hoey: The Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis tells me that the target strength for the Thames Division on 1 January 2000 will be 89 officers and that he expects that number to be in post then. At the moment the strength is 101.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the staffing requirement of the London River Police over the Millennium public holiday; and if he will make a statement. [86037]

Kate Hoey: The deployment of officers in the Thames Division of the Metropolitan Police is an operational matter for the Commissioner. He tells me that during the Millennium public holiday he expects that the full strength of the Division, 89 officers, will be deployed on a 24-hour shift pattern. The deployment of resources will be kept under review, and altered as necessary if new events related to the Millennium are planned.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to amend Part V of the Police Act 1997 regarding the Criminal Records Bureau; what time scale he envisages for reform; and if he will make a statement. [85904]

Mr. Boateng: The Protection of Children Bill, currently before Parliament, aims to amend Part V of the Police Act 1997 so as to permit the Criminal Records Bureau to act as a "one stop shop" for criminal record information and information contained in the Department for Education and Employment's List 99 and the Department of Health's Consultancy Index.

I have no plans for other amendments to Part V.

CRE Annual Report

Mrs. Humble: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to make available the Commission for Racial Equality's 1998 annual report; and if he will make a statement. [86621]

Mr. Straw: I have arranged for copies of the Commission for Racial Equality's 1998 report which is being published today to be placed in the Library.

The report demonstrates the Commission's commitment to making racial equality a reality in Britain and shows how it is playing a positive role to promote the importance of equal opportunities.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to change the support arrangements for the families of asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [86622]

Mr. Straw: The Government are determined to deliver an immigration and asylum system which is fairer, faster and firmer. The Immigration and Asylum Bill is key to achieving this goal. The new arrangements contained in the Bill will provide a coherent national support system for asylum seekers, including families with children.

The Bill has been carefully scrutinised by a Special Standing Committee which took evidence as well as considering it clause by clause. I am very grateful to all the hon. Members who took part in this Committee. In the light of issues raised, I am making the following changes:

I have today tabled amendments to the Immigration and Asylum Bill to make clear that the Home Secretary will be under a new duty to meet the accommodation and essential living needs of destitute asylum seeker families. The assistance they receive in this way will be comparable to what would otherwise be available under section 17 of the Children Act 1989. All other safeguards for children contained in that Act will continue to apply. Linked with the commitment we have already made to provide 24 hour emergency cover for such families, these measures will ensure that the children of asylum seekers receive the same kind of protection as other children enjoy.

I have also reviewed the balance between cash and vouchers in the resources to be made available to asylum seekers for living expenses, and have concluded that a cash allowance of £10 per person per week is justifiable for both adults and children. This would mean that, at the present illustrative support rates, a family of four would receive £40 per week in cash, and a further £50 of spending power by way of vouchers.

In the White Paper, "Fairer, Faster and Firmer" the Government set a target of delivering, by April 2001, most initial asylum decisions within two months and most appeals in a further four months. In respect of families with children, I have decided to bring forward this target to April 2000. From that date, our aim will be to deliver initial decisions on new asylum applications in such cases in an average of two months. Average waiting times for appeals are already below four months. Our intention is to maintain this for the future for all categories of cases. If we cannot achieve these targets for families with children, we will not bring these applications into the new support arrangements in April 2000. We will only do so when we are satisfied that the targets for these cases can be met. For those people who remain on the support arrangements for more than six months through no fault of their own, we shall be introducing an additional discretionary payment to assist with the cost of any replacement items they may need.

These changes, together with the other amendments that I am tabling today, will strengthen the Bill and ensure that the Government's objectives are achieved.

Immigration and Nationality Directorate

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received the annual report for 1998 of the Complaints Audit Committee of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate; and if he will make a statement. [86623]

Mr. Straw: A copy of the report has been placed in the Library. It is a useful and informative document and I am grateful to the Committee for its comments and its recommendations which will all be followed up. The report also includes details of the broadening of the Committee's terms of reference to encompass quality of service issues.

Pelargonic Acid Vanillyamide

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the scientific references used to ascertain the safety of pelargonic acid vanillyamide, as a replacement for CS spray. [85856]

Mr. Boateng: I am aware of no published reports relating to the safety of pelargonic acid vanillyamide (PAVA), although some private research on the subject has been commissioned by Hertfordshire Constabulary. The Home Office Police Scientific Development Branch considers that the information currently available is not sufficient to allow the use of PAVA as an incapacitant in the United Kingdom at present.

Pre-inquest Disclosure

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 20 May 1999, Official Report, column 434, what guidance has been issued to the police on pre-inquest disclosure to relatives of the deceased. [86139]

Mr. Straw: On 28 April 1999, a Home Office circular was issued to Chief Officers of Police advising them, where there has been a death in police custody, to make arrangements for the pre-inquest disclosure of documentary evidence to interested persons.

The guidance advises Chief Officers that there should be as great a degree of openness as possible, and that disclosure of documentary material to interested persons before the inquest hearing should be normal practice in cases of death in police custody and death arising from fatal road crashes involving the police. The guidance also states that in all cases, Chief Officers will want to consider whether there are compelling reasons why certain documents, or parts of documents, may not be disclosed. But there should always be a presumption in favour of openness. A copy of the circular has been placed in the Library.

Firearms

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were (a) killed and (b) injured by (i) hand guns, (ii) air guns, (iii) shot guns, (iv) rifles over .22 calibre, (v) rifles of .22 calibre, (vi) submachine guns and (vii) other firearms in each of the last five years indicating how many of the deaths and injuries were (a) accidental, (b) non-accidental and (c) self-inflicted by legally held firearms. [85866]

Mr. Boateng: Information obtained from the Office for National Statistics shows the following number of accidental deaths by shooting, broken down by the available type of gun for the years 1994 to 1998:

Accidental deaths by shooting, England and Wales, 1994–98

	Hand gun	Shot gun	Military firearm	Other firearm	Total
1994	2	4	1	3	10
1995	1	6	—	5	12
1996	—	3	—	4	7
1997	1	4	—	1	6
1998	1	5	1	1	8

Information is not available on the number of accidental injuries caused by firearms.

Deaths and injuries caused by the use of firearms in crime are as follows:

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms caused injury, England and Wales, 1993–97

	Hand gun	Shot gun	Air/ weapon	Other firearm	Total
Fatal injury
1993	35	39	—	—	74
1994	25	36	—	5	66
1995	39	28	1	2	70
1996	30	17	—	2	49
1997	39	16	—	4	59

Notifiable offences recorded by the police in which firearms caused injury, England and Wales, 1993–97

	Hand gun	Shot gun	Air/ weapon	Other firearm	Total
Other injury
1993	358	180	1,578	158	2,274
1994	292	143	1,591	149	2,175
1995	260	118	1,409	199	1,986
1996	249	87	1,212	384	1,932
1997	275	55	1,194	389	1,913

Source:
Home Office

Figures for 1998 are not yet available.

Information obtained from the Office for National Statistics shows the following number of suicides by shooting, broken down by the available type of gun for the years 1994 to 1998:

Suicides[1] by shooting, England and Wales, 1994–98

	Hand gun	Shot gun	Military firearm	Other firearm	Total
1994	4	80	—	80	164
1995	3	68	1	88	160
1996	1	72	2	70	145
1997	—	59	—	57	116
1998	3	65	—	61	129

[1] Includes also cases where an open verdict was recorded where the harm was likely to have been self-inflicted but where there was insufficient evidence to prove that the deceased deliberately intended to kill themselves

Information is not available on the number of self-inflicted injuries caused by firearms.

Only in the case of the fatal injuries caused by the use of firearms in crime is any information held as to whether the firearm was legally held or not. The results of a special survey covering the years 1992 to 1994 showed that in cases where it was known whether the firearm was legally held or not, (151 cases out of 196) in 23 cases (15 per cent.) the firearm was legally held.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission Research Agency

Mr. Browne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what targets have been set for the Forestry Commission Research Agency for the current financial year. [86712]

Dr. Reid: The Forestry Commission Research Agency has been set the following targets:

To achieve a customer satisfaction rating of at least 95 per cent.

To increase the output of peer-reviewed scientific papers submitted and subsequently accepted for publication by 8 per cent. on the 1998–99 target.

To achieve a 2 per cent. real reduction in the weighted average unit cost of support services and to hold weighted average charge for a researcher day at 1998–99 levels.

To achieve an operating surplus of at least £450,000.

Copies of the agency's Business Plan, which contains more detail about these targets, have been placed in the Library.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Remploy

Dr. Naysmith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what targets he has set Remploy in its 1999–2000 Annual Performance Agreement. [86330]

Ms Hodge: I have, on behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment, written to the Chairman of Remploy approving the 1999–2000 Annual Performance Agreement between the Department and the Company. This agreement covers the year from 1 April 1999. It has been negotiated by the Chief Executive of the Employment Service on behalf of my right hon. Friend. The targets are:

the average number of disabled people employed by Remploy Ltd. will be 10,150

the average number of disabled people employed under the Interwork scheme will be 3,800

the average number of progressions will increase to 400

Remploy Ltd. will keep within a total unit cost target (operating deficit per disabled worker) of £9,700

Remploy Ltd. will reduce its factory operating deficit to a maximum £81.0 million.

I have today arranged for the text of the Annual Performance Agreement to be placed in the Library.

HEALTH

Government-funded Research Programme

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the Government-funded research programme, showing (a) the research organisation, (b) the funding and (c) the research details; and if he will make a statement. [85697]

Ms Jowell: The Government fund health and medical research in a number of ways.

The Department funds research and development to support its work on policy development and evaluation in health and social care. The Department also manages the National Health Service research and development levy which is used to support research and development of relevance to the National Health Service in hospitals, general practice and other health care settings, and to fund the NHS research and development programme. In addition, the Medical Research Council (MRC)—which receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry—funds medical research as part of the Government's funding of the science and engineering base.

The research commissioned involves many different research organisations. The precise list would change as research is commissioned and ceases but most medical schools and many universities, NHS providers and other research organisations are likely to be involved.

Details of projects directly funded by the Department or supported through the NHS R&D levy can be found on the National Research Register (NRR). This is available in the Library on CD Rom, and on the Internet: http://www.doh.gov.uk/nrr.htm. The NRR also contains many details of projects/trials funded by the MRC and other funders. The Department spent approximately £489 million on health and social care research in 1998–99. Details about the MRC can be found in their Annual Report, copies of which are available in the Library.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Examining Medical Practitioners

Mr. Ian Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many examinations have been carried out by examining medical practitioners in the Greater Manchester area since January 1998; how many complaints have been made about (a) the examinations and (b) the examining medical practitioners; and what were the nature of the complaints. [85488]

Angela Eagle: The information is not available in the format requested. The information that is available is included in the following table.

Number of examining medical practitioner's (EMP) examinations and complaints in Manchester—September 1998–April 1999

Month	Number of EMP exams	Number of complaints	Doctor's manner	Content and length of examination, clinical findings
September 1998	1,391	0	0	0
October 1998	1,129	1	0	1
November 1998	2,172	7	2	7
December 1998	1,994	7	4	7
January 1999	1,993	11	7	11
February 1999	1,962	11	1	9
March 1999	2,191	25	11	53
April 1999	1,813	18	11	15
Total	14,645	80	36	103

Notes:
1. Figures are provisional and subject to change
2. Some complaints will have been made on more than one issue

Source:
Medical Services

Child Benefit

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many children living in Shrewsbury and Atcham fall into the eldest child category for purposes of calculating the number who qualify for child benefit. [85655]

Angela Eagle: The administration of Child Benefit is a matter for the Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, Peter Mathison. I have asked him to write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from Peter Mathison to Mr. Paul Marsden, dated 8 June 1999:

The Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Question asking how many children living in Shrewsbury and Atcham fall into the eldest child category for purposes of calculating the number who qualify for child benefit.

The information requested is not readily available, by region, to identify the number of children who qualify for the higher rate of Child Benefit payable for the eldest child. These figures could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. However, data will soon become available which it is hoped will enable the production of such figures, by Parliamentary constituency.

I am sorry I am not able to help at the moment.

Housing Benefit (Tower Hamlets)

Ms Oona King: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to receive the Benefit Fraud Inspectorate's report on housing benefit administration in Tower Hamlets. [86187]

Mr. Timms: The Benefit Fraud Inspectorate (BFI) report on Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit administration in Tower Hamlets will be submitted to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State before Parliament rises for the summer recess.

Social Security Appeal Tribunals

Mr. Etherington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has to evaluate the impact on claimants' decisions of the change in the composition of social security appeal tribunals; [86154]

(2) what representations he has received about the change in the composition of social security appeal tribunals; and if he will make a statement. [86155]

Angela Eagle: Schedule 6 of the Social Security Act 1998 provides powers for the President of the Independent Tribunal Service to vary the composition of certain Social Security Appeal Tribunals. These changes are in advance of the implementation of the main provisions of the Act which remove the rigid requirement for all benefit and child support appeals to be heard by a three person tribunal.

Consultation and representations on the changes under Schedule 6 to the composition of Social Security Appeal Tribunals are matters which fall to His Honour, the President of the Independent Tribunal Service. The President also gave commitments to monitor these changes. The President's early monitoring of the changes provides no evidence to suggest that the percentage of appeals upheld has been affected by the introduction of flexible composition.

Benefit Assessment Appeals

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many appeals were made during the last 12 months against benefit assessments. [86192]

Angela Eagle: 334,988 of the appeals lodged with the Independent Tribunal Service (ITS) during the 12 months ending on 28 February 1999 were about benefit assessments.

Source:

100 per cent. download of the ITS computer system. The figure reflects the total number of new appeals to Social Security Appeal Tribunals, Disability Appeal Tribunals and Medical Appeal Tribunals.

Bereavement Benefits Scheme

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the amount of national insurance contributions paid by the late spouse will affect the level of the allowance that widows and widowers can receive under the proposed Bereavement Benefits Scheme. [86619]

Mr. Timms: As with the current Widow's Benefit, entitlement to the proposed Bereavement benefits will depend on satisfaction of the contribution conditions by the late spouse. Reduced amounts can be paid if the conditions are not fully met and failure to meet the conditions can mean no benefits are paid. The contributions of married women who die before reaching pension age will count for the first time under our proposals and in the first year some 30,000 widowers will be able to claim benefit of £45 to £50 a week.

Stakeholder Pensions

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the next stage of formal consultation on the detail of stakeholder pensions policy will commence. [86620]

Mr. Timms: The consultation paper "Stakeholder Pensions: Minimum Standards—the Government Proposals" was published on 2 June 1999. Copies have been placed in the Library and in the Vote Office. Further consultation papers will be issued in the coming weeks.

Asylum Seekers

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide the latest available figures on the total cost to the Social Security budget of claims by asylum seekers in the years 1993–94 to 1998–99. [86618]

Angela Eagle: The available estimated costs for Income Support (and Jobseeker's Allowance (income based) from 1997), Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit are in the table. Information on the other non-contributory benefits is not available.

Asylum seekers—estimated annual expenditure

£ million

Year	Total estimated annual expenditure	Income Support and Jobseeker's Allowance (IB)	Housing Benefit	Council Tax Benefit
1993–94	340	160	175	5
1994–95	360	180	175	5
1995–96	420	205	205	10
1996–97	400	195	195	10
1997–98	305	150	145	10
1998–99[1]	280	150	120	10

[1] Forecast expenditure figures

Notes:

1. Estimated annual expenditure figures are rounded to the nearest £5 million. Figures may not sum due to rounding.

2. Income Support/Jobseeker's Allowance estimates will include a number of non-asylum seekers that receive Urgent Case Payments for other reasons.

3. Annual expenditure figures for Income Support/Jobseeker's Allowance have been based on an average of four quarters for the relevant financial year, using number of cases and average weekly amounts.

4. Income Support for the unemployed was replaced by Jobseeker's Allowance in October 1996. Unemployed recipients of Income Support are therefore included in the Income Support estimates for 1995–96 and 1996–97. The 1997–98 figures include Jobseeker's Allowance (income based) recipients (only available for 1997–98).

5. Housing Benefit and Council Tax Benefit estimates have been calculated using the Housing Benefit Management 1 per cent. sample and Departmental Reports, and exclude asylum seekers receiving Housing Benefit who are not receiving Income Support. Numbers of recipients with Housing Benefit but no Income Support are thought to be negligible.

Source:

1. Income Support Statistics Quarterly Inquiries, May 1993 to February 1998.

2. Jobseeker's Allowance Statistics Quarterly Enquiries, May 1997 to February 1998.

3. Housing Benefit Management Information System, annual 1 per cent. sample of claimants in receipt of Income Support, at the end of May in each year given.

4. Departmental Report.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

RADA

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans he has to ensure the financial stability of RADA; and if he will make a statement. [86080]

Mr. Mudie: I have been asked to reply.

The Royal Academy of Dramatic Art is a private institution not funded directly by Government.

The Arts Council of England has awarded £23.75 million of Lottery funds towards RADA's centenary project, which is intended to enable the Academy to achieve financial independence to continue as a key provider of drama training.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Ilisu Dam

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the steps which he has taken to give more detailed consideration to the areas of concern highlighted in the study of the Ilisu Dam project commissioned by the Swiss Government. [84893]

Mr. Wilson: ECGD is consulting other Government Departments and independent environmental advisers. They are also discussing the case with the other Export Credit agencies that are involved. No decision has yet been taken as to whether ECGD should support the project.

Research Council (Brussels)

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the outcome of the Research Council held in Brussels on 20 May; and if he will make a statement. [85358]

Mr. Battle: The Research Council of 20 May:

1. Agreed decisions on the association of applicant countries (CCEE and Cyprus) with the Fifth Framework programme for European Research and Technological Development.

2. Adopted a resolution on "Women and Science: Mobilising women to enrich European research".

3. Received information from the Commission on the competitiveness of European enterprises in the face of globalisation and on its views on the decommissioning of the Joint Research Centre's obsolete nuclear facilities, and from the Presidency on scientific and technical co-operation with the Mediterranean partner countries.

After the formal council meeting, the Presidency held informal discussions, in which Ministers were joined by invited experts, on issues concerning future European research policy.

Climate Change Levy

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what evaluation he has carried out on the impacts of a climate change levy, rebated by a general reduction in national insurance contributions, on the (a) steel, (b) chemical, (c) aluminium, (d) cement and (e) other major energy-using industries. [86043]

Mr. Battle: My Department is having extensive discussions with business on the impact of the climate change levy, and the accompanying reduction in employer National Insurance Contributions (NICs), which were announced by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his 9 March Budget.

The Government have said that they wish to implement the climate change levy in a way which minimises any adverse impact on the competitiveness of UK business. I welcome the recognition of the special circumstances of intensive energy sectors and the planned negotiated agreements with them, which will enable them to get significantly lower rates of the levy in return for commitments to improve their energy efficiency or reduce emissions.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will decide the final rates of the levy, including the discounts for intensive energy users which enter negotiated agreements. The overall impact of the levy, coupled with the reduction in employer NICs, on these sectors will depend on these decisions. The Government will continue to listen to the views of business and as raised in response to the Customs and Excise consultation, which ended on 28 May and final decisions will be taken in the light of these.

Charities (Telephone Charges)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to discourage charities from using premium telephone line charges. [86217]

Mr. Wills: The Independent Committee for the Supervision of Standards of Telephone Information Services (ICSTIS) has responsibility for regulating premium rate services. ICSTIS enforces an effective Code of Practice which has provisions to ensure that consumers are given adequate information to enable them to take informed decisions about the use of premium rate services. The Code ensures that the costs of calls to premium rate charitable promotions must be given in advertisements and ensures the caller is aware of the name of the beneficiary. I am confident in the effectiveness of ICSTIS to regulate the premium rate services market for charitable promotions.

Biotechnology Applications

Mr. Alan Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many people are currently employed in the medical and pharmaceutical applications of biotechnology in the United Kingdom; and what has been the annual financial contribution of this area of biotechnology to the United Kingdom's GDP since and including 1992 (a) in actual terms and (b) in terms of a percentage of the whole. [86069]

Mr. Battle: This information is not available from official statistics. To obtain it, would involve disproportionate cost.

MOX Transport Plan

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will place in the Library a copy of the United Kingdom maritime threat assessment prepared as part of the MOX transport plan. [85821]

Mr. Battle: No. For obvious security reasons, the details of assessments by the security authorities, including maritime threat assessments, are confidential.

Plutonium Sea Shipments

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on what date the details of the United Kingdom safety and security plans covering the sea shipment to Japan from Sellafield of plutonium-based MOX fuel was communicated to the Japanese Government and Japanese nuclear authorities; and what response he received. [85826]

Mr. Battle: Under the terms of the 1988 US-Japan Nuclear Co-operation Agreement, it is the responsibility of the Government of Japan to prepare and to submit to the United States Administration a transport plan covering arrangements for the sea shipment of Mixed Oxide (MOX) fuel from Europe to Japan. This transport plan was prepared in close consultation with the Governments of France and the United Kingdom and submitted to the United States Government in January 1999. In May 1999, the United States Government confirmed that the transport plan fully satisfied the provisions of Annex 5 of the US-Japan Agreement.

Bilateral Development Aid

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the CBI and other trade associations regarding untying UK bilateral development aid. [85964]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 8 June 1999]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry has had no discussions with the CBI or other Trade Associations regarding untying UK bilateral aid.

Coal Authority (Records)

Mr. Todd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on progress on the identification, distribution and preservation of (a) coal and (b) non-coal records which have been the responsibility of the Coal Authority. [85901]

Mr. Battle: The Coal Authority owns a range of records related to coal-mining and the coal resource that are relevant to its activities; in particular, the records of the Coal Commission, which consist of the Coal Holdings Register compiled following the Coal Act 1937 and 26,500 associated claim files; and over one million geological records (principally borehole logs) and 20,000 magnetic tapes of seismic data. It also maintains, and provides public access to circa 100,000 coal-mine abandonment plans owned by the Health and Safety Executive, together with 2,500 boxes of ancillary records (notebooks and calculation ledgers used by surveyors to produce the original plans). The Authority does not hold, other than on an incidental basis, non-coal records.

The Authority is currently considering in co-operation with other interested parties and those requiring access to the information where these records should be housed in the future. It is the Authority's intention to retain the records of the Coal Commission. The geological records and seismic data are in the process of being transferred to the British Geological Survey (BGS) centre at Keyworth, Nottinghamshire, to create a coherent collection of such records for all minerals. The Authority will shortly go to consultation on where the originals of the HSE's coal-mine abandonment plans, which are currently kept at the Bretby site, should be housed. It is the Authority's intention to retain micro-film copies of the plans if they are transferred to another record-holder.

Nuclear Power Stations

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with the nuclear industry on its plans for new stations. [85710]

Mr. Battle: My right hon. Friend and I have had a number of meetings with businesses in the nuclear industry, and many of these have included general discussion of the long-term prospects for new nuclear power stations, but we have received no applications for consent to build a new nuclear power station, and to the best of my knowledge at present no company has plans to make such an application.

Wave Power

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research into wave power is currently being funded by the Government. [85955]

Mr. Battle [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The EPSRC announced its new £3.5 to £4 million per year Renewable and New Energy Technologies Programme in March 1999. The programme's remit covers renewable supply technologies, including marine (wave and tidal current) power and the first call for proposals closed on 14 May 1999. 131 outline proposals have been received, of which 15 are for wave energy projects. The outline proposals will be considered by an advisory panel later this month, following which full proposals for the most promising projects will be evaluated through EPSRC's peer review process.

In addition, on 30 March this year I announced the launch of a new wave power research programme as part of my Department's New and Renewable Energy Programme. I expect that programme to monitor the development of projects contracted under the third Scottish Renewables Order and to support research, development and demonstration projects which can contribute to the development and assessment of wave power. Since my announcement officials at DTI have received several outline proposals from researchers and will consider these further in the light of decisions taken on outline proposals already submitted to the EPSRC programme.

Animal-based Foodstuffs

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what elements of the World Trade Agreement prohibit (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Union from placing restrictions on the import of animal-based foodstuffs liable to contain high levels of antibiotic substances; which officials (i) negotiated, (ii) agreed to and (iii) endorsed on behalf of the negotiating parties those elements; and what ratification procedure was followed in (1) the European Union and (2) the member states. [86231]

Mr. Wilson: UK and EU regulation in this area is governed by the WTO Agreement on Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures. This Agreement recognises the right of members to take measures necessary for the protection of human, animal or plant health. It requires, however, that any trade measures are based on scientific principles and are not maintained without sufficient scientific evidence. In a case where insufficient scientific evidence is currently available, WTO Members are allowed to impose a temporary ban while a thorough risk assessment is carried out. This agreement formed part of the WTO Agreement which concluded the Uruguay Round of multilateral trade negotiations on 15 December 1993. The WTO Agreement was negotiated by the European Commission in consultation with EC member states under the provisions of the EC Treaties. The Agreement was signed on behalf of the United Kingdom by the former right hon. Member for Hove, the then Minister for Industry, in Marrakesh on 15 April 1994. Under the Ponsonby rule, the Agreement was laid before Parliament in May 1994 and debated on 14 June 1994.

The United Kingdom's instrument of Ratification to the WTO Agreement was deposited with the GATT Legal Adviser on 30 December 1994. For the EC, the WTO Agreement was accepted by means of a Council decision and assent given by the European Parliament. The Agreement entered into force on 1 January 1995. The main WTO Agreement was published as Treaty Series No. 57 of 1996 (Cm 3277), and the Agreement on Application of Sanitary and Phytosanitary Measures as No. 54 of 1996 (Cm 3275). The UK's certified copy of the WTO Agreement resides in the Public Record Office.

Trading (Human Rights)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice his Department gives to prospective exporters about the human rights record of the receiving country; and whether this advice is given only in response to a specific request. [85830]

Mr. Wilson: British Trade International, the joint DTI/FCO operation for international trade promotion, provides advice in response to specific requests, except in the case of Burma where it is provided routinely.

Funeral Industry

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what assessment he has made of the results of the OFT inquiry into the funeral industry; [86280]

(2) what plans he has to review the regulations governing the funeral industry; [86281]

(3) what representations he has received from the OFT about competition in the funeral industry. [86282]

Dr. Howells: The Director-General for Fair Trading (DGFT) announced on 15 May 1998 an inquiry into the "at need" funerals industry. The inquiry is focusing on whether competition in the industry is effective.

I understand that the OFT has yet to complete its inquiries. On doing so, it will then be a matter for the DGFT to consider if further action is appropriate, such as making representations to the DTI.

There are no plans at present to regulate the funeral industry with the exception of the pre-paid funeral plans sector. It is proposed to bring this part of the industry within the scope of the Financial Services and Markets Bill.

HM Treasury issued a consultation paper in January 1999 outlining their proposals. Closing date for responses was 30 April. These responses are currently being considered by officials from DTI and the Treasury.

Corporate Neglect

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to implement the recommendations of the Law Commission's report on Corporate Neglect; and if he will make a statement. [85481]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

An inter-departmental working group of officials, which includes a member of the Law Commission, is currently considering the recommendations made in the Law Commission's report Number 237, "Legislating the Criminal Code: Involuntary Manslaughter", which includes the creation of a new offence of corporate killing.

We will consider whether and how to implement the recommendations of the Law Commission in respect of corporate killing once we have received the recommendations of the inter-departmental working group later this year.

PRIME MINISTER

European Defence Review

Dr. Godman: To ask the Prime Minister when he last met the leaders of NATO member states to discuss matters relating to a European Defence Review. [85195]

The Prime Minister: The last collective meeting was the NATO Summit in April where the main focus was the conflict in Kosovo. However, the Summit unanimously welcomed and endorsed the European defence initiative we launched last year.

I refer my hon. Friend to the statement I made to the House on 8 June 1999, Official Report, columns 463–65, where I set out details of agreement reached at the Cologne European Council on the further development of a common European security and defence policy.

Official Engagements

Sir Peter Tapsell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Wednesday 9 June. [85905]

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I will have further such meetings later today.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bat Meat

Mr. Baker: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimate he has made of the extent of the illegal trade in bat meat within the UK; and what steps he is taking to eradicate it. [85742]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 8 June 1999]: I am aware of the recent press reports stating that illegally imported bat meat is being sold in this country. MAFF officials, Official Veterinary Surgeons at Border Inspection Posts and local authorities have been asked to increase their vigilance in order to prevent this trade.

Horticulture Industry

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the applicability of the EU fruit and vegetable regime to the UK horticulture industry; and what proposals he has to improve the UK take-up of assistance under the regime. [86107]

Mr. Rooker: The reformed EU fruit and vegetable regime offers enormous benefits for UK growers. The progressive reduction in aid for intervention, and diversion of funds to structured operational programmes, has already enabled those growers who trade through producer organisations (POs) to benefit. Payments to POs for constructive works over a period of years enables POs to improve production techniques, quality, preparation for market, marketing and promotional activity, in addition to encouraging the use of environmentally sound practices.

Seventy six operational programmes are currently running in the UK. Funding for work on UK programmes in 1997 totalled £5.7 million. Payment for work in 1998 is expected to be about £7 million with a potential payment of £12 million for 1999. This represents new funding for the UK horticulture industry.

There is no great tradition of grower co-operation in the UK and, although a total of 92 POs in the UK are recognised under the new regime, the percentage of the UK fruit and vegetable sector covered by recognised POs is only 35 per cent. My officials have contacted organisations which have not sought recognition and encouraged them to do so. Independent growers are also encouraged to join existing POs or to form new organisations and seek recognition, so that they can benefit from EU aid.

International Whaling Commission

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the recent meeting of the International Whaling Commission. [86331]

Mr. Morley: The International Whaling Commission's 51st Annual Meeting was held in Grenada from 24 to 28 May. I attended the meeting, together with officials from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions, the Turks and Caicos Islands and the British Virgin Islands, as well as representatives of environmental organisations.

At the meeting I re-affirmed the United Kingdom's opposition to whaling. I am pleased to say that efforts by Japan to secure a quota of 50 minke whales, despite the moratorium on commercial whaling, and to weaken the Southern Ocean Sanctuary were defeated by substantial majorities. There was once again strong criticism of Norway's and Japan's continued whaling activities.

The Chairman of the IWC, the Commissioner for Ireland, announced that discussions with IWC members on the ideas put forward by Ireland in 1997 were continuing, although he had no real progress to report. The Irish proposals would involve a ban on all whaling, including scientific whaling, outside coastal waters, with the possibility that countries might authorise whaling under IWC rules within their own coastal waters for domestic consumption. The proposals also envisage a ban on international trade in whale products.

In the ensuing debate I made it clear that the UK's ultimate aim remained a permanent, worldwide moratorium on all whaling other than aboriginal subsistence whaling. However, we recognised that this was not something that was likely to be achieved overnight, or that could be imposed on members of the IWC against their will. We were, therefore, prepared to consider ideas for reaching interim solutions on the way to our ultimate destination. But any arrangements of this kind would have to deliver very real benefits to whale conservation. In this context, we continued to have reservations about some aspects of the Irish proposals, in particular the possibility of renewed coastal whaling. I noted that it seemed, in any case, unlikely that the Irish proposals represented a realistic way forward, given the opposition by Japan to ending scientific whaling. In these circumstances it was important to consider other ways in which the IWC could move forward. In the UK's view these included:

the creation of new regional sanctuaries;

changing the emphasis of the IWC's scientific committee away from the management of whale stocks in the context of whaling towards a much broader exploration of whale conservation issues;

continuing the IWC's efforts to assess fully the impact of environment change for cetaceans;

greater involvement of the IWC in issues relating to small cetaceans; encouraging whalewatching as a benign, potentially very profitable and sustainable way of exploiting a natural resource;

continued involvement of the IWC in welfare issues, including the encouragement of more efficient and humane killing methods, particularly in aboriginal subsistence whaling.

I also reaffirmed that in the UK's view the IWC has an essential role to play as the only international body with worldwide responsibility for the conservation of whales and that we would continue to participate actively, and constructively, in its deliberations.

Australia and New Zealand reported that consultations were continuing on the idea of a South Pacific Sanctuary, but that they were not yet in a position to put forward a formal proposal; the IWC is likely to revert to this topic next year.

The meeting confirmed the central role that environmental concerns now play in the IWC's work. An impressive presentation by the US Commissioner demonstrated the scale of the potential threat posed to cetaceans by climate change and pollution. I emphasised that, in the light of our increasing understanding of these threats there was greater concern than in the past about the ability of whale populations to withstand direct exploitation; in our view this was a cogent reason to adopt a precautionary approach to cetacean conservation and management. The IWC agreed to provide core funding, including £100,000 drawn from its reserves, for two substantial programmes of research on the effects of climate change and pollution on cetaceans; it also urged other interested parties to contribute to these programmes.

The IWC agreed a further 3-year aboriginal subsistence quota permitting inhabitants of St. Vincent and the Grenadines to take two hump back whales a year. During the meeting the IWC considered whether recent takes under this quota contravened IWC rules, which prohibit the killing of whale calves: it was not possible to reach a firm conclusion on this matter, as the rules in question are not entirely clear. However, the agreement to extend the quota amended the rules to remove any uncertainty, and the IWC also agreed a definition of the term calf for the purposes of this quota. In agreeing the quota the IWC also noted commitments by the Government of St. Vincent and the Grenadines to ensure that this hunt is properly regulated, to review and improve hunting and killing methods and to provide a more detailed statement of its aboriginal subsistence needs when seeking any further quota. As amended it is now absolutely clear that the taking of a cow and calf is forbidden.

The IWC meeting was preceded by a workshop of scientific and veterinary experts which examined methods used to kill whales with a view to improving their humaneness. The UK delegation to the workshop was led by Professor Sir Colin Spedding, a previous chairman of the Farm Animal Welfare Council and an internationally recognised authority on welfare issues. The workshop produced an 11 point action plan to improve the effectiveness and humaneness of whale killing methods, including those used in aboriginal subsistence hunts. This was endorsed by the Commission in a resolution, which went on to encourage member governments to continue to submit relevant information to the IWC and to future workshops and to take steps, including the provision of appropriate technical assistance, to improve the humaneness of aboriginal subsistence whaling.

The Dall's porpoise hunt off the coast of Japan is the largest directed take of small cetaceans in the world. Recent information suggests that the level of catch may not be sustainable and the IWC adopted a resolution, put forward by the UK, expressing concern about the sustainability of the hunt, directing the IWC's Scientific Committee to carry out a full review of the affected stocks in 2001 and, in the meantime, inviting the government of Japan to reconsider the quota it sets for Dall's porpoises.

A number of other issues were considered. There was a discussion on whalewatching, in which I emphasised the economic benefits of this activity, particularly in the Caribbean, and drew attention to the Guidelines of Whalewatching in the UK issued by the Government. A resolution was adopted drawing attention to the risk posed to consumers of whalemeat (including meat from small cetaceans) by the high levels of contaminants found in some samples, and requesting the IWC's Scientific Committee to monitor contaminant burdens in cetaceans and, where necessary, pass the information on to the World Health Organisation and appropriate national authorities. Other resolutions were agreed requesting the Scientific Committee to develop DNA methods for monitoring the origin of whalemeat as part of a control scheme for any future whaling and drawing attention to the continued threat posed to small populations of highly endangered whales by ship strikes, by-catches, and in a limited number of cases, whaling.

Overall, this was a successful meeting for the UK. We achieved all our main objectives, and made progress towards our ultimate goals. My presence at the meeting underlined the importance that the Government attach to their policy of opposing whaling and to the role of the IWC.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Political and Human Rights

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funding has been given by his Department to develop political and human rights parliamentary discussion groups in Commonwealth countries in each of the last three years. [84746]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: A number of FCO budget lines are used to support the development of pluralist democratic institutions and multi-party political systems. However, as a result of the devolved nature of some of these programmes the information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

While part of the FCO's grant-in-aid to the Westminster Foundation for Democracy has been used by WFD to fund various cross-party projects, these are generally to facilitate training. WFD do not fund round-table discussion groups or attendance at conferences.

Diplomatic Immunity

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which foreign embassies and high commissions have refused to waive diplomatic immunity when requested to do so, in each of the last three years. [85369]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 25 May 1999]: None, in 1996, 1997, 1998. However, there has been one such case in 1999, on which further action is being pursued. It would, therefore, not be appropriate at this stage to identify the Mission concerned.

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many foreign embassies and high commissions have waived diplomatic immunity in respect of offences committed by their staff or their staff's families in each of the last three years. [85368]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 25 May 1999]: The number of times on which a state has waived the immunity of a diplomatic agent in the last three calender years is as follows:

1996—One

1997—One

1998—None

1999—One (as of 8 June).

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many diplomats have been withdrawn by foreign countries from the United Kingdom at the request of the Government as a consequence of alleged crimes committed in the United Kingdom in each of the last three years. [85370]

Mr. Tony Lloyd [holding answer 25 May 1999]: In accordance with the guidelines laid out in the 1985 White Paper—The recommendations of the Government Report on Review of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and Reply to "The Abuse of Diplomatic Immunities and Privileges"—the following were formally asked to leave the United Kingdom in the last three calendar years:

1996—Five diplomats and families; One dependant of an accredited diplomat

1997—One diplomat and family

1998—Two dependants of accredited diplomats

1999—None (as of 8 June).

Cyprus (Drug Offences)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many British nationals have been charged with drug offences while staying in Cyprus in each of the last three years. [85516]

Mr. Hoon: The number of British nationals charged with drugs offences while visiting, (but not resident) in Cyprus and reported to our Consular service, was 19 in 1996, 17 in 1997 and 33 in 1998.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the current situation in Sierra Leone. [85551]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We welcome the recent signing of a ceasefire agreement. We hope that the current negotiations in Lomé between the Government of Sierra Leone and the rebels will lead to a sustainable peace. We support President Kabbah's commitment to dialogue, and look to all rebel factions to commit themselves to the peace process, and end the violence and atrocities that have beset the people of Sierra Leone for so long.

Cyprus

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what action he is taking within the EU to put pressure on Turkey to comply with the judgment in the Loizidou case; [85626]

(2) what action he is taking to persuade Turkey to comply with the judgment in the Loizidou case. [R] [85627]

Ms Quin: We and our EU partners continue to make clear to Turkey the need to respect the Court's judgment in this case, including in the Council of Europe's Committee of Ministers' Deputies. At its last meeting on 27 May the Committee of Ministers' Deputies agreed that its Chair would write to Turkey asking for clarification of Turkey's intentions. We will continue to discuss with EU partners, as with other members of the Council of Europe, how best to achieve Turkish implementation of the Court's judgment.

Indonesia

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Indonesian Government, and what representations he has received, concerning the massacre of unarmed civilians on 3 May near the city of Lhokseumawe. [85954]

Mr. Hoon: We are deeply disturbed by the incident in Lhokseumawe on 3 May in which a number of unarmed civilians, including women and children, were killed or injured. The late Derek Fatchett expressed our concern in a statement on 7 May which looked to the Indonesian Government to conduct a thorough investigation into the incident, to bring to account those responsible and to take all possible steps to ensure that local armed forces act with restraint and in accordance with basic human rights.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Indonesia on measures to protect the Christian and

Chinese minorities in that country from violence in the period before the general election; and if he will make a statement. [85649]

Mr. Hoon: We have consistently made clear to the Indonesian Government that the international community closely monitors the treatment of all minority groups in Indonesia, including Christians and the ethnic-Chinese community.

British Council (Manchester)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) when he intends to inform British Council staff based in Manchester of his detailed proposals for changes in the staffing and functions of the Manchester office; [86108]

(2) what proposals he has to change (a) the number of British Council staff in Manchester and (b) the functions of the British Council which are currently based in Manchester. [86109]

Mr. Hoon: Issues concerning staff, their duties and location are matters for the British Council. I understand that there are no proposals to change staffing and functions based in Manchester. The British Council is committed to its Manchester location until 2002 when there is an option to continue the leases on its current accommodation. The British Council is reviewing the options on premises and staffing in the light of its overall strategy and funding. Staff and their representatives will continue to be informed and consulted.

Libya

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has, following the suspension of UN sanctions, to lift the national controls on the export of aircraft, aircraft parts and flight simulators to Libya; and if he will make a statement. [86612]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Government have decided to lift the controls on the export of aircraft, aircraft parts and flight simulators to Libya under the provisions of Dual-Use and Related Goods (Export Control) Regulations 1996, as amended. Legislation will be laid before the House shortly. This decision follows the suspension on 5 April of UN sanctions, which included a prohibition on the supply of any aircraft or aircraft components to Libya.

The Foreign Office will issue a press release later today. The "Summary of Government Commitments regarding the Application of Strategic Export Controls" will be amended and updated versions placed in the Libraries of the House and on the FCO Website. The Department of Trade and Industry will issue a Notice to Exporters before the amending legislation takes effect.

Iran

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government's policy is on the export of arms to Iran. [86615]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: There has been no change to current policy, as set out in the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. King) on 28 January 1998, Official Report, columns 273–74.

Further to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Erewash (Liz Blackman) on 25 March 1999, Official Report, column 343, my Department and the Ministry of Defence have approved the issue of a licence by the Department of Trade and Industry, as an exception to our embargo on Iran, for the export of 1,020 bullet proof vests to the United Nations Drug Control Programme to equip Iranian frontier personnel. The bullet proof vests will enhance the capacity of Iran's frontier personnel to combat drug trafficking and reduce the sad toll of casualties which they have borne in the past 20 years.

Yugoslavia (Fuel Embargo)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what legislative steps have been taken to provide for a visit and search regime in respect of ships suspected of carrying fuel to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in breach of the EU-led embargo; and if he will make a statement. [86614]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The North Atlantic Council agreed a visit and search regime for ships suspected of carrying fuel to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia on 25 May. The regime is based on the consent of participating states.

To enable the United Kingdom to participate fully in this regime legislation allowing Royal Navy vessels to visit and search British ships outside UK waters came into force on 3 June.

The necessary enforcement powers in respect of United Kingdom ships are contained in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Supply, Sale and Export of Petroleum and Petroleum Products) (No.2) Regulations 1999 which revoke the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (Supply, Sale and Export of Petroleum and Petroleum Products) Regulations 1999.

The Dependent Territories (Federal Republic of Yugoslavia) (Supply, Sale and Export of Petroleum and Petroleum Products) Order 1999 imposes, by way of the prerogative, an oil embargo against the FRY in the Overseas Territories except for Bermuda and Gibraltar, with similar enforcement powers, in respect of ships registered in the territories concerned, to those in the Regulations. The UK does not have powers under the prerogative to legislate for Bermuda, which has been asked to legislate in similar terms. The EC Regulation is directly applicable in Gibraltar which will be legislating locally.

The EC Regulation is not directly applicable to the Crown Dependencies. The Channel Islands have already legislated locally and the Isle of Man will do so shortly.

UN Register of Conventional Arms

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the United Kingdom will submit its 1999 return to the UN Register of Conventional Arms; and whether copies of the return will be placed in the Library. [86616]

Mr. Hoon: We submitted our 1999 return to the UN Register covering conventional arms transfers in calendar year 1998 on 27 May. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Diplomatic Parking Fines

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish figures recording the number of outstanding parking and other minor traffic violation fines incurred by diplomatic missions and international organisations in London during 1998. [86613]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: At the end of 1998 there were 4,259 unpaid fines in respect of parking and other minor traffic violations incurred by members of Diplomatic Missions and International Organisations in London.

In April this year the Foreign and Commonwealth Office wrote to all Diplomatic Missions and International Organisations in London offering them an opportunity to either pay their outstanding fines or appeal against them if they considered that they had been incorrectly issued. As a result payments totalling £66,200.00 were received and a number of fines were cancelled, leaving a total of 2,667 unpaid fines for 1998. The following table details Diplomatic Missions and International Organisations which have more than 10 fines outstanding.

Unpaid parking and minor traffic violation fines—1998—diplomatic vehicles

Position	Diplomatic mission/international organisation	Number of fines outstanding
1	Ghana	153
2	Nigeria	130
3	Turkey	117
4	Oman	105
5	Angola	102
6	United Arab Emirates	101
7	Egypt	87
8	Jordan	84
9	Morocco	82
10	Cyprus	75
11	Greece	73
12	Cuba	68
13	Sudan	67
14	Russia	59
15	Zimbabwe	58
16	Jamaica	55
17	Hungary	50
18	Algeria	47
18	Iran	47
18	Poland	47
21	Liberia	45
22	Georgia	44
23	Mongolia	37
24	Japan	36
25	Thailand	34
26	USA	33
27	Cameroon	32
27	Ethiopia	32
27	Uganda	32
30	Bangladesh	28
31	Afghanistan	26
31	India	26
33	France	25
34	Pakistan	24
34	Ukraine	24
36	Yemen	23
37	Brazil	21
37	Lithuania	21
37	Uzbekistan	21
40	Belarus	20
41	Bulgaria	19
41	Tunisia	19
43	Albania	18
43	Malaysia	18
45	Barbados	15
45	China	15
45	Philippines	15
45	International Maritime Organisation	15
49	Qatar	14
50	Kyrgyzstan	13
50	Zambia	13
52	Gabon	12
52	Kenya	12
52	Malawi	12
52	Peru	12
56	Canada	11
56	Eastern Caribbean States	11
		2,435

WALES

Regional Air Service

9. Mr. Öpik: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what progress he has made in respect of supporting the establishment of a regional air service in Wales. [85163]

Mr. Hain: Our current study to improve air services for Wales will be taken forward by the National Assembly for Wales in collaboration with the Deputy Prime Minister.

Structural Funding

10. Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has held recently with Treasury and Department of Trade and Industry Ministers to secure matched funding for objectives 1 and 2 structural funding for east Wales. [85164]

Mr. Michael: This Government's success in securing such a significant level of funding for Wales under the new EC Structural Funds programmes has been discussed at ministerial level. I am sure the hon. Member will want to congratulate the Prime Minister and the Chancellor and Welsh Labour Members of the European Parliament who worked so hard to secure this important opportunity for Wales.

Cabinet Decisions

11. Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what mechanisms exist for informing the National Assembly of (a) decisions in and (b) representations from Cabinet meetings in respect of matters relating to Wales. [85165]

Mr. Michael: Concordats between the Assembly and the UK Government will cover the provision of information to the Assembly, including the passing on of Cabinet decisions. Under the Government of Wales Act 1998, it is the duty of the Secretary of State for Wales to consult the Assembly on the Government's legislative programme. There will also be regular contact at a ministerial level between the Assembly and other Government Departments as there will be between officials.

School Transport

12. Mr. Edwards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the provision of home to school transport. [85166]

Mr. Hain: The provision of home to school transport is a matter for local education authorities. Each LEA must publish a home to school transport policy which sets out arrangements for its area. The School Transport Advisory Group (STAG) has been commissioned to provide advice on school transport. A sub group of STAG is looking specifically at home to school transport arrangements. The Group has been asked to report its findings by the end of the year.

Junior Ministers

14. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the number of junior Ministers he expects to serve in his Department after 1 July. [85168]

Mr. Michael: That is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Secretary of State

15. Mr. Syms: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how he plans to divide his time between his responsibilities as Secretary of State and his functions within the National Assembly. [85169]

Mr. Michael: Whether as Secretary of State for Wales or as First Secretary, my priority will be to serve the people of Wales and to deliver a stronger economy, an improved health service, jobs and opportunity for our young people and better education and training systems in Wales. By occupying both roles during the crucial transition period I will be able to ensure a smooth transfer of powers which keeps these priorities clearly in focus at the Welsh Office and the Assembly.

17. Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what payments he has received from public funds as Secretary of State for Wales. [85171]

Mr. Michael: Between October 1998, when I was appointed as Secretary of State for Wales, and the end of May 1999, I have been paid £27,299 from public funds in respect of that office.

Children's Heart Surgery

16. Ms Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to restart children's heart surgery in Wales. [85170]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The Specialised Health Services Commission for Wales is currently preparing a report on the options for the future provision of paediatric cardiac surgery and paediatric cardiology services in Wales. This will shortly be considered by its Board and will take into account the importance of maintaining services at the University Hospital of Wales and Llandough Hospital NHS Trust. These options will then be the subject of wide discussion within the NHS and with other interested parties.

In the meantime, children needing cardiac surgery will continue to be referred to those centres that can most appropriately treat their particular condition.

Following the transfer of functions, this will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Kosovo Refugees

18. Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps the Welsh Office is taking to co-ordinate the reception of refugees from Kosovo. [85172]

Mr. Michael: My officials have been liaising closely with colleagues at the Home Office who are in the lead on this issue on arrangements which would need to be put in place should we receive refugees from Kosovo in Wales. They are also providing information to all agencies in Wales who have an interest in this matter. My Department is also considering what resources would be required to co-ordinate these arrangements although the Home Office has advised that there are no immediate plans for refugees to come to Wales.

The role currently undertaken by my Department will be taken over by the National Assembly for Wales with effect from 1 July.

Ministerial Responsibilities

19. Mr. St. Aubyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the responsibilities of Ministers in his Department following the transfer of powers to the National Assembly for Wales. [85174]

Mr. Michael: Ministers in the Office of the Secretary of State for Wales will have the following functions after the transfer of functions to the Assembly on 1 July:

Functions relating to their membership of the UK Government.

Responsibility to ensure that the interests of Wales are fully considered in the workings of the UK Government.

Responsibility to steer primary legislation relating to Wales through Parliament.

Functions relating to the fact that this House will vote the Main Estimate to the Secretary of State for Wales, who will make a grant to the Assembly after deducting the cost of running his own office.

Responsibility to consult the Assembly on the Government's legislative programme.

Responsibility to ensure that the arrangements for co-operation between the Assembly and the UK Government are working effectively.

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the impact that his newly acquired responsibilities in the National Assembly will have upon the discharge of his functions as Secretary of State. [85173]

Mr. Michael: The advent of the National Assembly for Wales will strengthen the United Kingdom and improve the way that services are delivered to the people of Wales. I shall be able to achieve substantial improvement in the effectiveness of my role of Secretary of State as a result of close co-operation with Members of the Assembly and others.

EU Funding

20. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans the Government have for increasing funding from the European Union to Wales for investment in infrastructure and the public services. [85175]

Mr. Hain: Under the relevant EU Regulations, West Wales and the Valleys qualify for Objective 1 funding. We are currently consulting on possible Objective 2 areas. Infrastructure measures could be eligible for funding in both Objective 1 and Objective 2 areas.

Farm Incomes

21. Mr. Prior: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received regarding the levels of farm incomes in Wales. [85176]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The latest estimates of incomes for full-time farmers in Wales were published in February 1999. The figures show the cash income for dairy and livestock farms in Wales is forecast to fall by 21 per cent. in 1998–99, to £17,900.

Rural Livestock Markets

22. Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent representations he has received with regard to the future of rural livestock markets. [85177]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: We have received no recent representations with regard to the future of rural livestock markets.

The Lamb and Beef Action Plan, prepared by the industry-led working groups which my right hon. Friend launched together with the group chairmen on 8 March, encourages livestock markets in Wales to re-appraise their position and plan for the future. It is important for the competitive health of the Welsh livestock industry that a strategic network of livestock marketing centres should remain.

Following the transfer of functions, this will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Job Creation

23. Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many new jobs have been created in the most recent year for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [85178]

Mr. Hain: The unadjusted number of employee jobs in Wales increased by 11,100 (1.1 per cent.) between December 1997 and December 1998. It now stands at just over 1 million.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Draft Concordat

24. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he expects the concordat between the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Welsh Office governing the relationship between Government departments and the National Assembly of Wales to be published. [85179]

Mr. Michael: All concordats will be agreed between the National Assembly for Wales and the UK Government. They will be published as soon as agreement has been secured.

Objective 1 Funding

25. Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what procedures will be employed to evaluate project proposals for objective 1 funding in the months before the Government have made a decision on match funding. [85180]

Mr. Hain: No decisions have yet been taken about implementation procedures for Structural Fund programmes under the new Regulations for 2000–06. This will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Assembly Costs

26. Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his current estimate of (a) the capital cost and (b) the running cost of the Welsh National Assembly in its first year of operation. [85181]

Mr. Michael: The capital cost of providing temporary and permanent accommodation for the National Assembly for Wales is estimated at £17 million to £20 million, although this estimate must be regarded as provisional until the final design for the new building is agreed.

We are continuing to plan within the overall estimate of £15 million to £20 million for the annual additional running costs of the Assembly which was contained with the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Government of Wales Bill and which will be balanced by savings in the budgets of Welsh quangos; our latest detailed estimate for 1999–2000 is £19.2 million.

Following the transfer of functions on 1 July, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

New Deal

27. Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the employment effect of the new deal in Wales to date. [85182]

Mr. Hain: I have been very pleased with the progress of the New Deal in Wales. The latest information shows that over 8,600 New Deal participants have obtained jobs through one or other of the New Deal initiatives.

Within this total, the New Deal for 18–24s has seen over 6,500 jobs secured by young people, including over 4,800 sustained jobs lasting at least 13 weeks.

The impact on youth unemployment has been there for all to see, with a massive 44 per cent. drop in the number of 18–24-year-olds claiming JSA for 6 months or more in Wales between April 1998 and April 1999.

NHS Specialist Regional Services

28. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what funding he has made available for the current year for specialist regional services in the national health service. [85183]

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: The funding of specialised health services is a matter for health authorities and the Specialised Health Services Commission for Wales.

Welsh health authorities will receive more than £2 billion for 1999–2000, some £1.5 billion of which will be included within their discretionary allocations, an increase of 10.3 per cent. over 1998–99.

A further £120 million is included with allocations for protected and ring fenced services. Included within this is:

£9.2 million which is the final year of ring-fenced funding for the Morriston cardiac centre

£12.6 million for the Artificial Limb and Appliance Service

£6.7 million for High Security Psychiatric Services

£1.9 million for Paediatric Intensive Care services.

Following the transfer of functions, this will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Milk Industry

29. Mr. Dafis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what action he is taking to safeguard the position of the Welsh milk industry. [85184]

Mr. Michael: With the National Assembly Secretary for Agriculture and Rural Affairs, Christine Gwyther I met farming leaders on Monday 24 May. The Action Plan for the Dairy industry in Wales, published in March 1999, sets out a positive agenda through which the Welsh Development Agency and the National Assembly will be able to work with the industry to help it adapt and invest in the dairy processing facilities which are essential for future prosperity in the sector.

Following the transfer of functions, this issue will be a matter for the National Assembly.

Livestock Farming

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has received since 1 May 1997 from the Vegetarian Society on livestock farming in Wales. [85167]

Mr. Michael: None.

Written Answers to Questions

Thursday 10 June 1999

NORTHERN IRELAND

Seamus Ludlow

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assistance the RUC has offered the Irish police following the announcement of a new inquiry into the killing of Seamus Ludlow in 1976; and if she will waive restrictions preventing witnesses and others assisting the investigation. [86140]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 9 June 1999]: On the basis of inquiries to the Irish Government, I have been advised that there has been no such announcement.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Greenhouse Gas Emissions

Mrs. Brinton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to change departmental refrigeration and air-conditioning systems to operate on not-in-kind refrigerants. [86166]

Dr. Howells: The policy of this Department is to ensure that no products containing CFCs, HFCs, Halon Carbon tetrachloride 1,1,1, methyl bromide or any other ozone depleting substances are purchased.

The Department continues to look at alternative methods of refrigeration wherever practical.

Passenger Service Charge

Mr. Gordon Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received about the decision of airline companies to separate passenger service charges from the price of their tickets; and what assessment he has made of that decision. [86237]

Dr. Howells: I have received one letter on this issue. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions has lead responsibility for this issue, and I would refer my hon. Friend to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London to my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) on 11 May 1999, Official Report, columns 108–09.

Hearing Aid Council Act 1968

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans he has to amend the Hearing Aid Council Act 1968 to permit a more streamlined disciplinary procedure for hearing aid dispensers; and what plans he has to consult on the effectiveness of the powers of the Hearing Aid Council. [85938]

Dr. Howells: I am aware of the Hearing Aid Council's concerns about the Hearing Aid Council Act 1968. There continues to be considerable pressures on the legislative programme and I can give no guarantee when time might become available, but will be looking for an opportunity.

Arms Exports (Indonesia)

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the individual items of military equipment licensed for export to Indonesia and their uses which are referred to in the Annual report on Strategic Export Controls as (a) communications equipment, (b) electrical components, (c) electronic equipment and (d) military simulator. [85831]

Dr. Howells: The information requested relates to 10 Standard Individual Export Licences, and inquiries are being made under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. As confidential information is involved, the parties concerned are being asked if they consent to its disclosure, and this can take some time. I will write to my hon. Friend as soon as possible, and will place a copy of that letter in the Library of the House.

Export Licences

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many Open Individual Export Licences were (a) applied for, (b) approved and (c) refused during 1998. [86242]

Dr. Howells: Detailed information about export licensing decisions made in 1998, including those made on applications for Open Individual Export Licences, will be included in the 1998 Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls, which will be published in due course.

Oesophageal Cancer

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to the answer of 26 April 1999, Official Report, column 29, on oesophageal cancer, what representations he has received that patients' consents were not obtained prior to their admission to the trial procedures. [85717]

Mr. Battle: I have not received any representation on this issue.

Special Advisers

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 1999, Official Report, columns 252–53, on Special Advisers, if he will list the meetings which his Special Advisers held with members and officials of the United States Government between 10 and 16 October 1998, listing the dates and locations of each meeting and the names of the US Ministers and officials at each meeting. [86283]

Mr. Byers: No such meetings were held.

Combined Heat and Power Generation, Cleveland

Miss Melanie Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will announce his decision on Enron Europe Ltd.'s notification to build a combined heat and power generation station at the Teesside Gas Processing Plant, Seal Sands, Cleveland. [86826]

Mr. Battle: I have today granted clearance under Section 14 of the Energy Act 1976 in response to Enron Europe Ltd.'s notification to build a 45 MW gas-fired combined heat and power station at the Teesside Gas Processing Plant at Seal Sands, Cleveland. The decision has been taken in accordance with the policy set out in the White Paper entitled "Conclusions of the Review of Energy Sources for Power Generation and Government response to fourth and fifth Reports of the Trade and Industry Committee" (Cm 4071).

I believe very strongly that CHP should play a vital and expanding role in the future of the UK power market. The technology has now come into its own, and the efficiency it offers is delivering benefits not just to business users, but to the country as a whole.

Copies of the Press Notice and Section 14 clearance are being placed in the Library of the House.

Departmental Recruitment

Miss Melanie Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will publish summary information on his Department's recruitment for calendar year 1998, and the use of permitted exceptions to the principles of fair and open competition and selection on merit, as required by the Civil Service Commissioners' Recruitment Code. [86825]

Dr. Howells: It is DTI policy that recruitment is carried out on the basis of fair and open competition and selection on merit, subject to the exceptions permitted by the Civil Service Commissioners. My Department has systems in place which ensure that the principles of fair and open competition are understood and followed, in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Commissioners' Recruitment Code. These systems are subject to internal check and to external check by the Commissioner's approved auditors.

The DTI's Executive Agencies and the Government Office network make separate arrangements for publishing recruitment data and the following table and narratives describe only Headquarters recruitment.

Recruitment information
Number of staff recruited 1 January 1998 to 31 December 1998

							Gender		Ethnic background [2]
Range	Permanent	FTA	Recurring temp	Standby	Short notice	Other [1]	M	F	White	Ethnic minority	Not stated	Disability
Range 11	—	3	—	—	—	—	3	—	[2]	[2]	[2]	[2]
Range 10	6	15	—	1	—	—	17	5	19	3	0	2
Range 9	12	—	—	—	—	—	9	3	11	1	0	0
Range 8	18	—	—	—	—	—	13	5	17	1	0	2
Range 7	12	—	—	—	—	—	11	1	9	1	2	2
Range 6	16	—	—	—	—	1	4	13	16	0	1	4
Range 5	8	—	1	—	—	9	8	10	14	2	2	1
Range 4	19	3	—	—	—	7	11	18	17	9	3	2
Range 3	9	—	2	—	—	25	24	12	24	8	4	3
Range 2	25	—	—	—	—	17	15	27	20	17	5	0
Range 1	11	2	—	—	—	5	7	11	15	1	2	3
Fast stream	20	—	—	—	—	7	15	12	22	4	1	1
Total	156	23	3	1	—	71	137	117	184	47	20	20

[1] Includes numbers of casuals, sandwich course students, legal trainees
[2] Note that ethnic data has been suppressed for those ranges where numbers recruited are 5 or less to avoid the possibility of identifying individuals

The number of occasions on which the permitted exceptions to fair and open competition and selection on merit have been used at each level (except for appointments of up to 12 months) are categorised as below. Details of the exceptions are underneath the relevant category.

extensions of appointments of up to 12 months up to a maximum of 24 months: none recurrent short-term appointments:

2 Range 3s, 1 Range 5, 1 part-time Range 11 and 6 Range 10s, all employed in the Queens Award office where the work is seasonal short-term appointments where highly specialised skills are required:

1 Range 10 on a standby contract for 20 days providing advice on clean coal generation technology and 2 fixed-term appointments of Range 10 Lawyers to meet unforeseen shortfalls in specific areas of legal services extensions of short-term appointments beyond the initially publicised period, including conversions to permanency:

1 Range 10 Research Officer whose appointment was extended to oversee the completion of a project; 1 Range 10 converted to permanency due to difficulty of recruiting a Remuneration Specialist secondments: 56

extensions to secondments:

26, mostly in the export promotion field where it is difficult to attract the right people. Also, it is becoming increasingly difficult to gain agreement for secondees' release from their parent organisation re-appointment of former civil servants:

1 Range 10 Lawyer formerly employed by the Crown Prosecution Service; 1 Range 4 who was originally recruited by DSS, applied to DTI for a casual post and was then reinstated in situ

transfers of staff with their work (not under TUPE): none transfers of staff from other public services without work (unless from a public body staffed exclusively by civil servants): none appointments of surplus acceptable candidates to shortage posts: none appointments of disabled candidates under modified selection arrangements: none

any use of the exceptions reserved for the Commissioners (ie appointments on the basis of the proven distinction of the individual and appointments not in order of merit): none.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Millennium Celebrations (Promotion)

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what steps his Department took to promote Britain's millennium celebrations at the European Incentive and Business Travel and Meetings Exhibition in Geneva. [85297]

Janet Anderson [holding answer 24 May 1999]: As the name indicates, this particular Exhibition in Geneva was primarily concerned with business incentives and business travel. The British Tourist Authority, which is funded by my Department, was present at the exhibition and promoted the millennium celebrations primarily through their "VisitBritain" internet site which was live on the stand with open access for anyone wishing to explore it. In addition, pictures of the Millennium Dome and other millennium projects, such as the Eden Project, were integrated into the overall design of the stand.

Ministerial Hospitality

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if he authorised the Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting to accept night club tickets and hospitality arranged by Sony Entertainment and the British Phonographic Industry Ltd.; and what account he took of the Ministerial Code in doing so. [86655]

Janet Anderson: There is no requirement for Ministers to seek the advice of their Secretary of State on the acceptance of gifts or hospitality. The DCMS has a clear policy on hospitality, in line with the Ministerial Code, and all Ministers and officials are expected to abide by it.

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the total monetary value was of the (a) night club tickets arranged for the Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting by Sony Entertainment and the British Phonographic Industry Ltd. and (b) hospitality received. [86656]

Janet Anderson: There is no charge for entry for guests of members of the Met Bar, Brown's or the Mayfair Club, and, therefore, no monetary value attached to the entry obtained. No other hospitality was received.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Jurors

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what exemptions from jury service are available to jurors with unavoidable child care responsibilities. [86198]

Mr. Vaz: If someone applies for excusal from jury service on the grounds of the need to care for young children, the guidance to court staff states that their application should be dealt with sympathetically. Each application is considered by the jury-summoning officer, based on the information provided by the applicant.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

MOX Shipment (Japan)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his oral answer to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Mr. Brake), of 18 May 1999, Official Report, column 861, on MOX shipments to Japan, by what means the plutonium in MOX fuel is destroyed in nuclear reactors; and if he will list the evidence on which he based his reply. [85825]

Mr. Hoon: Typically, MOX fuel contains between 50 and 70 kilograms of plutonium for each tonne of fuel entering the reactor. It is estimated that after four years of generating electricity, the amount of plutonium remaining in the fuel would have been reduced by about 18 kilograms in each tonne. This underpins the view that the use of MOX fuel reduces proliferation risks by gradually reducing plutonium stockpiles.

This is supported by an OECD (Nuclear Energy Agency) study ("Management of Separated Plutonium: The Technical Options", OECD, Paris 1997) which has indicated that if MOX fuel is burnt at reasonable levels, the world's stockpile of plutonium can be held steady and then gradually reduced during the first decade of the next century.

Entry Clearance Applications

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how long, on average, it took between refusal of settlement entry clearance at (a) New Delhi, (b) Bombay, (c) Islamabad, (d) Karachi, (e) Lagos, (f) Accra and (g) Moscow and the dispatch of the explanatory statement to the UK for statements dispatched in (i) September 1998, (ii) December 1998 and (iii) March 1999; and if he will estimate how long it will take for explanatory statements to be dispatched for refusals made in (A) December 1998, (B) March 1999, (C) April 1999 and (D) May 1999. [86101]

Mr. Hoon: Information in the form requested is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Explanatory statements are not prepared until a Notice of Appeal against the entry clearance decision is received. The time limit for this is three months from the date of refusal. In 1998, 81 per cent. of settlement refusals worldwide resulted in an appeal.

In 1990 guidelines were introduced requiring Entry Clearance Officers to produce and submit explanatory statements to the appropriate authorities in the UK within three months of receipt of the notice of appeal.

The following table shows the percentage of explanatory statements submitted within three months at the posts named, during 1998:

	Percentage
New Delhi	85
Bombay	98
Islamabad	74
Karachi	91
Lagos	92
Accra	50
Moscow	100

Kashmir

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Pakistan and Indian Governments about Kashmir; and if he will make a statement. [86063]

Mr. Hoon: We are deeply concerned by infiltration of militants into Jammu and Kashmir, and fighting between them and the Indian Security Forces. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary recently discussed the situation in Kashmir with his Pakistani and Indian counterparts. We continue to urge both countries to work together to resolve the issues between them, including Kashmir, through bilateral dialogue.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received following recent hostilities on the line of control in Kashmir. [86062]

Mr. Hoon: We are aware of the concern of many people in the UK regarding the current situation in Kashmir. We have made clear to Indian and Pakistani governments our hope that they can work together to resolve the issues between them, including Kashmir, through bilateral dialogue.

Angola

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with representatives of the Angolan Government regarding (a) the activities of UNITA in that country and (b) the international supply of arms to UNITA; and if he will make a statement. [86061]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We are in regular contact with the Angolan authorities both in London and in Luanda. Indeed I most recently discussed these issues with Dr. Miranda, the Angolan Foreign Minister, on 23 February when I was in Luanda. We deeply regret the renewal of the conflict for which we hold Dr. Jonas Savimbis' UNITA responsible. We fully support the tightening of United Nations sanctions on the sale of diamonds, on oil supplies and arms for UNITA. We welcome the establishment by the United Nations Secretary-General of expert groups to study the issue. We look forward to learning the results of the visit to the region by Ambassador Fowler, the Chairman of the UN Angolan Sanctions Committee. We shall then discuss with the Angolan authorities, our EU partners and all those members of the international community interested in finding a peaceful solution to the conflict in Angola how best to implement his findings.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Tobacco

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on tobacco consumption in the developing world. [86213]

Clare Short: I view with great concern the estimate by the World Health Organisation (WHO) that, if current trends continue, tobacco will be the leading cause of disease burden in the world by 2030, causing about one in eight deaths, and that 70 per cent. of tobacco-related deaths will be in developing countries. I strongly support the priority being given to tobacco control by WHO through its "Tobacco Free" initiative, and the efforts to establish an international framework convention for tobacco control which, in particular, will aim to protect children and adolescents from exposure to tobacco products and their promotion. We are contributing £200,000 this financial year to the "Tobacco Free initiative".

DEFENCE

Turkey

Mr. Hancock: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the value of defence products exported to Turkey during 1998. [86204]

Mr. Spellar: Information on defence exports will be included in the Government's Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls for 1998, which will be published in due course.

Pay and Personnel Agency

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Pay and Personnel Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [86911]

Mr. Spellar: The Chief Executive of the Pay and Personnel Agency (PPA) is responsible for providing pay and personnel information services for the Ministry of Defence as defined in the agency framework document. During 1999–2000 the PPA will be set the following challenging key performance targets:

1. To make 100 per cent. of all payments to staff by the due date (excluding late payments caused by invalid claims or late notification outside the control of the Agency).
2. To keep error rates within the following limits:
   12 per 1,000 payments of weekly industrial pay
   6 per 1,000 payments of monthly non-industrial pay
   20 per 1,000 awards of pension
   15 per 1,000 payments of expenses
3. By 31 March 2000 to implement the action plan established from the customer satisfaction survey.
4. To meet the Department's requirement for implementing agreed pay and grading changes.
5. By 31 March 2000 to complete training of 60 per cent. of all staff in leadership or change management or customer service as appropriate.
6. To achieve Agency IIP accreditation before the end of 1999.
7. To achieve full Y2K compliance of critical systems with revised contingency plans for maintaining business continuity into the next millennium.

8. To deliver the financial and organisational objectives resulting from the PPA Efficiency Review and in doing so achieve at least a 15 per cent. reduction in operating costs compared with the 1998–99 cash allocation.

Military Survey Defence Agency

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what Key Targets have been set for the Military Survey Defence Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [86912]

Mr. Spellar: The role of Military Survey is to ensure the provision of geographic support to defence operations, planning and training. The Key Targets for the Agency for the 12 months from April 1999 are:

Key Target 1:

To satisfy 100 per cent. of requirements for geographic support to current operations within the timescale agreed between the Agency and its customers.

Key Target 2:

To establish the baseline for measurement of customer satisfaction with the Agency's products and services.

Key Target 3:

To complete the agreed annual production programme on time and to cost.

Key Target 4:

To establish the baseline measurement of the effectiveness of the Agency's geographic information holdings in meeting customer requirements.

Key Target 5:

To maintain the requirement-readiness state of the required Field Support elements of the Agency as required by the Department.

Key Target 6:

To achieve a 3 per cent. improvement in efficiency.

RAF Personnel Management Agency

Mr. John Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the RAF Personnel Management Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [86913]

Mr. Doug Henderson: Key Targets have been set for the Chief Executive of the RAF Personnel Management Agency for the Financial Year 1999–2000 as follows:

Key Target 1—Peacetime Manning

To ensure that the percentage of trained personnel either filling posts or on alternative tasks for which there is an approved Manning and Training Margin is 92.5 per cent. or greater.

Key Target 2—War, Crisis and MOD Authorised Unestablished Tasks

To man War, Crisis and MOD authorised Unestablished Tasks at 98 per cent. or greater.

Key Target 3—Career Management

To ensure that 80 per cent. or more personnel who are given a posting that qualifies for a domestic move receive a minimum of 90 days notice.

Key Target 4—Manpower Planning

To ensure that the percentage variation between the actual trained strength and the authorised trained strength, taken as an average over the financial year is no greater than + or − 1 per cent.

Key Target 5—Efficiency

To maintain operating costs within a reduced cash allocation of 1.7 per cent. in real terms from the last financial year.

Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre Defence Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [86914]

Mr. Spellar: The role of the Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre is to produce imagery intelligence and imagery products and services to meet MOD and operational command requirements. The Key Targets for the Agency for the 12 months from April 1999 are:

Key Target 1:

To satisfy 95 per cent. of operational requirements for imagery, imagery intelligence (IMINT) and imagery-derived products within the timescales specified in the Customer Agreement.

Key Target 2:

To provide detached service personnel for intelligence-related support to operations duties (up to a maximum of 6 per cent. of the service strength at any time).

Key Target 3:

To satisfy 85 per cent. of non-operational requirements for imagery, imagery intelligence (IMINT) and imagery-derived products and services within the timescales specified in the Customer Agreement.

Key Target 4:

To achieve a 3 per cent. improvement in efficiency.

Key Target 5:

To establish the baseline for measurement of customer satisfaction with the Agency's products and services.

Defence Intelligence and Security Centre

Mr. McNulty: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what key targets have been set for the Defence Intelligence and Security Centre Defence Agency for the financial year 1999–2000. [86915]

Mr. Spellar: The role of the Defence Intelligence and Security Centre is to train the armed forces and other Intelligence agencies in intelligence and security disciplines and conduct after capture; to maintain an operational capability; and to contribute to effective and timely advice to the armed forces on appropriate intelligence and security matters. The Key Targets for the Agency for the 12 months from April 1999 are:

Key Target 1:

To satisfy 100 per cent. of operational taskings required by the Department to the standard specified by the tasking authority.

Key Target 2:

To deliver the training programme endorsed by the Defence Intelligence Training Policy Group within agreed resources.

Key Target 3:

To achieve an overall 80 per cent. measure of customer satisfaction with the quality of training delivered.

Key Target 4:

To reduce the real-terms cost of delivering the average training place made available by the DISC by 2 per cent. in FY1999–2000.

Milestone Objective:

To achieve Investors in People accreditation by 31 December 1999.

Patents

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many patent applications have been passed to his Department under section 22 of the Patents Act 1977 in each year since its implementation; how many are still held by his Department; and if he will make a statement on the procedures followed by his Department in respect of this matter. [85352]

Mr. Spellar: MOD records show that 4,700 Patent Applications were passed to MOD in the period 1985–98, of which 1,669 are still prohibited from publication. The total number of applications passed to MOD between 1978, when the Patents Act was implemented, and 1984 is not available, because the only information in the computer database relates to those applications which are still subject to prohibition; 471 applications from that period are still subject to a Section 22 prohibition order. Annual summaries of these figures follow: Of the overall total of 2,140 cases still prohibited from publication, 927 are overseas patent applications, which have been filed under secure conditions in the UK. These come from Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany, Italy, The Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Spain, Sweden and the United States of America, countries with which the UK has reciprocal arrangements for the protection of applications which have been prohibited from publication, and which have procedures similar to Section 22 of the 1977 Patents Act.

The MOD may not see any prohibited application until either the owner of the application has given permission for this, or until 18 months after the filing date, if such permission is not forthcoming. The MOD endeavours to confirm a prohibition order, or to recommend rescission of the order, within three months of receipt of the applications. 85 per cent. of new applications are dealt with within this time.

Each application which is prohibited from publication is reviewed annually by MOD to decide whether the prohibition order should be maintained or rescinded.

SCOTLAND

Warm Deal

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what progress has been made in implementing the Warm Deal programme in Scotland under the New Deal. [85407]

Mr. Macdonald: By 31 March 1999, 37,000 houses had been insulated under the Warm Deal by 450 New Deal employees.

From 1 July 1999, this will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament.

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Rural Bus Services

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if it is his policy that all underspend on the Rural Bus Services Grant for 1998–99 will be added to moneys available to improve rural bus services in 1999–2000. [85658]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The 1998–99 underspend on the grant has been added to the sum available for allocation to local authority schemes successful in the rural bus challenge competition, as was reflected in the total amount of challenge awards announced on 16 December.

Genetically Modified Crops

Mr. Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions in what ways the harvested material from the genetically modified crop test sites of (a) herbicide resitant oilseed rape, (b) high laurate modified oilseed rape, (c) herbicide resistant maize and (d) herbicide resistant beet will be disposed of. [85942]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The method by which harvested material from experimental releases of genetically modified crops is disposed of is specified in every consent, the details of each consent are available on the statutory public register held at my Department.

Typical means of disposal of harvested material include the methods set out as follows:

(a) Herbicide resistant oilseed rape seed is harvested and buried in landfill sites or incinerated, depending on quantities. The green plant material is treated with herbicide and then incorporated into the soil on site.

(b) High laurate modified oilseed rape seed is harvested and used for research or stored in bonded warehouses pending decision on future uses. Green plant material is treated with herbicide and then incorporated into the soil on site.

(c) Herbicide resistant maize is chopped and incorporated into the soil, incinerated or buried in landfill depending on quantities.

(d) Herbicide resistant beet is taken for analysis and then incinerated. Beets not required for analysis are chopped by farm machinery and incorporated into the soil on site.

Lead Shot

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what representations he has received from the Countryside Alliance concerning his recent consultation paper on the use of lead shot over wetlands; and what reply he has sent. [86046]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: My Department has received a number of representations on the proposed regulations on the use of lead shot including those of Countryside Alliance. Their views on the Regulations will be considered along with those of other organisations and individuals who have commented.

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions when he expects to lay before Parliament delegated legislation dealing with lead shot. [85917]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: It is the intention of my Department to lay the Statutory Instrument on the use of lead shot before Parliament in time for regulations to come into force in England on 1 September 1999. From 1 July, any regulations to restrict the use of lead shot in Scotland and Wales will be a matter for the Scottish Parliament and Welsh Assembly respectively.

Atmospheric Pollution Trends

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will make a statement on trends in the levels of (a) ammonia, (b) benzene, (c) mercury and (d) phosgene in the atmosphere. [86026]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 8 June 1999]: (a) Ammonia—My Department has been funding a nationwide network of around 70 sites to measure the ambient concentrations of ammonia since 1996. To date, there is not a sufficiently long dataset to discern authoritatively any trends, although early indications are that there is substantial seasonal and inter-annual variability. There are larger concentrations in spring and summer, and the largest concentrations are in warm, dry years. On the basis of natural variability, monitoring for more than five years will be necessary to clearly detect changes in response to changes in national emissions. Numbers of livestock and nitrogen fertiliser usage, which are the main sources of ammonia, have declined since the mid 1980s.

Earlier ad-hoc monitoring campaigns from this period are not sufficient to demonstrate increased concentrations in the 1980s compared with the present. Much longer term datasets of precipitation chemistry and deposition have shown that atmospheric ammonia increased substantially between 1950 and the 1980s, which can be explained by both increases in livestock numbers and nitrogen fertiliser inputs.

(b) Benzene—My Department has funded the continuous real-time measurement of benzene in the air since 1993. There are now 13 sites in the network, including roadside, urban background, and rural locations. In 1997, the running annual mean for benzene from this network ranged from (rural) 0.5–(urban centre) 2.1 parts per billion. To date, there is not a sufficiently long dataset to discern authoritatively any trends. Results of the monitoring are available in the Department's Digest of Environmental Statistics, and are available on the Department's internet site.

(c) Mercury—Mercury is predominantly present in the UK atmosphere as either particulate mercury or other semi-volatile mercury compounds. This leads to measurement problems in that it is difficult to measure the two phases in the same sample. My Department has been measuring mercury at three sites—Chilton in Oxfordshire, Styrrup in north Nottinghamshire and Wraymires in the Lake District. These are all relatively remote locations. Measurements have been taken of particulate mercury and of mercury in rain. Table 1 lists the atmospheric concentrations of mercury (ng m^{-3}) at rural locations. The particulate mercury is only a small fraction of the total, perhaps 4 per cent. Table 2 gives mercury concentrations in rain water (µg l^{-1}) at rural locations, mercury is rarely detectable in rain water. There is no trend to speak of in either of these measures of mercury concentrations, except that analytical detection limits have improved markedly in recent years.

Table 1: Atmospheric mercury concentrations (ng m^{-3}) at rural locations

Year	Chilton	Styrrup	Wraymires
1992	0.14	0.52	<0.1
1993	1.6	2.1	0.29
1994	0.11	0.32	0.18
1995	0.095	0.21	<0.1
1996	0.18	0.37	0.23
1997	0.07	<0.2	0.19
1998	0.22	0.72	0.49

Table 2: Mercury concentrations in rain water (µg l^{-1}) at rural locations

Year	Chilton	Styrrup	Wraymires
1992	<1	<6	<6
1993	<1	<1	<1
1994	0.026	0.031	0.019
1995	<0.1	0.2	<0.1
1996	<0.1	<0.1	<0.1
1997	<0.005	<0.008	0.009
1998	<0.006	<0.006	<0.006

(d) Phosgene—My Department has no information on the levels of phosgene in the atmosphere.

Air Safety

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions how many random ramp checks on foreign airlines have been undertaken by his Department in the last year; and in how many cases were problems found. [85844]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The Department asks the CAA to carry out checks on foreign-registered aircraft using UK airports where evidence suggests that ICAO standards may not be met. There were 63 checks in the year from 1 April 1998 to 31 March 1999; of these, 28 revealed no problems or only minor differences from ICAO standards, such as, for example, a defective light bulb in the cabin. Six inspections revealed serious problems which required that the aircraft be detained until corrective action was taken. The remaining checks revealed less serious differences from ICAO standards, which were drawn to the attention of the operators and the relevant national aviation authorities.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what plans Her Majesty's Government have for the future of the Safety Regulation Group following the reorganisation of the CAA. [85882]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The future of the Safety Regulation Group of the Civil Aviation Authority will be considered in the light of responses to the consultations on a public/private partnership for National Air Traffic Services Ltd. and on the institutional arrangements for transport safety across all modes.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what bilateral agreements the United Kingdom has established to govern the arrangements for checking the operating procedures of foreign aircraft flying into the United Kingdom. [85845]

Mrs. Liddell [holding answer 8 June 1999]: There are no bilateral agreements specifying procedures for checking the operating procedures of foreign aircraft flying into the United Kingdom.

The UK has agreed with partners in the European Civil Aviation Conference on a Safety Clause to be inserted, as the opportunity arises, into bilateral Air Service Agreements. In brief, the clause allows either party to call for discussions within 30 days when any safety problem arises and to inspect the other's aircraft at any time. To date, insertion of the safety clause has been agreed with 11 countries.

Multimodal Transport Study (London and South-West Corridor)

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what targets, in respect of the encouragement of rail freight, the multimodal study of the London and South-West Corridor announced as part of the Trunk Roads Review will have. [86196]

Ms Glenda Jackson: A key objective of the London to South-West and South Wales multimodal study is to examine the scope for modal shift. This will include the potential for the transfer of more freight onto the railway. Until the study is undertaken, it is not possible to assess this potential or to consider what might be a realistic target.

EU Regional Chambers

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what status regional chambers currently have within the acquis of the European Union; what personnel are currently responsible for their administration; and what information is collated centrally concerning their membership functions and activities. [86230]

Mr. Caborn: Regional chambers have no formal status in relation to the European Union. However, they provide a mechanism through which regional partners can present a coherent regional view on European issues.

Regional chambers are voluntary partnerships, and personnel issues are matters for each chamber. However, I have placed details of the current chair and secretary of each chamber in the Library.

Regional chambers seeking designation under the Regional Development Agencies Act 1998 are required to provide the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions with a copy of their constitution and a list of members.

Birmingham Northern Relief Road

Dr. Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will release all parts of the Concession Agreement for the Birmingham Northern Relief Road under the terms of the Environmental Information Regulations 1992 after the end of judicial proceedings. [85824]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Having regard to the outcome of the recent legal actions, my noble Friend the Under-Secretary is giving careful consideration to a request for disclosure of the Concession Agreement.

Litter

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what assessment he has made of the power of (a) local authorities and (b) the police to prosecute people who drop litter in the street; and how many people have been prosecuted for dropping litter in the street under these powers in each of the last three years. [85672]

Mr. Meacher: The Advisory Group on Litter undertook a wide-ranging review of the litter legislation, including the powers of local authorities and the police, in 1993. A summary of the Advisory Group's report is available in the House Library.

The number of defendants prosecuted for litter offences under section 87 of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 in England and Wales is given in the following table[1]:

	1996	1997	[2]1998
Police Prosecution	455	377	377
Other Prosecution[3]	171	128	109

[1] Data for the Home Office Court Proceedings Database
[2] Provisional
[3] Includes prosecutions instigated by Government Departments, local authorities (the majority of which fall into this category), private organisations and individuals

Night Flights

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he has reached conclusions following the second stage of the consultation on night restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted; and if he will make a statement. [86775]

Ms Glenda Jackson: On 17 November 1998 the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions issued the second of two consultation papers on the next night restrictions regime for Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted airports, to apply from 31 October 1999 until the end of the 2004 summer season. This second consultation paper took into account all relevant responses to the preliminary consultation paper issued on 27 February 1998.

The November consultation paper was in two parts. Part 1 was concerned with all aspects of the night restrictions regime now applying at the three airports. Part 2 examined options for changes to the preferential use of Heathrow's runways at night. The decisions I am announcing today are concerned with Part 1 of the November consultation paper only. Consideration of the responses to the options examined in Part 2 is continuing and a separate announcement will be made on that in due course. Decisions on Parts 1 and 2 of the consultation paper are not inter-dependent.

The current night restrictions are among the most stringent in Europe: night movements by Chapter 3 noise certificated aircraft are not limited at most other leading airports. We said in the preliminary consultation paper that we did not expect to propose major changes to the night restrictions for the next regime. To relax the restrictions significantly or to ban night flights entirely would not be consistent with the Government's objectives set out in the consultation paper.

We have decided to implement the proposals in the consultation paper, but with four modifications.

(a) The proposal to reduce the seasonal noise quotas for Heathrow from winter 1999–2000 onwards to nearer the level of current usage is to be implemented but with smaller reductions in the noise quotas than proposed. The winter season noise quota will be set at a level which is below quota usage in winter 1998–99.

(b) The proposal to reduce the seasonal noise quotas for Gatwick progressively from winter 2001–02 onwards is to be implemented but with larger reductions in the noise quotas than proposed.

(c) The proposal to reapportion the Gatwick movement limits pro rata to the length of the summer and winter seasons is not to be implemented and the current apportionment of the movements limits is to be retained for the next regime.

(d) The proposal to increase the noise quotas for Stansted, while maintaining the incentive for airlines to use quieter aircraft at night, is to be implemented but the reasons underpinning it differ to some degree from those set out in the consultation paper.

The overall effect of the decisions is to put in place a new night restrictions regime at the three airports which will contribute towards achievement of the Government's objectives set out in the consultation paper. The decision to reduce the noise quotas for Heathrow to nearer the level of current usage, and in the case of the winter season to a level below usage in winter 1998–99, will help safeguard the improvement in the noise climate during the noise quota period brought about since 1993 under the current regime. The decision to reduce the noise quotas for Gatwick by more than proposed in the consultation paper, in conjunction with the decisions we have reached on other aspects, is expected to bring about an improvement in the night noise climate around the airport over time. The decision not to reapportion the Gatwick movements limits pro rata to the length of the seasons will enable airlines to develop services in summer by more than would have been the case under the Government's proposal, but other environmental benefits will be provided through the larger than proposed reductions in the noise quotas. The decision to increase the noise quotas for Stansted by about 3.5 per cent. per annum will provide for the further development of the airport broadly as envisaged in 1993 and 1994.

The full decision and the reasons for the decision are dealt with in the document "Night Restrictions at Heathrow, Gatwick and Stansted: Revised restrictions with effect from 31 October 1999", copies of which have been placed in the House Library.

In reaching these decisions we have taken into account the disturbance caused by night flights and the need to ensure that local communities are not exposed to excessive levels of aircraft noise at night. Account has been taken of the existing noise climate around each airport, the local circumstances of each airport, and the distribution of population under their principal arrival and departure tracks. These have been weighed against the aviation interests involved, the existing air services using each airport and the wider economic considerations. We believe that the decisions announced today will protect local people from excessive levels of aircraft noise at night.

Copies of responses, except where the author has requested confidentiality, will be made available for inspection by prior appointment at the DETR Information Centre, Great Minster House, 76 Marsham Street, London, SW1P 4DR.

TREASURY

Aircraft Pollution

Mr. Brake: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of proposals for (a) an aircraft emissions tax and (b) an aircraft fuel charge, (i) in revenue terms and (ii) in respect of their impact on pollution from aircraft. [85687]

Ms Hewitt: No such assessments have been made.

EU Directive (Taxation of Interest)

Mr. Denzil Davies: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the total amount of tax which would have been collected in the fiscal year 1998–99 by paying agents situated in the United Kingdom if the draft EU directive on the taxation of interest payments at the rate of 20 per cent. had been operational and if the UK had opted for the withholding regime. [85833]

Dawn Primarolo: It is not possible to estimate the revenue consequences of the situation described with any degree of certainty.

Working Families Tax Credit

Ms Harman: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 10 May 1999, Official Report, column 58, on Working Families Tax Credit, what will be the effect on their eligibility for Working Families Tax Credit of an employee taking unpaid parental leave under the Employment Relations Bill at a time which coincides with the assessment for their next award period. [85832]

Dawn Primarolo: In order to be eligible for Working Families Tax Credit, an employee will need to meet various criteria, which are the same as those for Family Credit, including working 16 hours or more a week at the time of the application or in the period immediately preceding or following the application. Where an employee is on unpaid parental leave, the application will be treated in the same way as any other period of unpaid leave.

Single Currency

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer by what means statistics relating to the flow of capital investment for all, or particular, purposes, from the United Kingdom into each of the other member states of the European Union, are collated following the introduction of the single currency; and what assessment he has made of the effect of the United Kingdom joining the single currency on the collation of such statistics. [86228]

Ms Hewitt: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the Director of the Office for National Statistics. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Tim Holt to Mr. Austin Mitchell, dated 10 June 1999:

As Director of the Office for National Statistics (ONS), I have been asked to reply to your recent parliamentary question on statistics relating to the flow of capital investment.

Data sources for information on UK outward capital investment flows are outlined in National Accounts Concepts, Sources and Methods published in 1998 (in Chapters 24 and 25). The data are collected from regular enquiries by the ONS and the Bank of England. Inquiries of this type will continue should the UK join Monetary Union.

Geographical breakdowns, which include an analysis of flows between the UK and individual member states, are published for direct investment flows but such detailed information is not available for portfolio investment, other investment and reserve assets. Some data are also collected with an EU/Non EU split.

British Energy

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the recent sale of the Government's holding of debt in British Energy. [86828]

Mr. Milburn: The sale of HM Treasury's three bonds in British Energy (£109,861,000 5.949 per cent. bond due 2003, £163,444,000 6.077 per cent. bond due 2006, £134,586,000 6.202 per cent. Bond due 2016) was completed on 4 June 1999. Payment will be made to HM Treasury on 11 June. Proceeds from the sale, net of commissions, will total £392 million.

HEALTH

Dental Charges

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will abolish all dental charges for pensioners; and if he will make a statement. [85706]

Mr. Denham: Entitlement to help with National Health Service dental charges is based on the principle that those who can afford to contribute should do so, while those most likely to have difficulty paying should be protected. Pensioners on low incomes are entitled to claim free NHS dental treatment or help with the cost of charges under the NHS Low Income Scheme.

NHS Bodies (Running Costs)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the estimated annual running costs are for the last financial year of (a) the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation, (b) Local Education Consortia and (c) the Capital Priorities Advisory Group; and if he will make a statement. [86071]

Mr. Denham: For 1998–99, the estimated running costs for the Advisory Committee on Resource Allocation and the Capital Prioritisation Advisory Group are £22,000 and £5,000 respectively. These were funded from the Department's running costs (within Vote 2).

The Local Education Consortia costs are estimated at £5.8 million for 1998–99. These were funded from expenditure on hospital and community health services (within Vote 1).

Midwives (Grading)

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to review the grading of midwives. [85721]

Mr. Denham: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Randall) on 8 June 1999, Official Report, column 458.

CABINET OFFICE

Electronic Services

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when he intends to publish information on the target set by the Prime Minister to deliver 25 per cent. of Government services electronically. [86827]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: A report on progress by Departments and their key agencies is being published today. Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of the House and it will be published on the site www.citu.gov.uk. The report contains information supplied by Departments on a sample of key dealings between the citizen and business and government.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefit Payments (Barcodes)

Mr. Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if the barcode system to be installed in post offices will be able to record stolen order books; [85861]

(2) what benefits are planned to be paid through the barcode system to be used in post offices; [85877]

(3) what visible information on order books will be concealed by the barcode technology to be installed in post offices; [85858]

(4) if the barcode technology to be introduced on order books will require Post Office staff to ask a security question. [85860]

Angela Eagle: The barcode system to be installed in post offices will be able to record stolen order books. System-produced order books for the following benefits include a barcode and will therefore be controlled through the use of the Order Book Control System (OBCS) installed in post offices:

Attendance Allowance
Child Benefit
Disability Living Allowance
Disability Working Allowance
Earnings Top Up
Family Credit
Guardians Allowance
Incapacity Benefit
Income Support
Retirement Pension
War Pensions
Widows Benefit.

No visible information on order books in concealed by barcode technology. Order books continue to include a customer's name, address and National Insurance number. The purpose of the barcode is to hold information which uniquely identifies each order book.

There are no plans for Post Office staff to be required to ask a security question, and the information contained within the barcode would not support any such proposal.

Bereavement (Pension Costs)

Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will estimate the total cost to the Government of paying a SERPS widow's/widower's pension to any person bereaved after 6 April 2000 broken down into the following groups (a) based on 100 per cent. of the amount accrued for any contributions made between 6 April 1978 and the Royal Assent of the Social Security Act 1986, (b) based on 75 per cent. of the amount accrued for any contributions made between the Royal Assent of the Social Security Act 1986 and (i) 5 April 1996 and (ii) 5 April 1999 and (c) based on 50 per cent. of the amount accrued for any contributions made (1) since 6 April 1996 and (2) since 6 April 1999. [86048]

Mr. Timms: The information is in the table.

The additional costs of the two options specified compared to current legislation

£ million

Year	(a), (b)(i), (c)(1)	(a), (b)(ii), (c)(2)
2000	50	50
2010	950	950
2020	1,650	1,700
2030	1,850	1,900
2040	1,550	1,650
2050	950	1,000

Notes:

1. The figures are supplied by the Government Actuary's Department.

2. The figures are in 1999–2000 price terms and are rounded to the nearest £50 million. They represent gross costs excluding income-related benefit offsets.

3. The figures include SERPS paid to widows below State Pension age, but do not take account of the proposed bereavement benefit changes currently before Parliament.

4. Real earnings growth of 1.5 per cent. has been assumed.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people employed in (a) his Department and (b) its associated public bodies have benefited from the introduction of the national minimum wage. [86023]

Angela Eagle: 4,397 staff in this Department, out of approximately 90,000 staff, have benefited from the introduction of the national minimum wage. This includes the Department's Agencies, and 139 staff in the associated public bodies.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

Education Authorities (Private Firms)

16. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what procedures he intends to use to review the progress made by private firms running education in place of local education authorities. [85418]

Mr. Blunkett: Contracts for organisations taking on the delivery of education services in poorly performing LEAs will contain a series of key performance indicators and core outcomes against which the contractor's performance will be judged. These performance measures will be linked to a payment mechanism which will ensure that payments to the contractor are based on delivering an improved service. The precise details of such contracts are, of course, a matter for negotiation with providers. The LEA and the contractor will also need to hold regular contract monitoring meetings to review progress against the Service Management Plan.

In addition, Ofsted will continue its programme of local education authority inspections. These will include inspecting and reporting upon any education services being delivered by a contractor.

Teaching Staff (Salaries)

17. Mr. David Heath: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what is the average annual salary for teaching staff in local education authority schools in (a) the south-west region and (b) England. [85421]

Ms Estelle Morris: The estimated average salary of full-time teaching staff, including heads and deputies, in the local education authority maintained nursery/primary, secondary and special sector received during 1998–99 was £24,100 in England and £24,000 in the south-west region.

Average salaries at local education authority level are likely to vary for a number of reasons including: the grade structures required by the mix of school sizes, teacher's average length of service and payment of recruitment and retention points. The estimate takes account of the staged pay award in 1998–99, 2 per cent. in April with the full 3.8 per cent. paid in December.

Technology Colleges

18. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what advice and guidance he has issued to schools seeking technology college status. [85424]

Mr. Blunkett: A guidance document for schools wishing to apply for Technology College status is available to schools on request, and is also available under 'Specialist Schools Information' on the DfEE Web Site (WNN.DfEE.Gov.UK/DfEEHOME. HTM). The guidance sets out the considerations taken into account when deciding to designate Technology Colleges and covers sponsorship, school and community development plans, and location.

Head Teachers (Leadership College)

19. Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made in the development of a leadership college for head teachers. [85426]

Ms Estelle Morris: A prospectus for the College was launched by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 2 June. The prospectus sets out our vision for the College and invites potential external partners to join with us in working to make the vision a reality. Copies of the prospectus have been placed in the Libraries.

National Childcare Strategy

20. Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress the National Childcare Strategy has made in providing extra child care places. [R] [85430]

Ms Hodge: The National Childcare Strategy has had a major impact in its first year. We have funded the creation of 65,590 new child care places in 1998–99 which far exceeds the ambitious target we set of 60,000 places. In the first two years of this Government we have created more child care places than were created during the entire period of office of the last Government.

New Deal (Young People)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many young people on the new deal are currently taking part in the education and training option. [85417]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The latest Government Statistical Service figures show that at the end of March 1999 there were 23,190 young people on the New Deal Full Time Education and Training Option.

Dr. Whitehead: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress is being made in developing employer-involvement in the New Deal for young unemployed people. [85403]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Employers are playing an ever-increasing role in New Deal. They are helping us strengthen its design, meet business needs through sector initiatives, in hospitality for example, and most importantly, provide sustained jobs for nearly 70,000 young people.

Tuition Fees

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will estimate the cost of exempting all university students living in (a) Scotland, (b) Wales, (c) Northern Ireland and (d) England from tuition fees. [84062]

Mr. Mudie [holding answer 13 May 1999]: The following table shows the estimated private contributions to tuition fees from home and other EU full-time undergraduate students studying in universities and colleges in Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and England in 2000–01. These represent the cost of fee exemption assuming no consequent change to loan eligibility. Estimates of tuition fee income from part-time and postgraduate students are not readily available.

£ million

	Financial year 2000–01
Scotland	41
Wales	23
Northern Ireland	13
England	333

For students ordinarily resident in England and Wales it is not possible to estimate separately the contributions from those aged over 21 and over 25.

The proportions of private contributions from those ordinarily resident in Scotland, and EU students at Scottish institutions, aged over 21 and over 25 are estimated to be 28 per cent. and 6 per cent. respectively. For students ordinarily resident in Northern Ireland the equivalent figures are estimated to be 10 per cent. and 4 per cent.

Secondary Schools (Wandsworth)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what discussions he has had with the Education Department of the London Borough of Wandsworth on the number of children who have not obtained places in secondary schools in the borough for the September 1999 school entry. [85778]

Ms Estelle Morris: None. Arrangements for admission to schools are determined locally by the relevant admission authority, that is the local education authority for county and controlled schools, the governing body for voluntary aided and grant-maintained schools. While parents are able to say which school they would prefer, they may not gain a place at that school if it is popular and oversubscribed.

The local education authority is responsible for ensuring that a school place is available for every child living in its area whose parents want one. The places do not have to be provided at schools in its area. Where a child is without a school place because he or she has been refused admission to, or excluded from, every school within a reasonable travelling distance, the local education authority has the power to direct a school to admit the child.

I understand that Wandsworth Local Education Authority is monitoring the position and expects it to be satisfactorily resolved in due course.

European Social Fund

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if a participant on a European Social Fund course of training is designated as an employee for the purposes of the (a) Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and (b) Race Relations Act 1976. [85753]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Participation in a course part-funded by ESF does not in itself confer employment status on an individual. An individual could be participating in an ESF course of training as an employee of a company or on a work placement which may confer employment status as a result of the agreed contractual arrangement of the employer and the individual.

If an individual is an employee then they are afforded the protection of the employment provisions of the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if a participant on a European Social Fund course of training is entitled to take a complaint against (a) the training provider and (b) an employer with whom they may be doing work tasters or work placements as part of the course to an employment tribunal. [85754]

Mr. Andrew Smith: A participant in any vocational training course whether or not part-funded by ESF is entitled to bring a complaint of discrimination on the grounds of sex and/or race against a training provider in relation to provision or non-provision of that training which can be heard before an employment tribunal. In addition to any employment rights which a trainee participating in a course may have, it is unlawful for an employer to discriminate on the grounds of sex, race or disability in the way he affords or omits to afford access to the opportunity for training in the course of the employment. Any complaint can be considered by an employment tribunal.

First Aid

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funding is given to schools to provide first aid training to school children. [85699]

Mr. Charles Clarke: There is no specific funding allocated to schools to provide first aid training, but schools may choose to use part of their budget to do so if they wish.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many and what percentage of school children currently receive first aid training in schools; and if he will make a statement. [85701]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Department for Education and Employment does not collect these data.

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will introduce first aid training for all school children. [85700]

Mr. Charles Clarke: On 13 May, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment announced his proposals for the review of the National Curriculum in England. These include a non-statutory framework for Personal, Social and Health Education. At Key Stage 2 and 3, it is proposed that to develop a healthy lifestyle and keep themselves and others safe, pupils should be taught basic emergency aid procedures and where to get help and support.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86097]

Mr. Mudie: No staff have benefited from the introduction of the national minimum wage. When it was introduced on 1 April 1999, all staff earned more than the minimum wage.

Teachers (Consultation Paper)

Mr. Sawford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment (1) how many responses to the consultation paper on teachers have been received; and how many and what percentage were received from (a) headteachers, (b) teachers, (c) governors and governing bodies, (d) education authorities and (e) others; [85738]

(2) in the responses to the consultation paper on teachers, how many and what percentage of (a) headteachers, (b) teachers, (c) governors and governing bodies, (d) education authorities and (e) others, expressed support for performance related pay. [85739]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have received 40,000 responses to the Green Paper, "teachers: meeting the challenge of change". 36,060 respondents replied using the Department's response form. These responses can be broken down as follows:

(a) 3,007 (8 per cent.) from headteachers;

(b) 20,752 (58 per cent.) from teachers;

(c) 11,343 (31 per cent.) from governors;

(d) 102 (0.3 per cent.) from local education authorities and

(e) 192 (2 per cent.) from others.

We will be making the outcome of the consultation exercise public once the responses have been fully analysed.

Early Years Services

Miss Begg: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps have been taken to safeguard the interests of the voluntary sector in early years services. [85423]

Ms Hodge: We have taken a number of steps to ensure that voluntary pre-schools and playgroups contribute fully to early education and care. The voluntary and private sectors have to be represented on the Early Years Development and Childcare Partnerships which plan the delivery and development of local early years service. Each partnership has to provide specifically for the involvement of voluntary providers; to assess the health of the non-maintained sector in their areas; and to show financial support that may be available. Plans for the provision of additional places for 3 year olds, for which we are making available new funding of £390 million over three years from September 1999, must also fully involve the voluntary sector.

The same principles apply to Sure Start, which will provide integrated and community-based services for 0 to 3s and their families. The voluntary sector is a significant partner in all 60 Trailblazer programmes, and leads some of them.

In March, I appointed an independent review team to advise on how pre-schools and playgroups can contribute further to the development of early education and child care; the team will report by August. Good voluntary pre-schools and playgroups that are in financial difficulties will also be able to apply for special short term grants under the new £500,000 scheme also announced in March.

Parental Choice

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department has taken to increase the ability of parents to send their children to the school of their choice. [85431]

Ms Estelle Morris: Our commitment to increase parental choice is made clear in the Code of Practice on Admissions which came into force on 1 April. The Code reminds LEAs and governing bodies that they have an overriding duty to comply with parents' declared preferred school for their child. We want parents to be able to send their children to their preferred school wherever practicable, and LEAs should make every effort to ensure that they have sufficient school places to allow the maximum number of parents to obtain a place at a school of their choice. The funding we are providing to LEAs to meet our infant class size pledge will enable 12,000 extra places at popular schools to be achieved.

Reading

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps have been taken by his Department to encourage parents to read to their young children. [85408]

Ms Estelle Morris: We have run a series of TV and radio adverts advertising a free leaflet entitled "A little reading goes a long way". The leaflet offers parents practical advice about how to read with their children. Over 1 million copies have been requested so far and a further 2 million have been distributed through various outlets, including supermarkets and doctors' waiting rooms.

Disability Rights Commission

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what representations he has received on his proposals for the establishment of a disability rights commission. [85404]

Ms Hodge: A public consultation on the Government White Paper "Promoting Disabled People's Rights—Creating a Disability Rights Commission fit for the 21st Century", was held last year.

Seven thousand individuals and organisations were sent a copy of the White Paper or a summary of it. Out of 626 responses, 94 per cent. supported the main proposals on the establishment and role of the Commission. An analysis of responses compiled by an independent market research organisation has been placed in the Library. The report is available in a range of alternative formats on request.

Five national consultation conferences on the White Paper held in September 1998 were attended by over 300 delegates from the business, public and voluntary sectors. The views of the delegates are also reflected in the report.

Literacy

Mr. Rammell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what provisions the National Curriculum contains to ensure the teaching of literacy in primary schools. [85427]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have successfully introduced the National Literacy Strategy, which includes a literacy hour for all primary school pupils. Under the national curriculum review proposals, the English programmes of study have been aligned with the National Literacy Strategy "Framework for teaching" so that they support it fully.

Head Teachers

Mr. David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what steps his Department has taken to support and train headteachers. [85391]

Ms Estelle Morris: The contribution of the head is pivotal in leading schools to excellence and we are committed to helping all headteachers to develop the skills and knowledge they need. We are investing £100 million over the next three years to ensure heads have access to high quality, practical and professional training at every stage of their careers. As set out in the Green Paper, "teachers: meeting the challenge of change", we will build on the existing headship training programmes to develop a new national framework of training and development opportunities. Already, some 400 teachers have achieved the National Professional Qualification for Headship and some 6,000 are now in training. We are developing further the NPQH to build on the strengths of the qualification before making it a mandatory requirement for all those coming new to headship. The Green Paper also set out our intention to establish a National College for School Leadership. On 2 June we published our prospectus for the college, which will be a driving force for world-class leadership in schools, providing professional support for heads through cutting-edge training and development opportunities. Responsibility for designing and overseeing the existing headship programmes will move to the national college when it is established in 2000.

Cycling to School

Mr. Lock: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what funds his Department has allocated in the current and next two financial years to support cycling to school. [85392]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We have made over £100,000 available this financial year to support safer routes—including cycling—to school. We will be considering the case for further funding in the next two financial years.

Community Computer Centres

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when the national body to deliver community computer centres will be established. [85411]

Mr. Charles Clarke: We are in the process of establishing a co-ordinating group to steer this important initiative and to advise my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Education and Employment and the Chief Secretary to the Treasury. An announcement will be made before the summer and I expect the first learning centres to be established this year, but I can say that the group will have a broad range of members unpaid, including both Government officials and individuals with experience in the private sector.

Further Education

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will make a statement on recent developments in Government action to widen participation in further education. [85425]

Mr. Mudie: We are committed to widening participation in further education and have taken action to achieve this.

We have secured an excellent financial settlement for further education which will enable significant progress to be made towards securing an extra 700,000 students in further education in 2001–02 compared to 1997–98. This expansion is principally focused on widening participation to those who have not traditionally taken advantage of learning opportunities. We have also announced a new Further Education Student Support package, targeted at those most in need, which will come into force from September.

The introduction of the University for Industry and Individual Learning Accounts, from next year, will both assist in removing barriers to learning and widening participation in further education.

New Deal (North-West)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment how many people in the North West have been through the New Deal since its commencement. [85428]

Mr. Andrew Smith: The latest Government Statistical Service figures to the end of March 1999 show that 37,790 young people, in the Employment Service North West region, have joined the New Deal for young people since it started in the first Pathfinder areas in January 1998. Of these 17,800 have left, leaving 19,900 still participating at some stage of the New Deal process.

Schools (Disabled Access)

Mr. Gareth R. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what support has been given to schools to enable them to become accessible to those with disabilities. [85429]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Schools Access Initiative gives capital support to make more mainstream schools accessible to disabled pupils and those with sensory impairments. It has run each year since 1996 and a total of £25 million had been allocated by March 1999. A further £100 million has been earmarked over the next three years.

PRIME MINISTER

Macedonia

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister what undertakings were given to the Government of Macedonia during his recent visit to Macedonia, with respect to (a) levels of aid from the United Kingdom, (b) the willingness of the United Kingdom to accept refugees from Macedonia, (c) assistance and the speed of delivery of assistance from the European Union and (d) help from international financial institutions; and what progress has been made in fulfilling these undertakings. [84788]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 24 May 1999]: During my visit to Macedonia, I gave the following undertakings to the Government of Macedonia:

(a) The UK would allocate an additional £20 million for humanitarian assistance to the refugees in the region, including Macedonia, making a total of £40 million since the crisis started. £14.5 million of the additional £20 million has now been committed. I also promised £5 million of technical assistance to Macedonia to increase the capacity of the Government to absorb international assistance and to carry out reform. The Department for International Development is in the process of identifying suitable projects.

(b) I made clear to the Government of Macedonia that the UK was willing to accept refugees from Macedonia provided that they were properly selected by the UNHCR. The Government have since accelerated the arrival of refugees from the region and has now taken 2,782 people.

(c) I promised the Macedonian Government to press for the European Union to disperse the 25 million euro of budgetary assistance as soon as possible. I spoke subsequently to the President of the Commission to make sure that this happened. The first instalment was paid by the European Commission on 12 May, the second instalment will be released on 1 July and the third on 15 October. The European Commission has also provided technical assistance to the Macedonian Treasury to help them to disburse these funds through the budget.

(d) On my return from Macedonia, I also spoke to the Managing Director of the IMF in advance of the Donor Conference on assistance to Macedonia on 5 May. I asked that the IMF and other international financial institutions should speed up their support for Macedonia. At the Donor Conference, the international community, including the international financial institutions, pledged $252 million in financial assistance to Macedonia.

Post-16 Training and Education

Mr. Green: To ask the Prime Minister when he received a report from the Department for Education and Employment on the review of post-16 training and education. [85723]

The Prime Minister: As is the case for any aspect of developing government policy, my office has received regular reports on the progress of the Review, and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Employment will be making an announcement about our proposals in due course.

Weapons

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what is his policy on the use of depleted uranium and cluster bombs by British forces; and if he will make a statement. [85351]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 9 June 1999]: It is our policy to use cluster bombs in circumstances where there is a military requirement to do so, and our normal criteria for minimising collateral damage can be satisfied. Cluster bombs are the most effective weapon available against concentrations of armoured and soft-skinned vehicles, artillery, anti-aircraft artillery or fielded forces. In the current conflict in the Balkans, cluster bombs are being used against specific, identified military targets and a high level of accuracy is being achieved.

Depleted uranium weapons are not weapons of mass and indiscriminate destruction. They are ammunition designed specifically to penetrate tank armour on the battlefield and do not have effects on the wider population. Their use is not prohibited under any international agreements, including the Geneva Conventions.

DU-based ammunition have not been used by UK forces during military operations against Iraq since the 1990–1991 Gulf conflict; neither have they been used by UK forces in recent operations in the Balkans. Nevertheless, if the operational situation and the safety of UK troops required such a capability, DU-based ammunition would be deployed and used.

Correspondence

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Prime Minister if he will place a copy of the letter sent from his chief of staff to the leader of the Ulster Unionist Party on Monday 17 May in the Library. [86138]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 9 June 1999]: It is not the normal practice of Government to publish communications sent in confidence, in line with paragraph 2 of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

President Clinton

Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 17 May 1999, Official Report, column 267, on meetings with President Clinton, how many meetings he held with members and officials of the United States Government during his visit of 21 to 25 April; and if he will list the dates and locations of each meeting, and the names of the members and officials of the United States Government at each meeting. [86297]

The Prime Minister: During my visit to the United States of America in April, I met President Clinton on a number of occasions, both privately and during sessions of the NATO Summit.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CD-ROM (Official Report)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee when hon. Members will receive the CD-ROM version of the Official Report for the 1997–98 Parliamentary Session, and what plans he has to reduce the time taken to prepare the CD-ROM. [86397]

Mr. Allan: The final disc of the CD-ROM of the Official Report for the 1997–98 Parliamentary Session covering the whole of the Session 1997–98 was published on 10 June 1999.

Hansard in CD-ROM is not produced under the direction of the Authorities of the House and, therefore, the time taken to prepare the CD-ROM is a matter for the commercial judgment of the companies involved.

Expenses Claims

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee if his Committee will investigate the feasibility of allowing hon. Members to submit electronically expenses claims and other standard forms to the House authorities. [86398]

Mr. Allan: The Department of Finance and Administration (the Fees Office and the Finance Office) are actively looking at a number of options, following the results of the Members' survey in January, for making services more accessible to Members, including the submission of claims electronically. There are a number of factors—costs, technical and security issues—to be considered and resolved before it can be established whether such an arrangement could be introduced.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Domestic Violence

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the likely impact on domestic violence statistics of the change of definition which has been issued to police forces. [85918]

Mr. Boateng: The previous definition was being interpreted in a number of different ways. A new definition was necessary in order to bring about more precise, consistent and comparable returns to Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary so as to give more accurate knowledge of the number of incidents of violence between current or former partners that are reported to the police.

Because of the range of interpretations given to the existing definition, it is not easy to gauge the exact result of the change. For some forces, the new definition may not represent a significant change. For others, the new definition will narrow the interpretation which they have been using, with the result that they will probably record slightly fewer domestic violence incidents.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Rowlands: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in his Department and its associated bodies and agencies have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage. [86098]

Mr. Straw: 105 people have benefited from the introduction of a national minimum wage.

Sir Roger Casement

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what is the nature of the files relating to the black diaries allegedly written by Sir Roger Casement which have yet to be released into the public domain; [86153]

(2) what representations he has received from the Irish Prime Minister regarding the black diaries allegedly written by Sir Roger Casement; and what plans he has to release further documents at his request. [86225]

Mr. Straw: All Home Office records relating to Roger Casement are open to public inspection at the Public Record Office. No representations have been received from the Irish Prime Minister regarding the Casement diaries.

Asylum and Immigration Appeals

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish the number of (1) new instructions and (2) disposals in (a) asylum and (b) immigration appeals undertaken by (i) the Immigration Advisory Service and (ii) the Refugee Legal Centre for 1997–98 and the number of appeals in both categories disposed of by the Immigration Appellate Authority in the same period together with the unit cost in both categories. [70755]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [pursuant to his reply, 22 February 1999, c. 104]: The information requested is shown in the table.

It should be noted that the figures for the Refugee Legal Centre (RLC) and the Immigration Advisory Service (IAS) are based on outcomes (those cases in which the appeal has been disposed of) rather than outputs (those cases in which representation has been provided, but the appeal may or may not have finally been disposed). The number of cases dealt with by the RLC based on outputs is 8,154. The IAS do not have any comparable statistical information on outputs.

1997–98

	New instructions		Appeals disposed of
	Asylum	Immigration	Asylum	Immigration	Unit cost £
Refugee Legal Centre	6,123	—	4,454	—	796.38
Immigration Advisory Service	3,020	4,667	1,279	3,536	[1]640.89
Immigration Appellate Authority	—	—	[2]18,600	[2]11,200	—

[1] Overall unit cost for asylum and immigration cases
[2] Both rounded to the nearest 00

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Slaughtering Industry

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list (a) the organisations currently consulted by his Ministry on the impact of proposed charges on the slaughtering industry and (b) other organisations which have made representations to his Ministry on this issue, or have been consulted on it, since May 1997. [84077]

Mr. Rooker [holding answer 14 May 1999]: The information requested by the hon. Member has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Agriculture Council

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list those areas (a) he will raise and (b) he expects other member states will raise at the forthcoming Agriculture Council meeting on 30 May to 1 June. [85636]

Mr. Nick Brown: The meeting scheduled for 30 May to 1 June in Dresden is an informal meeting of EU Agriculture Ministers. As is usual for such meetings, there is no formal agenda and no official documents will be discussed. The only item scheduled for discussion is a German Presidency Paper on "Sustainable Rural Development: Agricultural Structure Policy for Rural Areas".

Genetically Modified Feed

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans he has to improve the labelling of animal feedstuffs that may contain genetically modified ingredients. [86131]

Mr. Nick Brown [holding answer 8 June 1999]: The Government are pressing the Commission to forward to the Council its proposed Regulation covering novel animal feeds. This is necessary to ensure fair and consistent labelling in the EU. We are exploring whether national labelling arrangements are feasible pending the introduction of EC measures.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 11 June 1999

ENVIRONMENT, TRANSPORT AND THE REGIONS

Coastguard

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions on how many occasions in the period January to April 1999 staffing levels at the Coastguard stations at (i) Oban, (ii) Liverpool, (iii) Belfast and (iv) Stornoway were maintained by the use of unqualified or partly-qualified staff. [85838]

Ms Glenda Jackson [holding answer 8 June 1999]:

	Oban	Liverpool	Belfast	Stornoway
Unqualified
12 hour watch	0	4	0	0
Partly Qualified
12 hour watch	0	93	60	116
6 hour watch	0	6	5	0

Recruits who have yet to qualify in their grade are able to perform certain tasks on watch almost immediately but under the supervision of a watch manager. Watch managers are encouraged to involve new recruits in watchkeeping tasks as much as possible.

Partly Qualified Officers are those who after their initial training have demonstrated their ability to their line management to undertake certain tasks appropriate to their grade, thus enabling them to become part of a Watch. Initial training is followed by further on the job training which take place at their parent station. This on the job training as part of the Watch, or as a supernumerary, is essential preparation for an officer's final proficiency examinations for qualification to their grade.

Bus Companies

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions if he will list for each of the 17 municipally owned bus companies their (a) annual turnover, (b) passenger revenues, (c) pre-tax profit or loss, (d) numbers of staff and (e) numbers of vehicles operated. [86666]

Ms Glenda Jackson: Under the Transport Act 1985 the local authority-owned bus companies were set up as Companies Act companies working at arms length from their owners. As the details required by the Companies Acts are lodged at Companies House, my Department does not collect the data requested.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what proposals he has to change his departmental expenditure limits and running costs limits for 1999–2000. [86984]

Mr. Prescott: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimates, my departmental expenditure limits will change as follows.

The voted Local Government Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £3,900,000, increasing the overall limit from £34,207,667,000 to £34,211,567,000. This increase reflects revised estimates of the costs of preparing for the Greater London Authority. The increase will be offset by a corresponding reduction in the Department's Main Programmes Departmental Expenditure Limit from £9,696,757,000 to £9,692,857,000.

Greater London Authority

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what steps he is taking to provide the Greater London Authority with accommodation and administrative support. [86985]

Mr. Raynsford: I announced on 26 February plans for a new building for the headquarters of the Greater London Authority (GLA) at London Bridge City. Design and contractual issues are being finalised, and I anticipate the building being ready for occupation towards the end of 2001.

To house the GLA before the new building is ready, my Department is arranging temporary office accommodation at Romney House, Marsham Street, London SW1, which should be ready for occupation by staff preparing for the GLA by the end of 1999.

The GLA will assume its responsibilities on 3 July 2000, eight weeks after the elections, and work therefore needs to be put in hand now to establish finance and other systems and to ensure that appropriate administrative machinery is in place. I announced on 31 March that Dr. Bob Chilton would be seconded from the Audit Commission to be Head of Transition: he took up his duties on 19 April, and will work closely with my officials to take this work forward.

My Department has earmarked £30 million from within existing budgets over the four years 1998–99 to 2001–02 to meet GLA preparation costs. This will cover the anticipated cost of fitting out, furnishing and equipping the new building, including professional and other specialist advice; providing temporary accommodation for the GLA; accommodating and equipping the transition team; and setting up new financial, management and communication systems for the GLA. This compares to an initial provision of £20 million, which was largely to cover the cost of providing a new building. I will provide more detailed estimates when commercial negotiations have been completed, and will report actual expenditure totals periodically.

Separate provision is being made to cover the cost of the first elections to the GLA, including publicity, and establishing Transport for London and the London Development Agency. A separate announcement is being made about a loan from the Contingencies Fund in relation to some of these costs. The arrangements for establishing the Metropolitan Police Authority and the London Fire and Emergency Planning Authority are matters for the Home Secretary.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what statutory authority exists for costs to be incurred by him in 1999–2000 in preparation for the establishment of the Greater London Authority and its functional and other associated bodies. [86986]

Mr. Raynsford: Further to the answer I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Battersea (Mr. Linton) on 2 February 1999, Official Report, column 568, pending Parliamentary approval, urgent expenditure on new services for the bodies other than the Greater London Authority in 1999–2000 estimated at £4.7 million will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

Sellafield

Mr. Eric Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, Transport and the Regions what progress he has made in his consideration of the draft decisions submitted to him by the Environment Agency on Sellafield MOX plant. [85629]

Mr. Prescott: The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I have looked very carefully at the recommendations made by the Environment Agency about the justification for the MOX plant. We have also examined the representations made to us about the plant. Our provisional conclusion is that the balance of the argument so far is in favour of justification. However, we have also come to the conclusion that there should be further consultations on the economic case for the plant. We were concerned that the version of the report by PA Consulting on the economic case for the plant, which had been published by the Agency in January last year, did not contain as much information as the public could reasonably expect to see. We have therefore decided to publish a fuller version of the report. We accept, however, that some material contained in the report is commercially confidential and cannot be published without potentially harming BNFL's commercial interests. This information has been omitted from the version we are publishing.

In view of the time that has passed since PA Consulting completed their report, we decided to commission from BNFL an up-to-date assessment of the market for MOX fuel. This assessment is also being published. Comments are being invited on this material by 23 July after which we shall take a final decision on the full operation of the plant.

While this consultation is under way, and given our view that the balance of the argument currently favours justification we have concluded that it would be right for BNFL to be allowed to proceed with the uranium commissioning of the plant. We concluded that it would be right to allow this before final conclusions are reached about whether to give the go-ahead for the full operation of the plant. This would enable BNFL to begin testing the plant before the introduction of plutonium. In this way, if the plant is eventually given the go-ahead, the delays in running the plant commercially would be minimised. If, after the consultation exercise we decide that full operation is not justified, the process would be halted and uranium removed from the plant. The costs of removal, estimated at £2 million, would be met by BNFL.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

MOX Fuel Shipment (Japan)

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if the conclusions of the Environment Agency on plutonium extraction from MOX fuel were assessed by his Department when determining the security measures necessary for the shipping of MOX fuel to Japan. [86740]

Mr. Battle: The physical protection measures necessary for the shipping of MOX fuel to Japan are based on the recommendations of the International Atomic Energy Agency concerned with the movement of all Category I nuclear materials.

Telecoms Data Protection Directive

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he expects to be able to make available draft regulations implementing the EC Telecoms Data Protection Directive (97/66/EC). [87025]

Mr. Wills: I have placed copies of the draft regulations in the Library of the House and these are also available in the Vote office. I am also making the draft Regulations available on the DTI Website at: www.dti.gov.uk/cii/tdpd/regs2/index.htm

Offer and Ofgas

Gillian Merron: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what changes will be made to the cash and running costs limits for the Office of Electricity Regulation and the Office for Gas Regulation. [87026]

Mr. Byers: Offer: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary revised Estimate, the running cost limit will be increased by £10,100,000 from £18,100,000 to £28,200,000.

This increase reflects the additional resources required by the Director General of Electricity Supply for the funding of the Review of Electricity Trading Arrangements (RETA) project (£11,200,000) and an accounting adjustment in respect of VAT receipts for contracted out services (£1,100,000). The increase will be offset by additional receipts and will not therefore add to the planned total of public expenditure.

Ofgas: The running cost limit for Class IX Vote 9—the Office of Gas Regulation—will be decreased by £938,000 from £12,938,000 to £12,000,000. This decrease reflects an accounting adjustment in respect of VAT receipts for contracted out services.

Small Business

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research his Department has conducted into the awareness of Business Support services among small business owners. [86668]

Mr. Wills: DTI commissioned MORI to undertake five surveys of tracking research between 1994 and 1997 on awareness of Business Support services, including Business Link. The most recent survey was in September 1997. Each survey involved a national telephone survey of a random sample of directors of businesses with between 10 and 200 employees in England, with a smaller sample of businesses with between five and nine employees for comparison. Research on awareness of Business Support services has also been carried out before and after national marketing campaign exercises for Business Link.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate he has made of the costs to small businesses of the change of telephone codes; and what related discussions he has had with Oftel. [86669]

Mr. Wills: The administration of the National Numbering Scheme is a matter for Oftel. Oftel has not carried out any specific research into the costs to small businesses relating to changes to telephone codes. The changes to geographic codes were made in response to the views of consumers and businesses following "Phoneday" in 1995 in order to meet additional demands for numbers. In order to minimise the costs to businesses Oftel has given long periods of notice of changes, put in place parallel running for old and new numbers and "changed number" announcements. This enables businesses to plan for the future. Oftel has consulted extensively on changes to numbering arrangements and Oftel has kept my officials fully informed.

Business Links

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was the total expenditure of Business Links in each of the last three financial years; and what proportion of that was on (a) salaries and (b) administration. [86636]

Mr. Wills: Business Links are private, independent organisations and the Department does not collect statistics on the total expenditure of Business Links or individual elements of it.

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what was his Department's total expenditure on Business Links in (a) 1997–98 and (b) 1998–99; and what expenditure is planned for 1999–2000. [86638]

Mr. Wills: The total amount of funding provided for the Business Link programme by the Department in the periods 1997–98 and 1998–99 were £129.2 million and £121.1 million respectively. For 1999–2000 the Department has earmarked £139 million for Business Link programme funding, which includes an element of funding specifically for developing services of the new Small Business Service.

Gas Suppliers

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has received concerning customers complaining that their gas supplier has been changed without their consent; what gas suppliers have been disciplined by Ofgas owing to their conduct in transferring customer accounts; and if he will make a statement. [85714]

Mr. Battle: The Department has received a number of representations from consumers complaining about the involuntary transfer of their gas supply. I have great sympathy for consumers who have experienced difficulties in this respect, and understand the worry and inconvenience that such occurrences can cause. I have asked my officials to work with Ofgas and the Gas Consumers Council to root out the causes of the problems and identify areas for action to tackle them urgently.

I am determined that the industry should have in place systems which work effectively and consistently to transfer customers from existing to new suppliers without error and that these should be properly regulated. The Office of Gas Supply continually monitors industry performance and should pursue rigorously any instances of failure with the companies concerned. Action has been taken by Ofgas under both the Competition Act 1980 and the Gas Act 1986 against a number of companies to secure a commitment to improve standards of performance. I have asked the Director General for an update on the situation and on the action he has in hand.

Company Directors (Insolvencies)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what statutory provisions regulate the ability of directors of companies which have become insolvent starting up in a similar line of business with a new company; what changes he is planning to introduce; and if he will make a statement. [86414]

Dr. Howells: A Director's involvement with a company which has become insolvent does not, of itself, preclude his or her from being a Director of a new company unless:

(a) contrary to the provisions of S216 of the Insolvency Act 1986, it has the same or a similar name to the company which failed;

or

(b) the director has been disqualified from so acting under the Companies Directors Disqualification Act 1986.

When Parliamentary time allows we plan to introduce legislation to improve the efficiency and effectiveness of the procedure for disqualifying unfit company directors. There are no plans to make any other change in this area.

Genetically Modified Crops

Joan Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what advice he has received about the use of genetically modified crops in the production of cosmetics and perfumes with respect to (a) skin allergies and (b) treatments of skin complaints by antibiotics. [86671]

Dr. Howells: We have not received advice in relation to genetically modified crops and the production of cosmetics and perfumes. The number of cosmetic ingredients which may be derived from GMOs is estimated to be less than 1 per cent. However, we are supportive of the moves proposed by the European Commission Scientific Steering Committee to develop harmonised guidelines for Genetically Modified Organism (GMO) risk assessments for cosmetic products.

CABINET OFFICE

Correspondence

Gillian Merron: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will publish the latest figures showing the volume of correspondence received by Ministers and Agency Chief Executives from hon. Members, the targets set for reply, and the percentage of replies sent within targets. [87028]

Dr. Jack Cunningham: The 1998 correspondence figures are set out in the following table. The table also sets out the figures for 1997, first published on 31 July 1998, Official Report, columns 643–46. Members' attention is drawn to the footnotes which accompany the table and which provide general background information on how totals have been calculated.

Correspondence from Members of Parliament to Ministers and Agency Chief Executives

Department or Agency	1997 Target set for reply (working days)	1997 Number of letters received	1997 Percentage of replies within target	1998 Target set for reply (working days)	1998 Number of letters received	1998 Percentage of replies within target
Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food	15	7,423	76	15	[8]8,058	57
Cabinet Office	15	341	96	15	292	96
Crown Prosecution Service	15	39	85	15	[9]66	88
Department for Culture, Media and Sport	18	2,939	78	18	3,387	86
HM Customs and Excise	18	4,291	20	18	[10]4,439	16
Ministry of Defence	15	4,719	65	15	[11]5,619	53
Army Base Repair Organisation	—	—	—	15	11	100
Army Personnel Centre	15	19	64	15	43	96
Defence Evaluation and Research Agency	12	27	93	15	42	79
Naval Recruiting and Training Agency	—	—	—	15	29	100
Department for International Development	15	2,994	89	15	2,613	91
Department for Education and Employment	15	22,460	71	15	[12]19,766	70
Employment Service	15	1,837	93	15	630	92
Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions	15	31,798	58	15	[13]38,059	51
DVLA	7	299	96	7	453	99
Driving Standards Agency	15	194	78	15	108	85
Highways Agency	12	468	71	15	480	83
Marine and Coastguard Agency	15	25	100	15	[14]21	100
Planning Inspectorate	8	296	94	8	[15]286	87
Vehicle Inspectorate	15	24	96	15	20	100
Foreign and Commonwealth Office	7	8,735	95	7	[16]10,040	85
Department of Health	20	14,547	76	20	[17]10,648	61
NHS Pensions Agency	15	78	76	15	42	74
Medicines Control Agency	—	—	—	10	37	73
Home Office	15	16,831	20	15	17,875	32
	20	1,175	22	20	[18]875	52
HM Prison Service	15	2,702	61	[19]20	2,400	69
UK Passport Agency	10	101	97	[20]10	181	96
Inland Revenue	18	3,323	40	18	[21]6,305	20
	23	375	79	23	[22]193	100
Valuation Office	23	74	31	23	47	36
Legal Secretariat to the Law Officers	15	301	88	15	[23]291	80
Lord Chancellor's Department	20	1,884	76	20	2,672	78
Court Service	20	1,391	99	20	[24]1,230	99
HM Land Registry	20	37	100	20	36	100
Public Trust Office	15	65	98	15	63	98
Northern Ireland Office (including Northern Ireland Departments)	10	2,163	59	10	2,001	70
Child Support Agency	10	144	67	10	104	87
Compensation Agency	—	—	—	7	25	100
Northern Ireland Prison Service	10	48	92	10	35	66
Planning Service	15	78	77	10	62	74
Rate Collection Agency	5	12	92	5	10	90
Rivers Agency	15	13	85	15	32	97
Road Service	15	23	87	10	35	97
Social Security Agency	10	94	78	10	70	93
Water Service	15	37	92	10	48	85
Office for National Statistics	10	269	92	10	[25]679	88
President of the Council's Office	15	102	91	15	230	88
The Scottish Office	17	4,722	65	17	5,650	60
Historic Scotland	17	23	91	17	36	100
Scottish Courts Service	17	11	82	17	17	97
Scottish Office Pensions Agency	17	38	97	17	45	100
Scottish Prison Service	17	145	97	17	119	95
Student Awards Agency for Scotland	17	240	70	17	112	50
Department of Social Security	20	17,585	51	20	19,330	31
Benefits Agency	20	3,314	89	20	2,797	56
Child Support Agency	20	8,182	99	20	8,365	100
Contributions Agency	20	338	89	20	280	37
War Pensions Agency	20	693	99	20	529	98

Correspondence from Members of Parliament to Ministers and Agency Chief Executives

Department or Agency	1997 Target set for reply (working days)	1997 Number of letters received	1997 Percentage of replies within target	1998 Target set for reply (working days)	1998 Number of letters received	1998 Percentage of replies within target
Department of Trade and Industry	10	19,459	61	10	[iii]22,193	50
Companies House	10	41	100	10	38	100
Employment Tribunal Service	—	—	—	10	78	90
Insolvency Service	10	27	100	10	19	100
Radiocommunications Agency	10	27	96	10	15	100
HM Treasury	15	4,553	54	15	[iii]7,086	37
Treasury Solicitor's Department	15	39	100	15	[viii]44	98
Welsh Office	15	2,998	75	15	3,913	71
CADW (Welsh Historic Monuments)	12	65	83	10	38	97

Notes on 1998 Figures[19]

[i] Includes correspondence for the Intervention Board.
[ii] Includes those letters addressed to the Law Officers but subsequently replied to by the Director of Public Prosecutions, excluding letters addressed to the DPP.
[iii] Includes all Ministerial replies, not only replies to Members of Parliament.
[iv] Includes 940 letters where Agency Chief Executives replied on Ministers' behalf. Interim replies are not included in the overall performance.
[v] 67 per cent. of letters were replied to within 20 working days.
[vi] Figures from 1 April 1998–31 December 1998.
[vii] Includes 56 cases relating to Wales.
[viii] In addition, the FCO's migration and visa department received 9,453 letters direct from MP's in 1998, of which 47 per cent. were replied to within 15 working days.
[ix] 1997 and 1998 figures are not directly comparable, as a new data system now provides figures relating to letters received from MPs only
[x] Prison Service Director General cases which includes correspondence that Ministers passed on to be answered under delegated arrangements.
[xi] UKPA Chief Executive cases.
[xii] Includes letters for HM Prison Service where Ministers replied.
[xiii] Head Office figures.
[xiv] Local Office and "delegated" figures (where local officials reply direct to MPs).
[xv] This figure excludes letters which were subsequently replied to by the Director of Public Prosecutions.
[xvi] Includes letters where correspondence has been received direct to the Chief Executive or transferred to the Chief Executive for reply.
[xvii] Includes 579 letters where the Chief Executive replied on Ministers' behalf.
[xviii] Includes 13 letters where the Chief Executive replied on Ministers' behalf.
[19] The 1997 figures are taken from the Official Report, 31 July 1998, columns 643–46. Please also refer to the notes given with that reply. Departments and Agencies which received a total of between 1 and 10 letters from MPs during 1998 are not shown in this table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Staff Pay Settlement

Mr. Pike: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission, when the 1999 pay settlement for House of Commons staff will be implemented; and if he will make a statement. [85971]

Mr. Kirkwood: There are four groups of House of Commons staff covered by separate pay settlements each year. They are the Senior Commons Staff (SCS), the Main Structure Staff (Pay Bands A to E), the Refreshment Department Catering Staff and the Works Directorate Craft Staff.

The pay of the Senior Commons Staff is kept in line with that of the Senior Civil Service. The Government accepted the recommendations of the Senior Salaries Review Body in February and the recommended increases have been implemented with effect from 1 April 1999.

The negotiations with the unions recognised to represent staff in Pay Bands A to E started in April 1999 and are continuing.

The negotiations with the unions representing staff in the Craft and Catering pay bands are expected to start towards the end of June.

The implementation date for all the settlements is 1 April 1999.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Personal Documents (Confiscation)

Mr. Rendel: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the powers he has to confiscate (a) passports, (b) national insurance cards and (c) driving licences. [86665]

Mr. Timms: The Secretary of State for Social Security has no express powers to confiscate passports, national insurance cards or driving licences. However, these documents remain the property of Her Majesty's Government. If the Secretary of State has concerns that such a document may be forged, altered or stolen, he may retain it. A receipt is issued and the appropriate authority notified.

PRIME MINISTER

Debt Burden

Dr. Cable: To ask the Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the likely progress at the forthcoming G7 Summit in reducing the debt burden of the poorest countries; and if he will make a statement. [85724]

The Prime Minister: At the G8 Summit in Cologne next weekend I will be taking forward the UK's proposals for faster, deeper and wider debt relief to the world's poorest countries.

Kosovo and Serbia (Ground Invasion)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the Government's policy on a ground invasion of (a) Kosovo and (b) Serbia. [85897]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 June 1999]: There is now evidence that the Yugoslav authorities are complying with the demands of the international community. My hon. Friend will be aware that following confirmation of the start of the withdrawal of Yugoslav forces from Kosovo, the NATO Secretary General ordered the suspension of the bombing campaign. An international peacekeeping force in which British troops will be at the forefront will be deployed within the timescale agreed between General Jackson and Serb military commanders on 9 June. Until this withdrawal is complete, however, we must continue to exercise caution and to keep all other options under review.

Ethnic Hungarians

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his discussions with the Prime Minister of Hungary in relation to the safety of the ethnic Hungarians living in northern Yugoslavia, and on the concerns of the Hungarian Prime Minister about the threat to ethnic Hungarians from Serbian military forces and paramilitaries positioned near their homes. [85900]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 8 June 1999]: I met the Hungarian Prime Minister in Downing Street on 15 April. We discussed the situation of the ethnic Hungarian community in Vojvodina. Mr. Orban said that a substantial number of ethnic Hungarians had left the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in recent years for Hungary. He expressed concern that the rights of the ethnic Hungarians in Vojvodina were inadequate and that the authorities of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia had deliberately resettled Serb refugees in areas which hitherto had an ethnic Hungarian majority.

I reaffirmed the United Kingdom's support for the democratisation of the whole of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia as the best way to safeguard the rights of all its citizens.

Quarantine

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the representations he received regarding the quarantine of the pet dog of William Dowell. [86630]

The Prime Minister: In addition to letters from William Dowell and his family, my office has received four letters on this subject, all from France.

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to abolish quarantine for animals entering the United Kingdom. [86631]

The Prime Minister: On 26 March, the Government announced that they were going to reform the quarantine laws in the UK. A pilot scheme is being developed for introduction as soon as possible and the main scheme will be in place by April 2001.

Council of Europe

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what the Government's policy is towards the development of the Council of Europe. [86645]

The Prime Minister: The Government support the development of the Council of Europe as a key institution for the promotion of the values of human rights, democracy and the rule of law throughout Europe, and for the strengthening of the political, legal, social and cultural cohesion of the continent.

The enlargement of the Council of Europe's membership to include the new democracies of Eastern Europe has given it a central role in European unification. The Government believe that to take forward this role it is essential that the Council re-affirm its structures and redefine its priorities to be able to act more effectively as a force for democratic stability. The Government therefore strongly support the recommendations of the report adopted by Ministers in Budapest in May. We want to see a strong and energetic and effective Council of Europe ready to face the new millennium.

Parliamentary Answers

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Prime Minister what were the reasons for the time taken in providing a full answer to the question of the hon. Member for South Holland and The Deepings (Mr. Hayes) of 20 May 1999, Official Report, column 403. [86716]

The Prime Minister: The hon. Member's question—which asked for the figures showing that the Labour Party represents more rural constituencies than any other party—was due for answer on Tuesday 18 May and I gave a full reply two days later. The delay was due to the fact that on Monday 17 and Tuesday 18 May, I was in Bulgaria and Albania visiting British troops and meeting Kosovar refugees and the leaders of these frontline states.

Holocaust Remembrance Day

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Prime Minister what plans the Government have to introduce a Holocaust Remembrance day; and if he will make a statement. [86654]

The Prime Minister: I am determined to ensure that the horrendous crimes against humanity committed during the Holocaust are never forgotten. The ethnic cleansing and killing that has taken place in Europe in recent weeks are a stark example of the need for vigilance.

The Government are considering a proposal for a Holocaust Remembrance Day and I have asked my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to consult widely about this.

TREASURY

Inland Revenue

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes are proposed to the Inland Revenue Departmental Expenditure Limit for 1999–2000. [87027]

Dawn Primarolo: There are no plans to change the overall Departmental Expenditure Limit of the Inland Revenue. However, subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Supplementary Estimate for Class XVI, Vote 4, the Voted element of the Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £46,319,000 from £1,836,316,000 to £1,882,635,000 to reflect the costs of administering working families tax credits and disabled persons tax credits from October 1999. The increase will be offset by a matching reduction in the non-voted element from £34,910,000 to -£11,409,000 reflecting the take-up of retained provision.

The Supplementary Estimate is subject to the passage of the Tax Credits Bill which has been laid before Parliament. The provision will not be used until the enabling legislation has been enacted or, in the event of the legislation not passing into law, further authority has been obtained from Parliament.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Mr. and Mrs. Adams

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to persuade the Florida State Prosecutor to drop all charges of child abuse against Mr. and Mrs. Adams of Harrogate and obtain an apology for the way they were treated at St. Petersburg Beach, Florida. [86678]

Mr. Hoon: The Government do not intervene in the judicial process of another sovereign country. This is a matter for Mr. and Mrs. Adam's lawyer. The family should address any complaints that they have about their treatment to the US authorities. They have been provided with the contact details.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 27 April, ref. GU10051886. [86401]

Mr. Hoon: My noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs wrote to my hon. Friend today.

MOX Fuel Shipments

Mr. Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to him by Caribbean states over the proposed shipment of MOX fuel to Japan. [86739]

Mr. Hoon: I am aware of the interest of Caribbean states on this issue, which the Government take very seriously.

I have received a letter from the High Commissioner of the Bahamas on behalf of his Commonwealth Caribbean colleagues requesting a meeting to discuss this issue. Arrangements are in hand to hold such a meeting.

China

Ann Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the membership and functions of the United Kingdom/China Forum. [85835]

Mr. Hoon: The UK/China Forum is a non-governmental organisation of senior British and Chinese individuals from the worlds of politics, business, administration, academia, the media and the arts, whose purpose is to promote contacts at all levels between Britain and China and develop initiatives to build stronger links in areas where better contact will bring mutual benefit to both sides. The Forum will meet yearly.

The British members of the Forum are:

Right hon. Michael Heseltine PC MP, Chairman; Dr. Chris Gamble (Director, Royal Institute of International Affairs), Executive Chair; Professor David Wall (Head, Asia Programme, Royal Institute of International Affairs), Secretary General; Mr. David Brewer (Chairman, Great Britain China Centre and Chairman, British Invisibles); Sir Charles Powell (President, China Britain Business Council); Sir Len Appleyard (Vice Chairman, Barclays Capital); Mr. Martin Broughton (Chairman, Chatham House China Task Force); Mr. Ben Chapman MP (Chairman, All-Party Parliamentary Group on China); Sir William Purves; Sir Patrick Gillam (Chairman, Standard Chartered Bank); Mr. Bob Mendelsohn (Group Chief Executive, Royal and Sun Alliance); Mr. Win Bischoff (Chairman, J. H. Schroder and Co. Ltd.); Sir John Jennings; Sir Ralph Robins (Chairman, Rolls Royce); Mr. Niall Fitzgerald (Chairman, Unilever); Mr. David John (Chairman, BOC); Baroness Kennedy (Chair, British Council); Lord Puttnam (Chairman, Enigma Productions); Sir Crispin Tickell; Mr. Giles Henderson (Senior Partner, Slaughter and May) and Mr. Richard Lambert (Editor, Financial Times).

The Chinese members of the Forum are:

Mr. Song Jian (Vice Chairman, Chinese People's Political Consultative Conference), Chairman; Mr. Mei Zhaorong (President, People's Institute of Foreign Affairs), Executive Chairman; Mr. Xin Futan (Vice President, People's Institute of Foreign Affairs), Secretary General; Mr. Yao Zhenyan (Chairman, China-UK Group, National People's Congress); Mr. Qu Geping (Chairman, Environmental Protection Committee, National People's Congress); Mr. Xie Anshan (Member, National People's Congress Standing Committee and Legal Committee); Mr. Chen Yuan (Governor, State Development Bank); Mr. Wang Xuebing (Governor, Bank of China); Mr. Wu Chunhe (Editor-in-Chief, Economic Daily); Mr. Wang Jiming (Vice President, China Petrochemical Group); Mr. Tu Guangshao (General Manager, Shanghai Stock Exchange); Mr. Chen Zhongbiao (Chairman, China Overseas Shipping Company Group); Mr. Feng Xiaozeng (Vice Chairman, State Insurance Regulatory Committee); Mr. An Chengxin (Vice President, Chinese Council for the Promotion of International Trade); Mr. Yao Jinrong (Deputy General Manager, China International Trust and Investment Corporation); Mr. Zhang Yanzhong (Deputy General Manager, China Aviation Industry Corporation); Mr. Wang Ren (Vice President, China Academy of Agriculture); Mr. Lin Jintong (President, Beijing Post and Telecommunications University); Mr. Wang Xuan (President, Research Institute of Founder Group of Peking University); Mr. Yang Qixian (Vice President, China Society of Economic Reform) and Mr. Li Gang (Director-General, Liaison Department, Ministry of Culture).

Ambassadors (Engineering Qualifications)

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department is taking to encourage men and women with engineering qualifications to enter the Diplomatic Service. [86163]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The FCO encourages a diverse range of candidates to apply to join the Diplomatic Service, so that the FCO is representative of the best of modern Britain. Applicants can have degrees in any discipline, so men and women with engineering degrees are encouraged to apply. We aim to visit each UK University every 4 to 5 years, which brings us into contact with graduates studying the whole spectrum of subjects, including engineering.

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many ambassadors are chartered engineers. [86162]

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Senior Management Structure of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office includes one officer who has qualified as a Chartered Engineer. No current Ambassador has this qualification.

Provisional Agendas (European Councils)

Mr. Maclean: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will account for the delay in replying to the questions from the right hon. Member for Penrith and The Border, 19 May 1999, Official Report, columns 349–50, [84699 and 84697]; and if a provisional agenda was available at the time of the holding answers. [85631]

Ms Quin: Holding replies were given to these questions as the Minister was overseas. The substantive answers were given the following day.

WALES

Departmental Expenditure

Ms Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what [illegible]he is proposing to make to the Departmental Expenditure Limit for the Welsh Office and the Office of Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Schools in Wales for the current financial year. [87029]

Mr. Michael: Subject to Parliament's approval of the related Revised Estimate, the Welsh Office Departmental Expenditure Limit for 1999–2000 will be increased by £30,800,000 from £7,061,717,000 to £7,092,517,000, including a transfer from the Department for Education and Employment Class I, Vote 1 to take account of the change to student support arrangements following the Dearing Review of higher education.

The increase will be offset by a transfer and will not add to the overall level of planned total public expenditure.

SCOTLAND

Fishing

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what consultations were undertaken with fishing organisations in advance of the Scottish Adjacent Waters Boundaries Order 1999. [85527]

Mr. Macdonald: A press release was issued at the time the draft order was laid, on 8 March 1999. All fishing organisations were therefore able to comment on the draft Order between that date and the Order being approved by the Privy Council on 13 April 1999. None did so.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what rights in respect of consultation are available to Scottish fishermen operating in the areas of sea, responsibility for which is transferred by the Scottish Adjacent Water Boundaries Order 1999 with regard to oil, gas and other subsea operations. [85531]

Mr. Macdonald: Under the Petroleum Act 1998, the Department of Trade and Industry is required in considering various oil and gas activities to have regard to the implications for other users of the sea including the fishing industry. Historically there has been appropriate consultation with representatives of the Scottish fishing industry through the Scottish Office. These consultation arrangements will continue through the Scottish Executive.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the impact on activities of the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency of the Scottish Adjacent Waters Boundaries Order 1999. [85529]

Mr. Macdonald: Officers of the Scottish Fisheries Protection Agency (SFPA) remain British Sea Fisheries Officers and, as such, will be empowered to operate anywhere within British fisheries limits. In practice, SFPA vessels will patrol down to the new median line, but they will have powers of pursuit outwith the Scottish zone.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will set out the reallocation of responsibilities between the United Kingdom Parliament and the Scottish Parliament as a result of the Scottish Adjacent Water Boundaries Order 1999. [85528]

Mr. Macdonald: The Order makes statutory provision for the first time for a Scottish zone of British fisheries limits. By doing so it helps define the functions of Scottish Ministers and the responsibilities of the Scottish Parliament. Responsibility for the regulation of sea fisheries issues, including measures implemented under the Common Fisheries Policy (CFP), will be devolved to the new Scottish Parliament within the zone, and in respect of Scottish boats outwith the zone.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement setting out the effects on the jurisdiction of the Scottish courts for waters in the area of sea transferred by the Scottish Adjacent Water Boundaries Order 1999. [85530]

Mr. Macdonald: It remains possible for prosecutions for most alleged offences to be taken anywhere in the UK. The current practice is normally to refer the prosecution case folder to the nearest court to where the offence took place. This is likely to continue to be the case.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Jim Murphy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to amend the Office of the Secretary of State for Scotland and transfers to the Scottish consolidated fund departmental expenditure limits/running costs provision for 1999–2000. [87024]

Dr. Reid: Subject to Parliamentary approval of the necessary Revised Estimates, the gross running costs provision for Class XIII, Vote 1 will be increased by £175,000 from £2,400,000 to £2,575,000. The increase is in respect of an increase in appropriations in aid from: VAT recoveries, fees and costs for legal work done by solicitors and receipts of rents and a transfer of £55,000 from Current Grants for the cost of Private Legislation

Procedure. The running costs limit and the Departmental Expenditure Limit will be increased by £55,000 from £2,400,000 to £2,455,000. This will be offset by a corresponding reduction in expenditure by the Scottish Parliament within the Departmental Expenditure Limit from £13,807,018,000 to £13,806,963,000.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Balkans (Reconstruction)

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what European Union support is being given for longer-term reconstruction in the Balkans; and if she will make a statement. [86478]

Clare Short: The EU has provided 4,185 million euros for the reconstruction of the region since the end of the Bosnian conflict. In 1999, 170 million euros were allocated for the reconstruction of the countries of the former Yugoslavia.

The EU is reviewing its plans to take into account the consequences of the Kosovo crisis. The proposed Stability Pact for South East Europe will provide a framework for the regeneration of the Balkan region. The EU will play a key role in this process and in the financing of the international reconstruction effort in Kosovo.

Tobacco

Jackie Ballard: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much British aid money has been invested in agricultural projects in developing countries which include the growing of tobacco crops for each year over the last five years. [86212]

Clare Short: Our policy is that development funds must not be used for any purpose which supports the tobacco sector. In line with this requirement, no British development money has been invested in bilateral projects which include the growing of tobacco crops in developing countries in any of the past 5 years.

Aid: GNP Ratio

Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what official development assistance was provided by the UK in 1998 as a percentage of GNP; and what the performance was of other members of OECD's Development Assistance Committee. [86981]

Clare Short: As announced yesterday by the Development Assistance Committee of the OECD, the UK's expenditure on official development assistance (ODA) in 1998 is estimated at £2,315 million, representing 0.27 per cent. of GNP. This is an increase on the 1997 figure of 0.26 per cent. and reflects the Government's commitment to reverse the decline in UK development assistance. The average ODA/GNP ration for all OECD DAC Member Countries was 0.23 per cent. We will continue our strenuous efforts to also improve the effectiveness of international development programmes.

The figures exclude financial flows to countries in transition in Central and Eastern Europe and more advanced developing countries as defined in the DAC List of Aid Recipients.

HEALTH

Guild Community Trust, Preston

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions he has had with the North West Regional Health Authority on the appointment of independent investigators to report on administration of the Guild Community Trust Preston during 1998 and 1999; and if he will make a statement; [85139]

(2) in what ways he involved the Chairman of the North West Regional Health Authority in seeking the resignations of the non-executive directors of the Guild Community Trust Preston; [85224]

(3) if he will list the grounds on which he dismissed the Board of the Guild Community Trust Preston; [85223]

(4) if he will list those occasions on which the non-executive directors of the Guild Community Trust Preston sought advice on the way the trust was being run from the North West Regional Health Authority; and what advice was given; [85136]

(5) if he will publish the correspondence between his Department, the North West Regional Health Authority and the Chief Executive of the Guild Community Trust Preston during 1998 and 1999 on the Chief Executive's administration of the trust during this period; [85137]

(6) if he will list the (a) meetings and (b) communications between his Department and the Chief Executive of the Guild Community Trust Preston during 1998 and 1999 and state the reasons for each of those meetings and communications; [85138]

(7) what reports his Department has received on the administration of the Guild Community Trust Preston in its last two years; and what were their conclusions. [85140]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 25 May 1999]: A mental health report which appeared in the summer of 1998 raised concerns about the management of Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust and, specifically, its Chief Executive. The Trust Board, after consultation with the NHS Executive North West, took the decision to suspend the Chief Executive and commission an independent panel to investigate his management style.

The independent Galbraith Report was presented to the non-executive team in December 1998. It concluded that there had been a clear and significant loss of confidence in the trust's Chief Executive and that his position had become untenable. Then the Chairman of the Trust resigned. I have received briefings from the North West Regional Office of the NHS about the investigation which was commissioned by, and reported to, the Guild Trust Board.

The circumstances at the Guild Trust, Preston were the subject of letters, e-mails, telephone and face-to-face conversations involving non-executive directors of the trust, officials at the NHS North West Regional Office and officials in my Department over a lengthy period.

In May the non-executive directors of the Guild Trust were asked to resign in the best interests of the NHS and the staff and patients of the trust because there had been an irreversible breakdown in relations with one another. Two agreed to resign and I dismissed the three who refused.

The Chairman of the North West Region of the NHS, who is my representative in these matters, was involved at all stages in my consideration of the situation at the Guild Trust and my decision to seek the resignations of the non-executive directors.

The Department, including the NHS Executive North West, communicates on a regular basis with NHS Trusts about management issues. The extent and diversity of these contacts make it impractical to compile a definitive list.

Staffordshire Ambulance Service

Mr. Jenkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps he is taking to ensure that the impact of the use of computerised systems in respect of call-outs by Staffordshire Ambulance service is disseminated to other ambulance services in the United Kingdom; [85537]

(2) what assessment he has made of the response rate times achieved by Staffordshire Ambulance service. [85536]

Mr. Denham: Staffordshire Ambulance service has reported impressive response times which we commend. Information about its work, including its use of computerised systems, has been widely disseminated through publication of its response times, presentation of its results to Ministers by the chief executive, and at a national meeting of health authority commissioners focusing on its methods.

Other ambulance services in England have adopted the approaches promoted by Staffordshire.

MMR Vaccine

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been conducted by, or on behalf of, his Department into the health risks of the use of bovine serum in the manufacture of MMR vaccines. [85534]

Ms Jowell: No research specific to bovine material and measles, mumps and rubella vaccine has been conducted by, or on behalf of, the Department of Health. All bovine blood products used in the manufacture of MMR vaccines comply with European guidelines on minimising the risk of transmitting agents causing spongiform encephalopathies via medicinal products, which address the sourcing and processing of bovine material used in the manufacture of pharmaceuticals. The product used in the manufacture of MMR vaccine is not serum, but bovine albumin. This is not United Kingdom sourced.

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital were referred for radiotherapy treatment in each year from 1989 to date; and if he will make a statement. [85695]

Mr. Denham: The Department does not collect information about numbers of patients referred for radiotherapy. The following information indicates first out-patient referrals for clinical oncology at Royal Shrewsbury Hospital (only available since 1994–95), a proportion of whom will have been referred for radiotherapy treatment.

Consultant first outpatient attendance

Year	Seen	Did not appear
1994–95	350	3
1995–96	492	5
1996–97	1,115	27
1997–98	632	21

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital will be informed of the outcome of its bid for a linear accelerator; and if he will make a statement; [85698]

(2) pursuant to the letter of 12 April from the Under-Secretary of State for Health, if his officials have considered the financial terms of funding a second linear accelerator at the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital; and if he will make a statement; [85696]

(3) what reasons underlie the length of time taken by the NHS Executive, West Midlands Regional Office to consider the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital's business case for funding to replace its cobalt unit with a new linear accelerator; and if he will make a statement. [85716]

Mr. Denham: The National Health Service Executive–West Midlands Regional Office is carefully considering the business case and hopes to make a decision as soon as possible. The prime consideration will be establishing a safe and sustainable service. There are several factors underpinning this, and the Regional Office needs to satisfy itself that all the issues have been addressed before approving the business case. In particular, the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital, which is not itself a cancer centre, will need to demonstrate that robust working links have been developed with the North Staffordshire cancer centre. In addition, work currently taking place on developing a national framework for radiotherapy services, as well as wider regional cancer strategy will inform the decision. The Royal Shrewsbury Hospital will be informed as soon as a decision has been reached.

West Midlands Regional Office is currently exploring possible sources of funding to minimise delay should the business case be approved.

Running Costs

Miss Widdecombe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the estimated combined annual running costs in the last financial year of the (a) Commission for Health Improvement and (b) National Institute for Clinical Excellence; and if he will make a statement. [85737]

Mr. Denham: The Commission for Health Improvement will be established by the Health Bill currently before Parliament, and incurred no running costs in the last financial year. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence was established on 1 April this year and did not incur any running costs in the last financial year.

Viagra

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the guidelines are for the issue of Viagra on NHS prescription, with particular reference to the general practitioner's discretion. [86301]

Mr. Denham: Subject to Parliamentary approval, from 1 July changes will be incorporated in schedule 11 of the National Health Service (General Medical Services) Regulations 1992 which will specify those categories of patients for whom general practitioners may prescribe drug treatments for impotence, including Viagra, on the NHS.

Asthma

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data his Department collects on childhood asthma; and if he will set out the figures for the last 10 years. [86407]

Mr. Hutton: There are no comprehensive data on the number of children with asthma. The Department's Central Health Monitoring Unit brought together a broad range of the best statistics on asthma in "Asthma: An Epidemiological Overview" (1995), copies of which are available in the Library. This report quotes an estimate, on the basis of all the information available, that

"the prevalence of asthma sufficiently severe to require regular medical supervision is from 4–6 per cent. in children".

The Department routinely collects data on hospital in-patient care for asthma. The numbers (in thousands) of hospital in-patient cases (ie finished consultant episodes—ordinary admissions and day cases) in which asthma was the main diagnosis (ICD 10 codes J45 and J46 from 1995–96; ICD 9 code 493 before that) in England for the last ten years for which figures are available, among children aged 0 to 4 years and 5 to 14 years, are given in the table:

Age group	0–4	5–14
1988–89	38.8	23.0
1989–90	32.7	18.8
1990–91	32.3	16.7
1991–92	32.1	18.5
1992–93	31.9	16.2
1993–94	32.5	17.5
1994–95	28.6	14.8
1995–96	28.7	15.2
1996–97	25.7	12.0
1997–98	20.4	12.5

Notes:
1. Figures for 1995–96 and earlier years are grossed for both coverage and unknown/invalid clinical data; 1996–97 and 1997–98 figures are provisional and ungrossed (no adjustments have yet been made for shortfalls in data).
2. A finished consultant episode (FCE) is defined as a period of patient care under the care of an individual consultant within one health care provider. FCE figures do not represent the number of patients as a person may have more than one episode of care during the year.

Source:
Hospital Episodes Statistics (HES), Department of Health

The Department also commissions the annual Health Survey for England, copies of the reports of which are also available in the Library. The surveys for 1995, 1996 and 1997 included questions on asthma. According to the report of the 1997 Survey, 23 per cent. of boys and 18 per cent. of girls aged 2 to 15 years had been diagnosed at some time in the past as suffering from asthma.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research his Department has carried out on asthma in young children; and what plans he has for further research. [86406]

Mr. Hutton: The Department, the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions and the Medical Research Council are jointly funding a major research initiative on the relationship between air pollution and respiratory disease. The National Asthma Campaign is managing, on behalf of the National Health Service Executive, the NHS National research and development programme on asthma management. Many of the research projects commissioned under these initiatives will be pertinent to asthma in children.

The Medical Research Council which receives most of its income via grant-in-aid from the Office of Science and Technology in the Department of Trade and Industry also spends about £2 million a year on research into prevention and treatment of asthma and related areas.

Medical Equipment (Registration)

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans his Department has to require health authorities which produce or modify medical equipment to obtain a CE Mark registration before the equipment is issued. [86677]

Ms Jowell: Any health authority which places medical devices on the market must comply with the requirements of the Medical Devices Regulations and CE mark their product accordingly.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which companies or Government organisations his Department has exempted from the requirement to obtain CE Marks for medical equipment. [86676]

Ms Jowell: None. All manufacturers or other organisations who place medical devices on the United Kingdom market must go through the appropriate conformity assessment procedure detailed in the Medical Devices Regulations and CE mark their products accordingly. Health care establishments who make a device for their own use in-house are not regarded as having placed a product on the market.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to make the list of medical equipment which has obtained a CE Mark available for public inspection. [86674]

Ms Jowell: As required by the Medical Devices Regulations, the Medical Devices Agency maintains a register only of manufacturers of low risk and custom-made devices and assemblers who have a place of business in the United Kingdom. Article 20 of the Medical Devices Directive prevents data on this register being made publicly available.

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance his Department has issued to health authorities about the need to obtain CE Marks for medical equipment. [86675]

Ms Jowell: In January 1998 the National Health Service Executive issued an Executive Letter (EL(98)5) to all health authorities reminding them of their responsibilities under the Medical Devices Regulations. In addition the Medical Devices Agency has produced a Guide for Health Care Professionals on the CE marking of Medical Devices together with a leaflet on the CE mark plus a Bulletin on the application of the Regulations on the activities of health care establishments. Copies of these documents are available in the Library.

Water Fluoridation

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many water authorities fluoridate their water; what guidance he gives to water authorities on this practice; what plans he has to change the law regarding water fluoridation; and if he will make a statement. [86411]

Mr. Denham: In England six Water Undertakers provide fluoridated water to some of the populations they serve—Northumbria, North West, Severn Trent, South Staffordshire, Anglian and Thames.

Under the Water Industry Act 1991 health authorities are required to consult:

the appropriate local authorities

the community health councils and any other local bodies the HA considers appropriate.

In addition the HA must publicise its proposals for water fluoridation through the local press and invite public comment. It is important to ensure that the publicity covers all parts of the area to be fluoridated, and reaches as many people as possible. The HA must allow a period of at least three months for this consultation process before it makes its final decision. Once it has completed consultation and formally adopted a policy in favour of water fluoridation, the HA must then in writing request the water company to implement the scheme.

The Government will make a policy statement on fluoridation in the Public Health White Paper, which will be published shortly.

Beta Interferon

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects that the National Institute for Clinical Excellence will report to him on the use of beta interferon; and if he will make a statement. [86483]

Mr. Denham: The initial work programme and, therefore, the timing of guidance on any specific procedure for the National Institute for Clinical Excellence has not been finally determined, although it is likely that beta interferon will be referred to NICE.

Homeopathy

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps are being taken to recognise at consultant level those practitioners with extensive experience in homeopathic medicine gained before 1 January 1997; [86326]

(2) what provision there is for the training of orthodox physicians in their conventional path of accreditation in homeopathy and complementary medicine; [86329]

(3) if homeopathic medicine is recognised as a specialty in the United Kingdom. [86327]

Mr. Denham: There is currently no statutory training path for doctors in homeopathy in the United Kingdom, although consultants in homeopathy have been appointed in the National Health Service. Since 1 January 1997 it has been a requirement to be on the General Medical Council's Specialist Register in order to be eligible for appointment as a substantive NHS consultant. Doctors holding substantive NHS consultant appointments in homeopathy before 31 December 1998 were able to apply for inclusion in the Register under transitional provisions in the European Specialist Medical Qualifications Order 1995 (as amended). New consultants in homeopathy would ordinarily expect to be trained in another medical specialty recognised for the purposes of specialist registration, as well as in the non-statutory requirements for homeopathy.

The requirements for specialist medical education are governed by European Directive 93/16/EEC. The practice of homeopathy varies greatly across the European Economic Area, and there is no provision within the Directive to recognise homeopathy for the purposes of medical training. The Faculty of Homeopathy has previously indicated its intention to develop a nationally recognised training programme in homeopathy. In order to do so, the Faculty would need to satisfy the Specialist Training Authority of the Medical Royal Colleges (STA) that the training programme met the requirements of Directive 93/16/EEC. It would then be for the STA to apply to the Secretary of State for Health for inclusion of the specialty in the European Specialist Medical Qualifications Order 1995 (as amended).

HOME DEPARTMENT

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to reply to the letters dated 19 March, 23 March and 22 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. H. Eljack, 5 Oundle Close. [86409]

Mr. Straw: I wrote to my right hon. Friend, on 10 June 1999.

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 27 April, ref. 7518/99. [86400]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I am sorry that my hon. Friend has not yet received a reply to his letter of 27 April. I will be replying shortly setting out the full background to this case.

Ford Open Prison

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are used to decide which prisoners should serve their sentence in Ford Open Prison. [86711]

Mr. George Howarth: Ford prison is an open prison and accepts adult male category D prisoners. The current arrangements for the categorisation and allocation of adult male prisoners are set out in chapter 7 of Prison Service Order 2200, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Allocation criteria for individual establishments are agreed between the area manager and the governor of the prison. They vary according to local circumstances. The criteria for acceptance at Ford prison are listed as follows:

There is no maximum sentence length, but prisoners must be within three years of their parole eligibility date; prisoners serving a sentence for a sex offence or an offence of arson will not be accepted;

prisoners serving sentences for violent offences will be accepted only on progressive moves from closed establishments, and where their conduct during their sentence has indicated their suitability;

prisoners should have no history of escape or abscond, and no failure on temporary release in the previous three years; and prisoners will not be accepted if they require full time medical care. They should be fit for most forms of work.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the impact that advertisements implying a pleasure for women in male roughness have on his efforts to avert domestic violence; and if he will make a statement. [86477]

Mr. Boateng: No such assessment has been made but nobody should believe that violence against women is either acceptable or enjoyed by the victims. There can be no excuse for such conduct. It is so serious because it is so often committed in what should be the "safety" of the victim's home, even in front of children, by a partner to whom the victim should be able to look for support and protection.

The "Break the Chain" campaign launched this year made clear the Government's determination to tackle domestic violence. The leaflet has been so much in demand that we are having to reprint it as a matter of urgency.

Senator Pinochet

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 9 February 1999, Official Report, column 144, to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), what was the role of the fourth officer at the arrest of Senator Pinochet. [86752]

Mr. Straw: As indicated in the my reply of 9 February 1999 to the hon. Member for Chesham and Amersham (Mrs. Gillan), Official Report, column 144, only two officers were present. They were the head of the Metropolitan Police Extradition Squad and another member of the Squad.

999 Calls

Mr. Dismore: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many 999 calls were received in each of the last three years by (a) police forces and (b) the Metropolitan Police; and if he will make a statement. [86653]

Mr. Boateng: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) on 19 March 1999, Official Report, columns 824–26.

Targeted Policing Bids

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those areas which (a) have successfully bid for additional funding for the targeted policing initiative, and how much has been allocated in each case and (b) submitted unsuccessful bids; and if he will make a statement. [86124]

Mr. Boateng: Of the £250 million three year Crime Reduction Programme which we announced on 21 July 1998, £32 million has been earmarked for the targeted policing initiative. The aim of this initiative is to help police forces, in collaboration with local crime and disorder partnerships, to improve the way in which they tackle crime. Rather than only responding to crime and dealing with its immediate consequences, the challenge is to reduce it by analysing the real crime problem and tackling its underlying causes. To this end we will be funding some 20 developmental projects over the next three years with an emphasis on developing and testing our new, effective and cost effective targeted policing tactics.

On 11 November last year, we wrote to all chief constables in England and Wales, copied to police authorities and local authority Chief Executives, inviting them to submit proposals under the first of two competitions in the targeted policing initiative. A total of 32 police forces submitted 73 outline proposals for funding a range of targeted policing initiatives in their areas. The bids contained a good mix of problems to be tackled and possible approaches to tackling them.

The proposals were assessed against the published criteria by a specially convened panel comprising representatives from the Home Office, the Association of Chief Police Officers, Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary and the Local Government Association. The panel identified 11 proposals (table 1) as strong contenders for further development and which are currently undergoing validation and development with the help of independent consultants appointed by the Home Office. The development of the proposals is due to be completed shortly and I expect to be able to announce the final results by the end of June.

The shortlisted proposals have an estimated bid cost to the crime reduction programme of £5.2 million, however the final allocation of funding will not be known until the development work is completed.

The 62 bids not selected for further development at this stage are shown in table 2. Of these, four have been designated by the assessment panel as reserve projects in case any of the 11 projects are not selected.

Table 1: Crime reduction programme—Targeted policing initiative—Phase 1
Recommended Projects

£000

Partners:	Police	Region	Topic	Bid from CRP	Resources levered in
1 Rhondda Cynon Taff CBC	South Wales	Wales	Partnership strategy to reduce crime and disorder problems associated with childrens homes	500	575
2 Cardiff CC/Bro Taf Health Authority	South Wales	Wales	Reduction of street violence within the City of Cardiff	498	305
3 Kingston-upon-Hull CC	Humberside	York	Reduction of anti-social behaviour and low level criminal behaviour	406	361
4 Calderdale MBC and Community Safety Partnership	West Yorkshire	York	Reduction of vehicle crime	138	475
5 Stoke-on-Trent UA/Community Safety Partnership	Staffordshire	W Mid	Reduction of acquisitive crime	412	645
6. Islington/Camden/Southwark Councils	Metropolitan	London	Reducing youth disorder and auto crime in the boroughs	542	967
7 Greenwich/Merton/Tower Hamlets/Hounslow	Metropolitan	London	Reduction on racially motivated crime	1,002	8,000
8 Hackney	Metropolitan	London	Reducing 'hot spots' in the borough generated by use of crack cocaine	760	1,380
9 Tyndale DC and Parish Councils	Northumbria	NE	Tackling crime and disorder in rural locations	40	240
10 Medway Council	Kent	SE	Reduction of acquisitive crime by disruption of market	450	50
11 Stockport MDC	GMP	NW	Reduction of acquisitive crime by disruption of marketing using Crackdown Consolidation Cycle technique	445	447
				5,193	13,445

Table 2: Crime reduction programme—Targeted policing initiative—Phase 1
Reserve projects

£000

Partners:	Police	Region	Topic	Bid from CRP	Resources levered in
Reading BC	Thames Valley	SE	Youth crime, disorder, and educational disruption in South Reading	544	0
Wide range of linked agencies	Dyfed-Powys	Welsh	Using Automatic Number Plate Recognition cameras to target police resources against travelling criminals and drug dealers	789	736
Luton BC/Safer Luton Partnership	Bedfordshire	East	Reduction of vehicle crime and associated issues	469	1,272
Leeds CC and Community Safety Partnership	West Yorkshire	York	Multi Agency approach to areas of high victimisation	570	726
				2,372	2,734

Table 2: Crime reduction programme—Targeted policing initiative—Phase 1
Non-selected proposals

Partners	Police	Area	Region
British CC and Chamber of Commerce	Avon and Somerset	Bristol N, S and Central	SW
British City Council	Avon and Somerset	Bristol N, S and Central	SW
Luton BC	Bedfordshire	Luton	East
Warrington BC and others	Cheshire	Warrington	NW
Redcar/Cleveland	Cleveland	Cleveland Police force	NE
Cumbria CC and local	Cumbria	Cumbrian Police force area	NW
Derby CC/Other local	Derbyshire	Derby Division	E Mid
Devon CC Cornwall CC	Devon and Cornwall	Devon/Cornwall Police	SW
Poole Borough and County	Dorset	Poole	SW
DCs of Wear Valley	Durham	Wear and Tees Division	NE

Table 2: Crime reduction programme—Targeted policing initiative—Phase 1
Non-selected proposals

Partners	Police	Area	Region
DCs of Durham	Durham	Durham Police force area	NE
Force Area Agencies	Dyfed-Powys	Force Area	Wales
Manchester CC	Greater Manchester	N and S Manchester	NW
Portsmouth City Council	Hampshire	Portsmouth South	SE
St. Albans CC/Herts CC	Hertfordshire	St. Albans	East
Herts CC Herts Probation	Hertfordshire	Hertfordshire Police force	East
S. Humber	Humberside	Scunthorpe	York
NE Lincolnshire Council	Humberside	Grimsby, Cleethorpes	York
Kingston-upon-Hull CC	Humberside	Kingston-upon-Hull	York
Kent CC/Youth Services	Kent	West Kent	SE
Kent CC/Thanet DC	Kent	Thanet	SE
Kent CC/Canterbury	Kent	Canterbury	SE
Thanet DC/Canterbury	Kent	Canterbury/Thanet	SE
Blackburn BC	Lancashire	Blackburn with Darwen	NW
Blackpool BC	Lancashire	Blackpool Town Centre	NW
Lancaster CC/Lancashire	Lancashire	Lancaster	NW
Lancashire CC/other	Lancashire	Pennine Police Division	NW
Leicester City Council	Leicestershire	Areas of Leicester	E Mid
Liverpool City Council	Merseyside	Liverpool	NW
St. Helens	Merseyside	St. Helens	NW
St. Helens	Merseyside	St. Helens	NW
Lewisham/Redbridge	Metropolitan	LBs of Lewisham	London
York CC and Uni; Safer	North Yorkshire	City of York	York
York CC LEA; Safer York	North Yorkshire	City of York	York
Sunderland City Council	Northumbria	Sunderland City	NE
N Tyneside Council	Northumbria	North Tyneside	NE
Gateshead MBC	Northumbria	Gateshead West	NE
S Tyneside Community	Northumbria	South Tyneside Area	NE
Gateshead MBC	Northumbria	Gateshead East	NE
Notts CC and local	Nottinghamshire	Nottinghamshire Police	E Mid
Local County and Borough	South Wales	S Wales Police force area	Welsh
Barnsley MBC/Chamber	South Yorkshire	S Yorkshire Police force	York
Rotherham MBC, Youth	South Yorkshire	Rotherham East and West	York
E Staffs BC, Prob Ser	Staffordshire	Burton upon Trent	W Mid
Surrey CC/Surrey Health	Surrey	Guildford/Waverley/East	SE
Various Sussex	Sussex	Eastbourne	SE
Reading BC	Thames Valley	Reading	SE
Aylesbury DC/Bucks CC	Thames Valley	Aylesbury	SE
Wycombe/Chiltern	Thames Valley	Chiltern Vale	SE
W Berkshire Council	Thames Valley	Newbury	SE
Slough BC	Thames Valley	Slough	SE
Members of local	Warwickshire	Warwickshire Police force	W Mid
Stratford-upon-Avon	Warwickshire	Stratford-upon-Avon	W Mid
Nuneaton BC/N	Warwickshire	Northern Area Command	W Mid
Warwick District Safety	Warwickshire	N and S Warwick	W Mid
Wychavon/Worcester	West Mercia	Worcester	WM
Birmingham City Council	West Midlands	Birmingham	W Mid
Sandwell MBC/Safer	West Midlands	Sandwell	WM
Birmingham LA, LEA	West Midlands	SW Birmingham	W Mid
Leeds City Council	West Yorkshire	Leeds	York
City of Bradford MDC	West Yorkshire	Bradford City Centre	York
Kirklees MC	West Yorkshire	Huddersfield/Dewsbury	York

Defendants

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many, and what percentage of, criminal prosecutions were completed in (a) magistrates' courts, and (b) higher courts, in each of the last five years for which figures are available; and if he will make a statement. [86122]

Mr. Boateng: Information taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database is given in the table.

Number and percentage[1] of defendants proceeded against for all offences where case was completed by type of court, England and Wales, 1993–97

Thousand and percentage

Year	Defendants where proceedings completed in magistrates' courts[2]	Defendants tried in the Crown Court
1993
Number	1,870.3	83.1
Percentage	96	4

Number and percentage[1] of defendants proceeded against for all offences where case was completed by type of court, England and Wales, 1993–97

Thousand and percentage

Year	Defendants where proceedings completed in magistrates' courts[2]	Defendants tried in the Crown Court
1994
Number	1,858.5	85.9
Percentage	96	4
1995
Number	1,757.3	89.0
Percentage	95	5
1996
Number	1,838.2	85.9
Percentage	96	4
1997
Number	1,767.7	91.3
Percentage	95	5

[1] Rates as a proportion of those cases completed at both magistrates' courts and the Crown Court.

[2] Excluding defendants committed for trial.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many indictable offences have been dealt with by either magistrates courts or the Crown Court serving (a) Croydon, (b) Gloucester and (c) Liverpool since 30 September 1998. [85763]

Mr. Boateng: Information taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database is given in the tables.

Table A: Number of defendants proceeded against for indictable offences at Croydon, Gloucester and Liverpool magistrates' courts, October-December 1998[1]

Magistrates' courts	Number proceeded against
(a) Croydon	728
(b) Gloucester	413
(c) Liverpool	1,912

Table B: Number of defendants tried for indictable offences at Croydon, Gloucester and Liverpool Crown Court Centres, October-December 1998[1], January-March 1999[1]

Crown Court Centres	Period	Total tried
(a) Croydon	October-December 1998	315
	January-March 1999	309
(b) Gloucester	October-December 1998	78
	January-March 1999	92
(c) Liverpool	October-December 1998	831
	January-March 1999	783

[1] Provisional

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offenders have been convicted of offences involving the supply or possession of drugs in either the magistrates court or the relevant Crown Court serving (a) Liverpool, (b) Croydon and (c) Gloucester since 30 September 1998. [85768]

Mr. Boateng: Information taken from the Home Office Court Proceedings Database is given in the table.

Number of persons convicted of offences involving the supply or possession of drugs at (a) Liverpool, (b) Croydon and (c) Gloucester magistrates' courts and Crown Court Centres by type of offence, October-December 1998[1], January-March 1999[1]

Court	Period	Possession of a controlled drug	Supply of a controlled drug	Possession with intent to supply a controlled drug
Magistrates' courts
(a) Liverpool	October-December 1998	240	18	27
(b) Croydon	October-December 1998	78	2	8
(c) Gloucester	October-December 1998	28	1	2
Crown Court
(a) Liverpool	October-December 1998	22	26	28
	January-March 1999	18	44	28
(b) Croydon	October-December 1998	5	6	15
	January-March 1999	5	12	18
(c) Gloucester	October-December 1998	—	—	4
	January-March 1999	2	1	2

[1] Provisional

DNA Samples

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many DNA samples have been taken of people (a) charged and (b) cautioned, in each police area and in total in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [86125]

Mr. Boateng: The annual totals (Table A) are based upon the information submitted with each DNA sample sent by individual police forces to the Forensic Science Service. The information shows whether someone has been "cautioned" or "not cautioned". The term "not cautioned" can mean the individual has been suspected, convicted, charged or informed that he will be reported for a recordable offence. It is, therefore, not possible to provide precise figures for (a).

The cumulative totals for the past five years (Table B) are based upon the number of samples received by the Forensic Science Service from each force. As neither individual forces nor the Association of Chief Police Officers retain information about the number of samples actually taken, the information in the table is the most reliable indicator available of the number taken and submitted to the Forensic Science Service for analysis. The cumulative totals in (Table B) cover the period to March 1999 only and therefore, differ slightly from those in (Table A) which include additional months.

Table A: Samples submitted annually by police forces—1995 to 1999

Force	Samples per year First columns relates to 'cautioned', second to 'not cautioned' 1995		1996		1997		1998		1999
Avon and Somerset	22	1,728	83	1,957	409	3,587	679	5,500	323	2,536
Bedfordshire	3	1,042	24	912	124	1,116	0	11	2	0
Cambridgeshire	12	1,540	30	1,890	163	1,895	314	1,873	111	1,604
Cheshire	5	955	54	2,986	196	2,735	195	1,570	1	0
Cleveland	61	1,929	75	1,757	123	1,664	181	1,093	37	449
Cumbria	2	415	19	790	76	1,250	218	2,208	60	719
Derbyshire	11	4,240	24	3,824	390	3,681	498	4,131	195	1,482
Devon and Cornwall	73	2,676	41	3,125	636	3,442	608	3,667	322	1,676
Dorset	0	671	9	724	23	795	30	831	14	265
Durham	13	1,232	13	1,110	224	2,495	646	3,259	11	177
Dyfed-Powys	41	1,860	9	2,407	168	2,604	409	2,190	114	819
Essex	8	2,461	20	2,265	565	3,946	758	4,053	279	1,452
Gloucestershire	1	885	1	861	50	1,024	210	1,484	113	542
GMP	58	2,179	335	8,303	712	7,701	293	1,727	0	7
Gwent	4	1,819	8	2,321	116	2,528	368	1,886	140	715
Hampshire	4	2,837	8	3,454	122	4,320	355	4,155	157	1,426
Hertfordshire	42	1,121	73	1,128	52	1,227	85	1,252	27	429
Humberside	7	1,262	310	6,237	1,919	8,313	2,230	5,466	716	1,828
Kent	12	2,363	95	3,161	351	2,807	1	12	0	3
Lancashire	100	3,256	242	5,289	366	4,462	195	2,069	1	6
Leicestershire	3	1,818	19	2,359	70	2,417	184	2,701	140	1,101
Lincolnshire	0	418	6	1,404	23	1,583	44	1,464	29	456
Metropolitan	80	15,796	133	16,387	1,070	19,456	5,952	29,152	2,520	11,809
City of London	297	1,467	400	1,647	710	1,437	633	1,280	232	505
Mersey	1	2,959	59	4,324	109	2,411	446	5,624	164	2,153
Norfolk	15	1,010	59	3,504	475	4,081	1,069	3,791	511	1,604
Northamptonshire	1	1,627	0	1,776	170	2,689	269	2,558	117	748
Northumbria	2	3,321	143	5,701	223	3,361	338	3,533	135	1,469
North Wales	8	1,751	1	1,936	110	1,979	509	2,484	197	989
North Yorkshire	29	1,335	16	1,535	50	1,674	112	1,539	31	643
Nottinghamshire	3	399	18	1,423	268	3,976	25	367	0	5
South Wales	9	5,988	238	8,222	769	6,927	130	1,538	17	191
South Yorkshire	4	2,841	11	2,894	374	5,833	2,582	9,440	194	1,177
Staffordshire	0	1,196	2	1,048	71	1,868	1,091	7,484	512	3,294
Suffolk	2	20	43	966	181	1,657	67	495	0	2
Surrey	4	556	2	674	68	1,783	76	1,379	12	279
Sussex	14	2,613	29	2,644	93	1,898	93	1,119	84	689
Thames Valley	18	2,758	52	3,045	81	2,467	197	2,106	272	1,428
Warwickshire	0	431	0	488	71	849	130	1,043	42	352
West Mercia	25	2,313	23	1,907	82	1,807	194	1,849	110	855
West Midlands	36	2,760	770	7,258	1,208	10,266	2,746	13,155	1,333	5,242
West Yorkshire	66	5,662	188	7,389	782	8,534	1,286	9,191	363	3,143
Wiltshire	1	1,271	4	1,145	17	1,401	27	786	0	1

Table B: Cumulative figures by police force—April 1995 to March 1999

Force	Number of samples received
Avon and Somerset	15,854
Bedfordshire	3,279
Cambridgeshire	8,179
Cheshire	8,789
Cleveland	7,079
Cumbria	5,382
Derbyshire	17,842
Devon and Cornwall	15,563
Dorset	3,254
Durham	9,195
Dyfed-Powys	10,361
Essex	14,986
Gloucestershire	4,855
GMP	21,360
Gwent	9,657
Hampshire	16,298
Hertfordshire	5,264
Humberside	27,289
Kent	8,967
Lancashire	15,997
Leicestershire	10,372
Lincolnshire	5,252

Table B: Cumulative figures by police force—April 1995 to March 1999

Force	Number of samples received
Metropolitan	96,388
City of London	8,334
Mersey	17,320
Norfolk	15,432
Northampshire	9,670
Northumbria	17,660
North Wales	9,446
North Yorks	6,753
Nottinghamshire	6,652
South Wales	24,153
South Yorkshire	25,392
Staffordshire	14,731
Suffolk	3,438
Surrey	4,729
Sussex	9,034
Thames Valley	11,743
Warwickshire	3,249
West Mercia	8,788
West Midlands	41,970
West Yorkshire	35,241
Wiltshire	4,662

Police Vehicles

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has (a) commissioned and (b) evaluated on the need for and use of rapid response by police vehicles. [86200]

Mr. Boateng: No research on this precise subject has been commissioned. The only recent research in this area of police work was conducted by the Home Office Police Research Group who published in 1997 the results of a study of deaths and serious injuries resulting from police vehicle accidents. It found that three police activities accounted for 88 per cent. of fatal accidents—45 per cent. were during pursuit/follow situations; 23 per cent. arose during responses to emergency calls and 20 per cent. were routine patrol cases. This research was used by the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) in its recent report and recommendations on police pursuit training.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the average response times of police cars to emergency calls in the last year for which figures are available. [86201]

Mr. Boateng: The information requested is not available centrally, but in 1997–98, in England and Wales, 88 per cent. of police immediate responses to incidents were within the targets set by forces.

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the rules governing blue light police car responses. [86202]

Mr. Boateng: This is an operational matter for chief officers of police. There is a nationally agreed Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) Pursuit Code of Practice and work is going forward to implement recommendations from the recent ACPO report on police pursuit driver training. One of the recommendations in the ACPO report is that all police vehicles that engage in pursuits and emergency response should be equipped with both sirens and emergency blue lights. Such equipment should be used in all but exceptional circumstances. It is already policy to consider continuously the consequences of a pursuit and whether to break it off.

National Identification Service

Dr. Cable: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the current applications process for police checks in the National Identification Service; and if he will make a statement. [86199]

Kate Hoey: The Metropolitan Police Service's Character Enquiries section, which is based in the National Identification Service, carries out pre-employment vetting checks in accordance with administrative arrangements agreed between the Home Office and the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO). New arrangements for criminal record checks, which will address the limitations of the current system, were included in Part V of the Police Act 1997. The various checks provided for in the Act will be undertaken by the new Criminal Records Bureau which is in the process of being established.

Nottingham Prison

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 25 May 1999, Official Report, column 80, what factors underlay his decision to select Nottingham Prison for the location of accommodation for offenders previously convicted of offences against children; and what other prisons were considered. [85906]

Mr. Boateng [holding answer 8 June 1999]: A wide range of factors were taken into account when considering the suitability of Her Majesty's Prison Nottingham for housing offenders and ex-offenders, including the need to ensure easy access to high quality local services such as the regular presence of experienced Probation and Social Services staff and a police force which is able to respond quickly and effectively. Such services are most easily available in towns and cities.

In considering which prison would be appropriate, options across the prison estate were taken into account.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has further to publicise the decision to accommodate offenders previously convicted of offences involving children in Nottingham Prison. [86103]

Mr. Boateng: Consultation with the relevant local agencies and interested people continues. My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams will be meeting representatives from Nottingham on Monday 14 June 1999.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations (a) he has carried out and (b) he proposes to carry out concerning his plan to accommodate offenders previously convicted of offences involving children in Nottingham Prison. [86104]

Mr. Boateng: The responsibility for managing the risk that ex-offenders present lies with local agencies. The plans in respect of Nottingham prison have been discussed with local Members of Parliament and they will be kept informed of progress. My right hon. and noble Friend Lord Williams will be meeting representatives from Nottingham on Monday 14 June 1999.

Behaviour Orders

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he has issued to local authorities on what constitutes anti-social behaviour under the behaviour orders under the Crime and Disorder Act 1998; how he will monitor the (a) use and (b) effectiveness of (i) behaviour orders, (ii) curfews and (iii) parenting orders; and what action he will take to encourage the use of such orders by (1) the police and (2) local authorities. [85671]

Mr. Boateng: We published comprehensive guidance on the use of anti-social behaviour orders earlier this year "Crime and Disorder Act 1998: Anti-Social Behaviour Orders—Guidance". This included guidance on the types of case in which such orders might be considered. A review of the use and effectiveness of anti-social behaviour orders is planned during the first two years of their availability.

The local child curfew scheme will help address the problems of unsupervised children who are out on the streets late at night, and who may be involved in anti-social behaviour.

We intend to carry out a monitoring exercise of the local child curfew scheme to assess how the practical arrangements work in those areas which decide to operate such a scheme. This will help identify good practice, particularly in the area of multi-agency working, which will be required for the enforcement arrangements.

The parenting order is the subject of an 18-month pilot scheme, which began on 30 September 1993. This involves monitoring and evaluating the use made of the order. The results of the pilot project will inform the process of national implementation and help to identify good practice which can be reflected in guidance and national standards.

The decision to apply for anti-social behaviour orders or local child curfew schemes is one which must be taken by the police or local authority as appropriate, but we shall continue to encourage their use whenever the opportunity to do so arises. Parenting orders are available to the courts and do not depend upon any application being made by either the police or the local authority.

CCTV

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received relating to the reliability of CCTV cameras in providing evidence in speeding cases. [86027]

Mr. Boateng: We have received no representations on this subject. No Closed Circuit Television systems have been granted type approval for police to use in the enforcement of speed limits.

Asylum Seekers

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many people who were (a) recognised as refugees, (b) granted exceptional leave and (c) refused asylum, in each year from 1991, were (i) female and (ii) male; [86121]

(2) how many asylum applicants in each year from 1991 were (a) female and (b) male. [86120]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The information requested is given in the table.

Applications received for asylum in the United Kingdom and decisions [1], excluding dependents, by gender [2] 1991 to 1998

	Year of application
	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997	1998
Applications received
Total	44,840	24,605	22,370	32,830	43,965	29,640	32,500	46,015
Of which:
Male (percentage)	80	70	67	69	71	71	75	78
Female (percentage)	20	30	33	31	29	29	25	22

Decisions in year [3,4]

Recognised as a refugee and granted asylum

	Year of decision
	1991	1992	1993	1994	1995	1996	1997	1998
Total	505	1,115	1,590	825	1,295	2,240	3,985	5,345
Of which:
Male (percentage)	71	82	80	78	72	68	73	70
Female (percentage)	29	18	20	22	28	32	27	30
Not recognised as a refugee but granted exceptional leave
Total	2,190	15,325	11,125	3,660	4,410	5,055	3,115	3,910
Of which:
Male (percentage)	81	76	71	57	59	60	68	78
Female (percentage)	19	24	29	43	41	40	32	22
Refused asylum and exceptional leave
Total	3,380	18,465	10,690	16,500	21,300	31,670	28,945	22,315
Of which:
Male (percentage)	84	84	81	75	76	75	73	76
Female (percentage)	16	16	19	25	24	25	27	24

[1] Numbers rounded to the nearest 5 and percentages to the nearest 1 per cent.
[2] Estimates based on records for which this information is held centrally.
[3] Decisions may not relate to applications made in the same period.
[4] Information is of initial determination decisions, excluding the outcome of appeals or other subsequent decisions.

Search and Detention Powers

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department under what powers officers at the frontier of the common travel area of the United Kingdom and Ireland are entitled to (a) question, (b) examine the belongings of, (c) search the person of and (d) detain a citizen of the European Union or European Economic Area or their accompanying relatives. [86229]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: European Economic Area (EEA) nationals are normally admitted to the United Kingdom on production of a valid passport or identity card as evidence of nationality and identity, in accordance with Article 3(1) of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994 and subject to Article 15(1) of the Order. Under Article 3(3) of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994, a family member of an EEA national who is not himself an EEA national may in addition be required to hold an EEA family permit issued abroad.

Powers for immigration officers to question passengers arriving in the United Kingdom, whether they are citizens of the European Union, or European Economic Area, or their accompanying (third country) relatives, are contained in paragraph 2 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971. Schedule 2 applies to the examination of European Economic Area (EEA) nationals in accordance with Article 20(2)(e) of the Immigration (European Economic Area) Order 1994. Under paragraph 4(3) of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971, a person who is examined under paragraph 2 of Schedule 2 to the Immigration Act 1971 may be searched, and his belongings examined, and that person may be detained under paragraph 16 of Schedule 2 of the Immigration Act 1971.

The operation of immigration controls in the Republic of Ireland is a matter for the Irish authorities.

EU (Corruption)

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when a draft of the Convention on the Fight Against Corruption involving officials of the European Communities or officials of member states of the European Union, (Cm 4266) published in April was first published; and what scrutiny of it is planned to be conducted in either House of Parliament. [86234]

Kate Hoey: The Council of the European Union adopted the Convention on the Fight against Corruption Involving Officials of the European Communities or Officials of Member States of the European Union on 26 May 1997. It was first published in the Official Journal of the European Communities on 25 June 1997.

Prior to its adoption by the Council, the Convention had been considered in draft and cleared from scrutiny by the House of Lords European Communities Committee.

The Government published the Convention on 16 April 1999 with an Explanatory Memorandum, as a Command Paper in the European Communities Series, and laid it for 21 sitting days in both Houses in accordance with the Ponsonby rule. Arrangements are under way for the United Kingdom to ratify the Convention by September. We expect to be among the first Member States to do so.

European Communities Financial Interests

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list in respect of the Convention on the Protection of the European Communities Financial Interests and subsequent protocols (i) the dates of promulgation and signature, (ii) the dates of draft and final publication in the United Kingdom, (iii) any relevant parliamentary proceedings and (iv) the dates of coming into force; [85679]

(2) what plans he has to amend the criminal law and procedures in respect of the Convention on the Protection of the European Communities' Financial Interests relating to international criminal fraud, and its protocols. [85680]

Kate Hoey: The Council of the European Union adopted and signed the Convention on the Protection of the European Communities' Financial Interests (the Fraud Convention) on 26 July 1995. The three protocols were adopted and signed on 27 September 1996, 29 November 1996 and 19 June 1997.

The Government published the Convention and its protocols on 16 May 1999 as Command Papers in the European Communities Series, and laid them for 21 sitting days in both Houses in accordance with the Ponsonby rule.

Prior to adoption the Convention and its protocols had been submitted for, and cleared from, parliamentary scrutiny.

The Convention will enter into force 90 days after the Secretary-General of the Council receives notice that it has been ratified by the last Member State of the European Union. The same rule applies to each of the protocols, except that they cannot enter into force before the Convention.

Following the recent commencement of Part I of the Criminal Justice Act 1993, which was brought into force on 1 June 1999, and of equivalent provisions of the Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland) Order 1996, which were brought into force on the same date, no further changes to criminal law are needed in the United Kingdom in order to satisfy the requirements of the Convention and protocols. Arrangements are under way for the United Kingdom to ratify the Convention and protocols by September.

Witness Protection (Eltham)

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officers are currently deployed on witness protection duties in the Eltham Police Division. [86194]

Kate Hoey: This is an operational matter for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. He tells me that in his view the information requested should not be published, in order to help maintain operational effectiveness.

EDUCATION AND EMPLOYMENT

"Youth and Europe—Our Future"

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will place a copy of the European Presidency memorandum, Youth and Europe—Our Future, in the Library. [86365]

Mr. Andrew Smith: Copies of the German EU Presidency's memorandum have been placed in the Library.

Sure Start

Mr. Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress he is making with the Sure Start programme; when (a) the application for the second round of Sure Start bids will be announced and (b) the application brochures will be sent to local authorities; who can bid for Sure Start funding; and when the closing date is for the next round. [85670]

Ms Jowell: Guidance inviting 60 areas of the country to apply for funding was published on 19 January. It was sent to key players across the country including local authorities. On 9 April, the Government announced the first 21 of these Sure Start programmes to be given funding. A further announcement concerning the others will be made soon.

The Government hope to announce the next round of applications in the autumn when Guidance will be sent to local authorities and other providers of services for young children.

Funding

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list, and place in the Library in machine-readable form, for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 the revenue grants falling within the aggregate external finance, other than revenue support grant, allocated by his Department to (i) each local authority, (ii) in aggregate, to each class of local authority and (iii) in aggregate to England; and in the case of each local authority the total of such grants. [85757]

Ms Estelle Morris: Details of the revenue grants within aggregate external finance other than revenue support grant for 1997–98, 1998–99 and 1999–2000, for each local education authority, each class of local authority and for England as a whole are given in tables that have been placed in the Library in both paper and machine-readable form. For Grants for Education Support and Training in 1997–98 and the Standards Fund in 1998–99 and 1999–2000 the figures shown in the tables include the grant made by the Department and the contribution made by the local education authority.

Mr. Healey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list, and place in the Library in machine-readable form, for (a) 1997–98, (b) 1998–99 and (c) 1999–2000 the support for capital expenditure allocated by his Department (i) to each local authority, (ii) in aggregate to each class of local authority and (iii) in aggregate to England, showing each capital grant and borrowing approval separately, and the total of that support. [85758]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The information requested is shown in three tables, copies of which have been placed in the Library in both paper and machine-readable form.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment when he intends to reply to the letter dated 22 April from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton with regard to Mr. W. Jackson, 32 Westbourne Range. [86410]

Mr. Mudie: A reply will be issued today.

Class Sizes

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what progress has been made in reducing the size of infant classes in South Gloucestershire. [86983]

Ms Estelle Morris: During the debate on primary schools on 19 May 1999, Official Report, column 1035, I gave the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) figures relating to infant class size reductions in South Gloucestershire. The correct figures show that the number of pupils in infant classes of over 30 fell from 3,391 in January 1998 to 1,387 in September 1998. The projected number of children in infant classes of over 30 for September 1999 is 326.

Business Links

Mr. Cotter: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment what was the total value of grants from TECs to Business Links in each of the last three financial years. [86667]

Mr. Mudie: The following table provides the total expenditure by TEC/CCTEs on Enterprise and Business support activities which includes, but is not solely, expenditure on Business Links.

£ million

Financial year	Expenditure
1995–96	81
1996–97	111
1997–98	142
1998–99	Not yet available

Employee Training (Government Grants)

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Employment if he will list the Government funds allocated to private sector companies for the provision of training for employees in the form of (a) capital grants and (b) infrastructure grants in each of the last three years; and if he will make a statement. [78303]

Mr. Wills: I have been asked to reply.

The Government do not fund private sector companies for training employees through capital grants. The Government do support private sector companies through infrastructure grants, including the SRB, but it would involve a disproportionate cost to identify the amount of funds from this source used for training employees.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 332

SESSION 1998–99

24th May—11th June 1999

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index to the daily parts and weekly Hansard is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Indexing Service (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc., between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes, and cannot, therefore, be used in conjunction with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There will, however, be headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one will find not only Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instruments etc., under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Contributions by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading 'Speaker and deputies'. Significant rulings and statements are indicated by the sub-heading 'Rulings and statements'.

Opposition Day Debates and Estimates Day Debates are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates, etc. (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R = first reading, 2R = second reading, Com = Committee stage, Rep = Report stage, 3R = third reading, res = resolution, amendt/amendts = amendment/amendments, * = matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.

Abbott, Ms Diane
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 208

Abortion
159w

Absinthe
251w

Access to Environmental Information Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 959

Additives
Petrol 168w

Administration of justice
134–5w

Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 949–56

Advertising
Welsh Office 267–8w

Advisory Board on Family Law
see Family Law Advisory Board

Advisory bodies
Biotechnology 291w
Food 41w

Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment
Public appointments 5w

Advisory services
New deal schemes 100–1w
Smoking 452

Aerials
Planning permission 228w

After school clubs
780

Age addition
State retirement pensions 55w

Age Limits on Health Care Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 959

Agriculture
see also Farmers

Agriculture
Females 43w

AIDS
Northern Ireland 292–4w, 297–8w
Scotland 130–3w, 192w
Wales 65–8w

Ainger, Mr Nick
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 518–20

Ainsworth, Mr Peter
Questions
Arts Council of England, Buildings 96–7w
Arts Council of England, Grants 96w
Britain Visitor Centre, Operating costs 186–7w
Broadcasting Standards Commission 95w
English Tourism Council 95w
Greater London Authority, Museums and galleries 229–30w
Hotels, Standards 95–6w
Millennium Exhibition, Retail trade 232w
Museum of London, Finance 232w
Museums and galleries 97w
Poetry 193–4w
Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, Finance 94–5w, 341w
Royal Opera House, Finance 94w

Ainsworth, Mr Peter—continued
Tourism, Millennium 367w
Training, Tourism 38w
Wembley Stadium 97w

Air conditioning
Aircraft 10w

Air misses
222w

Air pollution
167w, 375–6w

Air routes
221w, 224–5w

Air traffic
220w
South East region 219–22w

Aircraft
Air conditioning 10w
Taxation 380w

Aircraft carriers
Nuclear power 105–6w

Airlines
Service charges 363w

Airport tax
183–4w

Alexander, Mr Douglas
Questions
Drugs, Scotland 126w

Al-Fayed, Mohammed
Intelligence services 25w

Allan, Mr Richard
Debates etc.
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre (26.05.99) 319
Internet, Access (09.06.99) 612–3
Questions
Members, Allowances 394w
Official Report, CD-Rom 393–4w

Allergies
Children 17–9w

Allowances
Members 394w

Alternative medicine
Petitions (08.06.99) 542

Alzheimer's disease
157w
Aricept 20w, 117w, 451–2

Amess, Mr David
Debates etc.
Palace Theatre Westcliffe (26.05.99) 292–5
Waiting Times (National Health Service) Bill, 1R (25.05.99) 175–7
Questions
Disability living allowance 45w

Ammunition
Lead 374–5w

Anderson, Mr Donald
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 468–9
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 432–3

Anderson, Janet, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Culture Media and Sport*
Debates etc.
Broadcasting programmes, Children (26.05.99) 324–6
Newspaper press, Standards (09.06.99) 762–4
Questions
BBC, Commercial activities 231–2w

Anderson, Janet—continued
Catering, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 94w
Corporate hospitality, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 367w
Hotels, Licensing laws 186w
Millennium Exhibition, Retail trade 232w
News at Ten 233w
Radio Authority, Inquiries 94w
Television, Licensing 94w
Tourism, Millennium 367w

Angola
Armed conflict 369w
Trade promotion 308w

Animal breeding
Horses 252w

Animal experiments
Primates 79–80w, 262–3w

Animal feed
Genetically modified organisms 396w

Animal products
Vaccination 159w, 280w

Animal welfare
Shamrock Farms 79–80w, 262w

Animal Welfare (Prohibition of Imports) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
1R (08.06.99) 492–5

Antisocial behaviour orders
432–4w

Arad, Ron
310w

Archives
Coal Authority 344w

Aricept
Alzheimer's disease 20w, 117w, 451–2
Northern Ireland 117w

Armed conflict
208w
Angola 369w
Kosovo 21w, 124w, 145–6w, (25.05.99) 178–259, (26.05.99) 290–2, 304–6, 328w, 348, 407w, 413w

Armed forces
Education 331w
Falkland Islands 2w
Health services 329w
Manpower 210w
Pay 328w
Pensions 212–3w
Race relations 143–4w
Uniforms 208w
Vacancies 214w
Weapons 392–3w

Arms trade
Export controls 108w, 200–1w, 234w
Indonesia 236w, 364w
Iran 287–8w, 353–4w
Macedonia 119–20w
Military aircraft 1–2w
Russia 147w
Turkey 370w
Yugoslavia 200w

Armstrong, Rt Hon Hilary, Minister of State for Local Government and Housing, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions*
Questions
Capital receipts initiative, Carlisle 176w
Empty property, Council tax 322w
Housing management, Best value 92–3w
Local government, Reform 90w
Local government finance 218–9w, 225w

Armstrong, Rt Hon Hilary—continued*
Parish councils 227w
Schools, Finance 225w
Westminster City Council, Inquiries 85w

Army Base Repair Organisation
Old Dalby 213w

Art works
World War II 230w

Artillery
Procurement 330–1w

Arts Council of England
Buildings 96–7w
Grants 96w

Asbestos
British Rail 84w, 225w
Buildings 171–2w
Import controls 11w, 170–1w

Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 469–70
Questions
EC reform 641–2
Kosovo, Armed conflict 348

Ashton, Mr Joe
Debates etc.
Whitsun adjournment debate intervention (26.05.99) 275
Work permits, Football (26.05.99) 271–2
Questions
Members, Pay 2–3w

Assisted places scheme
776–7

Asthma
Children 417–8w

Asylum
see Political refugees

Atkins, Charlotte
Questions
Housing management, Best value 92–3w
Non-departmental public bodies, Public appointments 116–7w
Pre-school education, Northern Ireland 341

Atkinson, Mr David
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 821–3, 839
Questions
Confederation of Burial Authorities, Monuments 171w

Atkinson, Mr Peter
Questions
Education, Scotland 269w

Average earnings
Scotland 141–2w

Aviation
Safety 222w, 376–7w
Trade agreements 172–3w
Wales 356w

Avon
Probation and aftercare 263w

Baker, Norman
Debates etc.
Eastbourne Hospital, Nurses (24.05.99) 136
Questions
Bat meat 347w
Biotechnology Presentation Group 39w, 290w
Bovine somatotropin 247–8w
Bus services, Rural areas 373–4w
Genetically modified organisms 40w
Genetically modified organisms, Butterflies 8w

Baker, Norman—continued*
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 3w, 163w, 176w, 242–4w, 319w, 374w
Genetically modified organisms, Food 248w
Genetically modified organisms, Honey 248w
Genetically modified organisms, Maize 154–5
Genetically modified organisms, National Consumer Council 40w
Horserace Totalisator Board 152w
Libyan Arab Republic, Terrorism 308–9w
National Assembly for Wales 356w
Oilseed rape, Environment protection 5–6w
Public relations, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 83w
Public relations, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 42w
Public relations, Prime Minister 192–3w
Public relations, Treasury 180w
Shamrock Farms, Animal welfare 79–80w
Vaccination, Animal products 159w, 280w

Balance of trade
Manufactured goods 200w

Baldry, Mr Tony
Debates etc.
Animal Welfare (Prohibition of Imports) Bill, 1R (08.06.99) 492–4
Dioxins (08.06.99) 489
Kosovo (09.06.99) 756
Questions
Business questions 793

Ballard, Jackie
Questions
Developing countries, Tobacco 370w, 413w
Domestic violence 394w
NHS Direct 111–2w
Public libraries, Finance 231w
Quarantine 407w
Working families tax credit 181–3w

Bankruptcy
204w

Banks, Mr Tony, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Culture Media and Sport*
Questions
Football, World Cup 97w
National Lottery, Scotland 23w

Barclays Bank
Redundancy 775–6

Barnes, Mr Harry
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 363–4
Passports (26.05.99) 295–7
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 526, 535–7
Questions
Inland Revenue 184–5w
Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission 336

Barnet Football Club
Planning permission 216w

Barnsley
Magistrates 136w, 143w
NHS trusts 17w

Bat meat
347w

Battle, Mr John, Minister of State, Dept of Trade and Industry*
Debates etc.
Photovoltaics (25.05.99) 265–70

Battle, Mr John—continued*
Questions
Biotechnology, Medicine 343w
British Nuclear Fuels 202–3w
Cars, Imports 196–7w
Climate change levy 342–3w
Coal Authority, Archives 344w
EC Research Council 342w
Electricity, Trade competitiveness 197w
Electricity Act 1989 198w
Electricity Pool 235w
Energy, Prices 22w
Foresight programme 198w
Gas fired power stations 197–8w
Millennium compliance, British Nuclear Fuels 201–2w
Millennium compliance, EC Energy Council 234w
Millennium compliance, Nuclear power stations 11–2w
Mixed oxide fuel, Transport 343w
Natural gas, Complaints 401–2w
Natural gas, Meters 202w
Nuclear power stations 344–5w
Photovoltaics 109w
Power stations, Cleveland 365–6w
Radioactive materials, Japan 343–4w, 400w
Radiotherapy, Oesophageal cancer 364w
Science, Conferences 233w
Sellafield, Nuclear fuel reprocessing 234w
Soya beans, Brazil 199w
Textiles, Trade competitiveness 203–4w
United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority Constabulary, Inspections 110w
Wave power, Research 345w

Bayley, Mr Hugh, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Social Security*
Questions
Disability living allowance 45–6w
Incapacity benefit 46w
Invalid vehicles 49–50w
Maternity benefits 18
Severe disablement allowance 11–2
Social security benefits, Disabled 13–4, 51w
War pensions 7–8
Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill 1998/99 12–3

BBC
Commercial activities 142w, 231–2w, 236w

Beacon councils
West Midlands 8–9w

Beard, Mr Nigel
Questions
Schools, Playing fields 779–80

Beckett, Rt Hon Margaret, President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons*
Debates etc.
Business statements (26.05.99) 373–6
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 653–61, 664–6, 674, 677
Line of route (26.05.99) 385, 390–1, 396
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 411–2, 418, 420
Opposition, Finance (26.05.99) 427–8
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 82–6, 92–3, 106, 117, 119, 123
Questions
Business statements 783–97
Members, Pay 2–3w
Millennium compliance, Publicity 205w

Beef
Exports 111w

Beef—continued
Hormone treatments 111w
USA 111w
Wales 633–4, 638

Begg, Miss Anne
Questions
Disabled, Public buildings 344–5
Northern Ireland Assembly 339
Pre-school education, Voluntary schools 388–9w

Beggs, Mr Roy
Questions
Education, Northern Ireland 176w
Pre-school education, Northern Ireland 341–2
Sewage, Northern Ireland 298w
Teachers 770

Beith, Rt Hon A J
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 167
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 26–7
Questions
Criminal proceedings, Jurisdiction 425–7w
Identification of criminals, Genetics 427–30w
Legal aid, Expenditure 60w
Prisoners, Education 28w
Prisoners, Employment 29w
Targeted policing initiative 422–5w
UN Convention on the Rights of the Child 282w
Young offender institutions, Violence 28–9w

Belfast Agreement
335, 337–8

Bell, Mr Martin
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 472–3

Belmont Riding Centre
Planning permission 172w

Benefits Agency
see Social Security Benefits Agency

Benn, Rt Hon Tony
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 470

Bennett, Mr Andrew F
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 90

Bercow, Mr John
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 584, 588–9, 592
Dioxins (08.06.99) 490
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 498, 503–4
Questions
Arms trade, Macedonia 119–20w
Arms trade, Yugoslavia 200w
Business questions 796–7
Corporate hospitality, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 367w
Council of Europe 408w
Defence, Europe 209w
EC common foreign and security policy 12w
EC Foreign Affairs Council, Social security 25w
Electronic surveillance, EC action 148–9w
Electronic surveillance, Export controls 147–8w
Fisheries 44w
Health education, Sex 447
Job creation, EC action 327w
Millennium compliance, EC Energy Council 234w

Bercow, Mr John—continued
National grid for learning 781–2
Older workers, Unemployment 769
Parliamentary questions, Administrative delays 408w
Pinochet, Augusto 421w
Small businesses, Wales 631–2
"Youth and Europe - Our Future" 436w

Bermingham, Mr Gerald
Debates etc.
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 413
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 111–2, 118

Best value
Housing management 92–3w

Beta-interferon
419w
Correspondence 277w

Biotechnology
153w, 290–1w
Advisory bodies 291w
Medicine 343w
USA 175w

Biotechnology and Genetic Modification Ministerial Group
291w

Biotechnology Presentation Group
39w, 290w

Birmingham Airport
168–70w

Birmingham Relief Road
377w
Tolls 85w

Births and Deaths Registration (Amendment) Bill (HL) 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 958

Blair, Rt Hon Tony, Prime Minister, First Lord of the Treasury and Minister for the Civil Service*
Debates etc.
Kosovo, Ministerial statements (08.06.99) 463–79
Questions
Armed forces, Weapons 392–3w
Cabinet 13w, 98w
Cancer 352–3
Cancer, Medical treatments 14w
Class sizes 242w, 350
Class sizes, Secondary education 350–1
Council of Europe 408w
Developing countries, Debts 406w
Devolution, Departmental coordination 193w
Devolution, Prime Minister 12w
Disabled, Public buildings 344–5
Down's syndrome 642
Drugs, Rehabilitation centres 352
EC common foreign and security policy 12w
EC economic policy 644
EC internal relations 641
EC reform 641–2
EC trade 194–5w
Economic and monetary union 351–2, 639–41
Europe, Defence 347w
European Commission, Resignations 348–9
European Parliament elections 349, 645
Fishing vessels, Compensation 348
Further education 392w
Heavily indebted poor countries initiative 644–5
Holocaust Remembrance Day 408w
Horses 13w

Blair, Rt Hon Tony—continued
Hospitals, Waiting lists 642
Iraq, Uranium 12w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 348, 407w
Kosovo, Public opinion 193w
Kosovo, United Nations 347–8
M4, Bus lanes 643
Macedonia, International assistance 193w, 392w
Meat, Import controls 643
Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust, Waiting lists 646–8
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 98w
Ministerial policy advisors, Dept for Education and Employment 194w
National carers' strategy 643–4
NATO, Public relations 194w
NHS 643
Official engagements 194w, 347w
Parliamentary questions, Administrative delays 408w
Poetry 193–4w
Political parties, Finance 638–9
Post offices, Rural areas 349–50
Prisoners' release, Northern Ireland 645–6
Public relations, Prime Minister 192–3w
Quarantine 407w
Radioactive wastes 646
Regional aid, Greater London 351
Scottish Parliament, Correspondence 98w
Serbia, Ethnic groups 407w
Shotton steelworks 645
Standard of living 349
Taxation, EC action 344–5
Ulster Unionist Party, Correspondence 393w
USA, Prime Minister 393w
Welfare state, Reform 350
Withholding tax 352

Blears, Ms Hazel
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 85
Questions
Crime and disorder partnerships 158–9
NHS 643
Primary health care 274w

Blizzard, Mr Bob
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 529–32
Questions
Horses 13w
Horses, Animal breeding 252w
Pensioners, Income support 5
Pensions 50w
Regional development agencies 165w

Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry
335
Costs 299w

Blunkett, Rt Hon David, Secretary of State for Education and Employment*
Questions
City technology colleges 384w
Curriculum 773
Curriculum, Citizenship 773–4
Curriculum, Reform 772–3
Long term unemployed 768–9
Ministerial policy advisors, Dept for Education and Employment 190–1w
New deal for young people, Government departments 770–1
Older workers, Unemployment 769–70
Primary education, Numeracy 765
Schools, Private sector 384w
Teachers 770

Blunt, Mr Crispin
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 371
Questions
Armed forces, Manpower 210w
Means tested benefits 50w

Board of Inland Revenue
see Inland Revenue

Boateng, Mr Paul, Minister of State, Home Office
Questions
Antisocial behaviour orders 432–4w
Corporate manslaughter 346–7w
Crime, Journalism 81w
Criminal injuries compensation scheme 80–1w
Criminal proceedings, Jurisdiction 425–7w
Criminal Records Bureau 333w
Domestic violence 394w, 421w
Drugs, Convictions 428w
Firearms, Compensation 153w
Firearms, Death 335–6w
Fireworks, Safety 11w
Identification of criminals, Genetics 427–30w
Indictable offences 427–8w
Millennium compliance, Lancashire Constabulary 150w
Offences against children 80w, 432w
Police, Emergency calls 422w, 431w
Police, Leeds 262w
Police, Mentally disturbed offenders 152–3w
Police, Vehicles 431w
Rape, Prosecutions 34w
Riot control weapons 334w
Sex Offences Review 265–6w
Speed limits, Cameras 434w
Targeted policing initiative 422–5w
Voluntary organisations, Grants 151w

Bombings
Lockerbie 149
Sudan 124w

Bookmakers' Committee
78–9w

Borders region
EC grants and loans (10.06.99) 877–84

Boswell, Mr Tim
Debates etc.
Parliamentary questions, Points of order (08.06.99) 491
Questions
Cars, Imports 196–7w
Climate change levy 342–3w
Electricity, Trade competitiveness 197w
Electricity Pool 235w
Energy, Conservation 321–2w
Further education, Student numbers 391w
Gas fired power stations 197–8w
Lead, Fishing gear 374w
Pensioners, Income support 53w
Post Office 235w
Post offices, Social security benefits 21w
Prisoners, University for industry 28w
Regional development agencies 217w

Bottomley, Mr Peter
Questions
Cabinet 13w
European Parliament elections 645
Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry 71w

Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia
Debates etc.
Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 950–2
Pakistan, Religious freedom (09.06.99) 608

Bottomley, Rt Hon Virginia—continued
Questions
Cabinet 98w
Royal Surrey County and St Luke's Hospitals NHS Trust 446

Bovine somatotropin
247–8w
Milk 41w

Bovine spongiform encephalopathy
Waste disposal 299w

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy and Creutzfeld Jakob Disease Inquiry
110–1w

Boyd-Carpenter Board
see Family Law Advisory Board

Bradley, Mr Peter
Questions
Speed limits 319–20w

Brady, Mr Graham
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 170
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 99, 115, 126–7
Questions
British Council, Manchester 353w
Nurses, Pay 114w, 275w

Brake, Mr Tom
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 520–2, 540
Questions
Health hazards, Pollution 154–5w
Ilisu dam 342w
Nurses 272w
Radioactive materials, Japan 400w, 409w
Railways, Overcrowding 217w
Taxation, Aircraft 380w
Thameslink, Overcrowding 217w

Brazier, Mr Julian
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 369–70
Questions
Pensioners, Income support 4

Brazil
Soya beans 165w, 199w

Breast cancer
454–5

Breed, Mr Colin
Questions
Dental services, Cornwall 274–5w
Legal aid, Coroners 159–60

Bridges
Canary Wharf 91w

Brinton, Mrs Helen
Questions
Carbon dioxide 167w
Climate change levy 252w
Radio Authority, Inquiries 94w
Refrigeration, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 320w
Refrigeration, Dept of Trade and Industry 363w

Britain Visitor Centre
Operating costs 186–7w

British Airways
CityFlyer Express 201w

British Council
Manchester 353w

British Energy
Debts 381w

British Manufacturing and Research Company
287–8w

British Nuclear Fuels
202–3w
Millennium compliance 201–2w

British Rail
Asbestos 84w, 225w
Property transfer 320–1w

British Standards Institution
Unleaded petrol 167–8w

British Transport Police
6–7w

British-Irish Interparliamentary Body
177w

Broadcasting programmes
Children (26.05.99) 321–6

Broadcasting Standards Commission
95w

Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Debates etc.
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 938, 940–1
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 29
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 566–8
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 679
Kosovo (08.06.99) 472
Royal Parks (Trading) Bill, 1R (10.06.99) 797
Questions
Business questions 786–7
HIV infection, Finance 453

Brown, Rt Hon Nicholas, Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
Debates etc.
Dioxins, Ministerial statements (08.06.99) 480–90
Food Standards Bill, 1R (10.06.99) 797
Questions
Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy and Creutzfeld Jakob Disease Inquiry 110–1w
EC Agriculture Council 40–1w, 250–1w, 253w, 395–6w
Genetically modified organisms, Animal feed 396w
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 246–7w
Horses, Animal breeding 252w
Proof of identity, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 252–3w
USA, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 44–5w
Visits abroad, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 249–50w

Brown, Mr Russell
Questions
HIV infection, Medical treatments 273w
Hospital beds, Scotland 126w

Browne, Mr Desmond
Questions
Business Development Service, Standards 325w
Demonstrations, Drumcree 179w
Forest Research, Standards 336w

Browning, Mrs Angela
Debates etc.
Equity sharing, Elderly (26.05.99) 272–5

Bruce, Mr Ian
Debates etc.
Internet, Access (09.06.99) 613
Questions
EC grants and loans, Wales 635–6

Bruce, Mr Malcolm
Questions
Proof of identity, Treasury 286w
Science, Scotland 146–7

Burden, Mr Richard
Debates etc.
Severn Trent Water, Water charges (09.06.99) 622
Questions
Coroners 148w
Fireworks, Safety 11w
Northern Ireland government 176–7w

Burgon, Mr Colin
Questions
Countryside Agency 174w
Genetically modified organisms, Food 83w

Burns, Mr Simon
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 849
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 891–3, 898, 914–7, 923–4, 926–8, 933, 939–40, 944–5
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 575–6
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 499, 502–9, 523
Questions
Environmental impact assessment 218w
Lead, Ammunition 374–5w
Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust, Waiting lists 646–8
Social security benefits, Essex 51–3w

Burstow, Mr Paul
Questions
Chronic fatigue syndrome 154w
Epsom and St Helier NHS Trust 114w, 280w
Fares, Greater London 90w
Grant maintained schools, Finance 313w
Local government, Reform 90w
Local government finance 8w
Long-term Care Royal Commission 19w
National Institute for Clinical Excellence 158w, 283–4w
Social services 114w

Bus Fuel Duty (Exemptions) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Order for resuming adjourned 2R read (11.06.99) 959

Bus lanes
M4 643

Bus services
397w
Fuels 173w
Rural areas 373–4w

Business Development Service
Standards 325w

Business links
Expenditure 401w
Finance 438w

Business motions
(24.05.99) 133, (25.05.99) 259–60

Business statements
(26.05.99) 373–6, 783–97

Business travel
Psychiatric nurses 137w

Business travel*—*continued
Road traffic 6w

Busking
London Regional Transport 9–10w

Butterfill, Mr John
Questions
Withholding tax 352

Butterflies
Genetically modified organisms 8w

Byers, Rt Hon Stephen, Secretary of State for Trade and Industry
Questions
Export Credits Guarantee Dept, Risk assessment 198–9w
Gas fired power stations 109w
Manufactured goods, Balance of trade 200w
Office of Electricity Regulation, Cash limits 400w
Open government, Dept of Trade and Industry 200w
Partnership Fund 22–3w
Post offices, Social security benefits 21w
Proof of identity, Dept of Trade and Industry 203w
USA, Dept of Trade and Industry 364w
Visits abroad, Dept of Trade and Industry 204w

Bypasses
Carlisle 167w

Cabinet
13w, 98w

Cabinet Joint Consultative Committee
see Labour Liberal Democrats Joint Consultative Committee

Cabinet Office
Minimum wage 291w

Cable, Mr Vincent
Debates etc.
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre (26.05.99) 313–6
Questions
Alzheimer's disease, Aricept 20w, 117w, 451–2
Compulsorily detained mental patients, Young people 30w
Criminal records, Vetting 431w
Developing countries, Debts 406w
Economic and monetary union, Italy 287w
Elections, Hackney 255w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 29–30w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre, Education 31–3w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre, Mentally disturbed offenders 33w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre, Sexual offences 30–1w
Health services, Elderly 279w
Heavily indebted poor countries initiative 327w
Police, Emergency calls 431w
Police, Vehicles 431w
Prison visitors 33–4w
Sheltered housing 55–6w
Social Security Benefits Agency, Computers 306–7w
Taxation, Recruitment agencies 286–7w
Young offender institutions 30w
Young offender institutions, Health services 70–1w
Young offender institutions, Manpower 31–2w
Young offenders, Education 30w, 32w

Cable, Mr Vincent*—*continued
Young offenders, Prison accommodation 32w
Young offenders, Training 31w

Caborn, Rt Hon Richard, Minister for the Regions Regeneration and Planning, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions
Questions
Barnet Football Club, Planning permission 216w
Belmont Riding Centre, Planning permission 172w
Canary Wharf, Bridges 91w
Environmental Task Force, Chartermark scheme 226w
Heathrow Airport, Public inquiries 173w, 227–8w
RAF Hendon, Planning permission 172w
Regional development agencies 217w, 377w
Urban Task Force 91w

Calling of Members
Rulings and statements (09.06.99) 649

Cambridgeshire
Schools 187w

Camden
Health action zones 271w

Cameras
Speed limits 434w

Campbell, Mrs Anne
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 360
Questions
Dental services 271w
Schools, Cambridgeshire 187w
Schools, Closures 190w

Campbell, Rt Hon Menzies
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 803, 811
Kosovo (26.05.99) 360–1, (09.06.99) 746–7
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 101
Questions
Statistics, Dept of Health 279w
Territorial Army, Manpower 1w

Campbell, Mr Ronnie
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 34

Campbell-Savours, Mr Dale
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 487
Kosovo (08.06.99) 478
Line of route (26.05.99) 392–3, 399, 404–7
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 424
Ministerial statement intervention (08.06.99) 483
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 432
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 88
Questions
Cattle tracing system 250w
Housing benefit 47w
Identity cards 6
Weapons, Northern Ireland 177w

Canary Wharf
Bridges 91w

Cancer
352–3
Dundee University 146
Health services 153–4w
Medical treatments 14w, 19w, 112w, 279w, 281w

Cancer*—*continued
Screening 15w

Cann, Mr Jamie
Questions
Proof of identity, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 232–3w
Proof of identity, Home Office 260w

Capital receipts initiative
Carlisle 176w

Caplin, Mr Ivor
Debates etc.
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 946

Carbon dioxide
167w

Career structure
Midwives 382w, 458

Carers
State retirement pensions 51w, 304–5w

Carlisle
Bypasses 167w
Capital receipts initiative 176w

Cars
Imports 196–7w
Insurance 92w
VAT 58w

Casale, Mr Roger
Questions
Speed limits, Greater London 260w

Casement, Roger
394–5w

Cash, Mr William
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 184, 186

Cash limits
Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 398w
Inland Revenue 408–9w
Office of Electricity Regulation 400w
Office of Gas Supply 400w

Catering
Dept for Culture Media and Sport 94w

Caton, Mr Martin
Questions
Organic farming, Wales 3w
Vocational guidance, Wales 146–7w

Cattle tracing system
250w

CD-Rom
Official Report 393–4w

Cereals
EC action 42–3w

Certification quality marks
Medical equipment 415–9w

Cervical cancer
Screening 448–50

Chancellor of the Exchequer
see Treasury

Channel tunnel
Smuggling 59w

Chapman, Mr Ben
Questions
Administration of justice 134–5w
Children in care 274w
Gifted children, Teaching methods 766–7
Overseas aid 413w
Social security 47w

Chapman, Sir Sydney
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 84
Questions
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust 460–1
Housing benefit, Abuse 20
National Assembly for Wales 637–8
Portcullis House 118w
Primary care groups, Greater London 274w

Charities
Telephone services 343w

Chartermark scheme
Environmental Task Force 226w

Chaytor, Mr David
Debates etc.
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 559–66, 570–1
Questions
Radioactive wastes 646

Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment
214w

Chidgey, Mr David
Questions
Proof of identity, Dept of Trade and Industry 203w

Chief Medical Officer
Publications 292w

Chief Scientific Adviser
Publications 292w

Child benefit
Shrewsbury 339w

Child care tax credit
181–3w

Child Migrants Trust
281w

Child protection registers
277w
Northern Ireland 179w
Scotland 269w
Wales 267w

Child Support Agency
49w, 300w

Children
Allergies 17–9w
Asthma 417–8w
Broadcasting programmes (26.05.99) 321–6
Fares 227w
Health 271w
Heart diseases 357–8w
Hospital wards 113w
Passports 255–6w
Protection 157w

Children Act 1989
Questions
318w

Children in care
274w

China
409–10w
Dalai Lama 309w

China western poverty reduction project
239w

Chlamydiosis
447

Chope, Mr Christopher
Questions
Bankruptcy 204w

Chope, Mr Christopher*—*continued
Business questions 790–1

Chronic fatigue syndrome
154w

Chronically sick
National insurance contributions 181w

Citizenship
Curriculum 773–4

City technology colleges
384w

CityFlyer Express
British Airways 201w

Civil proceedings
136w

Civil service
New deal schemes 116w

Clappison, Mr James
Debates etc.
Ministerial statement intervention (25.05.99) 166
Questions
Drug treatment and testing orders 33w, 260w, 332w
Drugs, Convictions 428w
Drugs, Crime 260–1w
Home detention curfews 149w
Hospitals, Waiting lists 270w
Immigration, Appeals 395w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Administrative delays 34w
Indictable offences 427–8w
Magistrates' courts, Pontefract 291w
Offences against children 80w, 432w
Political refugees, Correspondence 255w
Probation and aftercare 71–2w

Clark, Rt Hon Dr David
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 26
Questions
Open government, Dept of Trade and Industry 200w
Open government, Northern Ireland Office 292w

Clarke, Mr Charles, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Education and Employment
Questions
After school clubs 780
Class sizes, Essex 189w
Computers 390–1w
Curriculum, Democracy 37w
Literacy, Primary education 390w
Local government finance 437w
National grid for learning 781–2
New deal for schools, Hendon 38w
Pupils, Cycling 390w
Pupils, First aid 387w
Schools, Cambridgeshire 187w
Schools, Closures 190w, 778–9
Schools, Information technology 189w
Schools, Playing fields 779–80
Schools, Swimming 101w
Schools access initiative 391w
Teachers, Computers 782
Teachers, Standards 101–2w

Clarke, Mr Eric
Questions
Mixed oxide fuel, Sellafield 399–400w
Regional selective assistance, Scotland 126w

Clarke, Rt Hon Tom
Questions
Industry, Gartcosh 127w

Clarke, Mr Tony
Debates etc.
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 893, 907, 911, 917, 946–7

Class sizes
242w, 350
Essex 189w
Gloucestershire 438w
Primary education 312w
Secondary education 350–1

Cleveland
Power stations 365–6w

Clifton-Brown, Mr Geoffrey
Questions
Fire Service College 261–2w
Local government finance 218–9w
New deal for young people, Leeds 313w
Police, Leeds 262w
Residential homes, Leeds 282w

Climate change levy
252w, 342–3w

Clinics
111–2w

Closed circuit television
Scotland 147

Clothing
Trade competitiveness 203–4w

Clwyd, Ann
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 474–5
Questions
Arms trade, Indonesia 364w
China 409–10w
China, Dalai Lama 309w
Export credit guarantees, Indonesia 235–6w
Import controls 235w
Kashmir, Overseas aid 238–9w
Overseas trade, Human rights 346w
Panchen Lama 309w
Refugees, Kosovo 358w

Clydeside
Shipbuilding 125w

Coaker Mr Vernon
Debates etc.
Line of route (26.05.99) 402–3, 405
Questions
Antisocial behaviour orders 432–4w
Armed forces, Pensions 212–3w
Bus services, Fuels 173w
Electronic government 382w
Foresight programme 198w
Litter 378w
Prostate cancer 277–8w
School choice 389w
Sure start programme 436–7w

Coal Authority
Archives 344w

Cohen, Mr Harry
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 823–8, 872
Questions
Corporate manslaughter 346–7w
Domestic violence 421w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 124w
Marriage of convenience 287w
Medical profession, Trade unions 282w
Police, River Thames 332–3w
Primates, Animal experiments 262–3w
Shamrock Farms, Animal welfare 262w
Speed limits, Cameras 434w

Coleman, Mr Iain
Questions
Millennium compliance, Publicity 205w
Partnership Fund 22–3w

Collins, Mr Tim
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 479
Questions
Nuclear fuel reprocessing 215w
Sellafield, Nuclear fuel reprocessing 234w

Colman, Mr Tony
Debates etc.
Pakistan, Religious freedom (09.06.99) 605–7, 611
Questions
Business questions 791
Cash limits, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 398w
Greater London Authority 398–9w
Greenhouse effect 83–4w
Motor vehicles, Grants 175w
National childcare strategy 385w

Colvin, Mr Michael
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 477

Commercial activities
BBC 142w, 231–2w, 236w

Commission for Health Improvement
Operating costs 416w

Commission for Racial Equality
Annual reports 333w

Commission of the European Communities
see European Commission

Committee on the Award of Honours Decorations and Medals
212w

Common Services Agency
Millennium compliance 129–30w

Commonwealth
Human rights 38–9w, 350–1w
Overseas students 99w

Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill (HL) 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R and Money res* (24.05.99) 38–80

Community hospitals
Private finance initiative 456–7

Community Legal Service
62w, 135w

Compensation Agency
see Northern Ireland Compensation Agency

Compulsorily detained mental patients
Young people 30w

Computers
390–1w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate 35–6w
Social Security Benefits Agency 306–7w
Teachers 782

Concessionary Television Licences for Pensioners Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
1R (09.06.99) 650–2

Conditions of employment
Higher education 316w

Confederation of Burial Authorities
Monuments 171w

Confiscation orders
Identity cards 406w

Connarty, Mr Michael
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 172–3
European Communities (25.05.99) 183
Questions
Modern apprenticeships, Scotland 152
Warm deal, Scotland 373w

Conservation
Energy 321–2w
Whales 348–50w

Consolidation bills
316–8w

Consultants
Dept for International Development 239–40w

Contact orders
Domestic violence 318w

Contingencies Fund
(26.05.99) 334

Contraceptives
Health hazards 156w

Contracts
Immigration and Nationality Directorate 151w

Convention on the Protection of the European Communities Financial Interests
435–6w

Convictions
Drugs 428w

Cook, Rt Hon Robin, Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs*
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 178–88, 197, 200
Questions
Al-Fayed, Mohammed, Intelligence services 25w
Government Communications Headquarters, Pension rights 307–8w
Sierra Leone 118w

Corbett, Mr Robin
Questions
Disability living allowance 45–6w
EC trade 194–5w
Health, Children 271w

Corbyn, Mr Jeremy
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 370
Questions
Coroners, Northern Ireland 300w
Health action zones, Camden 271w
Kosovo, United Nations 347–8
Pensioners, Income support 16–7
Scheduled offences, Northern Ireland 205w

Cormack, Sir Patrick
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 654, 692, 695–6, 698, 700, 711–2, 717, 737–40
Line of route (26.05.99) 391–6
Recess motions (26.05.99) 306–9
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 430–1

Cormorants
Pest control 249w

Cornwall
Dental services 274–5w
Tourism (26.05.99) 288–90

Coroners
148w
Legal aid 159–60
Northern Ireland 300w

Corporate hospitality
Dept for Culture Media and Sport 367w

Corporate manslaughter
346–7w

Correspondence
Beta-interferon 277w
Dept of Health 115w
Members 276–7w, 403–5w, 409w, 411w, 420w, 437–8w
Political refugees 255w
Scottish Parliament 98w
Ulster Unionist Party 393w
Untreated milk 196w
Young offenders 255w

Corruption
EC institutions 435w
Metropolitan Police (26.05.99) 437–44

Cot deaths
Scotland 128w

Cotter, Mr Brian
Questions
Business links, Expenditure 401w
Business links, Finance 438w
Probation and aftercare, Avon 263w
Road traffic, Business travel 6w
Small businesses 400–1w
Small businesses, Technology 184w
Small businesses, Telephone numbering 401w

Council housing
Construction 171w
Sales 229w
Slums 172w

Council of Europe
408w

Council of Ministers
120–4w
Wales 635

Council tax
Empty property 322w

Country Lanes and Villages Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 958

Countryside Agency
174w

County courts
Staffordshire 160

Cox, Mr Tom
Questions
Alzheimer's disease 157w
Armed forces, Uniforms 208w
Asbestos, Buildings 171–2w
Child protection registers 277w
Child protection registers, Northern Ireland 179w
Child protection registers, Scotland 269w
Child protection registers, Wales 267w
Children, Protection 157w
Class sizes, Primary education 312w
Commonwealth, Human rights 38–9w, 350–1w
Council housing, Construction 171w
Council housing, Slums 172w
Curriculum, Democracy 37w
Cyprus, Drugs 352w
Fertility, Medical treatments 156–7w
Foot and mouth disease 42w
Freight 171w
Hospital wards, Children 113w
Metropolitan Police, Recruitment 151w

Cox, Mr Tom—continued
New deal for young people 310–1w
Northern Cyprus 26w
Northern Cyprus, Ethnic groups 25–6w
Overseas students, Commonwealth 99w
Rape, Prosecutions 34w
Russia, Arms trade 147w
Schools, Information technology 189w
Schools, Wandsworth 386w
Social security benefits, Appeals 340w
Sudan, Foreign relations 307w

Crausby, Mr David
Questions
Armed forces, Education 331w
Belfast Agreement 335

Crime
Diplomatic service 351w
Drugs 260–1w
Journalism 81w

Crime and Disorder Act 1998
Questions
432–4w

Crime and disorder partnerships
158–9

Crimes of violence
Northern Ireland 36–8w, 298–9w

Criminal injuries compensation scheme
80–1w

Criminal proceedings
Jurisdiction 425–7w
USA 409w

Criminal records
Vetting 431w

Criminal Records Bureau
333w

Crops
Genetically modified organisms 3w, 163w, 176w, 215–6w, 242–4w, 246–7w, 319w, 374w

Cryer, Mr John
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 204–9, 234–5, 238
Questions
Inland waterways, Industrial health and safety 89–90w

Cryptography
Law enforcement 195–6w

Cumbria
Kidney patients 114w

Cunliffe, Mr Lawrence
Questions
Bookmakers Committee 78–9w

Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr Jack, Minister for the Cabinet Office
Debates etc.
Drugs, Ministerial statements (25.05.99) 161–73
Questions
Biotechnology 153w, 290–1w
Biotechnology, Advisory bodies 291w
Biotechnology and Genetic Modification Ministerial Group 291w
Biotechnology Presentation Group 39w, 290w
Chief Medical Officer, Publications 292w
Civil service, New deal schemes 116w
Electronic government 382w
Genetically modified organisms 40w
Genetically modified organisms, Food 292w
Genetically modified organisms, Health hazards 290–1w

Cunningham, Rt Hon Dr Jack—continued
Genetically modified organisms, National Consumer Council 40w
Labour Liberal Democrats Joint Consultative Committee 39w
Magistrates' courts, Pontefract 291w
Members, Correspondence 403–5w

Cunningham, Mr Jim
Questions
Beacon councils, West Midlands 8–9w
Cycling, Death 86–7w
Dietary supplements, Safety 251w
Disability Discrimination Act 1995 188w
Disability Rights Commission 188w
Driving, EC law 85–6w
Leave, Disabled 188–9w
Manufacturing industries, West Midlands 142w
Roads, Safety 86w
Stakeholder pensions 48w
Walking, Urban areas 9w

Curriculum
773
Citizenship 773–4
Democracy 37w
Reform 772–3

Curtis-Thomas, Ms Claire
Debates etc.
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 570
Questions
British Transport Police 6–7w
Diplomatic service, Engineers 410–1w
Environment protection 44w
New deal for young people 385w

Customs and Excise
X rays 56w

Cycling
Death 86–7w
Pupils 390w
Urban areas 9w

Cyprus
Drugs 352w

Dafis, Mr Cynog
Questions
Dairy farming, Wales 361–2w
NHS, Wales 629–30

Dairy farming
Wales 361–2w, 638

Dalai Lama
China 309w

Dalyell, Mr Tam
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 374
Defence (10.06.99) 800–1, 816, 829, 843–6
Devolution (09.06.99) 599
Dioxins (08.06.99) 489
European Communities (25.05.99) 181, 189
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 562, 565, 567, 571, 580
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 658
Kosovo (26.05.99) 367–8, (08.06.99) 472, (09.06.99) 748–9
Kosovo, Armed conflict (26.05.99) 290–2
Macedonia, Points of order (09.06.99) 649
Questions
Air pollution 375–6w
Armed forces, Weapons 392–3w
Business questions 789–90
Housing benefit, Students 11
Iraq, Uranium 12w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 407w
Limestone, Environment protection 7w
Lockerbie, Bombings 149

Dalyell, Mr Tam—continued*
Patents, Applications 372–3w
Serbia, Ethnic groups 407w

Darling, Rt Hon Alistair, Secretary of State for Social Security*
Questions
Identity cards 6
Pensioners, Income support 16–8
Social security benefits, Abuse 5
Social security benefits, Appeals 47w
Social security benefits, Lone parents 105w
Social security benefits, Post offices 6–7
Social Security Benefits Agency, Manpower 1–2

Darvill, Mr Keith
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 117–8

Davey, Mrs Valerie
Debates etc.
Health foods, Petitions (09.06.99) 748, 758
Questions
Northern Ireland government 176–7w

Davidson, Mr Ian
Questions
Asbestos, Import controls 170–1w

Davies, Rt Hon Denzil
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 474
Questions
Taxation, EC action 380w

Davies, Mr Geraint
Questions
Prisons, Redundancy pay 178–9w

Davies, Mr Quentin
Debates etc.
Ministers, Points of order (24.05.99) 35
Questions
Social security benefits, Post offices 10

Davis, Rt Hon David
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 597–9
Drugs (25.05.99) 169
Line of route (26.05.99) 399, 402–3
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 415–9, 422–4
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 88–9
Questions
British Manufacturing and Research Company 287–8w
Scottish Parliament, Elections 125–6w

Day, Mr Stephen
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 700
Questions
Prisoners' release, Northern Ireland 645–6

Dean, Mrs Janet
Questions
Milk Marque 236w
Service Children's Education, Standards 329w

Death
Cycling 86–7w
Firearms 335–6w
Pedestrians 86–7w
Police custody 335w

Debts
British Energy 381w
Developing countries 237–8w, 406w

Defence
Europe 209w, 347w
Expenditure 328w

Defence Analytical Services Agency
Standards 330w

Defence Evaluation and Research Agency
210–1w

Defence Intelligence and Security Centre
Standards 372w

Defence Pay and Personnel Agency see Pay and Personnel Agency

Democracy
Curriculum 37w

Demonstrations
Drumcree 179w, 342

Denham, Mr John, Minister of State, Dept of Health*
Debates etc.
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust (08.06.99) 549, 551, 553–8
Questions
Alzheimer's disease, Aricept 451–2
Beta-interferon 419w
Beta-interferon, Correspondence 277w
Cancer, Medical treatments 281w
Commission for Health Improvement, Operating costs 416w
Contraceptives, Health hazards 156w
Correspondence, Dept of Health 115w
Dental services 271w, 277w
Dental services, Cornwall 274–5w
Dental services, Pensioners 381w
Dental services, Scarborough 274w
Doctors, Racial discrimination 275–6w
Epsom and St Helier NHS Trust 114w, 280w
Fluoride, Water treatment 419w
General practitioners, Manpower 273w
General practitioners, Sunderland 271w
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust 414–5w, 460–1
Health action zones, Camden 271w
Health action zones, South Yorkshire 275w
Health authorities, Rural areas 272w
Health insurance, Tax allowances 112w
Health services, Elderly 279w
Homeopathy 419–20w
Hospitals, Waiting lists 270–1w
Investing in dentistry initiative 19–20w
Junior doctors, Working hours 445–6, 458
Medical laboratory scientific officers, Pay 283w
Medical profession, Students 19w
Medical profession, Trade unions 282w
Members, Correspondence 276–7w
Midwives, Career structure 382w
National Institute for Clinical Excellence 158w, 283–4w
NHS 276w
NHS, Finance 283w
NHS, Greater London 272w
NHS, Operating costs 381w
NHS, Pay 280–1w
NHS Direct 111–2w
NHS trusts, Barnsley 17w
NHS trusts, Directors 114–5w
NHS trusts, Mergers 160–1w, 455–6
Nurses 272w
Nurses, Pay 17w, 114w, 275w
Ophthalmic services, Pensioners 16w
Out-patients, Waiting lists 272w
Prescription drugs, Rationing 452
Primary care groups, Greater London 274w
Primary health care 274w
Psychiatry, Ethnic groups 14–5w
Royal Naval Hospital Haslar 283w
Royal Shrewsbury Hospital, Radiotherapy 415–6w

Denham, Mr John—continued*
Royal Surrey County and St Luke's Hospitals NHS Trust 445–6
Staffordshire Ambulance Service 415w
Statistics, Dept of Health 279w
Surgery, Waiting lists 270w
Viagra 417w
West Kent Health Authority 115w

Dental services
271w, 277w
Cornwall 274–5w
Pensioners 381w
Scarborough 274w
Whitby 274w

Departmental coordination
Devolution 193w

Deployment
Reserve forces 108w

Dept for Culture Media and Sport
Catering 94w
Corporate hospitality 367w
Proof of identity 232–3w
Public expenditure 187w

Dept for Education and Employment
Minimum wage 387–8w
Ministerial policy advisors 190–1w, 194w

Dept for International Development
Consultants 239–40w
Minimum wage 239w

Dept of Health
Correspondence 115w
Statistics 279w

Dept of Social Security
Information technology 50w
Minimum wage 383w

Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions
Cash limits 398w
Minimum wage 227w
Public relations 83w
Refrigeration 320w
USA 175w

Dept of Trade and Industry
Minimum wage 236w
Open government 200w
Proof of identity 203w
Recruitment 366–7w
Refrigeration 363w
USA 364w
Visits abroad 204w

Derelict land
Construction 91w
Taxation 142w

Developing countries
Debts 237–8w, 406w
Genetically modified organisms 237w
Overseas aid 240w
Private sector 240–1w
Tobacco 370w, 413w

Devolution
(09.06.99) 581–604
Departmental coordination 193w
Prime Minister 12w

Diesel fuel
Prices 327w

Dietary supplements
Safety 251w

Dioxins
Ministerial statements (08.06.99) 480–90

Diplomatic immunity
351w

Diplomatic service
Crime 351w
Engineers 410–1w
Unpaid fines 355–6w

Dir91/439/EEC
85–6w

Dir94/57/EC
87w

Dir96/61/EC
(08.06.99) 496–541

Dir97/11/EC
218w

Director General of Electricity Supply
see Office of Electricity Regulation

Director General of Gas Supply
see Office of Gas Supply

Directors
Insolvency 402w
NHS trusts 114–5w, 460

Disability Benefits Forum
Resignations 11–2

Disability Discrimination Act 1995
Questions
188w

Disability living allowance
45–6w

Disability Rights Commission
188w, 389w

Disabled
Employment 775
Leave 188–9w
National insurance contributions 181w
Public buildings 344–5
Railways 174w
Redundancy 775–6
Social security benefits 13–4, 51w, 305–6w
State retirement pensions 304–5w

Disabled person's tax credit
184w

Disadvantaged
Health services 278–9w
Scotland 125w

Disciplinary proceedings
Prisons 258w
Royal Ulster Constabulary 326w

Discrimination
Older workers 768–9

Diseases
Urinary system 160w

Dismore, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 108
Questions
Arad, Ron 310w
Barnet Football Club, Planning permission 216w
Belmont Riding Centre, Planning permission 172w
Criminal injuries compensation scheme 80–1w
Diplomatic immunity 351w
Diplomatic service, Crime 351w
Embassies, Email 26w
Holocaust Remembrance Day 408w
Israel, Visits abroad 309w
Judges' Council 157–8
London Regional Transport, Busking 9–10w
New deal for schools, Hendon 38w
Personal injury, Compensation 135–6w, 318w

Dismore, Mr Andrew—continued
Police, Emergency calls 422w
RAF Hendon, Planning permission 172w
Reading, Parents 389w
Thameslink, Hendon 217w
Turkey, Human rights 352w
War pensions 7–8

Dobson, Rt Hon Frank, Secretary of State for Health
Questions
Cervical cancer, Screening 448–50
Community hospitals, Private finance initiative 456–7
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust 112–3w
Health services, Kent 459
HIV infection, Finance 453
Hospitals, Private finance initiative 457
Midwives, Career structure 458

Doctors
Racial discrimination 275–6w

Dogs
266–7w

Domestic violence
394w, 421w
Contact orders 318w

Donaldson, Mr Jeffrey M
Questions
Bovine spongiform encephalopathy, Waste disposal 299w
Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission 336
Prisoners' release, Northern Ireland 117w
Transport, Northern Ireland 324w

Doncaster
Magistrates 136w, 143w
NHS trusts 17w

Donohoe, Mr Brian H
Questions
Closed circuit television, Scotland 147
National Lottery, Scotland 23w

Doran, Mr Frank
Questions
Oil and Gas Industry Task Force 127w

Dorrell, Rt Hon Stephen
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 185, 209–16
Questions
Community hospitals, Private finance initiative 456–7

Dover
Rescue services 223w

Down's syndrome
642

Drew, Mr David
Debates etc.
Alternative medicine, Petitions (08.06.99) 542
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 565
Photovoltaics (25.05.99) 263–4
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 514, 532–5
Questions
Beef, Exports 111w
Beef, Hormone treatments 111w
Business travel, Psychiatric nurses 137w
Disability Rights Commission 389w
Food, Advisory bodies 41w
Health authorities, Rural areas 272w
Iran, Arms trade 353–4w
Libyan Arab Republic, Export controls 353w
Maternity services, Rural areas 454

Drew, Mr David—continued
Meat Hygiene Service, Fees and charges 111w
Milk, Bovine somatotropin 41w
New deal for young people 311w
RAF Quedgeley 213w, 328w
Tibet, Farmers 180w
UN Register of Conventional Arms 354w

Driving
EC law 85–6w

Driving under influence
164–5w, 320w

Drown, Ms Julia
Debates etc.
Genetically modified organisms (26.05.99) 300–4
Questions
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 215–6w
Heavily indebted poor countries initiative 138w
Smoking, Television 272–3w

Drug treatment and testing orders
33w, 260w, 332w

Drugs
Convictions 428w
Crime 260–1w
Cyprus 352w
Ministerial statements (25.05.99) 161–73
Prisons 151–2w
Rehabilitation centres 352
Scotland 126–7w
Wales 634–5

Drumcree
Demonstrations 179w, 342
Orange Order 342–3

Duncan, Mr Alan
Questions
Allergies, Children 17–9w
Army Base Repair Organisation, Old Dalby 213w
Prescription drugs, Rationing 452

Duncan Smith, Mr Iain
Debates etc.
Metropolitan Police, Corruption (26.05.99) 437–40, 442–3
Questions
Social security benefits, Post offices 6–7

Dundee University
Cancer 146

Dunwoody, Mrs Gwyneth
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 31
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 83, 89, 91–4, 96, 103, 111, 114, 121
Questions
Air routes 221w, 224–5w
Air traffic 220w
Air traffic, South East region 219–22w
Aviation, Safety 222w, 376–7w
National Air Traffic Services 220w
Rescue services, Dover 223w
Rescue services, Manpower 223–4w, 397w
Shipping, Forecasts 223w

Eagle, Angela, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Social Security
Questions
Child benefit, Shrewsbury 339w
Child Support Agency 49w, 300w
Housing benefit 14–5, 47w, 301w
Housing benefit, Abuse 18–20
Housing benefit, Overpayments 303w

Eagle, Angela—continued*
Housing benefit, Proof of identity 302–3w
Housing benefit, Students 11
Income support 301–2w
Income support, Political refugees 301w
Information technology, Dept of Social Security 50w
Means tested benefits 50w
Minimum wage, Dept of Social Security 383w
New deal for lone parents 49w
Pensioners, Income support 4–5
Political refugees, Finance 340–1w
Prescriptions, Fees and charges 46w
Sheltered housing 55–6w
Social security 47w
Social Security Act 1998 103–4w
Social security appeal tribunals 339–40w
Social security benefits, Administrative delays 48–9w
Social security benefits, Appeals 340w
Social security benefits, Disabled 305–6w
Social security benefits, Essex 51–3w
Social security benefits, Medical examinations 338w
Social security benefits, Post offices 382–3w
Social security benefits, Students 304w
Social Security Benefits Agency, Computers 306–7w
"Support in Bereavement Consultation Paper" 304w
Widowed people, Employment 303w
Working families tax credit, Parental leave 105w

Eastbourne Hospital
Nurses (24.05.99) 134–42

EC action
Cereals 42–3w
Electronic surveillance 148–9w
Fraud 264w
Horticulture 347–8w
Job creation 327w
Taxation 344–5, 380w
Telecommunications 400w

EC Agriculture Council
40–1w, 250–1w, 253w, 395–6w

EC aid
Mongolia (08.06.99) 542

EC budget
137w, 289w

EC Commission
see European Commission

EC common foreign and security policy
12w

EC economic policy
644

EC Education Council
313w

EC Energy Council
Millennium compliance 234w

EC Fisheries Council
251w

EC Foreign Affairs Council
23–5w
Social security 25w

EC grants and loans
Borders region (10.06.99) 877–84
Fisheries 245–6w
Northern Ireland 178w, 337
Scotland 22w, 126w, 129w
Wales 356w, 359–60w, 635–6

EC institutions
Corruption 435w

EC internal relations
641

EC Labour and Social Affairs Council
314w

EC law
Driving 85–6w
Genetically modified organisms 163–4w
Scotland 150–2
Shipping 87w

EC reform
641–2

EC Research Council
342w

EC trade
194–5w

EC Youth Council
97–8w

Economic and monetary union
351–2, 639–41
French overseas territories 137w
Italy 287w

Eddie Stobart
Grants 175w

Education
Armed forces 331w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 31–3w
Finance 311–2w
Greater London 780–1
Northern Ireland 176w
Prisoners 28w
Scotland 128w, 269w
Young offenders 30w, 32w

Edwards, Mr Huw
Questions
Schools, Transport 357w
Small businesses, Wales 633
Students, Fees and charges 316w

Efford, Mr Clive
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 116

Elderly
Equity sharing (26.05.99) 272–5
Health services 279w
Institutional care 461–2

Elections
Hackney 255w
Scottish Parliament 125–6w

Electoral systems
Northern Ireland government 339

Electricity
Meters 302w
Trade competitiveness 197w

Electricity Act 1989
Questions
198w

Electricity Pool
235w

Electromagnetic fields
Health hazards 165–6w

Electronic government
139w, 382w

Electronic surveillance
EC action 148–9w
Export controls 147–8w

Ellman, Mrs Louise
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 201, 215, 249–51

Ellman, Mrs Louise—continued*
Middle East, Peace negotiations (26.05.99) 328–9
Questions
Education, Finance 311–2w
Northern Ireland government 177w

Eltham
Police 436w

Email
Embassies 26w

Embassies
Email 26w

Emergency calls
Police 422w, 431w

Emery, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Debates etc.
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry, Points of order (26.05.99) 372, 378
Kosovo (26.05.99) 363, (09.06.99) 749–50
Line of route (26.05.99) 384
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 94–5

Employment
Disabled 775
Prisoners 29w
Widowed people 303w

Employment schemes
European Social Fund 288w, 386–7w

Empty property
Council tax 322w

Energy
Conservation 321–2w
Prices 22w, 136–7w
Taxation 645

Energy Conservation (Housing) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Order for resuming adjourned 2R read (11.06.99) 958

Energy Efficiency Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Order for resuming adjourned 2R read (11.06.99) 958

Engineers
Diplomatic service 410–1w

English Tourism Council
95w

Ennis, Mr Jeff
Questions
Magistrates, Barnsley 136w, 143w
Magistrates, Doncaster 136w
NHS trusts, Barnsley 17w

Entry clearances
Administrative delays 368–9w

Environment protection
44w
Limestone 7w
Oilseed rape 5–6w
Petrol 322w

Environmental impact assessment
218w

Environmental Task Force
225–6w, 314–5w
Chartermark scheme 226w

Environmentally sensitive areas
44w

Epsom and St Helier NHS Trust
114w, 280w

Equality Commission for Northern Ireland
see Northern Ireland Equality Commission

Equity sharing
Elderly (26.05.99) 272–5

Erskine bridge
191w

Essex
Class sizes 189w
Social security benefits 51–3w
Structure plans (26.05.99) 279–81

Etherington, Bill
Questions
Social security appeal tribunals 339–40w

Ethnic groups
Magistrates 135w
Northern Cyprus 25–6w
Psychiatry 14–5w
Serbia 407w

EU Justice and Home Affairs Council
34–5w

Europe
Defence 209w, 347w

European Commission
Resignations 348–9

European Communities
see also EC and EU headings

European Communities
(25.05.99) 178–259
Scotland 151

European fighter aircraft
2w

European Parliament elections
349, 645

European Parliamentary Elections (Gibraltar) Bill (HL) 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 960

European Social Fund
Employment schemes 288w, 386–7w

Evans, Mr Nigel
Debates etc.
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust (08.06.99) 543–9, 556, 558
Questions
Advertising, Welsh Office 267–8w
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust 112–3w, 460
National Assembly for Wales, Ministers 268w
Small businesses, Wales 633

Exchange control
Overseas investment 327w

Excise duties
Vehicles 92w

Exhaust emissions
Lorries 164w

Export controls
Arms trade 108w, 200–1w, 234w
Electronic surveillance 147–8w
Libyan Arab Republic 353w
Military aircraft 206–7w

Export credit guarantees
Indonesia 235–6w

Export Credits Guarantee Dept
Risk assessment 198–9w

Exports
Beef 111w

Exservicemen
Homelessness 226–7w

Faber, Mr David
Debates etc.
Warminster Hospital, Points of order (08.06.99) 491

Fabricant, Mr Michael
Questions
Beef, Wales 638
County courts, Staffordshire 160
Students, Fees and charges 143

Falkland Islands
Armed forces 2w
Fishing grounds 119w

Fallon, Mr Michael
Questions
BBC, Commercial activities 142w, 231–2w, 236w
Post Office, Takeovers 110w
Road traffic, Pollution control 216w
Students, Fees and charges 124w

Families
259–60w

Family Law Advisory Board
326w

Fares
Children 227w
Greater London 90w

Farmers
see also Agriculture

Farmers
Income 359w
Tibet 180w
Wales 359w

Fees and charges
Food Standards Agency 128w
Meat Hygiene Service 111w
Nursing homes 20w, 159w
Prescriptions 46w
Slaughterhouses 43–4w, 395w
Students 99w, 124–5w, 143–5, 153–4, 316w, 385–6w

Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre
29–30w, 153w, (26.05.99) 313–20
Education 31–3w
Mentally disturbed offenders 33w
Sexual offences 30–1w

Females
Agriculture 43w

Fertility
Medical treatments 156–7w

Field, Rt Hon Frank
Questions
Disabled person's tax credit 184w
Housing benefit 47w, 301w
National insurance contributions, Disabled 181w
NHS, Pay 280–1w
Nursing homes, Fees and charges 20w, 159w
Social security benefits, Abuse 187w
Social security benefits, Post offices 16, 382–3w

Finance
Business links 438w
Education 311–2w
Further education 189–90w
Grant maintained schools 313w, 771–2
HIV infection 453
London Regional Transport 5w
Maternity services 454
Museum of London 232w
NHS 283w, 360–1w
Opposition (26.05.99) 427–9

Finance—continued
Political parties 638–9, 642–3
Political refugees 340–1w
Public libraries 231w
Royal Academy of Dramatic Art 94–5w, 341w
Royal Opera House 94w
Schools 225w, 315–6w
Wales 268–9w

Financial services
186w
VAT 289w

Financial Services Act 1986
Questions
141w

Financial Services and Markets Bill (Draft)
Questions
139–40w

Fire Service College
34w, 261–2w

Firearms
Compensation 153w
Death 335–6w
Training 98–9w

Fires
Gloucestershire 257–8w

Fireworks
Safety 11w

First aid
Pupils 387w

First secretary
National Assembly for Wales 357w

Fisher, Mr Mark
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 693–8, 700–1

Fisheries
44w, 249w
EC grants and loans 245–6w
Grants 245–6w

Fishing gear
Lead 374w

Fishing grounds
Falkland Islands 119w
Scotland 149, 151

Fishing vessels
Compensation 348
Safety 228w

Fitzpatrick, Jim
Questions
Regional aid, Greater London 351

Flint, Caroline
Questions
Peat Extraction Working Group 87w

Flood control
195w

Fluoride
Water treatment 419w

Flynn, Paul
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 487–8
Drugs (25.05.99) 167–8
Questions
Business questions 787–8
Lobbying, Wales 636
Mann, Eric 148w
Riot control weapons 334w

Food
Advisory bodies 41w

Food—continued
Genetically modified organisms 83w, 248w, 292w
Import controls 345–6w

Food Standards Agency
Fees and charges 128w

Food Standards Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
1R (10.06.99) 797

Foot and mouth disease
42w

Football
Work permits (26.05.99) 271–2
World Cup 97w

Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 885–948

Ford Prison
421w

Foreign and Commonwealth Office
National Assembly for Wales 359–60w

Foreign relations
India 307w
Pakistan 307w
South Africa 310w
Sudan 307w

Foresight programme
198w

Forest Research
Standards 336w

Forth, Mr Eric
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 374–5
Devolution (09.06.99) 587, 591
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 894–901, 904, 906–14, 919–24, 927–33, 935–42, 944, 947–8
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 33–4
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 680, 695–6, 712, 719–20, 729–31, 739
Kosovo (08.06.99) 471
Line of route (26.05.99) 385, 400–2
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 412–5, 417–8
Ministers, Points of order (24.05.99) 35
Oral question time intervention (09.06.99) 635
Points of order (24.05.99) 6
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 102, 105–10, 114
Questions
Energy, Prices 136–7w
Health insurance, Tax allowances 112w
Social security benefits, Abuse 15–6

Foster, Mr Don
Questions
Teachers, Computers 782

Foster, Mr Michael Jabez, (Hastings and Rye)
Questions
Reparation by offenders, Northern Ireland 179w

Foster, Mr Michael John, (Worcester)
Questions
Untreated milk, Correspondence 196w

Foulkes, Mr George, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for International Development
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 73, 76–9

Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 23–5

Fox, Dr Liam
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 655, 659–68
Liberal Democrats, Points of order (09.06.99) 649
Questions
Beef, Wales 634
Devolution, Departmental coordination 193w
Junior doctors, Wales 630–1
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 98w, 149–50
Scottish Parliament, Correspondence 98w
Students, Fees and charges 145

Fraser, Mr Christopher
Debates etc.
Kosovo (09.06.99) 756
Roads, Petitions (26.05.99) 436
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 112
Questions
Severe disablement allowance 11–2

Fraud
EC action 264w

Freedom of Information Bill (Draft)
Debates etc.
Ministerial statements (24.05.99) 21–34

Freight
171w, 377w

French overseas territories
Economic and monetary union 137w

Frigates
Satellite broadcasting 211w

Fuels
Bus services 173w

Funerals
346w
Planning permission (11.06.99) 961–8

Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Rep adjourned (11.06.99) 957

Further education
99–100w, 310w, 392w
Finance 189–90w
Scotland 133w
Student numbers 391w

Fyfe, Maria
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 47
Questions
Modern apprenticeships, Glasgow 153
NHS, Scotland 129w
Northern Ireland Compensation Agency, Standards 179w
Northern Ireland government 177w
Social security benefits, Disabled 51w, 305–6w
Violence, Northern Ireland 340
Widowed people, Employment 303w

Galloway, Mr George
Debates etc.
Newspaper press, Standards (09.06.99) 759–62

Gapes, Mr Mike
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 195, 212–3, 216–9

Gapes, Mr Mike—continued
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 93, 106
Questions
European Parliament elections 349
Incapacity benefit 46w
Land, Pollution 322–4w
UNESCO 180w

Gardiner, Mr Barry
Questions
Greater London Authority 399w
Headteachers 385w
Local government finance 225w
Political refugees 333–4w

Garnier, Mr Edward
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 376
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 702, 708
Kosovo (08.06.99) 478
Questions
Immigration, Appeals 156
Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry, Disclosure of information 36w
Untreated milk 196w

Gartcosh
Industry 127w

Gas
see Office of Gas Supply

Gas fired power stations
109w, 197–8w

GCE A level
Per capita costs 100w

General practitioners
Manpower 273w
Sunderland 271w

General Service Medal
Eligibility 211w

Genetically modified organisms
40w, 146, (26.05.99) 300–4
Animal feed 396w
Butterflies 8w
Crops 3w, 163w, 176w, 215–6w, 242–4w, 246–7w, 319w, 374w
Developing countries 237w
EC law 163–4w
Food 83w, 248w, 292w
Health hazards 290–1w
Honey 248w
Labelling 248w
Maize 154–5
Medical treatments 402w
National Consumer Council 40w
USA 3–5w

Genetics
Identification of criminals 427–30w

George, Mr Andrew
Questions
Breast cancer 454–5

Gerrard, Mr Neil
Questions
HIV infection, Finance 453
HIV infection, Medical treatments 155w
Television, Licensing 94w

Gibb, Mr Nick
Questions
Indirect taxation 56w
Ministerial policy advisors, Treasury 181w
Tax burden 288w

Gibson, Dr Ian
Questions
Cancer, Medical treatments 14w, 19w
Medical profession, Students 19w

Gibson, Dr Ian—continued*
Nuclear power stations 344–5w
Prostate cancer 278w
Science, Conferences 233w
Science, Scotland 146

Gift aid
Middle East 137–8w

Gifted children
Teaching methods 766–8

Gill, Mr Christopher
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 588, 593–5
Questions
EC budget 137w
Economic and monetary union, French overseas territories 137w
Fisheries 249w
Gift aid, Middle East 137–8w
Inland waterways 84w
International law 118w
Organophosphates 113w
Police stations, Shropshire 159

Gillan, Mrs Cheryl
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 45–6, 72–7
European Communities (25.05.99) 205

Glasgow
Modern apprenticeships 153

Gloucestershire
Class sizes 438w
Fires 257–8w

Gloucestershire Fire and Rescue Service
257w

Godman, Dr Norman A
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 180, 195, 201, 208
Kosovo (08.06.99) 476
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 497
Questions
Erskine bridge 191w
Europe, Defence 347w
Fishing grounds, Scotland 149
Social Security Benefits Agency, Manpower 1–2
Weapons, Northern Ireland 344

Goggins, Mr Paul
Questions
State retirement pensions, Carers 51w

Gordon, Eileen
Questions
Hospitals, Private finance initiative 457

Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 590–3, 602–3
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 571
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 509, 516, 525–8

Government Communications Headquarters
Pension rights 307–8w

Government departments
New deal for young people 770–1

Grant maintained schools
Finance 313w, 771–2

Gray, Mr James
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 581–6, 601, 604
Dioxins (08.06.99) 490
Ministers, Points of order (24.05.99) 36

Gray, Mr James—continued*
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 499, 507, 510, 512–9, 523, 533–4, 538, 540
Questions
Class sizes, Secondary education 350–1
Livestock, Markets 359w

Greater London
Education 780–1
Fares 90w
Hospital wards 113w
NHS 272w
Primary care groups 274w
Regional aid 351
Social Security Benefits Agency 15–6
Speed limits 260w
Stop and search 264w

Greater London Authority
398–9w
Museums and galleries 229–30w

Green, Mr Damian
Questions
Further education 310w, 392w
Further education, Finance 189–90w
Health services, Kent 459
New deal for young people, Government departments 770–1
New deal schemes, Advisory services 100–1w
Students, Fees and charges 99w

Greenhouse effect
83–4w, (09.06.99) 559–80

Grieve, Mr Dominic
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 673, 677, 683–5, 690, 692, 697, 702, 707, 711, 713–4, 720, 724–7, 733–6

Griffiths, Jane
Questions
Freight 377w
Juries 367–8w

Griffiths, Mr Nigel
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 369

Griffiths, Mr Win
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 239–40
Questions
NHS, Finance 360–1w
NHS, Wales 629

Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust
112–3w, 414–5w, 460–1, (08.06.99) 543–58

Gulf War
see Iraq-Kuwait conflict

Gulf War syndrome
207–8w

Hackney
Elections 255w

Hague, Rt Hon William
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 465–7
Questions
Economic and monetary union 639–41
Taxation, EC action 345

Hain, Mr Peter, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Welsh Office*
Questions
Aviation, Wales 356w
EC grants and loans, Wales 359–60w
Job creation, Wales 359w
New deal schemes, Wales 360w
Schools, Transport 357w

Hain, Mr Peter—continued*
Small businesses, Wales 631–3
Vocational guidance, Wales 146–7w

Hall, Mr Patrick
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 522–5

Hamilton, Rt Hon Sir Archie
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 366

Hamilton, Mr Fabian
Debates etc.
Prostitution (26.05.99) 275–7

Hammond, Mr Philip
Questions
Hearing aids 20w
Maternity services, Finance 454

Hancock, Mr Mike
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 828–34, 873, 875
Questions
Aircraft carriers, Nuclear power 105–6w
Arms trade, Indonesia 236w
Arms trade, Military aircraft 1–2w
Arms trade, Turkey 370w
European fighter aircraft 2w
Indonesia, Human rights 352w
Military aircraft, Export controls 206–7w
Military aircraft, India 211w
Mine control measures vessels 106–7w
Nuclear fuel reprocessing 214–5w
Open individual export licences 364w
Warships 213–4w
Warships, Procurement 107w
Wave power, Research 345w

Hanson, Mr David, An Assistant Whip*
Debates etc.
Whitsun adjournment debate intervention (26.05.99) 294

Hare Coursing Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 959

Harman, Rt Hon Harriet
Questions
After school clubs 780
Parental leave 22w
Working families tax credit, Parental leave 60w, 105w, 182w, 380w

Harris, Dr Evan
Questions
Health education, Sex 448

Harvey, Mr Nick
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 586–90, 598
Questions
Arms trade, Export controls 200–1w
Natural gas, Complaints 401–2w

Hawkins, Mr Nick
Questions
Financial services 186w
Life insurance 141w
Taxation, EC action 344

Hayes, Mr John
Questions
Class sizes 350

Headteachers
385w
Training 390w

Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Questions
Drugs, Rehabilitation centres 352
National carers strategy 643–4

Healey, Mr John
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 834–7
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 433–5
Questions
Armed conflict 208w
Business questions 788–9
Committee on the Award of Honours Decorations and Medals 212w
European Social Fund, Employment schemes 288w, 386–7w
General Service Medal, Eligibility 211w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Annual reports 334w
Local government finance 437w
Single benefit gateway 766
Teenage pregnancy, Rotherham 451

Health
Children 271w
Research 337–8w

Health action zones
Camden 271w
Islington 271w
South Yorkshire 275w

Health authorities
Rural areas 272w
Wales 268–9w

Health Bill (HL) 1998/99
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 373, 376

Health Care and Energy Efficiency Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Order for resuming adjourned 2R read (11.06.99) 959

Health education
Sex 447–8

Health foods
Petitions (09.06.99) 758

Health hazards
Contraceptives 156w
Electromagnetic fields 165–6w
Genetically modified organisms 290–1w
Pollution 154–5w

Health insurance
Tax allowances 112w, 462

Health services
Armed forces 329w
Cancer 153–4w
Disadvantaged 278–9w
Elderly 279w
Expenditure 284w
Kent 459
Strokes 281–2w
Young offender institutions 70–1w

Hearing Aid Council Act 1968
Questions
363–4w

Hearing aids
20w

Heart diseases
Children 357–8w
Wales 357–8w

Heath, Mr David
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 41
Defence (10.06.99) 799–800, 819
European Communities (25.05.99) 198–204
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 672
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 417
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 431–2

Heath, Mr David—continued
Questions
Business questions 796
Gulf War syndrome 207–8w
NHS, Audit 457
Prescriptions, Fees and charges 46w
Teachers, Pay 384w

Heathcoat-Amory, Rt Hon David
Questions
Diesel fuel, Prices 327w
National income, Republic of Ireland 59w, 288w

Heathrow Airport
Public inquiries 173w, 227–8w
Safety 222w

Heavily indebted poor countries initiative
138w, 285w, 327w, 644–5

Henderson, Mr Doug, Minister for the Armed Forces*
Questions
Armed forces, Education 331w
Armed forces, Falkland Islands 2w
Armed forces, Health services 329w
Armed forces, Manpower 210w
Armed forces, Pay 328w
Armed forces, Pensions 212–3w
Armed forces, Race relations 143–4w
Armed forces, Uniforms 208w
Armed forces, Vacancies 214w
Defence Analytical Services Agency, Standards 330w
Gulf War syndrome 207–8w
Iraq-Kuwait conflict, Post traumatic stress disorder 209w
Iraq-Kuwait conflict, Vaccination 205–6w
Logistic Information Systems Agency, Standards 144–5w
Military discipline, Young people 212w
Parachute Regiment, Manpower 210w
RAF Personnel Management Agency, Standards 371w
RAF Signals Engineering Establishment, Standards 108w
RAF Training Group, Standards 331–2w
Territorial Army, Manpower 1w

Henderson, Mr Ivan
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 171

Hendon
New deal for schools 38w
Thameslink 217w

Heppell, Mr John
Debates etc.
Broadcasting programmes, Children (26.05.99) 321–4

Hesford, Mr Stephen
Questions
Health services, Disadvantaged 278–9w

Hewitt, Ms Patricia, Economic Secretary to the Treasury*
Questions
Average earnings, Scotland 141–2w
Business travel, Psychiatric nurses 137w
Capital investment 380–1w
Diesel fuel, Prices 327w
EC budget 137w, 289w
Economic and monetary union, French overseas territories 137w
Economic and monetary union, Italy 287w
Energy, Prices 136–7w
Financial services 186w
Financial Services and Markets Bill (Draft) 139–40w
Gift aid, Middle East 137–8w

Hewitt, Ms Patricia—continued
Heavily indebted poor countries initiative 138w, 285w, 327w
Inflation 185–6w
International Organisation of Securities Commissions 140–1w
Job creation, EC action 327w
Life insurance 141w
Manufacturing industries, West Midlands 142w
Marriage of convenience 287w
Ministerial policy advisors, Treasury 181w
National income, Republic of Ireland 59w, 288w
Overseas investment, Exchange control 327w
Proof of identity, Treasury 286w
Public relations, Treasury 180w
Small businesses, Technology 184w
Stock Exchange, Disclosure of information 140w
Taxation, Aircraft 380w
Taxation, Derelict land 142w
UK Debt Management Office, Standards 285–6w
VAT, Financial services 289w

Higher education
Conditions of employment 316w
Scotland 124–5w, 133w

HIV infection
Finance 453
Medical treatments 155w, 273w
Northern Ireland 294–7w
Scotland 130–1w
Wales 64w, 68–70w

Hodge, Ms Margaret, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Education and Employment*
Questions
Barclays Bank, Redundancy 775–6
Disability Discrimination Act 1995 188w
Disability Rights Commission 188w, 389w
Employment, Disabled 775
Leave, Disabled 188–9w
National childcare strategy 385w
Pre-school education, Voluntary schools 388–9w
Remploy, Standards 337w

Hoey, Miss Kate, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Home Office*
Debates etc.
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 902–6, 908, 919, 935–6, 941–2, 948
Questions
Convention on the Protection of the European Communities Financial Interests 435–6w
Criminal records, Vetting 431w
EC institutions, Corruption 435w
Electronic surveillance, EC action 148–9w
Fraud, EC action 264w
Metropolitan Police, Recruitment 151w
Morgan, Daniel, Homicide 35w
Police, River Thames 332–3w
Speed limits, Greater London 260w
Stop and search, Greater London 264w
Treaty of Amsterdam 264–5w
Witnesses, Protection 436w

Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas
Debates etc.
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry, Points of order (26.05.99) 377
Business questions (26.05.99) 376
Dioxins (08.06.99) 488
European Communities (25.05.99) 182, 192

Hogg, Rt Hon Douglas—continued
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 655, 662, 666, 669, 677–8, 680, 688, 690, 694, 698–704, 731, 736
Kosovo (26.05.99) 369, (08.06.99) 475–6, (09.06.99) 753
Questions
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry 335

Holocaust Remembrance Day
408w

Home care services
Northern Ireland 299–300w

Home detention curfews
76–8w, 149w

Home energy efficiency scheme
87–9w, 321w

Home Office
Minimum wage 394w
Proof of identity 260w

Homelessness
Exservicemen 226–7w

Homeopathy
419–20w

Homicide
Morgan, Daniel 35w
Northern Ireland 363w

Honey
Genetically modified organisms 248w

Hood, Mr Jimmy
Questions
EC Labour and Social Affairs Council 314w
Science, Scotland 146

Hoon, Mr Geoffrey, Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office
Debates etc.
Middle East, Peace negotiations (26.05.99) 330–4
Pakistan, Religious freedom (09.06.99) 608–11
Questions
Arad, Ron 310w
British Council, Manchester 353w
China 409–10w
China, Dalai Lama 309w
Cyprus, Drugs 352w
Entry clearances, Administrative delays 368–9w
India, Foreign relations 307w
Indonesia, Arms trade 236w
Indonesia, Human rights 352w
Indonesia, Minorities 352–3w
Israel, Visits abroad 309w
Japan, Radioactive materials 368w, 409w
Kashmir 369w
Libyan Arab Republic, Terrorism 309w
Members, Correspondence 409w
Panchen Lama 309w
Sudan, Bombings 124w
Sudan, Foreign relations 307w
UN Register of Conventional Arms 354w
USA, Criminal proceedings 409w

Hope, Mr Phil
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 70
Questions
Social security benefits, Lone parents 105w

Hopkins, Mr Kelvin
Questions
NHS trusts, Mergers 160–1w
Private finance initiative 185w

Horam, Mr John
Questions
Financial Services and Markets Bill (Draft) 139–40w

Hormone treatments
Beef 111w

Horserace Totalisator Board
152w

Horses
13w
Animal breeding 252w

Horticulture
EC action 347–8w

Hospital beds
Scotland 126w

Hospital wards
Children 113w
Greater London 113w

Hospitals
Private finance initiative 457
Waiting lists (25.05.99) 175–7, 270–1w, 642

Hotels
Licensing laws 186w
Standards 95–6w

House of Commons
Pay 405w

House of Lords
Reform (09.06.99) 653–743

Housing benefit
14–5, 47w, 301w
Abuse 18–20
Overpayments 303w
Proof of identity 302–3w
Students 11
Tower Hamlets 339w

Housing management
Best value 92–3w

Housing problems
Scotland 134w

Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 186–95, 258
Questions
Sierra Leone 118w

Howarth, Mr Alan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Culture Media and Sport
Questions
Public expenditure, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 187w
Public libraries, Finance 231w
World War II, Art works 230w

Howarth, Mr George, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Home Office
Debates etc.
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre (26.05.99) 316–20
Questions
Bookmakers Committee 78–9w
Compulsorily detained mental patients, Young people 30w
Coroners 148w
Dogs 266–7w
Drug treatment and testing orders 33w, 260w, 332w
Drugs, Crime 260–1w
Elections, Hackney 255w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 29–30w, 153w

Howarth, Mr George—continued
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre, Education 31–3w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre, Mentally disturbed offenders 33w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre, Sexual offences 30–1w
Fire Service College 261–2w
Fires, Gloucestershire 257–8w
Ford Prison 421w
Gloucestershire Fire and Rescue Service 257w
Home detention curfews 76–8w, 149w
Horserace Totalisator Board 152w
Mann, Eric 148w
Primates, Animal experiments 262–3w
Prison visitors 33–4w
Prisoners, Education 28w
Prisoners, Employment 29w
Prisoners, Prescription drugs 75–6w
Prisoners, University for Industry 28w
Prisoners, Voting rights 73w, 76w
Prisoners' incentives and earned privileges scheme 73–5w
Prisons, Complaints 152w
Prisons, Disciplinary proceedings 258w
Prisons, Drugs 151–2w
Probation and aftercare 71–2w
Probation and aftercare, Avon 263w
Shamrock Farms, Animal welfare 79–80w, 262w
Young offender institutions 30w
Young offender institutions, Health services 70–1w
Young offender institutions, Manpower 31–2w
Young offender institutions, Violence 28–9w
Young offenders, Education 30w, 32w
Young offenders, Prison accommodation 32w
Young offenders, Training 31w

Howarth, Mr Gerald
Debates etc.
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry, Points of order (09.06.99) 649
Defence (10.06.99) 803, 807–8
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 32
Kosovo (09.06.99) 755
Questions
Al-Fayed, Mohammed, Intelligence services 25w
Business questions 788
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 127–8w
Stop and search, Greater London 264w

Howe Commission
see Broadcasting Standards Commission

Howells, Dr Kim, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Trade and Industry
Questions
Airlines, Service charges 363w
Arms trade, Export controls 200–1w, 234w
Arms trade, Indonesia 364w
Arms trade, Yugoslavia 200w
Bankruptcy 204w
BBC, Commercial activities 236w
CityFlyer Express, British Airways 201w
Directors, Insolvency 402w
Funerals 346w
Genetically modified organisms, Medical treatments 402w
Hearing Aid Council Act 1968 363–4w
Inflatable bouncing devices, Injuries 202w
Milk Marque 236w
Open individual export licences 364w

Howells, Dr Kim*—*continued
Petrol, Retail trade 200w
Recruitment, Dept of Trade and Industry 366–7w
Refrigeration, Dept of Trade and Industry 363w
Untreated milk 196w
Untreated milk, Correspondence 196w

Hoyle, Mr Lindsay
Questions
British Standards Institution, Unleaded petrol 167–8w
CityFlyer Express, British Airways 201w
Falkland Islands, Fishing grounds 119w
Millennium compliance, British Nuclear Fuels 201–2w
Millennium compliance, Lancashire Constabulary 150w
Petrol 167w
Petrol, Additives 168w

Hughes, Ms Beverley
Questions
Health education, Sex 447–8

Hughes, Mr Simon
Questions
Cervical cancer, Screening 449–50
EC grants and loans, Wales 359w
Education, Scotland 128w
Magistrates, Ethnic groups 135w
NHS 276w
Northern Ireland government 177w
Social security benefits, Administrative delays 48–9w

Human rights
Commonwealth 38–9w, 350–1w
Indonesia 352w
Northern Ireland 36w, 325w
Overseas trade 346w
Turkey 352w

Humble, Mrs Joan
Questions
Commission for Racial Equality, Annual reports 333w

Hurst, Mr Alan
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 704–7
Structure plans, Essex (26.05.99) 279–81

Hutton, Mr John*, *Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Health
Debates etc.
Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 952–6
Eastbourne Hospital, Nurses (24.05.99) 137–42
Questions
Alzheimer's disease 157w
Alzheimer's disease, Aricept 20w
Asthma, Children 417–8w
Breast cancer 454–5
Cancer, Health services 153–4w
Cancer, Medical treatments 19w, 112w, 279w
Cancer, Screening 15w
Child Migrants Trust 281w
Child protection registers 277w
Children, Protection 157w
Children in care 274w
Chlamydiosis 447
Chronic fatigue syndrome 154w
Elderly, Institutional care 461–2
Fertility, Medical treatments 156–7w
Health, Children 271w
Health education, Sex 447–8
Health insurance, Tax allowances 462
Hearing aids 20w

Hutton, Mr John*—*continued
Hospital wards, Children 113w
Kidney patients, Lancashire 114w
Long-term Care Royal Commission 19w
Maternity services, Finance 454
Maternity services, Rural areas 454
Midwives 453–4
Nursing homes, Fees and charges 20w, 159w
Prostate cancer 277–8w
Residential homes, Leeds 282w
Royal Shrewsbury Hospital, Waiting lists 16w
Smoking, Advisory services 452
Social Exclusion Unit, Teenage pregnancy 450–1
Social services 114w
Special hospitals, Vacancies 159–60w
Staffordshire Ambulance Service 281w
Strokes, Health services 281–2w
Teenage pregnancy, Rotherham 451
UN Convention on the Rights of the Child 282w
Urinary system, Diseases 160w

Iddon, Dr Brian
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 168–9
Questions
Cancer, Medical treatments 279w
Down's syndrome 642

Identification of criminals
Genetics 427–30w

Identity cards
6
Confiscation orders 406w

Ilisu dam
342w

Immigration
Appeals 155–6, 395w
Applications 35w

Immigration and Nationality Directorate
73w
Administrative delays 34w, 254w
Annual reports 334w
Computers 35–6w
Contracts 151w
Siemens 253–4w

Immigration controls
Petitions (25.05.99) 260
Republic of Ireland 433–5w

Import controls
235w
Asbestos 11w, 170–1w
Food 345–6w
Meat (08.06.99) 492–5, 643

Imports
Cars 196–7w

Incapacity benefit
46w

Income support
301–2w
Pensioners 4–5, 8–10, 16–8, 53–4w, 103w
Political refugees 301w

Income tax
Pensioners 54w

India
Foreign relations 307w
Military aircraft 211w
Nuclear weapons 147w

Indictable offences
427–8w

Indirect taxation
56w

Indonesia
Arms trade 236w, 364w
Export credit guarantees 235–6w
Human rights 352w
Minorities 352–3w

Industrial health and safety
Inland waterways 89–90w

Industry
Gartcosh 127w

Inflatable bouncing devices
Injuries 202w

Inflation
185–6w

Information technology
Dept of Social Security 50w
Schools 189w

Ingram, Rt Hon Adam*, *Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office
Questions
Crimes of violence, Northern Ireland 36–8w, 298–9w
Demonstrations, Drumcree 179w, 342
Homicide, Northern Ireland 363w
Human rights, Northern Ireland 325w
Northern Ireland Compensation Agency, Standards 179w
Open government, Northern Ireland Office 292w
Orange Order, Drumcree 342–3
Prisoners' release, Northern Ireland 117w
Prisons, Redundancy pay 178–9w
Reparation by offenders, Northern Ireland 179w, 343–4
Royal Ulster Constabulary, Disciplinary proceedings 326w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 177w, 179w
West Midlands Police 326w
West Midlands Police, Royal Ulster Constabulary 325w

Injuries
Inflatable bouncing devices 202w

Inland Revenue
184–5w
Cash limits 408–9w

Inland waterways
84w
Industrial health and safety 89–90w

Insolvency
204w
Directors 402w

Institutional care
Elderly 461–2
Northern Ireland 299–300w

Insurance
Cars 92w

Intelligence services
Al-Fayed, Mohammed 25w

Intercountry adoption
(11.06.99) 949–56

International law
118w

International Organisation of Securities Commissions
140–1w

International Stock Exchange
see Stock Exchange

Internet
Access (09.06.99) 612–9
VAT returns 57w

Invalid vehicles
49–50w

Investing in dentistry initiative
19–20w

Iran
Arms trade 287–8w, 353–4w

Iraq
Uranium 12w

Iraq-Kuwait conflict
Post traumatic stress disorder 209w
Vaccination 205–6w

Islington
Health action zones 271w

Israel
Visits abroad 309w

Italy
Economic and monetary union 287w

Jack, Rt Hon Michael
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 187, 193, 219–23
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust (08.06.99) 549–55, 557–8
Questions
British Nuclear Fuels 202–3w
Crime, Journalism 81w
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust 414–5w
Inflation 185w
Kidney patients, Lancashire 114w
Ministers, Pay 357w
NHS trusts, Directors 114–5w
Out-patients, Waiting lists 272w
Schools, Swimming 101w
Social security benefits, Abuse 5

Jackson, Ms Glenda, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions*
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 505, 519, 537–41
Severn Trent Water, Water charges (09.06.99) 624–8
Questions
Air routes 221w, 224–5w
Air traffic 220w
Air traffic, South East region 219–22w
Aircraft, Air conditioning 10w
Aviation, Safety 222w
Aviation, Trade agreements 172–3w
Birmingham Airport 168–70w
Birmingham Relief Road 377w
Birmingham Relief Road, Tolls 85w
British Rail, Asbestos 84w, 225w
British Rail, Property transfer 320–1w
British Standards Institution, Unleaded petrol 167–8w
British Transport Police 6–7w
Bus services 397w
Bus services, Fuels 173w
Bus services, Rural areas 373–4w
Bypasses, Carlisle 167w
Cars, Insurance 92w
Cycling, Death 86–7w
Driving, EC law 85–6w
Driving under influence 164–5w, 320w
Fares, Children 227w
Fares, Greater London 90w
Fishing vessels, Safety 228w
Freight 377w
London airports, Night flying 378–80w
London Regional Transport, Busking 9–10w
London Regional Transport, Finance 5w
Lorries 81w

Jackson, Ms Glenda—continued*
Lorries, Exhaust emissions 164w
Lorries, Refrigeration 81–2w
Minimum wage, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 227w
Motor vehicles 166–7w
Motor vehicles, Grants 175w
Motorcycling Advisory Group 89w
Motorways, Safety 82–3w
National Air Traffic Services 220w
Petrol 167w
Petrol, Additives 168w
Petrol, Environment protection 322w
Railways, Disabled 174w
Railways, Overcrowding 217w
Refrigeration, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 320w
Rescue services, Dover 223w
Rescue services, Manpower 223–4w, 397w
Road Haulage Association 216w
Road traffic, Business travel 6w
Road traffic, Pollution control 216w
Roads, Safety 86w
Shipping, EC law 87w
Shipping, Forecasts 223w
Speed limits 319–20w
Taxis, Licensing 174w
Thameslink, Hendon 217w
Thameslink, Overcrowding 217w
Vehicles, Excise duties 92w
Walking, Urban areas 9w

Jackson, Helen
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 92, 120–2
Questions
Elderly, Institutional care 461–2
Information technology, Dept of Social Security 50w

Japan
Radioactive materials 343–4w, 368w, 400w, 409w

Jenkin, Mr Bernard
Questions
Aviation, Trade agreements 172–3w
Bus services 397w
M4, Bus lanes 643
Road Haulage Association 216w
Waste management 175w

Jenkins, Mr Brian
Questions
Staffordshire Ambulance Service 281w, 415w

Job creation
EC action 327w
Wales 359w

Jobseeker's allowance
100w, 190w, 311w

Johnson, Mr Alan
Questions
Fishing vessels, Compensation 348

Johnson, Miss Melanie
Questions
Breast cancer 455
Power stations, Cleveland 365–6w
Recruitment, Dept of Trade and Industry 366–7w

Johnson Smith, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 804, 855–60
Kosovo (26.05.99) 362

Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre
Standards 372w

Joint Consultative Committee with the Liberal Democratic Party
see Labour Liberal Democrats Joint Consultative Committee

Jones, Mr Barry
Questions
Job creation, Wales 359w
Older workers, Unemployment 769–70
Organic farming, Wales 267w
Schools, Wales 146w
Shotton steelworks 645

Jones, Helen M
Questions
Class sizes, Gloucestershire 438w
Community Legal Service 135w
Empty property, Council tax 322w
Pensioners, Income support 4
Police, Mentally disturbed offenders 152–3w
Primary education, Numeracy 765
Special hospitals, Vacancies 159–60w

Jones, Mr Ieuan Wyn
Questions
EC grants and loans, Wales 360w

Jones, Ms Jenny
Questions
Arms trade, Export controls 234w
Child Support Agency 300w
Heavily indebted poor countries initiative 285w

Jones, Mr Jon Owen, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Welsh Office*
Questions
AIDS, Wales 65–8w
Child protection registers, Wales 267w
Drugs, Wales 634–5
Farmers, Income 359w
Health authorities, Wales 268–9w
Heart diseases, Children 357–8w
HIV infection, Wales 64w, 68–70w
Livestock, Markets 359w
NHS, Finance 360–1w
NHS trusts, Wales 3w
Organic farming, Wales 3w, 267w
Radioactive wastes, Wales 268w

Jones, Dr Lynne
Debates etc.
Kosovo (09.06.99) 751

Journalism
Crime 81w

Jowell, Rt Hon Ms Tessa, Minister for Public Health, Dept of Health*
Questions
Abortion 159w
Allergies, Children 17–9w
Health, Research 337–8w
Health hazards, Pollution 154–5w
Health services, Disadvantaged 278–9w
HIV infection, Medical treatments 155w, 273w
Listening to women initiative 115w, 158w
Medical equipment, Certification quality marks 418–9w
Medicines Control Agency, Manpower 157–8w
MMR vaccine 415w
Organophosphates 113w
Osteoporosis 273w
Pertussis vaccine, Side effects 279–80w
Smoking, Television 272–3w
Sure start programme 436–7w
Vaccination, Animal products 159w, 280w
Water treatment, Staffordshire 15w

Judges' Council
157–8

Junior doctors
Wales 630–1
Working hours 445–6, 458

Junior ministers
Welsh Office 357w, 637

Juries
367–8w

Jurisdiction
Criminal proceedings 425–7w

K4 Committee
259w

Kashmir
369w
Overseas aid 238–9w

Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 29
Kosovo (08.06.99) 471–2
Questions
Developing countries, Debts 237–8w
Members, Correspondence 420w, 437–8w
News at Ten 233w

Keetch, Mr Paul
Questions
Viagra 417w

Kelly, Ms Ruth
Questions
British Rail, Asbestos 84w, 225w
Defence Analytical Services Agency, Standards 330w

Kennedy, Mr Charles
Questions
Proof of identity, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 252–3w
Skye bridge 269w

Kent
Health services 459

Key, Mr Robert
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 829–30
Questions
Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment 214w
Consolidation bills 316–8w
Frigates, Satellite broadcasting 211w

Kidney, Mr David
Questions
Civil proceedings 136w
Dental services 277w
Driving under influence 164–5w, 320w
Pensioners, Income support 8–9
Radiotherapy, Oesophageal cancer 364w
Schools, Finance 225w
Water companies 84–5w
Water treatment, Staffordshire 15w

Kidney patients
Cumbria 114w
Lancashire 114w

Kilfoyle, Mr Peter, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Cabinet Office*
Questions
Minimum wage, Cabinet Office 291w
Non-departmental public bodies, Public appointments 116–7w

King, Mr Andy
Questions
Midwives 453–4
Natural gas, Meters 202w

King, Ms Oona
Questions
Housing benefit, Tower Hamlets 339w

Kirkbride, Miss Julie
Questions
Cervical cancer, Screening 449
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 148–9

Kirkwood, Mr Archy
Debates etc.
EC grants and loans, Borders region (10.06.99) 877–9
Questions
House of Commons, Pay 405w
Modern apprenticeships, Scotland 152–3
Scottish Adjacent Waters Boundaries Order 1999 411–2w

Kosovo
212w
Armed conflict 21w, 124w, 145–6w, (25.05.99) 178–259, (26.05.99) 290–2, 304–6, 328w, 348, 407w, 413w
Ministerial statements (26.05.99) 355–72, (08.06.99) 463–79, (09.06.99) 744–57
Public opinion 193w
Refugees 27w, 358w
United Nations 347–8

Kumar, Dr Ashok
Debates etc.
Local government finance, Redcar (26.05.99) 284–8
Questions
Training, Private sector 438w

Labelling
Genetically modified organisms 248w
Tobacco 56w

Labour Liberal Democrats Joint Consultative Committee
39w

Ladyman, Dr Stephen
Debates etc.
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 568–71, 574
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 85, 106–7, 110–3
Questions
Artillery, Procurement 330–1w
Electromagnetic fields, Health hazards 165–6w
Health services, Kent 459
Social security benefits, Abuse 2–3

Laing, Mrs Eleanor
Debates etc.
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 901–2, 919–20, 924, 947
Questions
Business questions 794–5
Curriculum, Reform 772–3
Students, Fees and charges 125w

Lancashire
Kidney patients 114w
Swimming 101w

Lancashire Constabulary
Millennium compliance 150w

Land
Pollution 322–4w

Lansley, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 184
Questions
Health authorities, Wales 268–9w
NHS, Finance 283w
Nurses, Pay 275w

Law enforcement
Cryptography 195–6w

Lawrence, Ms Jackie
Questions
British Energy, Debts 381w
Inland Revenue, Cash limits 408–9w
Overseas investment, Exchange control 327w
Public expenditure, Wales 411w
Radioactive wastes, Wales 268w
Small businesses, Wales 632
Taxation, Reform 183w
UK Debt Management Office, Standards 285–6w

Lawrence, Stephen
see Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry

Lead
Ammunition 374–5w
Fishing gear 374w

Leave
Disabled 188–9w

Leeds
New deal for young people 313w
Police 262w
Residential homes 282w

Legal aid
Coroners 159–60
Expenditure 6w

Leigh, Mr Edward
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 39, 41, 56–7, 70–2
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 661
Oral question time intervention (24.05.99) 5
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 83
Questions
Absinthe 251w
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 155
NHS trusts, Mergers 455–6
Social security benefits, Post offices 3

Letwin, Mr Oliver
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 599–601
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 655–6, 676, 682, 689, 700, 707, 718
Questions
EC law, Scotland 151–2

Levitt, Mr Tom
Questions
Business questions 792
Employment, Disabled 775

Lewis, Dr Julian
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 811, 818, 826, 837–43
European Communities (25.05.99) 212
Kosovo (09.06.99) 750–1
Questions
Livestock, Wales 362w
Westminster City Council, Inquiries 85w

Libyan Arab Republic
Export controls 353w
Terrorism 308–9w

Licensing laws
Hotels 186w

Licensing (Young Persons) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 959

Liddell, Rt Hon Mrs Helen, Minister for Transport, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions*
Questions
Aviation, Safety 376–7w

Liddell, Rt Hon Mrs Helen—continued*
Eddie Stobart, Grants 175w
Freight 171w

Lidington, Mr David
Questions
Firearms, Compensation 153w

Life insurance
141w

Limestone
Environment protection 7w

Lincolnshire
NHS trusts 455–6

Line of route
(26.05.99) 382–410

Linton, Mr Martin
Questions
British Rail, Property transfer 320–1w
Family Law Advisory Board 326w
Personal injury, Compensation 326w
Welfare state, Reform 350

Listening to women initiative
115w, 158w

Literacy
Primary education 390w

Litter
378w

Livestock
Markets 359w
Wales 359w, 362w

Livsey, Mr Richard
Questions
EC grants and loans, Wales 356w
Morgan, Daniel, Homicide 35w
Proportional representation, Wales 636

Llandough Hospital
Orthopaedics 630

Lloyd, Mr Tony, Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office*
Questions
Angola, Armed conflict 369w
Commonwealth, Human rights 350–1w
Diplomatic immunity 351w
Diplomatic service, Crime 351w
Diplomatic service, Engineers 410–1w
Diplomatic service, Unpaid fines 355–6w
Electronic surveillance, Export controls 147–8w
Embassies, Email 26w
Falkland Islands, Fishing grounds 119w
International law 118w
Iran, Arms trade 353–4w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 124w
Libyan Arab Republic, Export controls 353w
Libyan Arab Republic, Terrorism 308–9w
Macedonia, Arms trade 119–20w
NATO, UK delegations 105w
Pakistan, Nuclear weapons 147w
Serbia, Sanctions 354w
Sierra Leone 352w
South Africa, Foreign relations 310w
UN Security Council, Public appointments 26–7w

Llwyd, Mr Elfyn
Questions
General practitioners, Manpower 273w
National Assembly for Wales, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 359–60w
Small businesses, Wales 632–3

Lobbying
Wales 636

Local authorities
VAT 57w

Local government
Reform 90w

Local government finance
8w, 218–9w, 225w, 437w, (08.06.99) 541
Redcar (26.05.99) 284–8

Local Government (Organisation and Standards) Bill (Draft)
Debates etc.
(26.05.99) 435–6, (09.06.99) 758

Local Government (Organisation and Standards) Draft Bill Joint Select Committee (26.05.99) 435–6, (09.06.99) 758

Lock, Mr David
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 170
Severn Trent Water, Water charges (09.06.99) 622, 627
Questions
EC internal relations 641
Pupils, Cycling 390w

Lockerbie
Bombings 149

Logistic Information Systems Agency
Standards 144–5w

London
see also Greater London

London airports
Night flying 378–80w

London Regional Transport
Busking 9–10w
Finance 5w

Lone parents
Social security benefits 105w

Long term unemployed
768–9

Long-term Care Royal Commission
19w

Lord Chancellor's Dept
Minimum wage 318w

Lorries
81w
Exhaust emissions 164w
Refrigeration 81–2w

Loughton, Mr Tim
Debates etc.
Construction, Standards (26.05.99) 297–300
European Communities (25.05.99) 183, 188, 193, 224–5, 233, 237–44
Questions
International Organisation of Securities Commissions 140–1w
Nurses, Pay 275w

Luff, Mr Peter
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 486
Questions
Administration of justice 135w
Business questions 793–4

Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Questions
EC economic policy 644
Junior doctors, Working hours 458

M4
Bus lanes 643

McCartney, Rt Hon Ian, Minister of State, Dept of Trade and Industry*
Questions
Minimum wage, Dept of Trade and Industry 236w
Parental leave 22w
Post Office 235w
Post Office, Takeovers 110w

McDonagh, Ms Siobhain
Questions
Maternity benefits 18

Macdonald, Mr Calum, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Scottish Office*
Debates etc.
EC grants and loans, Borders region (10.06.99) 881–4
Questions
AIDS, Scotland 130–3w, 192w
Child protection registers, Scotland 269w
Closed circuit television, Scotland 147
Cot deaths, Scotland 128w
Disadvantaged, Scotland 125w
Drugs, Scotland 126–7w
EC grants and loans, Scotland 126w, 129w
Education, Scotland 128w, 269w
Erskine bridge 191w
Food Standards Agency, Fees and charges 128w
Genetically modified organisms, Maize 154–5
HIV infection, Scotland 130–1w
Hospital beds, Scotland 126w
Housing problems, Scotland 134w
Industry, Gartcosh 127w
Millennium compliance, Common Services Agency 129–30w
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 155
Modern apprenticeships, Glasgow 153
Modern apprenticeships, Scotland 152–3
NHS, Scotland 129w
Oil and Gas Industry Task Force 127w
Pathfinders to the Parliament 125w
Regional selective assistance, Scotland 126w
St Kilda 270w
Science, Scotland 146–7
Scottish Adjacent Waters Boundaries Order 1999 411–2w
Students, Fees and charges 125w
Warm deal, Scotland 373w

McDonnell, Mr John
Questions
Doctors, Racial discrimination 275–6w
Motor vehicles 166–7w
Nurses, Pay 17w

Macedonia
Arms trade 119–20w
International assistance 193w, 392w

McFall, Mr John, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Northern Ireland Office*
Questions
AIDS, Northern Ireland 292–4w, 297–8w
Alzheimer's disease, Aricept 117w
Child protection registers, Northern Ireland 179w
Education, Northern Ireland 176w
HIV infection, Northern Ireland 294–7w
Institutional care, Northern Ireland 299–300w
New deal schemes, Northern Ireland 178w
Pre-school education, Northern Ireland 341–2

MacGregor, Rt Hon John
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 658, 673–82, 690

McIntosh, Miss Anne
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 375
European Communities (25.05.99) 187, 198, 202, 232, 236, 247–9
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 496–7
Questions
Agriculture, Females 43w
Cereals, EC action 42–3w
Electricity Act 1989 198w
Health insurance, Tax allowances 462
Housing benefit, Students 11
Science, Scotland 146

McIsaac, Shona
Questions
EC grants and loans, Northern Ireland 337

MacKay, Rt Hon Andrew
Questions
Weapons, Northern Ireland 340–1

McKenna, Mrs Rosemary
Questions
EC grants and loans, Scotland 129w
European Communities, Scotland 151

Mackinlay, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
Business question time intervention (10.06.99) 787
Defence (10.06.99) 812–3
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 725
Ministerial statements, Points of order (24.05.99) 35
Questions
Business questions 785
Open government 134w
Sierra Leone 352w

Maclean, Rt Hon David
Debates etc.
Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 949–50, 953
Devolution (09.06.99) 583–4, 587, 592–7, 604
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 885–93, 895–7, 899–900, 905–10, 915–9, 921–7, 929, 933–5, 943–5
Fur Farming (Prohibition) Bill, Rep adjourned (11.06.99) 957
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 413–4, 418–21, 423
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 82, 95, 98, 101, 107–8, 110, 122–5
Questions
EC Agriculture Council 250–1w, 253w, 395–6w
EC Education Council 313w
EC Fisheries Council 251w
EC Youth Council 97–8w
EU Justice and Home Affairs Council 34–5w
Members, Correspondence 411w
Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry 259w
Young offenders, Correspondence 255w

Maclennan, Rt Hon Robert
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 655, 676, 686–93, 705
Questions
Magistrates, Retirement 157

McLoughlin, Mr Patrick
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 375
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 412
Ministerial statement intervention (24.05.99) 27
Ministerial statements, Points of order (24.05.99) 36–7
Questions
Business questions 792
Members, Correspondence 277w

McNamara, Mr Kevin
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 361
Questions
Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy and Creutzfeld Jakob Disease Inquiry 110–1w
Firearms, Training 98–9w
Homicide, Northern Ireland 363w
Human rights, Northern Ireland 36w, 325w
Northern Ireland Equality Commission 335
O'Neill, Diarmuid 255w
Police custody, Death 335w
Royal Ulster Constabulary, Disciplinary proceedings 326w
Ulster Unionist Party, Correspondence 393w
West Midlands Police 326w
West Midlands Police, Royal Ulster Constabulary 325w

McNulty, Mr Tony
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 849–55
European Communities (25.05.99) 231–7
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 111–2, 125–6
Questions
Cryptography, Law enforcement 195–6w
Defence Intelligence and Security Centre, Standards 372w
Export Credits Guarantee Dept, Risk assessment 198–9w
Flood control 195w
Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre, Standards 372w
Political parties, Finance 642–3
Public expenditure, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 187w
United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority Constabulary, Inspections 110w
Whales, Conservation 348–50w

MacPherson of Cluny Inquiry
see Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry

MacShane, Mr Denis
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 373
European Communities (25.05.99) 197, 234, 236
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 416, 422–5

Mactaggart, Fiona
Debates etc.
Immigration controls, Petitions (25.05.99) 260
Kosovo (09.06.99) 754–5
Questions
Chlamydiosis 447
Civil service, New deal schemes 116w
Class sizes 242w
Entry clearances, Administrative delays 368–9w
Immigration, Appeals 155–6
Immigration, Applications 35w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate 73w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Administrative delays 254w

Mactaggart, Fiona*—continued*
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Contracts 151w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Siemens 253–4w
Income support, Political refugees 301w
Members, Correspondence 276w
Passports 257–9w
Political refugees 72–3w, 434w

McWalter, Mr Tony
Questions
Business questions 792–3
Curriculum 773

Magistrates
Barnsley 136w, 143w
Doncaster 136w, 143w
Ethnic groups 135w
Retirement 156–7

Magistrates' courts
Pontefract 291w

Mahon, Mrs Alice
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 364–5, (08.06.99) 477

Maize
Genetically modified organisms 154–5

Malins, Mr Humfrey
Questions
Iraq-Kuwait conflict, Post traumatic stress disorder 209w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 21w

Mallaber, Judy
Questions
Environmental Task Force 225–6w, 314–5w
Environmental Task Force, Chartermark scheme 226w

Mallon, Mr Seamus
Questions
National insurance contributions 288–9w

Manchester
British Council 353w
Medical examinations 338w
Roads (26.05.99) 277–9
Transport (26.05.99) 281–4

Mann, Eric
148w

Manufactured goods
Balance of trade 200w

Manufacturing industries
West Midlands 142w

Maples, Mr John
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 806–18
Kosovo (26.05.99) 357–9, (09.06.99) 744–5
Questions
Government Communications Headquarters, Pension rights 307–8w

Marek, Dr John
Questions
Energy, Prices 22w

Markets
Livestock 359w

Marriage of convenience
287w

Marsden, Mr Gordon
Questions
Airlines, Service charges 363w
Funerals 346w
Motorways, Safety 82–3w
Passports, Administrative delays 150w

Marsden, Mr Paul
Questions
Cancer 352–3
Cancer, Health services 153–4w
Cancer, Medical treatments 112w, 281w
Cancer, Screening 15w
Child benefit, Shrewsbury 339w
Child Migrants Trust 281w
Dental services, Pensioners 381w
Further education 99–100w
GCE A level, Per capita costs 100w
Health, Research 337–8w
Health services, Expenditure 284w
Ophthalmic services, Pensioners 16w
Pensioners, Income support 53–4w
Pupils, First aid 387w
Royal Shrewsbury Hospital, Radiotherapy 415–6w
Royal Shrewsbury Hospital, Waiting lists 16w
Sixth form colleges, Teachers 100w
Winter fuel payments 187w

Marshall, Mr David
Questions
Housing problems, Scotland 134w

Martlew, Mr Eric
Questions
Bypasses, Carlisle 167w
Capital receipts initiative, Carlisle 176w
Eddie Stobart, Grants 175w
Passports, Administrative delays 151w

Maternity benefits
18

Maternity services
Finance 454
Rural areas 454

Maude, Rt Hon Francis
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 204
Questions
Customs and Excise, X rays 56w
Electronic government 139w
Inflation 185–6w
Smuggling 59w, 180–1w
Smuggling, Channel tunnel 59w
Tobacco, Labelling 56w
Value Added Tax (Input Tax) Order 1992 57w
Value Added Tax (Sports Sport Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1998 57w
VAT, Cars 58w
VAT, Financial services 289w
VAT, Local authorities 57w
VAT, Property transfer 57w
VAT, Tax thresholds 58w
VAT, Tax yields 58w
VAT, Trade unions 58w
VAT exemptions 139w
VAT (Goods Used for Exempt Supplies) Order 1999 58w
VAT returns, Internet 57w

Mawhinney, Rt Hon Sir Brian
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 168

May, Mrs Theresa
Questions
Gifted children, Teaching methods 768
Listening to women initiative 115w, 158w
Schools, Finance 315–6w
Social security benefits, Disabled 13
Teachers, Standards 101–2w, 310w

McGuinness, Martin
339

Meacher, Rt Hon Michael, Minister for the Environment, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 496–503, 506–7
Questions
Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment, Public appointments 5w
Air pollution 375–6w
Asbestos, Import controls 11w, 170–1w
Countryside Agency 174w
Energy, Conservation 321–2w
Environmental Task Force 225–6w
Genetically modified organisms, Butterflies 8w
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 3w, 163w, 176w, 215–6w, 319w, 374w
Genetically modified organisms, EC law 163–4w
Genetically modified organisms, Food 83w
Genetically modified organisms, USA 3–5w
Lead, Ammunition 374–5w
Lead, Fishing gear 374w
Limestone, Environment protection 7w
Litter 378w
Nuclear fuel reprocessing 214–5w
Oilseed rape, Environment protection 5–6w
Soya beans, Brazil 165w
USA, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 175w
Waste management 175w

Meale, Mr Alan, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions
Questions
Beacon councils, West Midlands 8–9w
Carbon dioxide 167w
Confederation of Burial Authorities, Monuments 171w
Greenhouse effect 83–4w
Home energy efficiency scheme 87–9w
Inland waterways 84w
Inland waterways, Industrial health and safety 89–90w
Land, Pollution 322–4w
Local government finance 8w
Public relations, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 83w
Regional development agencies 165w
Water companies 84–5w

Means tested benefits
50w
Pensioners 103w

Meat
Import controls (08.06.99) 492–5, 643

Meat Hygiene Service
Fees and charges 111w

Medical equipment
Certification quality marks 418–9w

Medical examinations
Manchester 338w
Social security benefits 338w

Medical laboratory scientific officers
Pay 283w

Medical profession
Students 19w
Trade unions 282w

Medical treatments
Cancer 14w, 19w, 112w, 279w, 281w
Fertility 156–7w
Genetically modified organisms 402w
HIV infection 155w, 273w

Medicine
Biotechnology 343w

Medicines Control Agency
Manpower 157–8w

Members
Allowances 394w
Correspondence 276–7w, 403–5w, 409w, 411w, 420w, 437–8w
Pay 2–3w
Travel (26.05.99) 411–26

Mentally disturbed offenders
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 33w
Police 152–3w

Mergers
NHS trusts 160–1w, 455–6

Merron, Ms Gillian
Questions
Members, Correspondence 403–5w
Office of Electricity Regulation, Cash limits 400w
Telecommunications, EC action 400w

Meters
Electricity 202w
Natural gas 202w

Metropolitan Police
Corruption (26.05.99) 437–44
Recruitment 151w

Michael, Rt Hon Alun, Secretary of State for Wales
Questions
Advertising, Welsh Office 267–8w
Beef, Wales 633–4, 638
Council of Ministers, Wales 635
Dairy farming, Wales 361–2w
EC grants and loans, Wales 356w, 635–6
Junior doctors, Wales 630–1
Junior ministers, Welsh Office 357w, 637
Livestock, Wales 362w
Llandough Hospital, Orthopaedics 630
Lobbying, Wales 636
Ministerial duties, Welsh Office 358w
Ministers, Pay 357w
National Assembly for Wales 356w, 637–8
National Assembly for Wales, Costs 360w
National Assembly for Wales, First secretary 357w
National Assembly for Wales, Foreign and Commonwealth Office 359–60w
National Assembly for Wales, Ministers 268w
NHS, Wales 629–31
Non-departmental public bodies, Wales 636–7
Proportional representation, Wales 636
Public expenditure, Wales 411w
Refugees, Kosovo 358w
Schools, Wales 146w
USA, Welsh Office 63–4w

Michie, Mr Bill
Questions
Belfast Agreement 337–8

Mid Essex Hospital Services NHS Trust
Waiting lists 646–8

Middle East
Gift aid 137–8w
Peace negotiations (26.05.99) 327–34

Midwives
453–4
Career structure 382w, 458

Milburn, Rt Hon Alan, Chief Secretary to the Treasury
Questions
BBC, Commercial activities 142w

Milburn, Rt Hon Alan—continued
British Energy, Debts 381w
Electronic government 139w
Health services, Expenditure 284w
Pensions, Public service 138–9w
Private finance initiative 185w

Military aircraft
Arms trade 1–2w
Export controls 206–7w
India 211w

Military discipline
Young people 212w

Military Survey
Standards 371w

Milk
Bovine somatotropin 41w

Milk Marque
236w

Millennium
Tourism 367w

Millennium compliance
British Nuclear Fuels 201–2w
Common Services Agency 129–30w
EC Energy Council 234w
Lancashire Constabulary 150w
Nuclear power stations 11–2w
Publicity 205w

Millennium Exhibition
Retail trade 232w

Miller, Mr Andrew
Questions
Disability living allowance 45w
Military Survey, Standards 371w
Pay and Personnel Agency, Standards 370–1w

Mine control measures vessels
106–7w

Minimum wage
Cabinet Office 291w
Dept for Education and Employment 387–8w
Dept for International Development 239w
Dept of Social Security 383w
Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 227w
Dept of Trade and Industry 236w
Home Office 394w
Lord Chancellor's Dept 318w
New deal schemes 178w

Ministerial duties
Scottish Office 98w, 127–8w, 148–50, 155
Welsh Office 358w

Ministerial Group on Biotechnology and Genetic Modification
see Biotechnology and Genetic Modification Ministerial Group

Ministerial policy advisors
Dept for Education and Employment 190–1w, 194w
Treasury 181w

Ministerial statements
Dioxins (08.06.99) 480–90
Drugs (25.05.99) 161–73
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 21–34
Kosovo (26.05.99) 355–72, (08.06.99) 463–79, (09.06.99) 744–57

Ministers
National Assembly for Wales 268w
Northern Ireland Assembly 337–9
Pay 357w
Welsh Office 357w

Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food
Proof of identity 252–3w
Public relations 42w
USA 44–5w
Visits abroad 249–50w

Minorities
Indonesia 352–3w

Mitchell, Mr Austin
Questions
Capital investment 380–1w
Convention on the Protection of the European Communities Financial Interests 435–6w
EC institutions, Corruption 435w
Fraud, EC action 264w
Immigration controls, Republic of Ireland 433–5w
Import controls, Food 345–6w
K4 Committee 259w
Manufactured goods, Balance of trade 200w
Regional development agencies 377w
Treaty of Amsterdam 264–5w

Mixed oxide fuel
Sellafield 399–400w
Transport 343w

MMR vaccine
415w

Modern apprenticeships
37–8w
Glasgow 153
Scotland 152–3

"Modernisation of the House Select Committee on Sittings of the House in Westminster Hall" (24.05.99) 81–133

"Modernising Parliament White Paper"
(09.06.99) 653–743

Moffatt, Laura
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 169
Questions
Cervical cancer, Screening 448–9
Logistic Information Systems Agency, Standards 144–5w

Mongolia
EC aid (08.06.99) 542

Monuments
Confederation of Burial Authorities 171w

Moore, Mr Michael
Debates etc.
EC grants and loans, Borders region (10.06.99) 879–80
Questions
Average earnings, Scotland 141–2w
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 153w
Students, Fees and charges 154

Moran, Ms Margaret
Questions
Contact orders, Domestic violence 318w
EC grants and loans, Northern Ireland 178w

Morgan, Mr Alasdair
Questions
Millennium compliance, Common Services Agency 129–30w
Regional selective assistance, Scotland 191–2w

Morgan, Daniel
Homicide 35w

Morgan, Ms Julie
Questions
Abortion 159w
Heart diseases, Children 357–8w

Morgan, Mr Rhodri
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 32

Morley, Mr Elliot, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
Questions
Cormorants, Pest control 249w
EC Fisheries Council 251w
Environment protection 44w
Environmentally sensitive areas 44w
Fisheries 44w, 249w
Fisheries, Grants 245–6w
Flood control 195w
Public relations, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 42w
Squirrels, Pest control 244w
Whales, Conservation 348–50w

Morris, Ms Estelle, Minister for School Standards, Dept for Education and Employment
Questions
Assisted places scheme 776–7
Class sizes, Gloucestershire 438w
Class sizes, Primary education 312w
Education, Finance 311–2w
Education, Greater London 780–1
Gifted children, Teaching methods 766–8
Grant maintained schools, Finance 313w, 771–2
Headteachers 385w
Headteachers, Training 390w
Local government finance 437w
Reading, Parents 389w, 777–8
School choice 389w
Schools, Finance 315–6w
Schools, Wandsworth 386w
Teachers, Pay 384w, 388w
Teachers, Standards 310w

Morris, Rt Hon John, Attorney-General
Questions
Kosovo, Armed conflict 21w
Scheduled offences, Northern Ireland 205w

Moss, Mr Malcolm
Questions
Hospitals, Waiting lists 642
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 336–7

Motor vehicles
166–7w
Grants 175w

Motorcycling Advisory Group
89w

Motorways
Safety 82–3w

Mountford, Kali
Questions
New deal schemes, Northern Ireland 178w

Mowlam, Rt Hon Marjorie, Secretary of State for Northern Ireland
Questions
Belfast Agreement 337–8
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry, Costs 299w
Human rights, Northern Ireland 36w
McGuiness, Martin 339
Northern Ireland Assembly 337–9
Northern Ireland Assembly, Ministers 337–9

Mowlam, Rt Hon Marjorie*—*continued
Northern Ireland government 176–7w
Northern Ireland government, Electoral systems 339
Violence, Northern Ireland 340
Weapons, Northern Ireland 340–1, 344

Mudie, Mr George, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept for Education and Employment
Questions
Business links, Finance 438w
EC Education Council 313w
EC Youth Council 97–8w
Firearms, Training 98–9w
Further education 99–100w, 310w
Further education, Finance 189–90w
Further education, Student numbers 391w
GCE A level, Per capita costs 100w
Higher education, Conditions of employment 316w
Members, Correspondence 437–8w
Minimum wage, Dept for Education and Employment 387–8w
National vocational qualifications 37–8w
Overseas students, Commonwealth 99w
Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, Finance 341w
Sixth form colleges, Teachers 100w
Students, Fees and charges 99w, 316w, 385–6w
Training, Tourism 38w
Young people, Voluntary organisations 774

Mullin, Mr Chris
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 166–7
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 28
Questions
China western poverty reduction project 239w
General practitioners, Sunderland 271w
Homelessness, Exservicemen 226–7w
Housing benefit 14
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Computers 35–6w

Murphy, Mr Jim
Debates etc.
Scottish Parliament, Points of order (25.05.99) 174
Questions
Operating costs, Scottish Office 412–3w
Students, Fees and charges 144–5

Murphy, Rt Hon Paul, Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office
Questions
Belfast Agreement 335
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry 335
Bovine spongiform encephalopathy, Waste disposal 299w
British-Irish Interparliamentary Body 177w
Business Development Service, Standards 325w
EC grants and loans, Northern Ireland 178w, 337
Northern Ireland Equality Commission 335
Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission 336
Sewage, Northern Ireland 298w
Terrorism, Northern Ireland 336–7
Transport, Northern Ireland 324w

Museum of London
Finance 232w

Museums and galleries
97w
Greater London Authority 229–30w

Museums Libraries and Archives Council
231w

National Air Traffic Services
220w

National Assembly for Wales
356w, 637–8
Costs 360w
First secretary 357w
Foreign and Commonwealth Office 359–60w
Ministers 268w

National carers' strategy
643–4

National childcare strategy
385w

National Consumer Council
Genetically modified organisms 40w

National grid for learning
781–2

National income
Republic of Ireland 59w, 288w

National Institute for Clinical Excellence
158w, 281w, 283–4w
Operating costs 416w

National insurance
304w

National insurance contributions
288–9w
Chronically sick 181w
Disabled 181w

National Insurance Fund
102w

National Lottery
Scotland 23w

National Meat Hygiene Service
see Meat Hygiene Service

National vocational qualifications
37–8w

NATO
Public relations 194w
UK delegations 105w

Natural gas
Complaints 401–2w
Meters 202w

Naysmith, Dr Douglas
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 62–3
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 528–9
Questions
Remploy, Standards 337w

New deal for lone parents
49w

New deal for schools
Hendon 38w

New deal for young people
310–1w, 385w
Government departments 770–1
Leeds 313w
North West region 391w

New deal schemes
Advisory services 100–1w
Civil service 116w
Minimum wage 178w
Northern Ireland 178w
Wales 360w

New Northern Ireland Assembly
see Northern Ireland Assembly

News at Ten
233w

Newspaper press
Standards (09.06.99) 759–64

NHS
276w, 643
Audit 457
Finance 283w, 360–1w
Greater London 272w
Operating costs 381w
Pay 280–1w
Scotland 128–9w
Wales 360–1w, 629–31

NHS Direct
111–2w

NHS trusts
Barnsley 17w
Directors 114–5w, 460
Doncaster 17w
Lincolnshire 455–6
Mergers 160–1w, 455–6
Wales 3w

Nicholls, Mr Patrick
Questions
National vocational qualifications 37–8w

Night flying
London airports 378–80w

Non-departmental public bodies
Public appointments 116–7w
Wales 636–7

Norman, Mr Archie
Questions
Refugees, Kosovo 27w

North West region
New deal for young people 391w

Northern Cyprus
26w
Ethnic groups 25–6w

Northern Ireland
AIDS 292–4w, 297–8w
Aricept 117w
Child protection registers 179w
Coroners 300w
Crimes of violence 36–8w, 298–9w
EC grants and loans 178w, 337
Education 176w
HIV infection 294–7w
Home care services 299–300w
Homicide 363w
Human rights 36w, 325w
Institutional care 299–300w
New deal schemes 178w
Pre-school education 341–2
Prisoners' release 117w, 645–6
Prisons 178–9w
Reparation by offenders 179w, 343–4
Scheduled offences 205w
Sewage 298w
Terrorism 336–7
Transport 324w
Violence 340
Weapons 177w, 179w, 340–1, 344

Northern Ireland Assembly
337–9
Ministers 337–9

Northern Ireland Compensation Agency
Standards 179w

Northern Ireland Equality Commission
335

Northern Ireland government
176–7w
Electoral systems 339

Northern Ireland Grand Committee
(25.05.99) 259

Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission
336

Northern Ireland (Location of Victims' Remains) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Royal Assent (26.05.99) 354

Northern Ireland Office
Open government 292w

Nottingham Prison
432w

Nuclear fuel reprocessing
214–5w
Sellafield 234w

Nuclear power
Aircraft carriers 105–6w

Nuclear power stations
344–5w
Millennium compliance 11–2w

Nuclear Safeguards Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 957

Nuclear weapons
India 147w
Pakistan 147w
Testing 329–30w
USA 211w

Numeracy
Primary education 765

Nurses
272w
Eastbourne Hospital (24.05.99) 134–42
Pay 17w, 114w, 275w

Nursing homes
Fees and charges 20w, 159w

Oaten, Mr Mark
Debates etc.
Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 952–4
Football (Offences and Disorder) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 925
Questions
Asthma, Children 417–8w
Hearing Aid Council Act 1968 363–4w
Medical equipment, Certification quality marks 418–9w

O'Brien, Mr Mike, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Home Office
Debates etc.
Metropolitan Police, Corruption (26.05.99) 440–4
Questions
Immigration, Appeals 395w
Immigration, Applications 35w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate 73w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Administrative delays 34w, 254w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Computers 35–6w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Contracts 151w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Siemens 253–4w
Immigration controls, Republic of Ireland 433–5w
Members, Correspondence 420w
Passports 257–9w
Passports, Administrative delays 150–1w
Passports, Children 255–6w
Political refugees 72–3w, 434w

O'Brien, Mr Mike—continued
Political refugees, Correspondence 255w
Refugees, Kosovo 27w

O'Brien, Mr William
Debates etc.
Concessionary Television Licences for Pensioners Bill, 1R (09.06.99) 650
Questions
Barclays Bank, Redundancy 775–6
Incapacity benefit 46w

Occupational pensions
48w

Oesophageal cancer
Radiotherapy 364w

Offences against children
80w, 432w

Office for the Supervision of Solicitors
134w

Office of Electricity Regulation
Cash limits 400w

Office of Gas Supply
Cash limits 400w

Official engagements
194w, 347w

Official Report
CD-Rom 393–4w

O'Hara, Mr Edward
Questions
State earnings related pension scheme, Widowed people 383w
"Support in Bereavement Consultation Paper" 304w

Oil and Gas Industry Task Force
127w

Oilseed rape
Environment protection 5–6w

Old Dalby
Army Base Repair Organisation 213w

Older workers
Discrimination 768–9
Unemployment 769–70

Olner, Mr Bill
Questions
Passports, Children 255–6w
Shipping, EC law 87w

O'Neill, Diarmuid
255w

Open government
107–8w, 134w
Dept of Trade and Industry 200w
Northern Ireland Office 292w

Open individual export licences
364w

Ophthalmic services
Pensioners 16w

Opik, Mr Lembit
Questions
Aviation, Wales 356w
Strokes, Health services 281–2w

Opposition
Finance (26.05.99) 427–9

Orange Order
Drumcree 342–3

Organ, Mrs Diana
Questions
Fires, Gloucestershire 257–8w
Gloucestershire Fire and Rescue Service 257w

Organic farming
Wales 3w, 267w

Organophosphates
113w

Orthopaedics
Llandough Hospital 630

Osborne, Ms Sandra
Questions
Students, Fees and charges 143–4

Osteoporosis
273w

Ottaway, Mr Richard
Questions
London Regional Transport, Finance 5w

Out-patients
Waiting lists 272w

Overcrowding
Railways 217w
Thameslink 217w

Overpayments
Housing benefit 303w

Overseas aid
241w, 413w
Developing countries 240w
Kashmir 238–9w
Trade associations 344w

Overseas investment
Exchange control 327w

Overseas students
Commonwealth 99w

Overseas trade
Human rights 346w

Paice, Mr James
Questions
Beta-interferon, Correspondence 277w
Horticulture, EC action 347–8w

Pakistan
Foreign relations 307w
Nuclear weapons 147w
Religious freedom (09.06.99) 605–11

Palace Theatre Westcliffe
(26.05.99) 292–5

Palmer, Dr Nick
Debates etc.
Line of route (26.05.99) 384–5, 395–6, 398–401, 403, 405

Panchen Lama
309w

Parachute Regiment
Manpower 210w

Parental leave
22w
Working families tax credit 60w, 105w, 182w, 380w

Parents
Reading 389w, 777–8

Parish councils
227w

Parliamentary Contributory Pension Fund
(26.05.99) 435

Parliamentary questions
Administrative delays 408w

Partnership Fund
22–3w

Passports
257–9w, (26.05.99) 295–7
Administrative delays 150–1w

Passports—continued
Children 255–6w

Patents
Applications 372–3w

Patents Act 1977
Questions
372–3w

Paterson, Mr Owen
Questions
Lorries 81w

Pathfinders to the Parliament
125w

Pay and Personnel Agency
Standards 370–1w

Peace negotiations
Middle East (26.05.99) 327–34

Peat Extraction Working Group
87w

Pedestrians
Death 86–7w

Pendry, Mr Tom
Questions
Airport tax 183–4w

Pension rights
Government Communications Headquarters 307–8w

Pensioners
Dental services 381w
Income support 4–5, 8–10, 16–8, 53–4w, 103w
Income tax 54w
Means tested benefits 103w
Ophthalmic services 16w
Shrewsbury 53–4w
Warrington 4

Pensions
47–8w, 50w
Armed forces 212–3w
Public service 138–9w

Pensions (Amendment) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 958

Perham, Ms Linda
Questions
Millennium compliance, Nuclear power stations 11–2w
Museums Libraries and Archives Council 231w

Personal injury
Compensation 135–6w, 318w, 326w

Pertussis vaccine
Side effects 279–80w

Pest control
Cormorants 249w
Squirrels 244w

Petitions
Alternative medicine (08.06.99) 542
Health foods (09.06.99) 758
Immigration controls (25.05.99) 260
Roads (26.05.99) 436

Petrol
167w
Additives 168w
Environment protection 322w
Retail trade 200w

Phillips Inquiry
see Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy and Creutzfeld Jakob Disease Inquiry

Photovoltaics
109w, (25.05.99) 261–70

Pickles, Mr Eric
Questions
War pensions 8

Pike, Mr Peter L
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 172
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 659
Kosovo (09.06.99) 748
Line of route (26.05.99) 386, 388–90, 392, 401, 408
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 90, 103–5, 108–9, 127
Questions
Angola, Armed conflict 369w
House of Commons, Pay 405w
Housing benefit 15
Kashmir 369w
New deal for young people, North West region 391w
Sex Offences Review 265–6w
South Africa, Foreign relations 310w

Pinochet, Augusto
421w

Planning Appeals Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 959

Planning permission
Aerials 228w
Barnet Football Club 216w
Belmont Riding Centre 172w
Funerals (11.06.99) 961–8
RAF Hendon 172w

Playing fields
Schools 779–80

Poetry
193–4w

Police
Eltham 436w
Emergency calls 422w, 431w
Leeds 262w
Mentally disturbed offenders 152–3w
River Thames 332–3w
Vehicles 431w

Police custody
Death 335w

Police stations
Shropshire 159

Political parties
Finance 638–9, 642–3

Political refugees
72–3w, 333–4w, 434w
Correspondence 255w
Finance 340–1w
Income support 301w

Pollution
Health hazards 154–5w
Land 322–4w

Pollution control
Road traffic 216w

Pollution Prevention and Control Bill (HL) 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R, Money res* and Ways and means res* (08.06.99) 496–541

Pontefract
Magistrates' courts 291w

Portcullis House
118w

Post Office
235w
Takeovers 110w

Post offices
Rural areas 349–50
Social security benefits 3, 6–7, 10, 16, 21w, 382–3w

Post traumatic stress disorder
Iraq-Kuwait conflict 209w

Pound, Mr Stephen
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 203
Ministerial statement intervention (09.06.99) 749
Planning permission (11.06.99) 961–3
Road Traffic Regulation (Cycle Parking) Bill (HL), 2R order read (11.06.99) 960
Questions
Northern Ireland government 177w

Power stations
Cleveland 365–6w

Prentice, Ms Bridget
Debates etc.
Kosovo (09.06.99) 750

Prentice, Mr Gordon
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 489–90
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 671
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 501, 513
Questions
Armed forces, Falkland Islands 2w
Business questions 786
City technology colleges 384w
Construction, Recycling 7w
Devolution, Prime Minister 12w
Ford Prison 421w
Labour Liberal Democrats Joint Consultative Committee 39w
Pakistan, Nuclear weapons 147w
Sheep, Radioactive fallout 41w
Textiles, Trade competitiveness 203–4w
Trade promotion, Angola 308w
UN Security Council, Public appointments 26–7w

Pre-school education
Northern Ireland 341–2
Voluntary schools 388–9w

Prescott, Rt Hon John, Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for the Environment Transport and the Regions
Questions
Cash limits, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 398w
Mixed oxide fuel, Sellafield 399–400w

Prescription Charges (Hormone Replacement Therapy) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 957

Prescription drugs
Prisoners 75–6w
Rationing 452

Prescriptions
Fees and charges 46w

Primarolo, Ms Dawn, Paymaster General
Questions
British Manufacturing and Research Company 287–8w
Customs and Excise, X rays 56w
Disabled person's tax credit 184w
European Social Fund, Employment schemes 288w
Indirect taxation 56w
Inland Revenue 184–5w
Inland Revenue, Cash limits 408–9w
National insurance contributions 288–9w

Primarolo, Ms Dawn—continued
National insurance contributions, Disabled 181w
National Insurance Fund 102w
Smuggling 59w, 180–1w
Smuggling, Channel tunnel 59w
Tax burden 288w
Taxation, EC action 380w
Taxation, Recruitment agencies 286–7w
Taxation, Reform 183w
Tobacco, Labelling 56w
Value Added Tax (Input Tax) Order 1992 57w
Value Added Tax (Sport Sports Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1998 57w
VAT, Cars 58w
VAT, Financial services 289w
VAT, Local authorities 57w
VAT, Property transfer 57w
VAT, Tax thresholds 58w
VAT, Tax yields 58w
VAT, Trade unions 58w
VAT exemptions 139w
VAT (Goods Used for Exempt Supplies) Order 1999 58w
VAT returns, Internet 57w
Working families tax credit 181–3w
Working families tax credit, Parental leave 60w, 182w, 380w

Primary care groups
Greater London 274w

Primary education
Class sizes 312w
Literacy 390w
Numeracy 765

Primary health care
274w

Primates
Animal experiments 79–80w, 262–3w

Prime Minister
Devolution 12w
Public relations 192–3w
USA 393w

Prior, Mr David
Questions
Farmers, Income 359w

Prison accommodation
Young offenders 32w

Prison visitors
33–4w

Prisoners
Education 28w
Employment 29w
Prescription drugs 75–6w
University for Industry 28w
Voting rights 73w, 76w

Prisoners' incentives and earned privileges scheme
73–5w

Prisoners' release
Northern Ireland 117w, 645–6

Prisons
Complaints 152w
Disciplinary proceedings 258w
Drugs 151–2w
Northern Ireland 178–9w
Redundancy pay 178–9w

Private finance initiative
185w
Community hospitals 456–7
Hospitals 457

Private sector
Developing countries 240–1w

Private sector—continued
Schools 384w
Training 438w

Probation and aftercare
71–2w
Avon 263w

Procurement
Artillery 330–1w
Warships 107w

Proof of identity
Dept for Culture Media and Sport 232–3w
Dept of Trade and Industry 203w
Home Office 260w
Housing benefit 302–3w
Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 252–3w
Treasury 286w

Proportional representation
Wales 636

Prosecutions
Rape 34w

Prostate cancer
277–8w

Prostitution
(26.05.99) 275–7

Protection of Children Bill 1998/99
Questions
333w

Psychiatric nurses
Business travel 137w

Psychiatry
Ethnic groups 14–5w

Public Accounts Committee
(10.06.99) 876

Public Administration Select Committee
(10.06.99) 876

Public appointments
Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment 5w
Non-departmental public bodies 116–7w
UN Security Council 26–7w

Public buildings
Disabled 344–5

Public expenditure
Dept for Culture Media and Sport 187w
Wales 411w

Public House Names Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 960

Public inquiries
Heathrow Airport 173w, 227–8w

Public libraries
Finance 231w

Public opinion
Kosovo 193w

Public relations
Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 83w
Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 42w
NATO 194w
Prime Minister 192–3w
Treasury 180w

Public service
Pensions 138–9w

Publicity
Millennium compliance 205w

Pupils
Cycling 390w
First aid 387w

Quarantine
42w, 407w

Quin, Rt Hon Ms Joyce, Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 199, 220, 255–9
Questions
Council of Ministers 120–4w
EC Foreign Affairs Council 23–5w
EC Foreign Affairs Council, Social security 25w
Members, Correspondence 411w
Northern Cyprus 26w
Northern Cyprus, Ethnic groups 25–6w
Russia, Arms trade 147w
Turkey, Human rights 352w

Quinn, Mr Lawrie
Questions
Dental services, Scarborough 274w
Invalid vehicles 49–50w

Race relations
Armed forces 143–4w

Racial discrimination
Doctors 275–6w

Radio Authority
Inquiries 94w

Radioactive fallout
Sheep 41w

Radioactive materials
Japan 343–4w, 368w, 400w, 409w

Radioactive wastes
646
Wales 268w

Radiotherapy
Oesophageal cancer 364w
Royal Shrewsbury Hospital 415–6w

RAF Hendon
Planning permission 172w

RAF Personnel Management Agency
Standards 371w

RAF Quedgeley
213w, 328w

RAF Signals Engineering Establishment
Standards 108w

RAF Training Group
Standards 331–2w

Railways
Disabled 174w
Overcrowding 217w

Rammell, Mr Bill
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 663, 665–6, 722–9
Kosovo (08.06.99) 473
Questions
Armed forces, Race relations 143–4w
EC Agriculture Council 40–1w
EC Foreign Affairs Council 23–5w
EC Research Council 342w
Literacy, Primary education 390w

Randall, Mr John
Debates etc.
Line of route (26.05.99) 403–4
Questions
Midwives, Career structure 458

Rape
Prosecutions 34w

Rating (Valuation) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Royal Assent (26.05.99) 354

Rationing
Prescription drugs 452

Raynsford, Mr Nick, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions*
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 582, 601–4
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 576–80
Planning permission (11.06.99) 963–8
Questions
Aerials, Planning permission 228w
Asbestos, Buildings 171–2w
Construction, Recycling 7w
Council housing, Construction 171w
Council housing, Sales 229w
Council housing, Slums 172w
Derelict land, Construction 91w
Electromagnetic fields, Health hazards 165–6w
Environmental impact assessment 218w
Greater London Authority 398–9w
Homelessness, Exservicemen 226–7w
Peat Extraction Working Group 87w
Walton bridge 229w

Reading
Parents 389w, 777–8

Recess motions
(26.05.99) 271–312

Recruitment
Dept of Trade and Industry 366–7w
Metropolitan Police 151w

Recruitment agencies
Taxation 286–7w

Recycling
Construction 7w

Redcar
Local government finance (26.05.99) 284–8

Redundancy
Barclays Bank 775–6
Disabled 775–6

Redundancy pay
Prisons 178–9w

Redwood, Rt Hon John
Questions
Gas fired power stations 109w

Reed, Mr Andrew
Questions
Arms trade, Export controls 108w

Referendums Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Order for resuming adjourned Rep read (11.06.99) 957

Refrigeration
Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 320w
Dept of Trade and Industry 363w
Lorries 81–2w

Refugees
Kosovo 27w, 358w

Reg(EC)258/97
248w

Reg(EC)1139/98
248w

Regional aid
Greater London 351

Regional development agencies
165w, 217w, 377w

Regional selective assistance
Scotland 126w, 191–2w

Regulations on Small Businesses (Reduction) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 958

Rehabilitation centres
Drugs 352

Reid, Rt Hon Dr John, Secretary of State for Scotland*
Questions
EC law, Scotland 150–2
European Communities, Scotland 151
Fishing grounds, Scotland 149, 151
Forest Research, Standards 336w
Higher education, Scotland 133w
Lockerbie, Bombings 149
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 127–8w, 148–50
Operating costs, Scottish Office 412–3w
Regional selective assistance, Scotland 191–2w
Scottish Parliament, Elections 125–6w
Shipbuilding, Clydeside 125w
Skye bridge 269w
Students, Fees and charges 124–5w, 143–5, 153–4

Religious freedom
Pakistan (09.06.99) 605–11

Remploy
Standards 337w

Rendel, Mr David
Questions
Housing benefit, Overpayments 303w
Housing benefit, Proof of identity 302–3w
Identity cards, Confiscation orders 406w
Jobseeker's allowance 311w
National insurance 304w
Severe disablement allowance 12
State retirement pensions, Disabled 304–5w

Reparation by offenders
Northern Ireland 179w, 343–4

Republic of Ireland
Immigration controls 433–5w
National income 59w, 288w

Rescue services
Dover 223w
Manpower 223–4w, 397w

Reserve forces
Deployment 108w

Residential homes
Leeds 282w

Resignations
Disability Benefits Forum 11–2
European Commission 348–9

Restraining and Protection Orders Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 958

Retail trade
Millennium Exhibition 232w
Petrol 200w

Retirement
Magistrates 156–7

Riot control weapons
334w

Risk assessment
Export Credits Guarantee Dept 198–9w

River Thames
Police 332–3w

Road Haulage Association
216w

Road haulage industry
see Lorries

Road traffic
Business travel 6w
Pollution control 216w

Road Traffic Regulation (Cycle Parking) Bill (HL) 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 960

Roads
Manchester (26.05.99) 277–9
Petitions (26.05.99) 436
Safety 86w

Robathan, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 42
Defence (10.06.99) 802, 810, 851–2, 860–3, 876
Kosovo (26.05.99) 364
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 82, 84, 127
Questions
Beef, Wales 633–4
Business questions 795–6
Education, Greater London 780–1
Kosovo, Public opinion 193w
Weapons, Northern Ireland 340

Robertson, Rt Hon George, Secretary of State for Defence*
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 798–806, 808, 814–7, 859
Kosovo, Ministerial statements (26.05.99) 355–72, (09.06.99) 744–57
Questions
Artillery, Procurement 330–1w
Defence, Europe 209w
European fighter aircraft 2w
Kosovo 212w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 145–6w
Nuclear weapons, Testing 329–30w
Nuclear weapons, USA 211w
Reserve forces, Deployment 108w

Robertson, Mr Laurence
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 586–7
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 569
Questions
Armed forces, Pay 328w
Beta-interferon 419w
Criminal Records Bureau 333w
Defence Evaluation and Research Agency 210–1w
Directors, Insolvency 402w
Fares, Children 227w
Fluoride, Water treatment 419w
Indonesia, Minorities 352–3w
Medical laboratory scientific officers, Pay 283w
Parish councils 227w

Roche, Mrs Barbara, Financial Secretary to the Treasury*
Questions
Airport tax 183–4w

Roe, Mrs Marion
Debates etc.
Line of route (26.05.99) 382–9, 400, 406–9
Questions
Standard of living 349

Rogers of Riverside Task Force
see Urban Task Force

Rooker, Mr Jeff, Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food
Questions
Absinthe 251w
Agriculture, Females 43w
Bat meat 347w
Beef, Exports 111w
Beef, Hormone treatments 111w
Bovine somatotropin 247–8w
Cattle tracing system 250w
Cereals, EC action 42–3w
Climate change levy 252w
Dietary supplements, Safety 251w
Food, Advisory bodies 41w
Foot and mouth disease 42w
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 242–4w
Genetically modified organisms, Food 248w
Genetically modified organisms, Honey 248w
Horticulture, EC action 347–8w
Meat Hygiene Service, Fees and charges 111w
Milk, Bovine somatotropin 41w
Quarantine 42w
Sheep, Radioactive fallout 41w
Slaughterhouses, Fees and charges 43–4w, 395w

Rooney, Mr Terry
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 505

Ross, Mr Ernie
Questions
Pathfinders to the Parliament 125w

Ross, Mr William
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 372
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 118–20
Questions
Bloody Sunday Tribunal of Inquiry, Costs 299w
Crimes of violence, Northern Ireland 36–8w, 298–9w
Firearms, Death 335–6w
Institutional care, Northern Ireland 299–300w
McGuiness, Martin 339
Weapons, Northern Ireland 179w

Rotherham
Teenage pregnancy 451

Rowe, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 46, 48–50
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 669, 683, 700, 707–10, 729
Questions
India, Foreign relations 307w

Rowlands, Mr Ted
Debates etc.
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 431
Questions
EC budget 289w
Minimum wage, Cabinet Office 291w
Minimum wage, Dept for Education and Employment 387–8w
Minimum wage, Dept for International Development 239w
Minimum wage, Dept of Social Security 383w

Rowlands, Mr Ted—continued
Minimum wage, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 227w
Minimum wage, Dept of Trade and Industry 236w
Minimum wage, Home Office 394w
Minimum wage, Lord Chancellor's Dept 318w
New deal schemes, Wales 360w
Non-departmental public bodies, Wales 636–7

Royal Academy of Dramatic Art
Finance 94–5w, 341w

Royal Air Force Personnel Management Agency
see RAF Personnel Management Agency

Royal Commission on Long-term Care
see Long-term Care Royal Commission

Royal Naval Hospital Haslar
283w, 329w

Royal Opera House
Finance 94w

Royal Parks (Trading) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
1R (10.06.99) 797
2R order read (11.06.99) 960

Royal Shrewsbury Hospital
Radiotherapy 415–6w
Waiting lists 16w

Royal Surrey County and St Luke's Hospitals NHS Trust
445–6

Royal Ulster Constabulary
Disciplinary proceedings 326w
West Midlands Police 325w

Ruddock, Joan
Questions
Energy, Conservation 321w
Genetically modified organisms, Developing countries 237w
Genetically modified organisms, Medical treatments 402w
London airports, Night flying 378–80w
Soya beans, Brazil 165w, 199w

Rural areas
Bus services 373–4w
Health authorities 272w
Maternity services 454
Post offices 349–50

Russell, Bob
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 830–1
Kosovo (09.06.99) 756–7
Questions
Class sizes, Essex 189w

Russia
Arms trade 147w

St Aubyn, Mr Nick
Debates etc.
Adoption (Intercountry Aspects) Bill, Rep and 3R (11.06.99) 956
Questions
Assisted places scheme 776–7
Business questions 794
Ministerial duties, Welsh Office 358w
Royal Surrey County and St Luke's Hospitals NHS Trust 445

St Kilda
270w

Salmond, Mr Alex
Questions
Fisheries, Grants 245–6w

Sanctions
Serbia 354w

Sanders, Mr Adrian
Questions
Hotels, Licensing laws 186w

Sarwar, Mr Mohammad
Questions
Shipbuilding, Clydeside 125w

Satellite broadcasting
Frigates 211w

Savidge, Mr Malcolm
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 706, 725
Kosovo (09.06.99) 754
Questions
Demonstrations, Drumcree 342
Disadvantaged, Scotland 125w

Sawford, Mr Phil
Questions
Osteoporosis 273w
Teachers, Pay 388w

Sayeed, Mr Jonathan
Questions
Witnesses, Protection 436w

Scarborough
Dental services 274w

Scheduled offences
Northern Ireland 205w

School choice
389w

Schools
Cambridgeshire 187w
Closures 190w, 778–9
Finance 225w, 315–6w
Information technology 189w
Playing fields 779–80
Private sector 384w
Swimming 101w
Transport 357w
Wales 146w, 357w
Wandsworth 386w

Schools access initiative
391w

Science
Conferences 233w
Scotland 146–7

Scotland
AIDS 130–3w, 192w
Average earnings 141–2w
Child protection registers 269w
Closed circuit television 147
Cot deaths 128w
Disadvantaged 125w
Drugs 126–7w
EC grants and loans 22w, 126w, 129w
EC law 150–2
Education 128w, 269w
European Communities 151
Fishing grounds 149, 151
Further education 133w
Higher education 124–5w, 133w
HIV infection 130–1w
Hospital beds 126w
Housing problems 134w
Modern apprenticeships 152–3
National Lottery 23w
NHS 128–9w
Regional selective assistance 126w, 191–2w
Science 146–7
Students 11, 143–5, 153–4
Warm deal 373w

Scottish Adjacent Waters Boundaries Order 1999
Questions
411–2w

Scottish Enterprise Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
Royal Assent (26.05.99) 354

Scottish Office
Ministerial duties 98w, 127–8w, 148–50, 155
Operating costs 412–3w

Scottish Parliament
Correspondence 98w
Elections 125–6w

Secondary education
Class sizes 350–1

Select Committee on Public Administration
see Public Administration Select Committee

Sellafield
Mixed oxide fuel 399–400w
Nuclear fuel reprocessing 234w

Serbia
Ethnic groups 407w
Sanctions 354w

Service charges
Airlines 363w

Service Children's Education
Standards 329w

Severe disablement allowance
11–2

Severn Trent Water
Water charges (09.06.99) 620–8

Sewage
Northern Ireland 298w

Sex
Health education 447–8

Sex Offences Review
265–6w

Sexual offences
Feltham Young Offender Institution and Remand Centre 30–1w

Shamrock Farms
Animal welfare 79–80w, 262w

Shaw, Mr Jonathan
Questions
Fire Service College 34w

Sheep
Radioactive fallout 41w

Sheerman, Mr Barry
Debates etc.
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 415, 419–21
Questions
Canary Wharf, Bridges 91w
Derelict land, Construction 91w
Heathrow Airport, Public inquiries 173w, 227–8w
Pensions 47–8w
Taxation, Derelict land 142w
Telephone services, Charities 343w
Urban Task Force 91w

Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 656, 667–73
Line of route (26.05.99) 402, 406
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 83–4

Sheltered housing
55–6w

Shepherd, Mr Richard
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft) (24.05.99) 30

Shipbuilding
Clydeside 125w

Shipping
EC law 87w
Forecasts 223w

Short, Rt Hon Clare, Secretary of State for International Development
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 38–49, 51, 53–4, 60, 65–6, 68, 71, 74, 77
Questions
China western poverty reduction project 239w
Commonwealth, Human rights 38–9w
Consultants, Dept for International Development 239–40w
Developing countries, Debts 237–8w
Developing countries, Genetically modified organisms 237w
Developing countries, Overseas aid 240w
Developing countries, Private sector 240–1w
Developing countries, Tobacco 370w, 413w
Kashmir, Overseas aid 238–9w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 413w
Minimum wage, Dept for International Development 239w
Overseas aid 241w, 413w
Tibet, Farmers 180w
UNESCO 180w

Shotton steelworks
645

Shrewsbury
Child benefit 339w
Pensioners 53–4w

Shropshire
Police stations 159

Siemens
Immigration and Nationality Directorate 253–4w

Sierra Leone
118w, 352w

Simpson, Mr Alan
Questions
Biotechnology 153w, 290w
Biotechnology, Medicine 343w
Biotechnology and Genetic Modification Ministerial Group 291w
Biotechnology Presentation Group 290w
Genetically modified organisms, Food 292w
Home energy efficiency scheme 87–9w

Simpson, Mr Keith
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 833, 863–8
Questions
Armed forces, Vacancies 214w
Defence, Expenditure 328w
Kosovo 212w
NATO, Public relations 194w
Parachute Regiment, Manpower 210w
Reserve forces, Deployment 108w

Single benefit gateway
766

Single parents
see Lone parents

Sixth form colleges
Teachers 100w

Skinner, Mr Dennis
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 484

Skye bridge
269w

Slaughterhouses
Fees and charges 43–4w, 395w

Slums
Council housing 172w

Small businesses
400–1w
Technology 184w
Telephone numbering 401w
Wales 631–3

Smith, Rt Hon Andrew, Minister for Employment and Disability Rights, Dept for Education and Employment
Questions
EC Labour and Social Affairs Council 314w
Environmental Task Force 314–5w
European Social Fund, Employment schemes 386–7w
Jobseeker's allowance 100w, 190w, 311w
New deal for young people 310–1w, 385w
New deal for young people, Leeds 313w
New deal for young people, North West region 391w
New deal schemes, Advisory services 100–1w
Single benefit gateway 766
"Youth and Europe - Our Future" 436w

Smith, Angela
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 57–9
Questions
Families 259–60w
Railways, Disabled 174w
Reparation by offenders, Northern Ireland 343

Smith, Rt Hon Chris, Secretary of State for Culture Media and Sport
Questions
Arts Council of England, Buildings 96–7w
Arts Council of England, Grants 96w
Britain Visitor Centre, Operating costs 186–7w
Broadcasting Standards Commission 95w
English Tourism Council 95w
Greater London Authority, Museums and galleries 229–30w
Hotels, Standards 95–6w
Museum of London, Finance 232w
Museums and galleries 97w
Museums Libraries and Archives Council 231w
Proof of identity, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 232–3w
Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, Finance 94–5w
Royal Opera House, Finance 94w
Wembley Stadium 97w

Smith, Jacqui
Debates etc.
Severn Trent Water, Water charges (09.06.99) 620–4
Questions
Community Legal Service 62w

Smith, Mr John
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 191, 244–7
Questions
Llandough Hospital, Orthopaedics 630

Smith, Mr John—continued*
RAF Personnel Management Agency, Standards 371w

Smith, Mr Llew
Questions
Japan, Radioactive materials 368w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 145–6w
Mixed oxide fuel, Transport 343w
MMR vaccine 415w
NATO, UK delegations 105w
Nuclear fuel reprocessing 215w
Nuclear weapons, USA 211w
Open government 107–8w
Radioactive materials, Japan 343–4w

Smith, Sir Robert
Debates etc.
Devolution (09.06.99) 591, 593
Questions
Fishing grounds, Scotland 151

Smoking
Advisory services 452
Television 272–3w

Smuggling
59w, 180–1w
Channel tunnel 59w

Smyth, Rev Martin
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 170
Questions
Reparation by offenders, Northern Ireland 343–4

Soames, Mr Nicholas
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 40
European Communities (25.05.99) 185
Kosovo, Points of order (24.05.99) 36
Middle East, Peace negotiations (26.05.99) 327–30
Questions
Cormorants, Pest control 249w
Squirrels, Pest control 244w
War pensions 8

Social Exclusion Unit
Teenage pregnancy 450–1

Social security
47w
EC Foreign Affairs Council 25w

Social Security Act 1998
Questions
103–4w

Social security appeal tribunals
339–40w

Social security benefits
Abuse 2–3, 5, 15–6, 49w, 187w
Administrative delays 48–9w
Appeals 47w, 340w
Disabled 13–4, 51w, 305–6w
Essex 51–3w
Lone parents 105w
Medical examinations 338w
Post offices 3, 6–7, 10, 16, 21w, 382–3w
Students 304w
Widowed people 340w

Social Security Benefits Agency
Computers 306–7w
Greater London 15–6
Manpower 1–2

Social services
114w

Soley, Mr Clive
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 477

Soley, Mr Clive—continued*
Questions
Psychiatry, Ethnic groups 14–5w

South Africa
Foreign relations 310w

South East region
Air traffic 219–22w

South West region
Teachers 384w

South Yorkshire
Health action zones 275w

Soya beans
Brazil 165w, 199w

Speaker and deputies
Debates etc.
Amendments and new clauses (24.05.99) 81–2, (26.05.99) 411, (11.06.99) 885–6, 910, 920, 930, 943, 949, 957
Conduct of proceedings (24.05.99) 19, 34, 89, 135, (25.05.99) 166, 195, (26.05.99) 312, 335, 363, 368, 372, 432, (08.06.99) 488, 503–4, 507, (09.06.99) 580, 619, 640, 666, 678,(10.06.99) 785, 807–8, 816, 837, 853, 855, (11.06.99) 900, 905, 907–8, 939, 941, 951
Disallowed questions (26.05.99) 373–4, (09.06.99) 643
Points of order (24.05.99) 6, 35–7, 103, 127, (25.05.99) 174, 187, 204, (26.05.99) 275, 372, (08.06.99) 483, 491, (09.06.99) 649
Private Members' bill orders (11.06.99) 959–60
Royal Assent (26.05.99) 354
Rulings and statements, Calling of Members (09.06.99) 649
Rulings and statements, Sub judice rule (26.05.99) 377–8

"Special Grant Report (No 46) on Private Finance Initiative" (08.06.99) 541

Special hospitals
Vacancies 159–60w

Speed limits
319–20w
Cameras 434w
Greater London 260w

Spellar, Mr John, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Ministry of Defence*
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 833, 865, 868–76
Questions
Aircraft carriers, Nuclear power 105–6w
Armed conflict 208w
Arms trade, Export controls 108w
Arms trade, Military aircraft 1–2w
Arms trade, Turkey 370w
Army Base Repair Organisation, Old Dalby 213w
Chemical and Biological Defence Establishment 214w
Committee on the Award of Honours Decorations and Medals 212w
Defence, Expenditure 328w
Defence Evaluation and Research Agency 210–1w
Defence Intelligence and Security Centre, Standards 372w
Frigates, Satellite broadcasting 211w
General Service Medal, Eligibility 211w
Joint Air Reconnaissance Intelligence Centre, Standards 372w
Military aircraft, Export controls 206–7w
Military aircraft, India 211w

Spellar, Mr John—continued*
Military Survey, Standards 371w
Mine control measures vessels 106–7w
Open government 107–8w
Patents, Applications 372–3w
Pay and Personnel Agency, Standards 370–1w
RAF Quedgeley 213w, 328w
Service Children's Education, Standards 329w
Warships 213–4w
Warships, Procurement 107w

Spelman, Mrs Caroline
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 487
Questions
Child Support Agency 49w
Pensioners, Income support 9–10

Spring, Mr Richard
Debates etc.
Tourism, Cornwall (26.05.99) 288–90

Squire, Ms Rachel
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 214
Questions
EC law, Scotland 150–1

Squirrels
Pest control 244w

Staffordshire
County courts 160
Water treatment 15w

Staffordshire Ambulance Service
281w, 415w

Stakeholder pensions
48w, 340w

Standard of living
349

Standing Order No 152
(26.05.99) 430–6

Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 474, (09.06.99) 748

Starkey, Dr Phyllis
Debates etc.
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 95–100, 123
Questions
Higher education, Conditions of employment 316w
Motorcycling Advisory Group 89w

State earnings related pension scheme
Widowed people 51w, 383w

State retirement pensions
Age addition 55w
Carers 51w, 304–5w
Disabled 304–5w
Taxpayers 52w

Statistics
Dept of Health 279w

Steen, Mr Anthony
Questions
Fisheries, Grants 245–6w
Fishing vessels, Safety 228w
Investing in dentistry initiative 19–20w

Steinberg, Mr Gerry
Questions
EC grants and loans, Scotland 22w
Iraq-Kuwait conflict, Vaccination 205–6w

Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry
71w, 259w
Disclosure of information 36w

Stewart, Mr David
Questions
Cot deaths, Scotland 128w
Long term unemployed 768–9

Stewart, Mr Ian
Questions
Pertussis vaccine, Side effects 279–80w
Social security benefits, Medical examinations 338w

Stinchcombe, Mr Paul
Questions
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 163w
Genetically modified organisms, EC law 163–4w
Home detention curfews 76–8w
Military discipline, Young people 212w
Prisoners, Prescription drugs 75–6w
Prisoners, Voting rights 73w, 76w
Prisoners' incentives and earned privileges scheme 73–5w
Prisons, Complaints 152w
Prisons, Disciplinary proceedings 258w

Stoate, Dr Howard
Questions
Political refugees, Finance 340–1w
Stakeholder pensions 340w
Widowed people, Social security benefits 340w

Stock Exchange
Disclosure of information 140w

Stop and search
Greater London 264w

Strang, Rt Hon Dr Gavin,
Questions
AIDS, Northern Ireland 292–4w, 297–8w
AIDS, Scotland 130–3w, 192w
AIDS, Wales 65–8w
HIV infection, Northern Ireland 294–7w
HIV infection, Scotland 130–1w
HIV infection, Wales 64w, 68–70w

Straw, Rt Hon Jack, [illegible] of State for the Home Dept
Debates etc.
Freedom of Information Bill (Draft), Ministerial statements (24.05.99) 21–34
Questions
Casement, Roger 394–5w
Commission for Racial Equality, Annual reports 333w
EU Justice and Home Affairs Council 34–5w
Families 259–60w
Fire Service College 34w
Immigration and Nationality Directorate, Annual reports 334w
K4 Committee 259w
Members, Correspondence 420w
Minimum wage, Home Office 394w
O'Neill, Diarmuid 255w
Pinochet, Augusto 421w
Police custody, Death 335w
Political refugees 333–4w
Proof of identity, Home Office 260w
Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry 71w, 259w
Stephen Lawrence Death Inquiry, Disclosure of information 36w
Young offenders, Correspondence 255w

Streeter, Mr Gary
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 41, 44, 47, 49–57, 75

Streeter, Mr Gary—continued
Questions
Consultants, Dept for International Development 239–40w
Developing countries, Overseas aid 240w
Developing countries, Private sector 240–1w
Kosovo, Armed conflict 413w
Overseas aid 241w
Trade associations, Overseas aid 344w

Streetworks Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 960

Stringer, Mr Graham
Questions
Council of Ministers 120–4w
Football, World Cup 97w
Social security benefits, Abuse 49w

Strokes
Health services 281–2w

Structure plans
Essex (26.05.99) 279–81

Stuart, Ms Gisela
Debates etc.
Defence (10.06.99) 818–21
Questions
Nuclear weapons, Testing 329–30w
Occupational pensions 48w
Pensions, Public service 138–9w
Reading, Parents 777–8
Smoking, Advisory services 452

Student numbers
Further education 391w

Students
Fees and charges 99w, 124–5w, 143–5, 153–4, 316w, 385–6w
Housing benefit 11
Medical profession 19w
Scotland 11, 143–5, 153–4
Social security benefits 304w

Stunell, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
Greenhouse effect (09.06.99) 571–5
Transport, Manchester (26.05.99) 281–4
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 100–3, 118
Whitsun adjournment debate intervention (26.05.99) 296
Questions
Portcullis House 118w

Sub judice rule
Rulings and statements (26.05.99) 377–8

Sudan
Bombings 124w
Foreign relations 307w

Sunderland
General practitioners 271w

"Support in Bereavement Consultation Paper"
304w

Sure start programme
436–7w

Surgery
Waiting lists 270w

Sustainable Energy Agency Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
1R (26.05.99) 379–81

Sutcliffe, Mr Gerry
Questions
Cars, Insurance 92w
Dogs 266–7w

Sutcliffe, Mr Gerry—continued
Office for the Supervision of Solicitors 134w
Vehicles, Excise duties 92w

Sutherland Commission
see Long-term Care Royal Commission

Swayne, Mr Desmond
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 39
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 705, 734
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 91–2, 104
Questions
Aerials, Planning permission 228w
European Commission, Resignations 348–9
Grant maintained schools, Finance 771–2
New deal for lone parents 49w
NHS, Wales 629
Social security benefits, Abuse 16
Students, Fees and charges 153–4

Swimming
Lancashire 101w
Schools 101w

Swinney, Mr John
Questions
Students, Fees and charges 144

Syms, Mr Robert
Questions
Child Support Agency 49w
National Assembly for Wales, First secretary 357w
Students, Fees and charges 124–5w

Takeovers
Post Office 110w

Tapsell, Sir Peter
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 367, (08.06.99) 475
Questions
Official engagements 194w, 347w

Targeted policing initiative
422–5w

Tax allowances
Health insurance 112w, 462

Tax burden
288w

Tax thresholds
VAT 58w

Tax yields
VAT 58w

Taxation
Aircraft 380w
Derelict land 142w
EC action 344–5, 380w
Energy 645
Recruitment agencies 286–7w
Reform 183w

Taxis
Licensing 174w

Taxpayers
State retirement pensions 52w

Taylor, Ms Dari
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 366–7
Questions
Young people, Voluntary organisations 774

Taylor, Mr David
Questions
Headteachers, Training 390w
Urinary system, Diseases 160w

Taylor, Mr Ian
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 217–8, 227–31
Kosovo (08.06.99) 473

Taylor, Rt Hon John D
Questions
Casement, Roger 394–5w

Taylor, Mr John M
Questions
Birmingham Airport 168–70w
Child Support Agency 300w
Meat, Import controls 643
State retirement pensions, Taxpayers 52w

Taylor, Mr Matthew
Questions
Genetically modified organisms, USA 3–5w
St Kilda 270w
USA, Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 175w
USA, Dept of Trade and Industry 364w
USA, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 44–5w
USA, Prime Minister 393w
USA, Welsh Office 63–4w

Taylor, Sir Teddy
Debates etc.
Kosovo (08.06.99) 476–7
Questions
Business questions 787
Ministerial duties, Scottish Office 148
Schools, Private sector 384w
Sudan, Bombings 124w

Teachers
770
Computers 782
Pay 384w, 388w
Sixth form colleges 100w
South West region 384w
Standards 101–2w, 310w

Teaching methods
Gifted children 766–8

Technology
Small businesses 184w

Teenage pregnancy
Rotherham 451
Social Exclusion Unit 450–1

Telecommunications
EC action 400w

Telephone numbering
Small businesses 401w

Telephone services
Charities 343w

Television
Licensing 94w, (09.06.99) 650–2
Smoking 272–3w

Temple-Morris, Mr Peter
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 682–6, 688–9

Territorial Army
Manpower 1w

Terrorism
Libyan Arab Republic 308–9w
Northern Ireland 336–7

Textiles
Trade competitiveness 203–4w

Thameslink
Hendon 217w
Overcrowding 217w

The Tote
see Horserace Totalisator Board

Thomas, Mr Gareth
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 701, 715, 732–3
Questions
NHS, Wales 631

Thomas, Mr Gareth R
Debates etc.
Photovoltaics (25.05.99) 263
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 504
Sustainable Energy Agency Bill, 1R (26.05.99) 379–81
Questions
Diplomatic service, Unpaid fines 355–6w
Schools access initiative 391w
Serbia, Sanctions 354w
Social Security Act 1998 103–4w

Thompson, Mr William
Questions
Orange Order, Drumcree 342–3

Tibet
Farmers 180w

Timms, Mr Stephen, Minister of State, Dept of Social Security*
Questions
Housing benefit, Tower Hamlets 339w
Identity cards, Confiscation orders 406w
National insurance 304w
Occupational pensions 48w
Pensioners, Income support 8–10, 53–4w, 103w
Pensioners, Income tax 54w
Pensions 47–8w, 50w
Social security benefits, Abuse 2–3, 15–6, 49w, 187w
Social security benefits, Post offices 3, 10, 16
Social security benefits, Widowed people 340w
Stakeholder pensions 48w, 340w
State earnings related pension scheme, Widowed people 51w, 383w
State retirement pensions, Age addition 55w
State retirement pensions, Carers 51w
State retirement pensions, Disabled 304–5w
State retirement pensions, Taxpayers 52w
Winter fuel payments 187w

Tipping, Mr Paddy, Parliamentary Secretary, Privy Council Office*
Debates etc.
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 740–3
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 418
Recess motions (26.05.99) 309–12
Standing Order No 152 (26.05.99) 430, 435

Tobacco
Developing countries 370w, 413w
Labelling 56w

Todd, Mr Mark
Questions
Coal Authority, Archives 344w
Environmentally sensitive areas 44w
Post offices, Rural areas 349–50

Tolls
Birmingham Relief Road 85w

Tonge, Dr Jenny
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 52, 59–62, 78

Tonge, Dr Jenny—continued*
Questions
Quarantine 42w
Social Exclusion Unit, Teenage pregnancy 450–1

Touhig, Mr Don
Questions
Northern Ireland Assembly 337–8

Tourism
Cornwall (26.05.99) 288–90
Millennium 367w
Training 38w

Tower Hamlets
Housing benefit 339w

Town and Country Planning (Use Classes) Order 1987
Debates etc.
(11.06.99) 961–8

Townend, Mr John
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 374

Trade agreements
Aviation 172–3w

Trade associations
Overseas aid 344w

Trade competitiveness
Clothing 203–4w
Electricity 197w
Textiles 203–4w

Trade promotion
Angola 308w

Trade unions
Medical profession 282w
VAT 58w

Training
Firearms 98–9w
Headteachers 390w
Private sector 438w
Tourism 38w
Young offenders 31w

Training Group Defence Agency
see RAF Training Group

Transport
Manchester (26.05.99) 281–4
Mixed oxide fuel 343w
Northern Ireland 324w
Schools 357w

Travel
Members (26.05.99) 411–26

Treasury
Ministerial policy advisors 181w
Proof of identity 286w
Public relations 180w

Treaty of Amsterdam
264–5w

Tredinnick, Mr David
Questions
Homeopathy 419–20w
Medicines Control Agency, Manpower 157–8w
Ministerial duties, Welsh Office 358w

Trend, Mr Michael
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 251–5

Turkey
Arms trade 370w
Human rights 352w

Turner, Dr Desmond
Questions
Heavily indebted poor countries initiative 644–5
Stock Exchange, Disclosure of information 140w

Twigg, Mr Derek
Questions
Housing benefit, Abuse 18–20

Twigg, Mr Stephen
Questions
Voluntary organisations, Grants 151w

Tyler, Mr Paul
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 485
Line of route (26.05.99) 394–8, 400
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 99, 108
Whitsun adjournment debate intervention (26.05.99) 289–90
Questions
Council housing, Sales 229w
Slaughterhouses, Fees and charges 43–4w, 395w

Tyrie, Mr Andrew
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 42
European Communities (25.05.99) 180
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 670, 674, 680–1, 697, 712, 716–22, 726, 728
Kosovo (26.05.99) 365, (09.06.99) 754
Questions
Visits abroad, Dept of Trade and Industry 204w
Visits abroad, Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 249–50w

UK Debt Management Office
Standards 285–6w

Ulster Unionist Party
Correspondence 393w

UN Convention on the Rights of the Child
282w

UN Register of Conventional Arms
354w

UN Security Council
Public appointments 26–7w

Unemployment
Older workers 769–70

UNESCO
180w

Uniforms
Armed forces 208w

United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority Constabulary
Inspections 110w

United Nations
Kosovo 347–8

University for Industry
Prisoners 28w

Unleaded petrol
British Standards Institution 167–8w

Unpaid fines
Diplomatic service 355–6w

Untreated milk
196w
Correspondence 196w

Uranium
Iraq 12w

Urban areas
Cycling 9w
Walking 9w

Urban Task Force
91w

Urinary system
Diseases 160w

USA
Beef 111w
Biotechnology 175w
Criminal proceedings 409w
Dept of the Environment Transport and the Regions 175w
Dept of Trade and Industry 364w
Genetically modified organisms 3–5w
Ministry of Agriculture Fisheries and Food 44–5w
Nuclear weapons 211w
Prime Minister 393w
Welsh Office 63–4w

Vaccination
Animal products 159w, 280w
Iraq-Kuwait conflict 205–6w

Value Added Tax (Input Tax) Order 1992
Questions
57w

Value Added Tax (Sport Sports Competitions and Physical Education) Order 1998
Questions
57w

VAT
Cars 58w
Financial services 289w
Local authorities 57w
Property transfer 57w
Tax thresholds 58w
Tax yields 58w
Trade unions 58w

VAT exemptions
139w

VAT (Goods Used for Exempt Supplies) Order 1999
Questions
58w

VAT returns
Internet 57w

Vaz, Mr Keith, Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Dept*
Questions
Administration of justice 134–5w
Civil proceedings 136w
Community Legal Service 62w, 135w
Consolidation bills 316–8w
Contact orders, Domestic violence 318w
Coroners, Northern Ireland 300w
County courts, Staffordshire 160
Crime and disorder partnerships 158–9
Family Law Advisory Board 326w
Immigration, Appeals 155–6
Judges Council 157–8
Juries 367–8w
Legal aid, Coroners 159–60
Legal aid, Expenditure 60w
Magistrates, Barnsley 136w, 143w
Magistrates, Doncaster 136w
Magistrates, Ethnic groups 135w
Magistrates, Retirement 156–7
Minimum wage, Lord Chancellor's Dept 318w
Office for the Supervision of Solicitors 134w
Open government 134w
Personal injury, Compensation 135–6w, 318w, 326w

Vaz, Mr Keith—continued*
Police stations, Shropshire 159

Vehicles
Excise duties 92w
Police 431w

Vetting
Criminal records 431w

Viagra
417w

Viggers, Mr Peter
Debates etc.
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 414
Questions
Armed forces, Health services 329w
Closed circuit television, Scotland 147
Pensioners, Income support 17–8
Royal Naval Hospital Haslar 283w

Violence
Northern Ireland 340
Young offender institutions 28–9w

Vocational guidance
Wales 146–7w

Voluntary organisations
Grants 151w
Young people 774

Voluntary schools
Pre-school education 388–9w

Voting rights
Prisoners 73w, 76w

Waiting Times (National Health Service) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
1R (25.05.99) 175–7
2R order read (11.06.99) 960

Wales
AIDS 65–8w
Aviation 356w
Beef 633–4, 638
Child protection registers 267w
Council of Ministers 635
Dairy farming 361–2w, 638
Drugs 634–5
EC grants and loans 356w, 359–60w, 635–6
Farmers 359w
Finance 268–9w
Health authorities 268–9w
Heart diseases 357–8w
HIV infection 64w, 68–70w
Job creation 359w
Junior doctors 630–1
Livestock 359w, 362w
Lobbying 636
New deal schemes 360w
NHS 360–1w, 629–31
NHS trusts 3w
Non-departmental public bodies 636–7
Organic farming 3w, 267w
Proportional representation 636
Public expenditure 411w
Radioactive wastes 268w
Schools 146w, 357w
Small businesses 631–3
Vocational guidance 146–7w

Walker, Mr Cecil
Questions
New deal schemes, Northern Ireland 178w

Walking
Urban areas 9w

Walley, Ms Joan
Debates etc.
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 509–12

Walley, Ms Joan*—*continued
Questions
Petrol, Environment protection 322w
RAF Signals Engineering Establishment, Standards 108w
RAF Training Group, Standards 331–2w

Walton bridge
229w

Wandsworth
Schools 386w

War pensions
7–8

Ward, Ms Claire
Questions
Catering, Dept for Culture Media and Sport 94w

Wardle, Mr Charles,
Debates etc.
Eastbourne Hospital, Nurses (24.05.99) 134–5, 137–8

Warm deal
Scotland 373w

Warrington
Pensioners 4

Warships
213–4w
Procurement 107w

Waste disposal
Bovine spongiform encephalopathy 299w

Waste management
175w

Water charges
Severn Trent Water (09.06.99) 620–8

Water companies
84–5w

Water treatment
Fluoride 419w
Staffordshire 15w

Waterson, Mr Nigel
Debates etc.
Eastbourne Hospital, Nurses (24.05.99) 134–7
Kosovo (08.06.99) 478–9

Watts, Mr Dave
Questions
Social security benefits, Appeals 47w

Wave power
Research 345w

Weapons
Armed forces 392–3w
Northern Ireland 177w, 179w, 340–1, 344

Webb, Mr Steve
Debates etc.
Internet, Access (09.06.99) 612–8
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 97
Questions
Income support 301–2w
Members, Allowances 394w
National Insurance Fund 102w
Official Report, CD-Rom 393–4w
Pensioners, Income support 103w
Pensioners, Income tax 54w
Social security benefits, Students 304w
Stakeholder pensions 48w
State retirement pensions, Age addition 55w

Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill 1998/99
Questions
12–3

Welfare state
Reform 350

Wells, Mr Bowen
Debates etc.
Commonwealth Development Corporation Bill, 2R (24.05.99) 38, 63–70, 79
European Communities (25.05.99) 182, 215

Welsh, Mr Andrew
Questions
Higher education, Scotland 133w

Welsh Assembly
see National Assembly for Wales

Welsh Office
Advertising 267–8w
Junior ministers 357w, 637
Ministerial duties 358w
Ministers 357w
USA 63–4w

Wembley Stadium
97w

West Kent Health Authority
115w

West Midlands
Beacon councils 8–9w
Manufacturing industries 142w

West Midlands Police
326w
Royal Ulster Constabulary 325w

Westminster City Council
Inquiries 85w

Westminster Hall sittings
(24.05.99) 81–133

Whales
Conservation 348–50w

Whitby
Dental services 274w

Whitehead, Dr Alan
Debates etc.
Photovoltaics (25.05.99) 261–5
Pollution Prevention and Control Bill, 2R (08.06.99) 515
Questions
Lorries, Refrigeration 81–2w
New deal for young people 385w
Photovoltaics 109w

Whittingdale, Mr John
Questions
Hospitals, Waiting lists 270–1w

Wicks, Mr Malcolm
Debates etc.
Kosovo (26.05.99) 362, (09.06.99) 752–3
Questions
Gifted children, Teaching methods 767–8
Pensioners, Income support 10

Widdecombe, Rt Hon Ann
Questions
Commission for Health Improvement, Operating costs 416w
Hospitals, Waiting lists 270w
Junior doctors, Working hours 445–6
Midwives, Career structure 382w
NHS, Finance 283w
NHS, Operating costs 381w
Surgery, Waiting lists 270w

Widowed people
Employment 303w
Social security benefits 340w
State earnings related pension scheme 51w, 383w

Wigley, Rt Hon Dafydd
Questions
Council of Ministers, Wales 635
NHS trusts, Wales 3w
Welfare Reform and Pensions Bill 1998/99 12–3

Wildlife and Countryside (Amendment) Bill 1998/99
Debates etc.
2R order read (11.06.99) 958

Wilkinson, Mr John
Debates etc.
Armed conflict, Kosovo (26.05.99) 304–6
Defence (10.06.99) 800, 846–9
Questions
Housing benefit 14–5, 47w
National Assembly for Wales, Costs 360w
NHS, Greater London 272w
Northern Ireland Assembly, Ministers 337–9

Willetts, Mr David,
Questions
Assisted places scheme 777
Grant maintained schools, Finance 772
Jobseeker's allowance 100w, 190w
Ministerial policy advisors, Dept for Education and Employment 190–1w, 194w
Students, Fees and charges 385–6w

Williams, Mr Alan W
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 215, 223–7

Willis, Mr Phil
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 171
Questions
Business questions 785–6
Curriculum, Citizenship 773–4
Northern Ireland government, Electoral systems 339
USA, Criminal proceedings 409w

Wills, Mr Michael, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Dept of Trade and Industry*
Debates etc.
Internet, Access (09.06.99) 616–9
Questions
Business links, Expenditure 401w
Cryptography, Law enforcement 195–6w
EC grants and loans, Scotland 22w
Small businesses 400–1w
Small businesses, Telephone numbering 401w
Telecommunications, EC action 400w
Telephone services, Charities 343w
Training, Private sector 438w

Wilshire, Mr David
Questions
Walton bridge 229w

Wilson, Mr Brian, Minister for Trade, Dept of Trade and Industry*
Questions
Export credit guarantees, Indonesia 235–6w
Ilisu dam 342w
Import controls 235w
Import controls, Food 345–6w
Overseas trade, Human rights 346w
Trade associations, Overseas aid 344w
Trade promotion, Angola 308w

Wilson, Mr Brian—continued
Winnick, Mr David
Debates etc.
Concessionary Television Licences for Pensioners Bill, 1R (09.06.99) 650–2
Kosovo (26.05.99) 365–6, (08.06.99) 475
Questions
Business questions 787
Members, Correspondence 409w, 420w
Social security benefits, Disabled 13–4
State earnings related pension scheme, Widowed people 51w

Winter fuel payments
187w

Winterton, Mrs Ann
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 163–4
Questions
Business questions 789
Drugs, Scotland 126–7w
Drugs, Wales 634–5
Gifted children, Teaching methods 767
Prisons, Drugs 151–2w

Winterton, Mr Nicholas
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 374
Kosovo (09.06.99) 751–2
Roads, Manchester (26.05.99) 277–9
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 90, 113–7, 124
Questions
Business questions 791–2
Economic and monetary union 351–2
Food Standards Agency, Fees and charges 128w
Junior ministers, Welsh Office 357w, 637
Lorries, Exhaust emissions 164w
Schools, Closures 778–9

Winterton, Ms Rosie
Debates etc.
European Communities (25.05.99) 195–8
Questions
Health action zones, South Yorkshire 275w

Wise, Audrey
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 486
Kosovo (08.06.99) 479

Wise, Audrey—continued
Questions
Guild Community Healthcare NHS Trust 460

Withholding tax
352

Witnesses
Protection 436w

Women
see Females

Woolas, Mr Phil
Questions
Petrol, Retail trade 200w

Work permits
Football (26.05.99) 271–2

Working families tax credit
181–3w
Parental leave 60w, 105w, 182w, 380w

Working hours
Junior doctors 445–6, 458

World Cup
Football 97w

World War II
Art works 230w

Worthington, Mr Tony
Questions
Aircraft, Air conditioning 10w
Asbestos, Import controls 11w
EC grants and loans, Scotland 126w
Macedonia, International assistance 193w, 392w

Wright, Dr Tony
Debates etc.
Drugs (25.05.99) 171–2
House of Lords, Reform (09.06.99) 710–6
Questions
Birmingham Relief Road 377w
Birmingham Relief Road, Tolls 85w
British-Irish Interparliamentary Body 177w
Contraceptives, Health hazards 156w
Inflatable bouncing devices, Injuries 202w
Magistrates, Retirement 156–7
Political parties, Finance 638–9
World War II, Art works 230w

Wyatt, Derek
Questions
Community hospitals, Private finance initiative 456
Computers 390–1w
Correspondence, Dept of Health 115w
West Kent Health Authority 115w

X rays
Customs and Excise 56w

Yeo, Mr Tim
Debates etc.
Dioxins (08.06.99) 481–3
Questions
Advisory Committee on Releases to the Environment, Public appointments 5w
Biotechnology 291w
Biotechnology, Advisory bodies 291w
Biotechnology Presentation Group 290w
Chief Medical Officer, Publications 292w
Genetically modified organisms, Animal feed 396w
Genetically modified organisms, Crops 163w, 246–7w
Genetically modified organisms, Health hazards 290–1w

Young, Sir George
Debates etc.
Business questions (26.05.99) 373
Members, Travel (26.05.99) 421–2
Opposition, Finance (26.05.99) 428–9
Westminster Hall sittings (24.05.99) 86–91
Questions
Business statements 783–5
Taxis, Licensing 174w

Young offender institutions
29–30w
Health services 70–1w
Manpower 31–2w
Violence 28–9w

Young offenders
Correspondence 255w
Education 30w, 32w
Prison accommodation 32w
Training 31w

Young people
Compulsorily detained mental patients 30w
Military discipline 212w
Voluntary organisations 774

"Youth and Europe - Our Future"
436w

Yugoslavia
Arms trade 200w

REFERENCE